The small town of Siren

Bai Liu woke up cramped in the backseat of a dilapidated car, the air thick with the stench of stale smoke. The damp seatbacks pressed uncomfortably against him, while water streaked down the fogged-up windows, blurring the dreary landscape outside. The sky hung in a monotonous gray, so bleak it was impossible to tell whether it was dusk or night. A faint, nauseating odor of salted fish clung to the air, stubbornly sticking to his nostrils.

In front of him, a translucent panel flickered to life, its cold, stark text reading:

[Instructions for the Game]

Bai Liu frowned, confusion clouding his thoughts.

Where am I? How did I get here? And what's with this panel?

As though responding to his unspoken questions, the panel shifted and updated:

[You are in a deadly game. You were chosen because we detected a strong desire for money that activated the game after you lost your job.]

The words hung in the air, and Bai Liu's memories slowly came rushing back.

Yes. That's right. He was unemployed.

But more than that, he was a man consumed by an insatiable hunger for wealth. Even as a child, his obsession had been so extreme that a psychiatrist once diagnosed him with "money hoarding disorder." The psychiatrist had warned that his compulsive fixation on money would eventually ruin him if he didn't learn to control it.

At the time, Bai Liu had brushed off the warning. With a steady job, his desires were under control. But losing that job was like releasing a starving dog from its leash. Anxiety gnawed at him day and night, his craving for money spiraling out of control, fueling reckless fantasies of amassing a vast fortune.

His psychiatrist had suggested he relax and "see the world."

"Relax?" Bai Liu had sneered. "Without money, all I'll see is hell—not the world."

The psychiatrist had hesitated, then tried to soothe him. "Well, you won't get rich by traveling. In fact, you'll probably just get poorer."

Bai Liu had stared at him, deadpan. "You knew that already, didn't you?"

"But after becoming poorer, you'll realize..." the psychiatrist began, his tone gentle, "that money is just an external thing. Why torment yourself over it?"

Bai Liu's response had been biting. "Is it painful to have a patient like me?"

The psychiatrist had fallen silent, visibly uncomfortable.

Bai Liu had left the session with a new revelation: poverty wasn't just a weapon to break a man's spirit—it was the ultimate weapon. It hurt the user more than anyone else.

Thankfully, the community psychiatry sessions were free. Otherwise, the cost of his misery would've only deepened.

After losing his job, Bai Liu's days blurred together in a haze of anxiety and impossible dreams. Each night, he imagined sitting atop a mountain of money, laughing with joy. But each morning, reality set in: his dwindling savings were all that remained.

One evening, as he rested his cheek against his palm, a reckless thought crossed his mind:

If only there were a high-risk, high-reward way to make money... I wouldn't care if it was dangerous—I just want it.

He'd shared this thought with a friend, who had glanced at the dusty Criminal Code on Bai Liu's shelf.

"See that book?" his friend had said. "Flip through it. There are bound to be a few entries about high-risk jobs. Work hard enough, and you might even make the expedited list this month."

Bai Liu had scowled. "I'm not breaking the law."

"Then keep dreaming," his friend had replied dryly.

And so, Bai Liu dreamed. That night, his mind clung to the idea of a gamble—anything for a chance to make money. As he drifted into sleep, so too did his grip on reality. And when he woke, he was here.

Snapping back to the present, Bai Liu stared at the glowing panel before him.

[Yes, your strong desire triggered the game. Succeed, and you will gain everything you desire.]

Without hesitation, Bai Liu responded, his voice firm: "I want money."

[If you succeed, you will earn points. Points can be exchanged for money, or anything else you wish.]

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly. "This... game of yours, it's legal, right?"

The panel hesitated again.

[...] Legal.

It continued:

[This is a horror escape game, filled with ghosts, murderers, and unimaginable terrors. Your task is to find their weaknesses, complete the game's storyline, and survive.]

As the final words appeared, Bai Liu felt the car shudder beneath him.

[Game loading... Loading complete.]

The air grew heavier, the smell of salted fish more pungent, as a low, unearthly sound echoed through the rain outside.

Bai Liu leaned back in the worn seat, a small, unbothered smile curling his lips.

No matter what it is, he thought, if it gets me money, I'll take it.

The panel responded:

[Your game will be broadcast on a small screen in the Newcomer section of the lobby. No one has watched it yet, and no one has 'recharged' you. You are currently silent.]

He understood now—it was like being an online game streamer, but his focus remained on the "recharge rate": "Someone can recharge me for points, right?"

The panel confirmed:

[Yes.]

[Good luck with your game, new player.]

The screen blinked out of existence as a white light flashed in front of Bai Liu's eyes.

In the game lobby, Bai Liu's small screen flickered to life, showing his calm, clean face. Around it, other screens displayed the terrified expressions of various new players—some cowering, some howling, struggling to accept the reality they faced.

Bai Liu stood apart from the others, an anomaly in the sea of terrified newcomers.

A passing player looked at his screen, eyes widening as they noticed his character panel.

"Wait! This player has a full 100 spirit value!"

"What?!"

"A hundred spirit points on a new player?!"

"Isn't the last person with that high spirit level in the top ten overall?"

The excitement spread like wildfire.

Bai Liu's small screen flickered again as a mechanical voice chimed:

[50 people have gathered around player Bai Liu's TV, and Bai Liu has earned the 'First Time Out' achievement, unlocking the 'One Touch Trifecta' system.]

[28 people liked Bai Liu's video, 56 liked his TV, but no one has recharged him yet. Try again.]

The small town of Siren

Bai Liu was lying on his side in the back row of a cramped van, struggling to turn over. As he moved, he noticed a necklace fall out from under his shirt.

His outfit, consisting of a white shirt and black trousers, hadn't changed since before entering the game. It was typical workwear, but the necklace was a new addition.

The pendant was a dollar coin with a hole punched through it. When Bai Liu touched it, a game panel popped up, the same one he'd seen before, with no additional information.

It seemed like this necklace might serve as a game manager's item.

Not particularly fond of the damaged coin, Bai Liu tucked it back into his shirt.

Peering out from the back of the van, he saw that it was a seven-passenger vehicle, with four other people sitting up front. As soon as his head appeared, one of them looked back at him, surprised. "Bai Liu, hey, my sweetie, you're finally awake!"

The rest of the group was obviously foreign. The person who had called him "sweetie" was a girl with curly brown hair, bold red lips, and brown eyes. She wore hot pants and suspenders. As soon as Bai Liu saw her, a panel with her information popped up.

[NPC Name: Lucy]
[Description: Your classmate, who likes your type of guy. Too shy to approach you, she is ten centimeters taller and more enthusiastic and daring than you.]

Bai Liu's gaze lingered on the part of the description that said, "Too shy," before quickly withdrawing into thought.

This game seemed to require players to focus their eyes on NPCs in order to trigger their info, much like hovering a mouse over a character in an online game. In this case, Bai Liu's eyes functioned as the player's mouse and gamepad.

He paused, realizing that in this game, at least, he couldn't lose his eyesight.

Lucy, still looking at Bai Liu, teased, “Hey, baby, did I wear you out? You’ve been asleep the whole trip.”

Bai Liu, who had long been accustomed to his single life, had mixed feelings. "....."

A painless end to single life.

Bai Liu shook off his thoughts, turning his attention to the view outside the van window. The landscape seemed increasingly remote and cold. “Where are we headed? Why does it look so isolated here?”

From the front of the van, a sarcastic voice cut through the silence: “Looks like someone’s trying to run away again.” A tall man, dressed in tight jeans and a sports T-shirt, folded his arms and looked at Bai Liu with disdain. His massive frame made his shirt stretch tight, giving him the look of a rugby player.

He sneered at Bai Liu, “Too late, Bai Liu. Even if you're a coward and want to run, we're already headed to Siren Town.”

The game panel popped up again.

[NPC Name: Andre]
[Description: Your rival, who loves Lucy but has been rejected by her, is hostile toward you. You proved your love for Lucy by betting that you would protect her in the most dangerous place in the world. Now, you’re heading to Siren Town, where you regret your decision, but Andre forced you into it.]

Bai Liu had seen "Siren Town" twice now, and ignoring Andre’s taunts, he asked, “Siren Town? What’s that?”

Before Andre could continue mocking him, a quiet, continuous chant interrupted the conversation.

“Siren Town, the only seaside town in history where remains of sirens have been found. Many people have claimed to have seen the Siren here, or heard their beautiful songs on the waves. Some even say these demonic-looking mermaid sirens feast on human corpses on the dark reefs...”

“Jeff!” Andre interrupted, visibly irritated. “Those are just stories the town made up to attract tourists!”

A small boy, wearing thick glasses, hugged a book to his chest and flinched under Andre's harsh tone, but still spoke back in a quiet, fearful whisper. "Then how do you explain the mysterious disappearances of tourists in Siren Town? Twelve people vanished last month, and the police have found nothing. No one saw them leave..."

Bai Liu looked at the game panel.

[NPC Name: Jeff]
[Description: An avid fan of mermaids, sea monsters, and unnatural creatures. He volunteered to join the trip to Siren Town and is very familiar with its legends.]

Andre scoffed, "Most of those people just drowned in the water. It's perfectly normal to drown at the beach."

Jeff retorted in a dark, eager tone, "The police have been searching for a month and haven't found a single body. If they drowned, why haven't they recovered any of them? Unless... their bodies were eaten by a Siren. The police can't recover what's been eaten..."

Andre finally snapped and slapped Jeff on the head. "Shut up, you four-eyed freak! All you ever talk about is mermaids and fish! You look like one yourself!"

The blow was so hard that Jeff's head slammed against the seat, causing him to dizzyingly hit Andre in return. Furious, Andre slapped Jeff multiple times, knocking out one of his teeth.

Jeff, silent and holding his mouth, picked up the tooth and looked at Andre with a subtle but intense hatred. Softly, barely audible, he mouthed, "The mermaid will tear you apart and swallow you, Andre."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow but said nothing. The NPC relationships were complicated, to say the least.

It seemed Andre had been bullying Jeff for some time, and now Jeff had some kind of revenge plan involving the "mermaid."

The driver, a local from Siren Town, had been paid by Bai Liu to drive the group. Bai Liu learned from Lucy's conversation that the driver was wealthy and had arranged for the group's food and lodging.

They drove through the night, reaching Siren Town late. The driver described it as a fishing village that had been rundown until the new mayor promoted rumors of mermaids to draw in tourists.

One example was a visitor who had checked into the hotel one night, only to be gone by morning. The door was locked, the bed was warm, but the person had vanished.

Because of these disappearances, Siren Town was desolate during the tourist season. Many businesses had closed due to poor trade.

Upon arriving, Bai Liu found Siren Town exactly as described: a run-down place with fences, fishing nets, and seaweed everywhere. Only a few hotels had decent decor. Despite the late hour, the streets were busy with people heading towards the beach.

As Bai Liu's group arrived, the townspeople stopped in unison and turned to look at the van. Their eyes gleamed a strange, cat-like green in the darkness, and their expressions were unsettling—smiles that stiffened unnaturally at the corners of their mouths.

They were holding nets and hooks, some carrying oil lamps, and their eyes followed the van as if preparing to strike.

The driver, sensing the tension, warned, "You need to be careful. These people are poor and see you as rich targets."

Because of Bai Liu's wealth, the driver had arranged for them to stay at the best hotel in the area.

The hotel was a luxurious five-star establishment that seemed out of place in the town. A fountain pool sat at the entrance, with a limestone statue of a mermaid standing on a base of cold white wax.

The mermaid was lifelike, her skin glistening in the moonlight, with her long hair flowing over her ample chest. She held a water jug from which a fountain poured into the pool, mimicking the sound of waves.

The driver bypassed the fountain and drove directly to the front entrance.

Suddenly, Jeff gasped, pointing at the mermaid statue. "She just looked at me! She just moved!"

The small town of Siren

Bai Liu followed Jeff's gaze and saw that the wax figure of a mermaid remained perfectly still, staring into the water with her eyebrows furrowed.

Andre, startled by Jeff's shout, punched him hard. "The wax figure isn't moving! It hasn't moved at all! If you keep this up, I'm going to rip your voice box out and stomp on it!" he growled.

Jeff covered his bruised head, fear in his eyes, curled into a ball, and whispered to himself, "She moved... she really moved..."

Lucy, also unnerved by Jeff, forced a smile. "Jeff, how can you be so sure? This mermaid wax figure doesn't have eyes, so how could you know it's looking at you?"

The wax figure, a creamy white mermaid, was made of cold, translucent wax, with half-melted droplets on her face, giving her an eerie look.

The eyes were carved into the figure, but they were pure white, with no pupils, making her appear soulless, like a dead being standing silently in front of the hotel.

"Haven't you all noticed?" Jeff's voice dropped lower and grew shaky. "No matter where we go, this wax figure is always looking directly at us, and her eyes... they're definitely moving..."

"That's... what I thought it was," Lucy said, visibly relieved. She finally laughed, albeit nervously. "It's like that 'Mona Lisa's Smile' portrait, right? No matter where you stand, it always feels like the person in the painting is looking at you."

"No, this isn't the same. A portrait can give the illusion of looking at you from different angles because it's two-dimensional. This wax figure is three-dimensional," Bai Liu replied calmly. "Jeff's right. The eyes on this figure do seem to move."

It felt the same as when the townspeople stared at them upon their arrival, as if they were prey in a hunter's territory.

This thing, Bai Liu realized, was probably some sort of monster.

The coin on his chest suddenly vibrated, bringing up a new panel—a heavy, antique medieval book slowly flipped open before him.

A photograph appeared on the page—an image of the mermaid's wax figure submerged in murky waters, her face half-exposed, her uncarved eyes staring silently at Bai Liu, as though she might crawl out of the picture at any moment.

[Monster Name: Mermaid Wax Figure (Nymph Status)]

[Attack Method: ?? (Unexplored)]

[Weakness: ?? (Unexplored)]

The question marks were smudged with what appeared to be wet ink, making it impossible to read. Fluorescent text hovered behind the stains.

A note under the weaknesses section read:

The monster book had four pages, and the next page refused to turn, displaying only unlocked monsters from other game copies.

It seemed similar to a system where defeating a monster grants a reward. The more dangerous the monster, the greater the reward.

But judging by the conditions, it encouraged players to provoke and defeat the monsters...

Bai Liu, a player with the combat skills of a high schooler's book bag, rubbed his chin thoughtfully.

Lucy grabbed Bai Liu's hand in a slight panic. "Is she really moving?!"

"How could that be?" Andre, briefly shaken by Bai Liu's words, quickly suppressed his fear. He mocked, "Bai Liu, you coward! If you're too scared to stay, just go! But when you leave, you'll give up Lucy and get on your knees to lick my shoes!"

That was the bet between Bai Liu and Andre.

The driver, behaving oddly, tried to downplay the situation. "It's late, and you must be mistaken, right? There's no such thing as a moving wax figure! If there were, we'd make it a tourist attraction! Our town produces wax, and the mermaid figures are a feature—nothing unusual about it."

"Here we are! Get off the bus, folks! Rest up tonight, and have fun tomorrow!" The driver opened the door and ushered them out.

Bai Liu glanced back at the mermaid wax figure in the fountain. From a distance, it appeared to still be gazing into the water, her head slightly lowered. It didn't seem to be watching them.

But Bai Liu distinctly remembered that when they first arrived, the figure's front was not facing the entrance of the hotel—it had been turned toward them.

Two mermaid wax figures stood at the hotel entrance, one on each side, each holding a scepter and wearing twisted smiles, almost like they were forced to pose as waiters welcoming guests.

Inside the hotel, more mermaid wax figures were scattered throughout the space. Even behind the reception desk, a large mermaid wax figure held money in her hands, as if ready to check them out.

As the driver had said, the wax mermaids were everywhere in Siren Town, but the sheer number was overwhelming. From the floor lamps shaped like mermaids to mermaid pencil holders at reception, the figures were inescapable.

All these wax figures had one thing in common—wherever Bai Liu went, it felt as though they were staring directly at him.

None of the figures had pupils, which should have made it impossible for them to appear as if they were looking at him. Yet, Bai Liu couldn't shake the feeling that they were.

Even Andre, who had been mocking Bai Liu, got goosebumps once inside and rubbed his arms. Jeff, shivering, hid behind Andre, afraid of another punch.

Lucy clung to Bai Liu's arm, her face pale, still shaken by the strange hotel decor.

Bai Liu, however, calmly approached the receptionist. "Hello, my name is Bai Liu. I have a reservation."

The receptionist, a young man with an unnaturally pale complexion, wore a long kilt and moved awkwardly, his limited mobility making it hard to tell whether he was real or a wax figure.

When the receptionist suddenly moved, it startled Lucy, who covered her face and exclaimed, "Oh my God! You look like a wax figure!"

"I'm sorry," the receptionist apologized. "I have albinism. I didn't mean to scare you! Mr. Bai, is it? You booked four rooms. The reservation was made a week ago, and the fee has been paid. Here are your room cards. Enjoy your stay."

Bai Liu took the cards, relieved that they had four rooms. He hadn't wanted to share a room with Lucy.

Lucy, understanding, quickly recovered and flirtatiously glanced at Bai Liu. He ignored her with a neutral expression.

"I'd like to ask," Bai Liu said, "What's the deal with so many wax mermaids in your hotel?"

The receptionist replied, "The mermaids gave us everything. Before we discovered their remains, Siren Town had nothing. Since then, more tourists have come, and we've prospered. We are grateful to the mermaids. These wax figures are like talismans to us."

Bai Liu gestured to the mermaid wax figure behind the desk. "You've got quite a variety of these mermaid wax figures. The one behind you, it looks exactly like you. It also seems to be made from a different material."

It wasn't that Lucy couldn't tell the difference between the man and the wax figure, but the mermaid behind the desk looked strikingly like the receptionist, even with a more vivid expression, and it appeared more menacing.

The figure's eyes locked on the receptionist, and no matter where the man moved, the figure's gaze followed, as though it wanted to leap out and devour him.

The receptionist nodded. "Yes, that wax figure is my talisman. We have them made to look like us, and when danger comes, these figures will be mistaken for us, melting away to take the disaster in our

[New Discovery - Siren Small Town Monster Book Mermaid Wax Panel Refresh]

A chrysalis and a cocoon? So the mermaid wax figure had two different states?

Bai Liu mused that a chrysalis was an insect in its shell, while a cocoon was what remained after the adult emerged.

This "protecting the shell" concept seemed consistent with the receptionist's claim about defending against danger.

Bai Liu speculated that the wax figures likely had two states: [Bug] and [Butterfly], with the latter being more aggressive.

So far, the mermaid wax figures in the [Chrysalis] and [Cocoon] states didn't seem inclined to attack. However, their presence could be mentally distressing.

Bai Liu handed out the room keys, brushing off Lucy's attempt to share a room. He didn't want to deal with her flirtations.

Lucy, disappointed, quickly retreated.

Bai Liu entered his room and froze.

He had booked a better room, but it was filled with mermaid wax figures, from the lampshades to the bedside figure, glowing eerily in the dim light.

As Bai Liu entered, the eyes of the wax figures subtly shifted to follow him.

[Main Quest Activated: Player Bai Liu must survive the night in the hotel until morning. Must not be "hatched." Quest Reward: 20 points.]

The small town of Siren

The system gave Bai Liu his first task, but Bai Liu's focus was not on the task. Instead, he looked at the words [Avoid being hatched] and fell into a deep thought.

..... hatching?

Gee, can that bunch of wax figures hatch them?

Bai Liu made a silent note, and as soon as he turned around, he saw a wax figure of a mermaid of equal height standing across the bed.

This is the largest wax figure of a mermaid that Bai Liu has seen in the house.

The wax figure of a mermaid is beautiful, holding a one-person-high polished mirror, the frame of which is also embedded in wax, while the graceful hands of the mermaid are the support for the dressing mirror.

It is also the only wax figure of a mermaid in the room that is not looking at Bai Liu.

He looks into the mirror with a smile on his face, and he is reflected in it, his arms are wrapped around the mirror as if he were in it, making him slightly uncomfortable.

The eyes of the mermaid wax figure fall on the mirror, the brow inward, the corners of the eyes lowered, the fish tail splayed helplessly on the ground, with a realistic and cheerful expression, as if welcoming the person in the mirror.

Bai Liu looks in the mirror, and the [self] inside gives an eerie wax-like smile to the Bai Liu outside the mirror.

Bai Liu covers the mirror with a white cloth unmoved.

This level of horror doesn't work for Bai Liu, who is a horror game maker in the real world and often stays up until two or three o'clock alone to create all kinds of horror scenes. So, this kind of routine horror scene with a man in the mirror laughing at you is almost numb to Bai Liu, and he doesn't feel anything.

It seems that the tourists who disappeared silently directly from the hotel and whose bodies were never found, as Jeff said earlier, were probably [hatched] by these mermaid wax figures.

Although Bai Liu doesn't know exactly what [incubation] is all about, it can't be good.

Conservatively, Bai Liu covered all the mermaid wax figures with white sheets from the hotel room, including the huge mirror, to block out the eerie and omnipresent view. It doesn't always work, but it's better than nothing.

Most importantly, with so many people looking at Bai Liu in fish wax, Bai Liu couldn't sleep either.

As he shielded himself from the mirror, he touched the mermaid wax figure's fish tail, which did not feel like a glossy, silky touch of wax, but was as slimy and wet as a sea fish.

Bai Liu even felt the scales on the tail of the wax figure under him gently open and close.

Bai Liu paused to smell his fingers after touching the wax figure and was surprised to smell a strong smell of fish, but when Bai Liu got close enough to sniff the mermaid wax figure, he didn't smell anything fishy, only the smoky aroma of the hotel room.

It could be the smell carried off the car...

... More likely Bai Liu himself gave off that fishy smell, and thinking about that mermaid wax figure that can [hatch] tourists, Bai Liu frowned, feeling a little uncomfortable.

What can be hatched from a mermaid wax figure?

Mostly it's just some nasty-looking fish or something.

The word [hatching] reminds Bai Liu of a film called "The Mermaid in the Sewer," which he watched two or three times for its source material and has not had any charming fantasies about mermaids ever since.

Bai Liu was tired after a long night's drive, so he simply cleaned himself up and lay down on his bed to drift off to sleep. His stamina was already at zero, and he desperately needed to sleep in relative safety to replenish it.

In the middle of the night, Bai Liu was awakened by a very dull, dragging, strange sound.

As soon as he opened his eyes, he saw that the white cloth that had previously covered the wax figures of the mermaids had somehow slipped off, leaving only a part of it hanging on these wax figures.

Some of these wax figures are covered by white cloths so that only one eye is visible, and their expressions seem to have changed slightly, from one of divine compassion to one of resignation and resentment, as they look at Bai Liu motionlessly, as if blaming him for covering them with white cloths.

Bai Liu noticed that the wax figures seemed to be closer together than they had been before he went to sleep, like a group of people about to gather at a table for a meal slowly gathering around his bed with their hands raised.

Especially the dressing-glass mermaid wax figure holding a huge mirror. Bai Liu woke up in a daze to see his feet almost on the mirror.

The huge mirror, which was facing the bed, had moved to fit against it.

As soon as Bai Liu sat up on his shrunken feet, he saw himself reflected in the mirror.

In the mirror, [Bai Liu's] skin is pale as rock, his eyes are devoid of black, and the cobwebbed pattern of marble surrounds them. [He] shows a stiff smile at the corners of his mouth to the Bai Liu outside the mirror, but in a flash, it becomes a normal mirror image again, as if it was just Bai Liu's imagination.

Bai Liu quietly got up from the bed and, without changing his face, tied the wax figures of the mermaids up with a white cloth.

To prevent the wax figures from breaking free, Bai Liu used twine to tie them twice, then wrapped the smaller ones in a white cloth and threw them into the wardrobe and locked them, while the larger ones were pushed into the bathroom and locked behind them, with the precision of a skilled kidnapper.

The objects appear to be somewhat restricted in their movement, not being able to move until Bai Liu is asleep, and it appears that even after Bai Liu is asleep, they need to break free of the white cloth and see Bai Liu before they can move towards him.

Some of the little wax figures of mermaids that had not gotten their white cloths off were just scurrying around in the white cloth, not gathering towards the bed but scattering and fleeing.

Once this rule was clarified, Bai Liu took the opportunity to increase the limit to the maximum.

Just as he was finishing this and clapping his hands together to get ready for bed, Bai Liu heard a door open and close and a creeping footstep from next door to him.

Bai Liu had just lain down on the bed. The four rooms he had booked were all adjacent to each other, with Andre and Jeff living in the rooms next to each other on the left and right.

The sound of the door opening and closing came from the left, which was Jeff's room. Bai Liu gets up from the bed and presses himself against the door to look through the cat's eye into the corridor.

Jeff was seen standing in the corridor and after looking around to make sure the corridor was clear, he sneaked down the hotel stairs.

Bai Liu frowned, "What are you doing up in the middle of the night?"

He was just about to open the door and follow him when he saw the door handle of Jeff's room, which had been closed, start to turn slowly again, as if someone else was about to follow Jeff out of his room.

Hotel rooms are for one person.

Lucy could not have gone to Jeff's room in the middle of the night. Andre was not on good terms with Jeff and could not have gone to Jeff in the middle of the night, and Bai Liu was in his room.

So, who is this person coming out of Jeff's room?

Bai Liu's heart skipped a beat as he realized something with a jolt and moved slightly away from his face which was pressed against the cat's eye.

It's not a person coming out of Jeff's room!

Jeff's door handle turned to a click and finally opened slowly from the inside, and Bai Liu heard again that dull dragging sound he had heard half-asleep, as if something was being dragged along on its knees on the floor.

But Bai Liu knew this time how the sound was made.

A human-sized wax figure of a mermaid emerges from Jeff's room, its face frozen in place, its face expressionless, its eyes deadly white from lack of eyes, its fish tail on the ground, scuffing and dragging along the empty corridor in the dead of night.

Its snow-white fishtail trailed across the hotel's sturdy old red carpet, leaving a greasy trail of wax on the carpet, and its full body remained motionless as it made its way up the stairs, reminding Bai Liu of a zombie's rigid ghoul that can only bounce forward.

... This thing can actually run out of the room by itself and open the door...

As the wax figure of the mermaid dragged out of Jeff's room reached the staircase, it seemed to sense something, and the head on its shoulder suddenly twisted rigidly 180 degrees and turned straight back.

The candles on its face are slowly melting away, revealing an almost fleshy lightness.

It then shifted its direction of travel and walked expressionlessly in the direction of Bai Liu's room.

Bai Liu made sure the door was unlocked and took two steps back with his back pressed against the door holding his breath as he wondered what the hell this thing wanted.

Bai Liu soon saw out of the corner of his eye that the cat's eye on the door had turned white and was still turning.

The thing was coming up to look at the person in the door with its eyes, and the thing that kept turning was the white eye of the wax figure.

This thing is searching through the cat's eye to find out who is in the room.

The white eyes on the cat's eyes are still rolling as Bai Liu slowly moves aside with bated breath, reaching out his foot to hook the white cloth on the floor, ready to cover himself with it.

The frightening image was projected onto the screen of the small TV and those waiting in front of the small Bai Liu TV held their breath and bit their hands with nervousness.

"Fuck fuck fuck, that's scary, I'd have dropped my mental value if I was in-game..."

"Steady on! Hold on! This place has a super high mortality rate for newcomers!"

"The monsters in Siren town are really nasty and it's hard for newcomers just coming in to keep their cool and figure out the weaknesses of this thing..."

The new players on the screens around Bai Liu have almost reached the point where the mermaid wax figure is blocking the door, and some players are playing a little faster and the mermaid wax figure outside the door is clanging against it.

One of the players was whimpering and crying while huddled by the vibrating door with his ears, a wooden stick trembling in his hand, seemingly ready to be used in an attack.

The mermaid wax figure banged on the door and he cried out and screamed a little, but no one came to his rescue. The door to this player's room stopped after two shakes, and the wax figure of the mermaid outside seemed to have left.

The sobbing player wiped his eyes and sighed with relief, propping himself up on the door and standing up weakly on his hands and feet.

But what he didn't notice was that the cat's eye on the door was still white, a pure white stone eye staring silently through it at the person inside.

That mermaid wax figure didn't leave at all, it just pretended to leave.

Seeing the player stand up, a strange and stiff smile appeared on the wax figure's face as it grinned contentedly as if it had found its prey.

The door was slammed twice more and easily broken open, with players who hadn't reacted screaming and being crushed underneath it.

The mermaid wax figure entered the house trailing its fish tail, a grin of strange innocence and odd hideousness on its face as it slowly reached out with open hands to the player pinned under the door.

The moment he was touched by the wax figure of a mermaid, the player seemed to be wrapped in something all over his body, his eyes rolled up, his limbs were curling up in slow motion, his legs were twitching and swaying on the ground together, like a fish struggling madly after being splashed with boiling water, and his skin turned stiff and pale in an instant.

The wax on the mermaid's body melted as quickly as if it had met hot water and wrapped around the stiff player on the floor.

Around the player's eyes appear marbled grey-black lines of the kind seen in Bai Liu's mirror, and the eyeballs disappear, leaving only the whites of the eyes covered with lines and the corners of the mouth stiffened and turned upwards.

He is wrapped in this melted wax as a wax figure of a mermaid.

[Play Yi Zhong Spiritual value is zero, completely alienated by the monster mermaid wax figure, game pass failed]

[Player Liu Xiaohong has zero spirit value and failed to pass the game by Mermaid Wax Figure ......]

[Player Zou Mingri ..... game pass failed]

The small TVs of the failed players went out with a "zippy" sound, and the people gathered around them sighed.

"Eh, I knew it, I guess it's still hard to have a pass this time, 'Siren Small Town' is so hard..."

It's only the first night, and the monster has only had one look, and almost a fifth of the entire [newcomers' area] TV wall is darkened with small TVs.

Bai Liu The TV screens above, below, and to the left and right went out, leaving him alone in a sea of black screens, staring calmly out the door.

Bai Liu could hear the crisp clang of marble against the door, and the door handle moved twice this time.

Although the door had been unlocked, the door handle sounded like it was soon to be scrapped with the fragile metallic fracture under the vigorous twisting of the wax figure of a mermaid outside the door.

The thing seemed to be trying to get in, its dead white eyes searched around Bai Liu's room, seemingly noticing that there was no one in the room, it seemed to leave Bai Liu's door, the door handle did not move, the room became silent and silent outside, the other side seemed to leave.

But Bai Liu still held his breath, he remembered that the thing made that dull sliding sound when it moved, and it wasn't right without it.

The mermaid wax figure had not left at all, but was still more or less silently guarding his door.

This thing is tricking him, luring him out, Bai Liu thought as he squinted and noticed that the cat's eyes, which had reverted to the colour of carpet, had suddenly turned back to the white of bulging eyeballs.

That thing is really still there.

The thing waited for a moment seemingly undeterred, still trying to get in, and the door handle was violently twisted into a protruding broken shape, rattling to slide off the door.

The mermaid wax figure outside the door is coming in.

Some of the kind-hearted viewers in front of the TV screen have already closed their eyes in disgust.

"It's rare to see a seeded player...eh, shame."

"The main thing is that this copy of Siren town is so disgusting, it's not even a novice copy of the difficulty, it's totally killing it for newbies."

Bai Liu's mind raced and his breathing slowed.

The game tells him quite clearly that these ghostly monsters have weaknesses that the player can use to escape from these monsters, so the way to break the game at the moment is to find the weaknesses that limit the movement of this thing.

Bai Liu closes his eyes to reflect on the whole process of moving in tonight.

As long as it's a game, it's got a solution, and games without solutions are the worst. Bai Liu has been making horror games for years, and he's beyond sure that there must be something that hints at the weakness of other people's fish wax figures.

What exactly is it .....

Bai Liu calmly begins to sort out all the scenes in which he meets the mermaid wax figure.

The first time was at the fountain outside the hotel, Jeff exclaimed that he saw the mermaid wax figure moving, the movement was silent, just spinning behind the car, the mermaid wax figure wasn't looking directly at them, it was looking into the water.

The second time was in the hotel lobby, where a huge number of various wax figures of mermaids, looking straight at them, did not move.

The third time was in the hotel room, except for the huge mermaid wax figure looking into the mirror, the rest of the mermaid wax figures looked straight at Bai Liu and started moving after Bai Liu fell asleep, the mirror mermaid was the fastest moving, but after Bai Liu woke up these wax figures did not move.

But apparently Bai Liu staying awake is not some condition that restricts the movement of the mermaid wax figure, because the one outside the door is ready to break in.

There will be no situation where the game cannot be broken, he must have something on him, something that can limit the movement of the mermaid wax figure.

It is not something in the room, it is not something in the hotel, it must be something brought by Bai Liu, because the hotel and the room do not restrict the movement of the wax figure of the mermaid, as evidenced by the fact that this wax figure was able to move freely in and out of Jeff's room before.

What exactly is it?

Mirror...water...sleep .... Look straight ahead!

Bai Liu knows what it is.

Bai Liu jerked to his feet as he pulled the door open and stared directly at the wax figure of a mermaid.

The wax figure outside the door is close enough to be seen from Bai Liu's point of view, the lifeless mermaid's face seemingly pressed against the tip of Bai Liu's nose, its palm still resting on Bai Liu's doorknob, its pure white beadless eyes peering through the cat's eye into the lower right corner - that's where Bai Liu is hiding.

No wonder this thing had to come in, it must have seen Bai Liu hiding in the bottom right corner behind the door.

Its movement stopped, its fish tail having touched Bai Liu's toe, and at the last moment of stepping into Bai Liu's room, it came to a standstill in front of Bai Liu's door.

Bai Liu was relieved to be right, the weakness that kept this thing immobile was the direct view of the human eye.

The crowd in front of the small TV was stunned.

"Holy shit!!! How did he think of that!!! Just pulled the door open without hesitation!"

"The average new player would not even think of it, and even if they did, they would not dare to pull the door open, only to look directly through the cat's eye, and that would still be certain death, because that close to look through a mirror image like the cat's eye, the movement of the mermaid wax figure would only be partially restricted, enough to break through the door."

"Woj, I got goosebumps when he just locked eyes with the mermaid wax figure!"

"What's his name, so awesome this new guy ...."

The crowd gradually gathers around Bai Liu's small TV.

[168 people watched player Bai Liu's mini-TV, player Bai Liu achieved

the Novice 100 achievement]

[102 people liked Bai Liu's TV, 143 people favorited Bai Liu's TV, 3 people charged Bai Liu's TV, 3 points were awarded to Bai Liu].

Bai Liu's expression on the small TV remains calm and collected, as if he doesn't think he's done anything remarkable.

Deducing the weakness that [Human Eyes] restricts the movement of mermaid wax figures when they see it is actually quite simple.

Because the wax figures started moving after Bai Liu went to sleep, and they stopped instantly after he woke up, the only difference before and after he went to sleep was that he opened his eyes, and that means that [human sight] is able to limit the movement of the wax figures of mermaids.

But there is a catch here - and that is that looking at such a thing across a mirror-like object only weakens some of the movement of the mermaid wax figure, and one must look directly at it to stop it completely.

Because there are two other kinds of wax figures that can also move under the direct view of the human eye, the wax figure of the fountain in front of the hotel and the wax figure of the mirror mermaid in the room.

The mermaid wax figure in the fountain pool outside the hotel door looks into the water, then one is looking [directly] at the mermaid wax figure through the water. Although the mermaid wax figure is restricted and cannot move fast, it can still move slowly or even turn, which is why it turns slowly at the door.

And of the mermaid wax figures in the room, the mirror mermaid is the fastest moving, also because the mirror mermaid looks inside the mirror and the limiting force given by the person looking [directly] at the wax figure through the mirror is limited, which is why the mirror mermaid runs the fastest.

The mermaid just now was looking at Bai Liu through the cat's eye, so it can move, while Bai Liu should be able to move if he is just looking directly at the mermaid wax figure through the cat's eye alone, although there will be some limitations.

This close, through the cat's eye is definitely not enough to limit the mermaid's movement to break in, if it is allowed in, the player is pinned under the door and loses the condition of [Human Eye Direct], the player will soon be dead.

But it has to be said that in this case, there are very few new players indeed who can have pulled the door open to look squarely at the mermaid wax figure.

Most of the players panicked, even if they deduced the condition of [Human Eyes Seeing Straight], they did not have the courage to verify it. Only Bai Liu, the one who wanted money and not life, had this kind of calmness even if he was not 100% sure his deduction was right, but still justified.

[Siren Small Town Monster Book] Mermaid Wax Panel Refresh

[Mode of attack: Hatching]

The wax figure of a mermaid with downcast eyes and a head tilted slightly to the right, the corners of her mouth slightly raised with a hint of a smile, a graceful fish tail, a flawless white body and a posture of indescribable hidden beauty and divinity.

Once this wax figure is fixed still, the spine-tingling invasiveness of its body disappears, transforming it into a wax figure of great aesthetic value, standing silently in front of the door of the house of a stranger in the midnight of the seaside.

[Player Bai Liu gets 3 points for watching player charge and unlocking the game merchandise shop]

[Points are too low to purchase any items, so please keep up the good work!]

That player charged three points, Bai Liu kind of got it, someone who was watching should have rewarded him, and this unlocked merchandise shop, where all the items were black and white, showed a status of [Unavailable for purchase].

After a few brief glances, he found that this merchandise shop had everything from daily necessities to weapons, and a lot of messy things, what with [intact heart], [magic potion at first sight], such unbelievable-sounding items were also on sale, but accordingly, the prices of such items were very high.

Bai Liu understood the phrase when he entered the game - [Points can buy everything you want].

Bai Liu closes the shop and stares at the wax figure of a mermaid that remains motionless in front of him.

It's true that the thing isn't moving now, but Bai Liu can't stay up all night confronting this thing, and after this incident, Bai Liu has a new appreciation for the destructive power of this thing.

He looked to the stainless steel handle that was just about to come off his own door.

Judging from the behaviour of those wax figures in his room earlier, it seems that although this thing has enormous destructive power, it can only rely on the eyes to locate it, or rather, it is only sensitive to visual things, and once it is covered by the white cloth there is no way to locate Bai Liu, even if it is difficult to find him in the same room.

In other words, the mermaid wax figure appears to have no senses such as hearing and smell.

If Bai Liu was in the same size room as the wax figure of many fish, it would have been easy to locate Bai Liu by listening to his breathing and unscrewing his head like a doorknob, so there would be no need to rip off the white cloth to find him.

.... What a pain in the arse, and such a large quantity, what a burden to keep.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes slightly and had an evil thought in his mind - now he had a wax figure in front of him that was motionless and at his mercy, could he experiment with it and see what its weaknesses were, like roasting it over a fire and knocking it to pieces with a stick ....

[Tip: If the player attacks the monster directly, if the monster does not die, it will cause the monster's hate value to stay on the player for a long time and will keep attacking the player, reducing the player's survival rate]

Bai Liu strokes his chin thoughtfully and he smiles, a small, harmless pear swirl appearing on the right side of his face.

"Attacking it directly will cause it to hold a grudge against me and take revenge on me, right..." Bai Liu said to himself, "Then I can't be blamed if something happens to it on its own."

Bai Liu did the same trick again, wrapping the mermaid wax figure in a sheet and then tying the openings underneath with string, before he unkindly placed the mermaid wax figure at the entrance to the hotel staircase.

The wax figure of a mermaid walks around headlessly when it cannot be seen. Bai Liu put the wax figure of a mermaid in this place so that the wax figure would actively fall down the stairs.

Bai Liu is not going to break these wax figures if there is hate value, which is fine if he can, but if he can't, he's obviously going to get himself into trouble.

Bai Liu has only one pair of eyes, and if he is surrounded by wax figures in a 360-degree view, the horizontal view of the human eye is only 188 degrees at most, and Bai Liu has no way to see all of them with eyes in the back of his head, then he will surely die.

Bai Liu likes to do things that are more cost effective and although the game says that using weaknesses to escape from monsters is all that is needed, he wanted to know if he could just destroy the wax figures in some way.

Or whether there are other fatal weaknesses in these wax figures.

He doesn't do it by actively cracking or striking the wax figure of a mermaid, the risk is too great for him to take - who knows what will crawl out of this chrysalis or cocoon when it breaks.

But the mermaid wax figure has nothing to do with him if he stepped off the stairs and fell because of his own poor eyesight.

Bai Liu just wanted to do a little test to verify that the thing could be smashed and he retreated back into the room.

The wax figure of the mermaid did move shortly afterwards, and Bai Liu was puzzled. He was still looking at the wax figure, but it was covered by a white cloth and did not know that Bai Liu was looking at him, so it moved on its own.

This proves that [the human eye looking directly at it] is only an objective condition, and that the mermaid wax figure has to feel subjectively that it is being looked at directly in order to stop moving.

With so many wax figures in Bai Liu's room, there was no way for him to look at them all at once, and before Bai Liu had a chance to look around once he woke up, they had voluntarily stopped moving.

So as soon as the mermaid wax figure [feels] like it's being looked at directly, it will stop moving.

To be self-aware to this level, these things are indeed living creatures, or living creatures with some degree of intelligence, although it does not appear to be a high degree of intelligence.

The wax figure of a mermaid at the stairway struggled a few times, and with a stroke from the side of the stairway steps, it crackled down covered in white cloth, puffing out with a loud dusty thud.

Bai Liu stood on the stairs and looked down, patting the dust from his hands and tsking with some regret as he looked down at the wax figure of a mermaid, unscathed and only slightly curled up, with not even a crack in the marble.

..... really can't be broken ah ..... physical attacks are ineffective ah ....

Bai Liu was unaware that his villain-like appearance was on small TV, causing a crowd of players to gawk.

"Is this guy really a newcomer? Covered head in bed sheet, drops mermaid wax figure downstairs .... Was this new guy a kidnapper before he came in? Or a terrorist?"

"I was just nervous and scared for him, now I'm starting to feel sorry for the mermaid wax figure knocking on the door, it's fallen on its tail, it's so bad..."

"..... Does this guy really think of himself as a player?!"

"All the other players are trying to survive the monsters, but he's good, he just doesn't want the monsters to live..."

Bai Liu was oblivious to these discussions and his attention was soon drawn to something else when he saw Jeff.

Jeff was furtively hiding under the stairs, talking to someone, and after the conversation he walked back.

Jeff was sneaking out most of the night before, and now he's actually back.

Bai Liu had a good view from the stairs and saw that Jeff was followed by a man of the same height and dress as the driver who had driven them here today.

The two men seemed to be discussing something in whispers, and Jeff handed the driver a bunch of fancy things and gave him a few more instructions.

If Bai Liu is correct, the coins Jeff gave to the driver should be of this world.

[You have triggered the hidden storyline of Jeff's Bloody Plot]

[Explore the whole storyline, 50 points awarded, current storyline completion rate is 15%]

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed slightly as his hand reached into his collar and pulled out the perforated dollar coin and pointed it at the driver as the panel popped up with the character's information.

[Your driver, the one who drove your party to Siren Town, was hired by Jeff, who allegedly knows Siren Town well and has a history of arson and robbery.]

Sure enough, this is also a character npc with status.

Bai Liu and the driver had never come into contact with each other before, and the driver was sitting in the front seat while Bai Liu was in the last row, so he could not see the driver's face.

The driver did not get out of the car, so Bai Liu never got a frontal view of the driver, and therefore never got to identify the driver's character.

He hadn't thought anything of it before, but now that Bai Liu has looked back he realizes that it seems Jeff has been intentionally blocking Bai Liu from the driver, whether by choosing to sit between Bai Liu and the driver, or by the shriek he makes when he's about to get out of the car .....

What conspiracy do these two have to hide from themselves?

Based on what is known about the conspiracy, Bai Liu speculates that Jeff paid the driver, who had a criminal history, to do something for him. This is unknown at this time, but Bai Liu thinks it is likely to be revenge against Andre.

On entering the town the driver had already said that many people in this town had not had an economic source for a long time and that they should be careful.

Previously Bai Liu had thought this was a reminder, but now it seems to be more of a smug and arrogant admonition from the driver, and a sort of zoning out of the hunt.

He was sending a warning to Jeff - away from his cooperation and protection, Jeff could easily be harmed by the other townspeople in this town.

The driver, of course, was a citizen of the small town of Siren and was short of money, and certainly could have done something to rob Jeff's carload of people for lack of money.

The driver had probably done a lot of taking money from people, he didn't look like a good guy and was obviously crazy about the money, he was insinuating threats when they entered Siren Town.

There's no telling what this driver might do if he doesn't get the money in time.

Bai Liu went back to his room before Jeff saw him and helped Jeff close the door to the room that had been left open.

Jeff hesitates for a moment as he passes Andre's room and lowers himself. Bai Liu looked through the cat's eye and saw what Jeff had put down - a large piece of fish.

It wasn't long before Bai Liu saw a pile of gloomy white wax figures of mermaids gathered in front of Andre's room.

A series of dull, cackling wax movements resounded in the corridor again.

To be on the safe side, Bai Liu had covered the cat's eye of his room with a white cloth to keep the mermaid from prying eyes, and had used a cupboard against the door in the hope that if the mermaid broke in it would make some noise and wake him up.

His stamina had been emptied. Once this was done, Bai Liu lay back on the bed and closed his eyes.

A dreamless night.

The next day, Bai Liu woke up to find the wardrobe door and the door to his room closed, but the bathroom door was about to open.

Bai Liu opened the bathroom to find that the wax figures of the mermaids he had covered and tied up had broken free of their white cloths and were moving towards the bathroom door in various contorted and bizarre positions. Some of the wax figures had reached the door handle and were only a step away from turning away.

The poses of these wax figures of mermaids remind Bai Liu of the time when he played 123 Wooden Men and suddenly turned around to see the people behind him unable to control their expressions and gestures.

The way these eerie cold white wax figures chase and surge behind the door in order to get out is inexplicably oozing.

The oppressiveness of these human-like marble wax figures stacked like this is heightened by the high density of their eyes gazing into a small space Bai Liu, which can be uncomfortable, or as uncomfortable as any normal person would feel when being looked at by so many pairs of dead eyes.

Bai Liu closes the bathroom door and he no longer cares about the wax figures, nor does he tie them up anymore.

Because there is no point anymore.

These things are breaking free faster and faster, and if we can't find any more weaknesses to control this thing, constant masking and binding is a cost effective way to do it, and maybe work out the ability of these wax figures to get out of bondage quickly.

The moment Bai Liu opened the door to his room, a new message popped up in the panel.

[Player Bai Liu completed the main quest - Stay in the house overnight without being alienated, awarded 20 points]

[Current balance: 23 points, can buy props, does the player buy?]

Bai Liu opened the shop, he was now so poor that he could count on one hand what he could purchase. Bai Liu bought a 15 point strong searchlight torch and had 8 points left - he pondered slightly.

..... I don't know if there are any of those 3D holographic projection instruments.

[Yes, one for 4 points, on sale for 3 for 8 points, will the player buy 3?

Bai Liu nodded without thinking: [Yes!]

As a social animal who is short of money, two of the words he can't afford to hear in his life are [discount] and [sale].

It was only natural that he bought and played with the 3D projector he had gotten.

The quality of these discounted projectors is not bad at all. Bai Liu recorded his own portrait and the projection was amazing, with no bad quality at all, realistic colours and vivid characters, almost like real people when you look at them in the dark.

Bai Liu is very happy with his purchase.

But his viewers are not happy, and it's a tradition in this game that once a newcomer gets their likes, attention and airplay, they demand a certain amount from that newcomer.

A group of people gathered around the small TV pointing and sighing.

"This newcomer isn't trying to use the projector as a human-eye hokey-pokey mermaid wax figure, is he? It's written in the monster book that you need to see straight through the human eye. The projector will only fool the mermaid wax figure for a while, it won't last long."

"I can't believe I bought a discounted projector, it looks fancy, but it's useless! Otherwise it wouldn't be a stagnant item that no one would buy for a point a piece! What was this newbie thinking!"

"..... Yes, this projector was on sale when I came in and now, after all these years, it's still on sale ....."

"Fuck, 23 points, clearly the highest number of points in the newbie area so far, and it's all gone to waste, without buying a single useful item! Are you out of your mind?!"

Suddenly, a player shouted in surprise in front of a small screen, "Come here! There's a newbie over here who's bought the Flaming Torch! This thing kills mermaids, he's stable!"

The crowd suddenly left Bai Liu's small TV screen and gathered around the novice who had supposedly bought the right prop, many nodding approvingly.

"Yeah, that's the regular level-breaking prop, that's a good newbie idea."

"The Flaming Torch can be used three times, and with a good grasp, he should be the only newcomer in the group to get through."

Bai Liu's small TV is once again only a handful of people in front of it.

[50 people unliked Bai Liu's TV, 44 people unliked Bai Liu's TV, 17 people stepped on Bai Liu's TV and no one charged Bai Liu's TV].

.....

After testing his props, Bai Liu left the room and went to Jeff's room to wake him up.

Jeff had obviously slept badly last night, his face was a little pale and there were two large dark circles under his round-rimmed glasses.

The number of wax figures of mermaids in Jeff's room - as Bai Liu has visually estimated - is about the same as in his own room.

Unlike the wax figures in Bai Liu's room, which he had locked up, the wax figures were quietly in place, and he don't know if it was his fault, but he thought the wax figures in Jeff's room looked a little more realistic than the ones in his room, and their faces had become slightly similar to Jeff's... ...

The mermaid wax figure has a translucent flush under its white waxy case, its eyes seem to move in their sockets at any moment, and its expression is pleasant and natural, as if it were a fish that has absorbed enough water to stretch out the scales on its tail.

The room also began to have a faintly fishy smell.

Bai Liu went to Lucy's and Andre's rooms to observe them. He carefully compared them and found that the wax figures of mermaids in these rooms were indeed closer to human skin colour than those in his own room, both in terms of touch and shade, and that they were beginning to resemble the features of the people living in the rooms.

Lucy sits at the table, looking like she hasn't slept either, yawning sickly and leaning into Bai Liu.

Jeff has been dozing off all morning and has dark circles under his eyes, his skin is greenish grey and his eyes are sunken.

And I don't know if it was Bai Liu's fault, but he felt that Andre's pupils had shrunk a little compared to yesterday, and his whole being had an uncomfortable air of nervous agitation, with an unmistakable smell of fish.

Bai Liu took out the coin and swiped it against Andre.

[NPC Name: Andre (Mental value decreased, alienation in progress)]

Andre seems to have worked up an appetite at this point, eating large plates of the hotel breakfast buffet as if it were being poured straight down his throat.

As this hotel is by the sea, most of the breakfasts consist of fried fish of all kinds. The fish soup is oily and smooth, and the fillets are golden and crispy, making them look appetising.

Bai Liu smelt a pungent fish smell like rotting dead-fish tails he smelt at the dump where the fishmongers dumped their fish in the market, and he started to gag as soon as he got near the glorious looking fish delicacies.

But both Jeff and Lucy had the look on their faces that these things smelled good.

Bai Liu took out the coin and scanned it. As expected, these two also showed [Alienation in progress], which should be related to the mermaid statue in the room.

Not to mention Andre, who makes Bai Liu a little uncomfortable with the way he eats. Andre chewed heavily, the wet, dark tail of the fish lapping at the side of his mouth as he chewed, often forking the next one into his mouth before he even had finished it.

Lucy looked at Bai Liu with slight surprise as she sliced the fish steak with her knife and fork: "Aren't you going to eat? Baby! The fish steaks here are so delicious, I couldn't help but eat two of them even though I'm on a diet!"

"You've really found a rather nice beachfront hotel!" With that, Lucy was about to come over and kiss him.

But Bai Liu was choked by the strong smell of fish in Lucy's mouth, and subconsciously pushed her away, but thought better of it and pulled the plate away from Lucy's face, pretending to be serious: "Baby, you're in shape, I won't allow you to lose your beauty for a fish. "

Lucy was delighted to be coaxed into eating the vegetarian salad, although she still had a fondness for the fish and chips.

Bai Liu pretended to drop by again and filled a number of salads for Jeff and Andre to eat.

Jeff ate a little bit.

It was Andre who looked at Bai Liu and taunted, "It's not like our rich man is short of money, is it? Before he came here, he said he'd pay for our food and accommodation, but now he can't even let us eat a fish steak."

" Lucy, look at that, there's your mean boyfriend!"

Lucy immediately cursed in anger: " Andre! If it wasn't for Bai Liu, do you think you could come to a hotel like this and eat this fancy fish and chips? You wouldn't even be able to stay here! If Bai Liu didn't pay for you, you wouldn't be able to enter the hotel!"

" Lucy!" Andre growled, but Lucy tilted her head back and glared at Andre.

Andre can't do anything to the woman he likes, so he's ready to take his anger out on Bai Liu.

As Lucy watched Andre's wide palm open to lift Bai Liu by the back of his collar, Bai Liu wiped his mouth nonchalantly, looked over at Andre and smiled, "If you still want me to pay your bill, you'd better not touch me."

Andre's hand suddenly stopped in mid-air, his nostrils dilating and contracting like a bull as he spat out a furious breath.

He looked at Bai Liu with red eyes and threatened fiercely, "If you can't do what we bet on by the end of the night, I'll make sure you're a short-handed punk who can't even get laid!"

Andre's eyes were bloodshot, seemingly dazed by the rage that had gone straight to his head, but he couldn't do anything about it, as he was still expecting Bai Liu to pay his bill.

At the same time a piece of broccoli accidentally rolled out of Jeff's plate while he was eating and onto Andre's shoe.

Like a balloon that has been inflated to its limit and then punctured, Andre backhanded Jeff in the back of the head before he could say sorry, knocking Jeff's head on the plate and spitting out everything he had eaten that morning.

"You've soiled my shoes! You disgusting bastard!" Andre seemed amused at the sight of Jeff vomiting, found some sort of mental balance by grunting a laugh out of his nose and giving Jeff another kick.

After wiping the negligible grease stain from his shoes on Jeff's trousers, Andre added, "I don't mess with losers who can't fight back, wipe it off and get the hell out of my way."

Lucy helped a dazed Jeff to his feet as she yelled hysterically at Andre: "You stop it Andre! You've gone too far with Jeff!"

Bai Liu ignored the two arguing men, his eyes focused on Jeff's vomit, a golden fish fillet that had been chewed and spat out with a greenish-black cross-section that looked like dead fish, covered in what looked like wriggling worms.

This rotting dead fish, which is simply not edible to humans, is used by fishmongers to feed larger fish.

Bai Liu remembers a fishmonger telling him that the larger the fish, the more they like to eat dead fish.

The driver came to pick Bai Liu up after his breakfast.

[Main Quest: Visit Siren Wax Museum, 50 bonus points]

[Main Quest: Attend the Mermaid Fishing Convention, reward points 50]

The Siren Museum and the Mermaid Fishing Convention, which sounds like two attractions.

Bai Liu pondered for a moment, and was just about to ask the driver what these two were when Jeff suddenly came up and got between Bai Liu and the driver, his head bowed and silent, his pale, thin cheeks sunken, blood stains from Andre's blows on the side of his mouth, his teeth clenched and trembling slightly.

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, Jeff seemed to have gone out of his way to avoid contact with the driver from yesterday until now.

This is not quite normal.

Bai Liu's fingers unconsciously turn the coin in his heart.

The coins flip back and forth on the backs of his fingers, a common gesture Bai Liu uses to think things through, and the feeling of having money in his hands, even a dollar, gives him a sense of calm and pleasure.

In the absence of other information, Bai Liu speculated that Jeff's target would be Andre, and that it would be normal for Andre to have access to the driver, who would be looking for opportunities to strike, while Lucy would be an easy character to fool, and there would be no need to be so deliberate in isolating him.

Jeff must have had a reason for isolating him and the driver, and that reason, Bai Liu pondered, would be money.

Jeff clearly doesn't look like a wealthy character, looking at the way he dresses and his daily routine of violence by Andre.

Andre is also a bully, and is not very aggressive with the rich Bai Liu, but he does not take any real action, while he beats and scolds Jeff, whose family situation is not as good as his own, or even Andre's, in this respect.

Last night, Jeff gave the driver what appeared to be a substantial amount of money, and Bai Liu had reason to suspect that Jeff had taken the money he had paid for the driver and the tourists to hire the driver to get back at Andre, which is why he had been so vain in keeping the driver away from him.

But last night Jeff had already paid this driver a sum of money, the deal was reasonably well done, and the work of the apparent driver and tourist was well executed, and he did not express any suspicion.

Generally speaking, Jeff should have been relieved that there was no need to go to such lengths to isolate him from the driver, which would have aroused his own suspicions.

This is not quite the kind of cautiousness that you would expect if things were not yet in place.

But it’s also possible that Jeff was simply being overly cautious or hesitant, not letting his guard down in case things didn’t go according to plan. After all, Jeff’s subplot was called "The Bloody Plot," so Bai Liu could understand why he might be extra careful with a plan that could involve murder.

Bai Liu wasn’t sure when Jeff would confront Andre, but for now, he wanted to stay focused on the main quest.

Turning to the driver, Bai Liu asked, "Driver, is there anything worth seeing in Siren Town?"

The driver paused for a moment before replying, "Sights? Well, the must-sees around here are the night fishing and the museum."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow at the answer, "Night fishing and a wax museum? What’s so special about those?"

The driver glanced over at him, a strange glint in his eyes. Bai Liu, seeing the driver's face up close for the first time, was taken aback. Even with his high tolerance for horror, he couldn’t help but feel a sense of surprise.

It wasn’t fear, but pure astonishment at the driver's appearance.

The man’s eyes were so filled with whites that they barely resembled normal eyes—more like tiny, erratic flecks, constantly shifting as if they might roll out of their sockets at any moment.

His skin was unnervingly pale, almost translucent, like cheap wax that had been left out too long.

The driver spoke casually, continuing to drive while chomping on a fish and chip sandwich. The fillet inside was a putrid, green-black color, resembling moldy fish, but the driver seemed to enjoy it, his teeth stained with the same sickly hue. He then gave Bai Liu a wide, unnaturally stretched smile.

The small town of Siren

When Bai Liu got into the car, the overpowering stench of fish hit him immediately. At first, he assumed it was Andre—the man had devoured an absurd amount of rotten fish fillets earlier that morning. But now, to his surprise, the smell was coming from the driver.

Thinking back, the faint fishy odor he noticed in the car yesterday must have also been from the driver, though it hadn't been nearly as intense as it was today.

Today, the reek was overwhelming.

Bai Liu cast a sideways glance at the driver. There was something... off about him. The more he observed, the more certain he became.

This driver didn't feel entirely human.

[Warning!!! Player identification error! The NPC is not a monster! Cannot be entered into the monster book! The entity is merely in an alienated state!]

[Player identification error! The NPC's trust in the player has dropped significantly and may act aggressively towards the player!]

The driver slowly bit into the sandwich in his hand, his unsteady eyes fixing on Bai Liu for a moment. His voice turned sharp and bitter as he sneered, "…Do you think I smell disgusting?"

Bai Liu's thoughts betrayed him—yes, you do—but he hurriedly denied it outwardly. "No."

The driver's gaze darkened as he chuckled grimly. "You're looking at me like I'm some kind of monster. Typical—arrogant, rich man." He scoffed and turned away, focusing on his food, dismissing any further questioning from Bai Liu.

This is going to be tricky, Bai Liu thought, his expression impassive.

The abrupt shift in hostility made his task much harder. Extracting information from someone actively suspicious of him wasn't going to be easy—especially when the system had already warned that the driver might act aggressively. Bai Liu wasn't foolish enough to provoke him further.

Bai Liu turned to Lucy beside him, leaning close to whisper a few words. Gently coaxed, Lucy took the cue and asked the driver the question instead.

The driver grunted but, to Bai Liu's relief, he responded.

"Siren Town's attractions? They're certainly tied to mermaids," the driver replied, his grin unsettling. His darting eyes seemed to drift in and out of their sockets, as though he couldn't decide who to look at—or perhaps he was looking at no one at all.

"Our fishing isn't for ordinary fish. We have a special catch: mermaids," he said, his voice chilling. "Only at night. And our wax museum? It's not just any wax museum. We make wax figures of the mermaids we catch and put them on display there."

He chuckled, his expression twisting further. "The first mermaid skeleton we ever caught—it's still in the museum."

"Mermaid fishing?" Bai Liu asked, narrowing his eyes. "Did you really catch mermaids?"

The driver ignored him entirely.

Lucy repeated the question, her voice soft yet persistent. Only then did the driver bother to reply.

With a cryptic smile, he said, "Yes. The first one we caught was beautiful—truly stunning. But the ones we've caught since… inferior. Imperfect. Incomplete forms. But mermaids nonetheless."

Andre snorted loudly, his voice dripping with disdain. "It's just a gimmick. Don't tell me you people actually believe this crap."

Jeff looked like he wanted to say something, but his lips snapped shut. After the beating he'd taken from Andre earlier that morning, he clearly wasn't eager to challenge him.

But Lucy wasn't about to back down. She shot Andre a disgruntled glare and exclaimed, "I'll believe it! What about you, Bai Liu?" Turning sharply, she fixed Bai Liu with an indignant look, as if daring him to disagree.

"Seeing is believing," Bai Liu replied evenly, his tone calm. "We'll find out when we watch the fishing event tonight."

Andre didn't seem to mind Lucy's defiance, but he made a point of mocking Bai Liu with every word. "I just hope some people don't start crying and try to run off when they see the fishing tonight," he sneered.

His wicked grin widened, and his gaze raked over Bai Liu with malicious glee. "It'd be a shame if you fell into the water, screaming, and got caught by the fishermen. Imagine them mistaking you for a mermaid and turning you into one of those wax figures."

Andre shrugged theatrically, his grin impish, as if he could already see the scene unfolding in his mind.

Bai Liu remained unfazed, though his mind wandered to the unfinished business between him and Andre: the bet.

This morning, he had coaxed Lucy into revealing the full details.

The wager was straightforward but dangerous. Andre and Bai Liu would each hire a canoe and drift out onto the Siren's waters late at night. The one who couldn't endure and turned back first would lose, branded a coward—and, in Andre's words, unworthy of Lucy.

Lucy, for her part, wanted no part of the bet. But Bai Liu's role, his character in this unsettling game, demanded that he participate.

In a horror game centered around [mermaids], venturing out onto the sea in the dead of night was no trivial challenge. Bai Liu couldn't deny it: the night sea would be a terrifying place.

Bai Liu would never agree to a situation like this—venturing into the unknown with someone as devious as Andre—without knowing all the details.

There was no doubt in Bai Liu's mind: if given the chance, Andre would tip his canoe and leave him to drown in the sea.

And Bai Liu? He didn't even know how to swim.

In truth, the fabled mermaid Siren and whatever horrors came with it were far less terrifying to Bai Liu than the sea itself. He avoided the ocean whenever possible and only ventured near it when absolutely necessary.

His scowl betrayed his disdain for this so-called "betting event."

Andre laughed mockingly, pointing at him with exaggerated glee. "Look, look, there he is—our pampered young master. What do you have over me except money? You don't even have the guts to go to sea."

Bai Liu nodded in mock agreement, his expression genuinely pleased. "You're right—I have nothing but money."

He said it with such satisfaction that it startled Andre. Bai Liu's unbothered demeanor, as if being called rich was a compliment, only made it worse.

Andre: "…What the hell? Why do you look proud?"

Snorting, Andre leaned closer. "So, you're just giving up on Lucy by not going, huh?"

Bai Liu was about to declare his refusal outright—there was no way he'd risk his life on this absurd death-defying bet.

But then the coin on his chest vibrated.

A mission prompt appeared before his eyes:

[Side Quest Triggered: "Ship of True Love"]
Objective: Complete the bet before leaving Siren Town. Win against Andre in the competition to receive 100 bonus points.

Bai Liu: "…"

A hundred points?!

The lure of that reward silenced his protests. The desire for wealth instantly drowned out his fear of the sea. His face returned to its usual calm as he announced, "No. I'm going. And I'm going to beat you."

Lucy's eyes lit up, and she threw her arms around Bai Liu in delight. "Oh, darling, when you come back, we must celebrate together and have the loveliest evening!"

Bai Liu silently pried her hands off him, his face blank.

The driver, who had been silently watching the interaction, turned his head slightly. "If you're going, you might want to check out our wax museum first. There's no mermaid fishing until the evening."

The group exchanged glances and murmured their agreement.

The driver maneuvered the car onto a narrow path that wove behind the beach, taking seven winding turns before finally stopping.

Bai Liu's gaze drifted to the beach ahead, where an array of sun-dried wreckage lay scattered.

"This," the driver said, gesturing casually, "is where we catch the mermaids. Those fragments you see? They're the broken remains of the ones we hauled in. Some are too damaged to keep, so we dump them here."

Bai Liu scanned the beach and saw what the driver meant. Large fish-tail bones, stark and white, jutted out from the sand, alongside several skulls, their empty sockets staring blankly at the sky. Nets hung nearby, swaying gently in the breeze, as a handful of fishermen emerged to gather the bones and check their gear.

For the first time, Bai Liu saw the townspeople in daylight, and the sight made his skin crawl.

By night, the driver's strange appearance had been unsettling. But in the daylight, these fishermen were far worse.

Their eyes were unnervingly white—so starkly pale that the pupils, no larger than soybeans, seemed lost within their sockets. Their gazes wandered aimlessly, as if unsure where to look.

The eyes themselves were wide-set, positioned unnaturally close to their ears, making them resemble catfish more than humans. Around their eyes and down their necks, grey-black marbling spread like ink stains.

Their movements were equally strange: sluggish, as if the sun weighed them down. As they walked, their feet dragged through the sand, and Bai Liu noticed the backs of their feet were covered in green scales—scales that appeared to be peeling away.

The fishermen froze when they noticed the car. Their expressions were unsettling, like children sniffing out a treat. They grinned at Bai Liu and the others, but the smiles never reached their wandering eyes.

"They look so strange," Lucy muttered, her voice barely above a whisper.

Bai Liu agreed silently. These fishermen weren't just strange—they were more like grotesque deep-sea creatures than people.

The driver finished the last bite of his foul-smelling sandwich, turning to the group with a grin that revealed blackened teeth. "Strange? That's just how we are here. Probably from eating all sorts of fish—it's not the healthiest diet."

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes, suppressing his instinctive suspicion. These townsfolk, though eerily inhuman, might not qualify as monsters within the game's mechanics. He'd already been burned once by misidentifying the driver.

If these fishermen weren't recognized as monsters in the [Monster Book], there were two possibilities:

The first: they truly weren't monsters.
The second: they hadn't yet met the criteria for classification, possibly due to the game's unique rules around [hatching] and [alienation].

In Siren Town, both states seemed to exist simultaneously. The mermaid wax figures could be [hatched], and characters like Andre displayed signs of [alienation]. Bai Liu suspected the townsfolk might be caught in some similar transformative state, though what it would ultimately lead to, he didn't know.

His gaze shifted to Andre, sitting stiffly in the front seat.

It wasn't that Bai Liu couldn't have saved Andre the previous night. But in Bai Liu's calculation, Andre—an aggressive NPC—was more valuable dead than alive.

Andre scratched at his cheeks, which seemed perpetually itchy, and cast a resentful glance at Bai Liu through the rearview mirror.

Bai Liu caught the look but didn't react.

Andre's stomach growled audibly, his eyes locked onto the driver's hands as if he might snatch the remnants of the meal at any moment. But the driver ate quickly, finishing before Andre could act, and leaned back with a sigh of satisfaction, rubbing his stomach.

"Ah," the driver sighed, licking fish oil from the corners of his mouth. "Nothing beats the fish from Siren Town."

Lucy chimed in, her voice light. "It really is delicious. I've never had fish this fresh before."

The driver chuckled, his smile turning unsettling. "Fresh? No, no—it's not fresh. The secret to Siren Town's fish is that it's never fresh. This kind of fish isn't good until it's rotted a little, cured, and specially treated."

He leaned closer, his tone dropping to a conspiratorial whisper. "You're eating a very special kind of fish—something you won't find anywhere else. It's unique to Siren Town."

Lucy's curiosity got the better of her. "What kind of fish?" she asked innocently.

The driver's grin widened, and his voice dropped to a sinister murmur.

"Mermaid."

The small town of Siren

A heavy silence descended over the car, and everyone's faces turned unusually pale.

Lucy let out an awkward harrumph, while Andre sneered—neither of them seemed convinced by the driver's story.

The driver suddenly burst into laughter. "Just kidding! Why would we eat mermaids? It's just sea fish we specialize in around here."

Moments later, the car came to a smooth stop in front of a building. The driver announced calmly, "We've arrived at the wax museum. Time to get out."

As everyone stepped out of the car, the driver leaned out the window. "Take your time inside. Give me a call when evening comes, and I'll take you to see the mermaid fishing."

With that, he drove away.

Bai Liu stood outside the car, taking in his surroundings. In front of him loomed a towering building, so tall he had to crane his neck back to glimpse the top. At its peak, elegant English lettering spelled out the name: Siren Wax Museum.

[System Alert: Scene Unlocked – Siren Wax Museum]

The museum's exterior was painted in deep, somber shades reminiscent of the sea, supported by thick granite columns. From his position at the entrance, Bai Liu could see the faint outlines of wax figures displayed in shadowy alcoves—mermaids, frozen in eerie stillness.

Though the building's interior looked modern and polished, the façade bore signs of wear. Red brickwork, faded and chipped, hinted at its age. Old newspapers plastered the walls, their corners fluttering in the breeze. One of them tore free and smacked into Bai Liu's face.

Peeling the paper away, Bai Liu's eyes caught on a bold headline:

[Police Notice: Twelve people have gone missing in Siren Town this month. If you have any information regarding the individuals in the photographs below, please report to the authorities immediately. Visitors are advised to exercise caution: avoid large fish and stay clear of the water.]

Beneath the warning were twelve black-and-white photographs. Each showed smiling individuals, their joy from visiting Siren Town captured in an unsettling way. The faded smiles stared back at Bai Liu through the yellowed, brittle paper, evoking a strange, unnatural unease.

Bai Liu carefully folded the newspaper and slipped it into his bag. However, as he pressed the folds together, he noticed something odd —the texture felt too rigid, almost as though it wasn't just paper.

He frowned, turning the folded sheet over in his hands. For a newspaper, even one aged and stiffened by the salty sea air, the material felt unnaturally hard... as though it concealed something more.

Bai Liu inspected the cross-section of the newspaper closely.

It appeared unnaturally thick, yet there was no visible sign of multiple layers. The newspaper had been compressed so firmly by the wind and dampness that even if additional sheets were hidden within, they would be difficult to detect.

He tucked the newspaper under his arm, deciding to test his theory once inside the wax museum. Warm water might help loosen any stuck layers and reveal what was hidden.

[Side Quest Triggered: Find the hot water in the wax museum and separate the newspaper layers. Reward: 10 points.]

The keeper of the Siren Wax Museum emerged to greet them. He was an old man with cloudy, cataract-filled eyes. Despite his impaired vision, he moved with uncanny precision, his gaze seemingly tracking them with ease.

As Bai Liu and the others stepped inside, the keeper inclined his head, his blank eyes glinting faintly under the dim lighting. A polite yet formulaic smile stretched across his aging face as he approached with surprising speed, startling Lucy into a small gasp.

"It's been so long since anyone visited…" The keeper's voice was tinged with melancholy. "No one comes to the Siren Wax Museum anymore, not since the accidents last month. And it's been a while since we've had a new mermaid wax figure for the displays."

Bai Liu's curiosity piqued. "Why haven't there been new mermaid wax figures recently? Does it have anything to do with the lack of visitors?"

The keeper nodded, his tone growing animated as he gestured stiffly with his arms. "Of course! Without tourists, it's hard to justify large events like the mermaid fishery—"

He cut himself off abruptly, as if realizing he'd said too much.

Bai Liu shifted his approach. "Are mermaid wax figures brought in regularly? Doesn't the museum eventually run out of space for them?"

The keeper's demeanor changed, his cloudy eyes narrowing slightly. A peculiar smile played on his lips. "As many new wax figures as we receive, the same number always leave. The Siren Wax Museum can never be filled."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, intrigued. "And where do the wax figures go when they leave? Are they discarded, or returned to the sea?"

The keeper fell silent, his expression tight with hesitation.

Sensing the man's unease, Bai Liu pressed further. "What happens when tourists arrive in Siren Town?"

"Nothing," the keeper muttered under his breath. "They have a pleasant holiday… and then leave."

No matter how Bai Liu framed his questions, the keeper refused to elaborate further.

After asking for directions to the hot water, Bai Liu collected his ticket and led the group into the museum.

At the entrance stood an imposing wax figure of a middle-aged man painted in gold. Unlike the mermaid figures Bai Liu had glimpsed, this one was entirely human—dressed in a suit and hat, with a golden body and a practiced smile. The figure waved stiffly in greeting to visitors.

Dim lighting from above cast long shadows across the figure's face, twisting its polite expression into something unsettling.

Curious, Bai Liu approached the wax figure, which was mounted on a black stone pedestal. An inscription identified it as a depiction of Mayor Harris, created for the ribbon-cutting ceremony of the Siren Wax Museum.

The engraving beneath the figure extolled Mayor Harris for revitalizing Siren Town by developing tourism through the discovery of mermaid skeletons and funding the museum's construction. It credited him with transforming the once-declining seaside town into a prosperous destination.

Carved prominently into the stone was a peculiar line:

[Mayor Harris loved every villager in Siren Town as unconditionally as he loved his own children.]

Bai Liu studied the engraving carefully.

Suddenly, Jeff, who had been silent for most of the trip, leaned in and whispered, "Do you believe in mermaids? Do you think any of this about Siren Town is true?"

Bai Liu considered the question. Most of the lore surrounding places like this tended to be fabrications—a blend of local myths and promotional gimmicks designed to attract tourists. At best, only a fraction of it was rooted in truth.

But this wasn't an ordinary place. This was a horror game.

"I think it's true," Bai Liu replied calmly.

Andre snorted, clearly skeptical, but said nothing, trailing behind Jeff as they moved further into the museum.

Bai Liu lingered, intending to join Lucy, but his plan shifted when he remembered the newspaper. After explaining that he needed to find the hot water room, he encouraged Lucy to explore on her own.

Lucy hesitated but eventually nodded. "I'll wait for you in the gallery," she said before heading off.

Left alone, Bai Liu turned toward the area the keeper had indicated, determined to uncover whatever secrets the newspaper might hold.

The small town of Siren

The keeper warned Bai Liu that the hot water room was somewhat isolated, with broken lamps leaving parts of the corridor in darkness. He added, with a mischievous smirk, that piles of mermaid wax figures were scattered along the way. “Be careful not to bump into them,” he said with an impish gleam in his eye.

Bai Liu walked along a dimly lit corridor framed by towering marble columns, each wide enough to conceal two or three people behind them. At regular intervals, mermaid wax figures were stationed along the path.

Their forms were eerily lifelike yet unsettlingly static, tails draped limply on the ground, and their faces blank of any emotion. What unnerved Bai Liu most was their gaze—almost every figure was turned toward the windows, as though yearning to escape.

At the end of the corridor, the hot pool was already active, steaming water cascading out and filling the passageway with a thick, humid fog. The wax figures near the pool seemed to glisten under the mist, wax dripping faintly from their forms. They appeared to shift imperceptibly as if subtly melting, their shapes in flux.

As Bai Liu ventured deeper into the mist-shrouded hallway, he felt like he was walking through an underwater dream. The mermaid wax figures, half-hidden by the haze, seemed to sway gently, their movements just beyond comprehension.

Soon, Bai Liu noticed something unnerving. The mermaid figures, once facing the windows, began to subtly turn their heads toward him. Their necks crooked at unnatural angles, their blank faces now unmistakably focused on him.

Step by step, the figures drew nearer. Their melting forms began encroaching on the path, closing the distance between him and them. The tails of the mermaids dragged across the floor, leaving behind trails of greasy, waxy residue.

The silence of the grand, darkened corridor was oppressive. Bai Liu’s soft footfalls echoed faintly, each step accompanied by the unsettling realization that the wax figures moved whenever he glanced away.

With each blink, the figures appeared closer, their positions and expressions subtly altered. The once-expressionless faces now bore faint, eerie smiles. Their pale, flawless forms glimmered under the dim light, their presence like a haunting tableau of restless phantoms frozen in time.

Bai Liu began counting the wax figures, trying to keep track of their movements. Every few steps, he'd glance behind him, locking eyes with those following. But each time he turned back to the path ahead, a figure seemed closer than before—its hand nearly brushing his neck.

The figures' movements were slow but deliberate, their sheer numbers and resilience making escape seem increasingly unlikely. Bai Liu maneuvered carefully, using the massive columns to prevent the figures from encircling him. He calculated their movements, deliberately forcing gaps to keep them from closing in completely.

Despite his strategic positioning, the figures continued their relentless approach. Their faces, originally generic and unremarkable, began to change. The wax melted and reformed, their once-uniform features now eerily mirroring Bai Liu's own face.

The resemblance was uncanny. The closer they came, the more the figures' grotesquely curved smiles twisted into a macabre mockery of Bai Liu's expression.

These malformed replicas advanced toward him, their once-static forms now brimming with life, clawed hands outstretched. The mist seemed alive with their presence, their distorted faces inching ever closer as they surrounded him.

Bai Liu finally arrived at what the keeper had referred to as the "hot tub." It turned out to be a yellowing old lavatory sink, its rust-stained tap darkened with streaks that could have been either dried blood or corrosion.

Above the sink, a rectangular tin can used for boiling water trembled and hissed, the sound of boiling liquid filling the damp air.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu calmly placed the folded newspaper he had been carrying onto the counter, his eyes scanning the room with quiet composure. As he turned back toward the sink, a group of mermaid wax figures stood silently behind him.

They loomed in rows of varying sizes and heights, completely blocking his path to escape. Their eyeless faces bore twisted, malicious grins, mouths cracked unnaturally at the corners. Under the dim light, their waxy forms shimmered faintly, and their expressions—grotesque parodies of Bai Liu's own face—seemed to mock him.

The figures tilted their heads downward, their melting features distorting further. Their greedy stares locked onto Bai Liu, who now felt as if he was surrounded by dozens of twisted reflections of himself.

The group wasn't just passively looming. They were hunting.

Bai Liu had earlier remarked that these wax figures lacked intelligence. Yet, here they were, seemingly learning on the spot, encircling him with a grim determination. Their unnerving ability to adapt and strategize reminded him of humans—a realization that made them all the more unsettling.

Hot water continued to pour out of the sink behind him, spilling over the edge. But Bai Liu didn't move to stop it—not yet. Any sudden movement, he knew, would invite immediate retaliation. His gaze stayed fixed on the figures, holding them in their place as they edged closer with every passing moment.

Instead of panicking, Bai Liu methodically reached back without turning and shut off the tap.

The mermaid wax figures inched forward, their expressions growing more menacing. Their distorted grins stretched wider, their faces curling into something almost unrecognizable. Bai Liu, however, seemed unconcerned. He stroked his chin, muttering to himself as if the advancing threat was no more than a curiosity.

"Hatching, huh? That's what this is. The closer they get, the more they resemble me. So, I guess what they eventually become will look exactly like me. Interesting... The ichor on me seems to have an effect when they get too close. Is that why the townspeople are all 'hatching' like this?"

Meanwhile, spectators watching Bai Liu's situation through small TV monitors weren't nearly as composed.

"Look at him! Still analyzing at a time like this," one sneered. "And what's with those cheap projectors he bought? Is he planning to show a movie to the mermaids?"

"Yeah, what a joke," another chimed in. "I spent my points on this guy? Should've gone for the torch guy instead. He's breaking through!"

Indeed, on a nearby screen, another player wielding a blazing torch was charging through a group of wax figures, shouting threats and forcing them to retreat. The audience erupted in cheers for the torch-wielding player's bold actions.

"See? That's how you handle it! Mermaids are photophobic, so a torch is the perfect prop!"

Bai Liu's small TV screen, however, remained mostly ignored, save for a few viewers sticking around to witness what they assumed would be his inevitable demise.

Their jeers continued as Bai Liu casually pulled out three cheap 3D projectors from his pocket.

"What is he even doing now?" someone mocked. "Projections won't work for long. At best, they'll confuse the wax figures for a few minutes. Then what? He's still stuck!"

Unperturbed, Bai Liu placed the projectors strategically—one behind him, one to his left, and one to his right. With a faint smile, he flipped them on.

In an instant, three identical projections of Bai Liu appeared, surrounding the wax figures. The figures hesitated, their movements halting as they turned their focus toward the projections.

The audience's laughter turned into awkward murmurs.

"Okay, so maybe that bought him some time," one admitted reluctantly. "But projections won't hold them off for more than ten minutes. The wax figures will figure it out. They're already reacting!"

Sure enough, after a few moments, the mermaid wax figures began to close in again, their suspicions seemingly growing.

But Bai Liu wasn't done.

Before the audience could fully dismiss him, the three projections mimicked Bai Liu's actions exactly. All four of them—Bai Liu and his projections—simultaneously pulled out torches and aimed them directly at the wax figures.

The room was suddenly bathed in bright, searing light.

The wax figures recoiled violently, their movements chaotic and disorganized. The once-confident spectators watching Bai Liu's screen were now struck silent.

Bai Liu smirked, his calm voice cutting through the tension. "One torch wasn't enough. But four?" He glanced at the retreating wax figures. "That should do the trick."

The small town of Siren

Four intense beams of light blazed from every direction, converging on the mermaid wax figures. For a moment, Bai Liu's small TV screen was so dazzlingly bright that the pure white glare overwhelmed the neighboring screens, forcing viewers to shield their eyes.

The mermaid wax figures recoiled under the assault of the torchlight. Their stiff forms jerked backward as if in agony, their melting hands moving instinctively to shield their hollow, eyeless faces.

Under the relentless beams, the figures began to shrink and curl into themselves like criminals caught in a spotlight. Some crouched low, their bodies folding inward, while others tried to bury their heads in their arms, desperate to escape the glare.

Bai Liu crouched before them, a devilish grin playing on his lips. His voice was soft but cutting: "I was right. You really are afraid of the light."

The crowd watching his small TV screen fell silent.

One player, who had just criticized Bai Liu moments earlier, broke the quiet, his voice raised in disbelief. "No way! There's no way those cheap projectors could reproduce torchlight this perfectly! That's not scientific!"

Another spectator snorted. "Scientific? Really? You're looking for logic in a game where mermaid wax figures are a thing?"

Someone else added, "Actually, I just checked the manual for those projectors. They're optical projectors. Most of their specs are garbage, but they're crazy efficient at reflecting light. Something like 80% energy efficiency."

"Seriously? You didn't even bother reading the system instructions before trashing the guy?" another viewer laughed. "Kind of embarrassing, no?"

"I mean... I just bought three of those projectors myself. Couldn't resist," a viewer admitted sheepishly.

Meanwhile, on the neighboring screen, the torch-wielding player was having a much rougher time. Waving his blazing torch frantically, he shouted threats at the encroaching wax figures. His movements were panicked as he attempted to force his way toward the newspaper floating in the "hot tub."

The wax figures, their grim faces and outstretched claws, pushed him closer and closer to the brink. The scene was tense, thrilling even—a chaotic, life-or-death struggle.

But compared to Bai Liu's side, it felt almost comical.

Bai Liu, accompanied by his three projections, had encircled the wax figures like an officer leading a tactical operation. The intense torchlight kept the wax figures cowering pathetically in the center, their once-menacing forms now helpless and motionless.

As the wax figures quivered under the light, Bai Liu stood calmly by the hot tub, casually reading the newspaper as if on vacation.

The contrast was undeniable, and the audience couldn't ignore it.

The sudden surge in attention left viewers stunned.

"I've never seen a newbie player make it onto the central gaming lobby screen—let alone so quickly," one muttered in awe.

"It's like we're witnessing the rise of a new star..." another whispered.

[Siren Town Monster Book Updated!]

[Mode of Attack: Hatching.]

[Player Bai Liu is one weakness away from completing the "Mermaid

Wax" Monster Book page. Completing it will unlock a corresponding reward at the end of the game.]

Bai Liu had long suspected that the mermaid wax figures had an aversion to light. It wasn't a difficult deduction.

The driver had mentioned earlier that large fish are typically caught at night because they tend to avoid light. Since the mermaid fishing event in Siren Town also occurred at night, it stood to reason that mermaids—and by extension, mermaid wax figures—were light-averse creatures.

Still, Bai Liu hadn't yet drawn a definitive connection between mermaids and their wax figure counterparts regarding this particular trait. His observations provided a clue: during the day, no mermaid wax figures were visible anywhere in Siren Town.

This absence was telling. If mermaid wax figures truly feared light, then perhaps they only emerged at night when the shadows offered them protection.

Bai Liu, as always, would patiently piece together the puzzle in due time.

The dimly lit hotel and the Siren Wax Museum were rife with mermaid wax figures. Bai Liu had already deduced that these figures were creatures devoid of hearing or smell, relying solely on their extraordinary vision. This heightened sensitivity to light was likely their greatest weakness.

The conclusion was almost self-evident: mermaid wax figures fear strong light.

Once Bai Liu arrived at this hypothesis, he resolved to test its limits systematically.

How much light would it take to repel a mermaid wax figure?

How long would the effect last?

Could light effectively break an encirclement formed by the wax figures?

To find answers, Bai Liu deliberately lured the wax figures into an enclosure. Using intense beams of light and a 3D projector, he attempted to force his way out.

Failure was always a possibility, but Bai Liu wasn't one to shy away from taking risks.

With a 10% or better chance of success, Bai Liu would gamble without hesitation.

For him, risk was intrinsic to the nature of games—and even more so in their creation. Failure wasn't discouraging; it was part of the process.

Having dealt with the wax figures, Bai Liu's attention shifted to the softened newspaper soaking in the sink.

Grabbing the paper, he carefully tore it apart at the back.

Sure enough, it wasn't an ordinary newspaper.

[Player Bai Liu has completed the task: Separate the newspaper at the hot tub. Bonus: 10 points.]

[Charge points: 21. Current points balance: 31. Would you like to buy props?]

Bai Liu declined the offer and examined the torn newspaper.

Upon closer inspection, the thickness of the two halves was different. One section was visibly thinner. Curious, Bai Liu gripped the thicker half and tore it again.

It separated once more.

His brow furrowed. Despite the system confirming the task was complete, the hidden layers within the newspaper suggested otherwise. If Bai Liu hadn't scrutinized it further, he might have missed crucial information.

This game really knew how to bait players into traps.

After seven or eight tears, the sink was filled with soaked scraps of old newspaper. Satisfied that there were no further tricks, Bai Liu scanned their contents.

The headlines were uniform across all nine newspapers: police reports and missing persons notices for tourists.

The number of disappearances was staggering.

The earliest case dated back to the previous year, coinciding with the Siren Wax Museum's opening. Initially, there were only a few reports of missing tourists, often accompanied by signs of robbery.

In a popular seaside tourist destination, a couple of disappearances per month weren't unusual. Crowded attractions often attracted crime. Some incidents were dismissed as accidents—overboard falls or abductions. These cases were typically handled quietly.

But according to Jeff, the outside world remained oblivious until just last month. Despite the growing number of disappearances, tourism in Siren Town thrived unabated.

It wasn't until twelve tourists went missing in a single month, accompanied by increasingly eerie occurrences, that the situation could no longer be suppressed.

Bai Liu suspected Mayor Harris, the so-called "people-loving" leader of Siren Town, had concealed the earlier disappearances to maintain the town's tourism-driven economy.

But now, the truth was unraveling too fast to hide.

From these newspapers, one thing was clear: the townspeople of Siren Town were experts at covering up crime.

After pocketing the newspapers and projector, Bai Liu shone his torch backward. The mermaid wax figures remained motionless in the corridor, allowing him to leave unimpeded.

He made his way to the central gallery of the Siren Wax Museum, where Lucy and the others awaited him.

The central gallery was a circular hall, dominated by a glass display case at its center. The case, made of bulletproof, crystal-clear glass, contained what the driver described as "the immaculate mermaid skeleton"—the catalyst for everything.

The lights illuminated the case from every angle, creating an ethereal, almost reverent glow around the figure within.

Bai Liu stopped dead in his tracks as he entered the gallery.

The figure in the case wasn't what he would consider a "skeleton."

Lucy, gazing at the figure with fascination, murmured, "It's so beautiful... I've never seen anything this perfect—not even computer-generated models."

Jeff, the bespectacled boy, stood frozen, his disbelief evident as he stared up at the display.

Andre, ever skeptical, scoffed. "You've all been fooled. It's a trick—probably just a human body with a fish tail sewn on to draw attention."

Still, even Andre couldn't resist a grudging compliment. "But... it does look well-made."

The figure in the glass was mesmerizing.

Its right arm, from shoulder to hand, was stripped to bare white bone, while the rest of its body retained lifelike flesh.

Its sinewy musculature was elegant and severe, the contours of its body framed by the deep, sapphire-blue liquid in the case.

Delicate bubbles rose slowly through the water, curling through the figure's dark, flowing hair before settling like pearls on its long, pale lashes.

Its eyes were closed, its face breathtakingly flawless. Long, slightly curled hair framed its sharp features, and tucked behind the strands were ears unlike any human's.

Its left ear was shaped like a shell, shimmering with a mica-like texture. Its right ear, however, was skeletal—bare white bone exposed through the waves of hair.

The figure's lower body ended in a magnificent tail, like a silver-blue ribbon glinting under seawater. Translucent scales caught the light, while the fins between its fingers and along its tail shimmered like fragile glass.

Its left hand, skeletal and stark, rested across its chest, intertwining with its flesh-covered right hand.

Bai Liu now understood why the driver had described the first salvaged mermaid as “beautiful and high.”

The wax figures of mermaids scattered throughout Siren Town were crude and lifeless in comparison—cheap tourist souvenirs of shoddy craftsmanship. The skeleton displayed before him, however, was intricate, elaborate, and hauntingly elegant.

Drawn in by its allure, Bai Liu, with his inherent fondness for expensive-looking things, stepped closer to examine the profile plaque next to the skeleton.

[Siren, discovered in Siren Town on the night of XX during a collective fishing activity. Verified by relevant institutions to have grown under purely natural conditions without any synthetic factors. Categorized as a rare organism.]
[Recovered in a carcass state. Preserved in a curing solution and displayed in the central gallery of the Siren Wax Museum for public viewing.]

Bai Liu’s sharp eyes traced the skeletal structure as he finished reading.

This isn’t just rare. This is a powerful monster, he mused.

But as his gaze lingered on the mermaid’s right hand encased within the display cabinet, something shifted—so faint it could have been his imagination. The skeletal fingers twitched, almost imperceptibly.

The coin on Bai Liu’s chest abruptly erupted in violent vibrations, spinning wildly as if possessed. Panels of bright red text popped up in rapid succession, cascading over his field of vision like a malfunctioning system.

[Estimated time until full awakening: One day.]

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow as he calmly read through the barrage of warnings.

Something extraordinary, indeed.

While Bai Liu remained unfazed, considering his next move, the scene unfolding on his "Little TV" in the central gaming lobby sent shockwaves through the crowd.

Wang Shun, a veteran cloud player who had spent years analyzing and watching gameplay, was crouched in front of the massive screen in disbelief. His usually composed expression was replaced by a slack-jawed stare as he fixated on Bai Liu's broadcast.

"Wait... am I seeing this right? Is that a god-tier wandering NPC?!"

Cloud players—spectators who preferred watching gameplay over participating—had one clear advantage: their vast database of knowledge. Wang Shun's expertise was in cataloging gameplay information for guilds and player organizations.

But in all his years, he'd never seen a god-tier wandering NPC appear on a Little TV.

Horror games within the system were countless and isolated, each operating like a standalone world. Players entered self-contained instances with unique NPCs, rules, and monsters. Cross-instance interference was unheard of—until wandering NPCs emerged.

These bizarre entities transcended the boundaries of individual games, capable of appearing in any instance without warning. Worse, they could possess monsters within the game, transforming them into god-tier threats. Their sheer power was unmatched, leaving destruction and wiped-out teams in their wake.

The odds of encountering such an NPC were astronomically low. In fact, Wang Shun had only heard rumors of them. The few confirmed sightings were so brief—most players didn't survive long enough to relay detailed information—that these wandering gods remained shrouded in mystery.

But now, Wang Shun was witnessing it live.

“This is... top-tier information,” Wang Shun muttered, his voice trembling with excitement. If he could document the Siren King’s behavior, it would be worth a fortune in points.

He planted himself firmly in front of Bai Liu’s screen, ignoring everything else in the lobby. It was rare enough to see a god-tier wandering NPC in action, but what truly amazed him was Bai Liu’s composure.

The broadcast itself was pushed to the far corner of the central screen—an obscure position typically reserved for novice players or unremarkable gameplay. Wang Shun had only noticed it because of his habit of scanning the entire display.

“Why is this buried in the margins? The algorithm must be glitching,” he muttered.

Leaning closer, he observed Bai Liu’s movements carefully. “This player... he’s calm. Too calm. He’s already unlocked the second page of the monster book and even triggered a god-tier wandering NPC without panicking. And he’s still progressing in the game?”

Curious, Wang Shun opened the game manager to check Bai Liu’s profile. The data loaded quickly, and as he read through it, his jaw dropped even further.

“...This guy is a newbie?!”

Wang Shun leaned back, stunned. “This is his first time playing?!”

For a moment, Wang Shun just stared at the screen in silence, his mind reeling.

Who is this player?

[Game Forum - Has anyone seen the new player on the central screen who just moved up from the newbie section?]

1L: Moved up in his first game? That's impressive! Is he going to be the new star of this year's rankings?

2L: No way. This guy is in serious trouble. I'm watching his "Little TV" feed right now, and he's unlucky enough to have triggered a godly wandering NPC. This is probably his last game.

3L: He was doing well in the newbie section before, but now... well, he's still good, but it's not necessarily a death sentence, right?

4L: Does no one else think this wandering NPC thing is a bug? It has no weaknesses, and whenever it appears, the player team is basically wiped out because they can't escape. I think the system just gave this wandering NPC a fancy name to cover up a bug they couldn't fix...

5L: I was rooting for him earlier. I thought he might break the record for the highest points in Siren Town. His strategy seemed really solid.

6L: The highest points record in Siren Town is held by God Mu, right? God Mu's now ranked fourth on the Nightmare Rising Stars list. This newbie's probably not even going to survive this game, so forget about crossing that line.

7L: It's a shame. The newcomer has a good look, though. If he survives, he might have a chance to hit the top ten high-value players.

8L: Pfft, this guy's face won't get him far. The top ten high-value players look at skill first, then appearance. He's done for in this game...

[1 new person liked Bai Liu's TV feed, 416 new people liked Bai Liu's feed, no one recharged the player].

[512 new people are watching Bai Liu's mini-TV feed, but no one is liking it. Is it because he's not doing well? Come on, watchers, give him a like!]

[The number of new likes is too low, and Bai Liu's central screen edge promotion is about to expire.]

Unaware of the discussions surrounding him, Bai Liu stood in front of the mermaid in the glass cabinet, silent and contemplative. The mermaid, with its skeletal form and haunting beauty, was undoubtedly the highest-level boss in the game. The system had made it clear that there was no escape from this boss by exploiting its weaknesses.

[Warning: Siren King NPC triggered. Upon awakening, certain death.]

Bai Liu frowned. He disliked the feeling of being completely out of control, but he couldn't deny the game's warning. There was no way around it.

But until the Siren King fully awakened, Bai Liu had a chance to outwit it.

He stroked his chin, mulling over his next move. Could he somehow use the Siren King to his advantage?

The thought might have seemed foolish to onlookers, but Bai Liu wasn't intimidated by the idea of facing a higher-level monster. In his mind, there was always a way to deal with any boss, no matter how tough they seemed. A monster might have a scary-looking panel, but as long as the game didn't have any bugs, it could always be overcome.

After all, if the system made a monster seem invincible, it was probably part of the designer's strategy to hook the player, to make them want to explore further.

What Bai Liu didn't know was that he had encountered something far beyond a typical game challenge. The [God-Class Wandering NPC] was an anomaly—commonly considered a bug within the game. It was not a challenge players were supposed to face, and it was nearly impossible to survive when triggered.

As evening approached, Bai Liu and the driver prepared to leave the wax museum. The keeper, his voice faint and weathered, waved them off with an eerie, almost gleeful smile.

"It's been a long time since we had such a big mermaid catch. The Siren Wax Museum will finally be able to welcome new wax figures tonight..."

He rolled his eyeless gaze toward Bai Liu, a strange satisfaction in his expression. "Have a pleasant evening."

The small town of Siren

The keeper remained in the doorway, watching silently as Bai Liu and the driver left. Behind them, in the dim light, the wax figures in the museum seemed to stir. Their marble faces, expressionless and frozen, poked out from the shadows like fish emerging from the deep sea.

[Main Quest: Explore Siren Wax Museum - Completed. 50 bonus points awarded.]

[Current point balance: 81. Do you wish to purchase items?]

Bai Liu stroked his chin thoughtfully. [Is there a high concentration of alcohol available?]

[Open shop - 218 types of special alcohol are available. 18 can be purchased in this copy.]

[9 points for 25L of alcohol. Reminder: Alcohol in the game is not the same as real alcohol; after system modification, its effects may vary. We advise players to read the instructions carefully before purchasing.]

[System Suggestion: Detected that player has sufficient points. We recommend purchasing the Flaming Torch prop for better efficacy and safety.]

Bai Liu, considering his options, decided to take a look at the instructions for the alcohol first. As expected, they were long and tedious—full of dense text designed to overwhelm the reader. But Bai Liu had seen this before. As a savvy consumer in a world of e-commerce, he knew that the cheaper items often came with more convoluted instructions to discourage players from buying them.

Despite the complicated read, Bai Liu was accustomed to parsing through such details. He finally noticed the price adjustments for items he had previously considered.

[Flaming Torch price lowered to 17 points.]

[3D Projector "Siren Small Town" price back to original at 6 points each.]

The price changes intrigued Bai Liu. These adjustments suggested that the player market had influenced the system's pricing, likely due to the amount of demand for these props. He read through the descriptions of the available alcohols and, without hesitation, chose the cheapest one.

[Bai Liu purchases 9 bottles of high-strength alcohol. Welcome to your next adventure.]

Meanwhile, on the central screen, Wang Shun gasped in disbelief as he watched Bai Liu's actions.

"What's this newbie doing?" Wang Shun slapped his thigh in frustration. "Is he really going to use alcohol to burn the wax figures? Wax figures are photophobic, but they're not afraid of fire! If he burns them, the monsters inside will emerge! And why would he spend all his points on this?!"

Around him, whispers of confusion spread among the watching players.

"Is this guy really buying all that alcohol? No one's ever bought it before. Is he some kind of alcoholic?"

"What a fool. The mermaid wax figures aren't afraid of fire, but they are sensitive to light. Someone made this mistake before, using a torch and getting wiped out when the light faded."

"It's over. I thought he might be a big deal, but it looks like it's just luck. This newbie's going down."

"Why does he even have a spot on the central screen? Before, it was God Mu and that whole legendary group—now we're stuck with this guy."

[0 new likes for Bai Liu's TV. 2 new dislikes. 166 people stomped on Bai Liu's feed.]

[Player Bai Liu's center-screen edge promotion expires.]

As Bai Liu's feed flickered and his spot on the edge of the central screen disappeared, Wang Shun adjusted his glasses. He knew that Bai Liu had triggered the godly wandering NPC, and the situation was dire. But, unable to resist the allure of rare information, Wang Shun made his way to the Death Comedy section, where Bai Liu's impending failure would surely entertain the crowd.

.....

In-game.

Night had fallen, and the van rumbled through the darkened streets, lit only by the flickering streetlights. Fishermen, carrying their nets and machetes, eyed the van with a strange, almost vacant expression as it passed by.

These were the fishermen who would participate in the mermaid fishery tonight.

The dim, uneven streetlights cast eerie shadows on their faces, revealing marble-like green and black veins that intertwined across their skin. Mucus dripped from their faces, giving them an even more grotesque appearance. The townspeople looked even more ghastly in the dark, their eyes glowing a dull green as they moved.

The driver, still munching on a sandwich, gave a warning. "These townsfolk are dangerous. They haven't had an income in a long time. Stick to your designated boat for the mermaid fishing later. Don't engage with them. You look like outsiders, and you'll be easy targets for robbery."

The driver took a big bite of his sandwich as he spoke.

Bai Liu, in the back of the van, could barely suppress the urge to vomit as the putrid smell of the fishy sandwich filled the air. The others, however, seemed unfazed. Andre, eagerly watching the driver eat, swallowed nervously, his discomfort evident as he fiddled with his ear.

Lucy couldn't help herself. "This sandwich smells so good," she said with an excited tone.

Andre shot a glare at her, clearly irritated. "What did we have for dinner? I'm starving!" he grumbled, casting a disparaging look at Bai Liu in the rearview mirror.

Earlier, during their stop at the Wax Museum, Bai Liu had ordered the cheapest vegetarian meal, refusing to touch any fish. His choice had angered Andre, who, along with Lucy, had been shocked at Bai Liu's refusal to eat fish. Despite ordering the least expensive meal, Bai Liu had paid for the entire group, insisting that they all accompany him. This had caused some tension.

Andre had cursed under his breath, frustrated by the situation. "Don't come out here playing big-boy games if you can't afford it! Go home and drink your vegan milk!" he had snapped.

Bai Liu, unfazed, had simply smiled. "In that case, Andre, you can order your own meat," he had replied calmly. He'd taken away Andre's meal, but given the exorbitant prices at the wax museum, Andre couldn't afford any other meal. Bai Liu had refused to hand it over unless Andre paid for it himself.

Andre had been forced to swallow his pride, unwilling to anger Bai Liu further—after all, Bai Liu had also paid for his hotel room. Andre didn't want to risk sleeping rough in a town like this.

However, Jeff, not caring about the others, had been the one to snatch Andre's meal and, when Andre protested, had been punched in the stomach. He had cowered in the corner, silently clutching his stomach in pain.

Now, as the pungent scent of the sandwich wafted through the van, Jeff's longing was palpable. His throat worked with suppressed desire, his gaze lingering on Andre, and his eyes burned with a hunger that seemed almost unnatural.

[Jeff's Bloody Plot - 30% Progress on Branch]

Bai Liu, keenly aware of the rising tension, shot a brief glance at Jeff, who kept his head lowered in shame. Andre, on the edge of irritation from both hunger and the food's aroma, couldn't help but snap, his anger flaring.

Bai Liu noticed something odd—Andre's skin, where he had been scratching behind his ear, suddenly twisted and contorted. The area seemed to breathe, folding in on itself like gills flaring open for a moment before quickly closing. The skin, slightly inflated, puffed out as though alive.

Bai Liu, intrigued, glanced at the display panel.

[NPC Name: Andre (High Alienation)]

Coming out of the Wax Museum, Andre's alienation has increased...

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Andre, did you touch the mermaid wax figures in the museum?"

"So what if I touched them?" Andre growled, his voice dripping with malice. "Bai Liu, tonight we'll see who's going home to drink milk!"

In that moment, Andre's gills flared open once more, the fin-like protrusions visible behind his ears, shaking violently in the dim light of the van.

The driver, noticing the tension, barked a warning. "Hey, boys! No fighting in my car!"

Andre reluctantly retracted his gills but glared at Bai Liu, still seething with anger.

The driver, almost amused, chuckled to himself. "I've set up a place for your bet, like you asked—remote beach, two wooden boats. Take care of yourselves out there. I'm not responsible if you drown."

After a brief pause, the driver's voice dropped, almost darkly, "But with how long you've been here, you shouldn't drown. You should all know how to swim by now."

Bai Liu's face remained calm, though internally, he was tense. He couldn't swim.

The inhabitants of this town had all transformed into these fish-like creatures, and his group, after only being here for a short while, was already beginning to exhibit some strange traits—an unusual craving for fish meat and the subtle but pervasive fishy odor emanating from them. Bai Liu, however, had resisted the pull of the transformation. He hadn't eaten the bizarre fish meat nor gotten close to the mermaid wax figures at night.

Bai Liu couldn't help but speculate that these two things—eating the fish meat and interacting with the wax figures—were causing the others to evolve into something fish-like. But for him, the transformation seemed to have bypassed him. He would be more vulnerable in the coming challenges, especially with the impending bet on the remote beach. His danger had only increased.

And with Andre's strange transformation, Bai Liu was left to wonder: what if Andre, or any of the others, had already turned into monsters?

Would they sabotage him during the upcoming challenge?

No wonder the side quest [Ship of True Love] had a hundred points — the danger level was far higher than several other quests combined.

Andre, unable to control his appetite, lunged for the driver's sandwich. "Give me a bite!" he demanded.

The driver didn't resist, watching with a strange, almost pitying look as Andre devoured the sandwich. Andre wolfed it down, chewing only a few times before pounding his chest and swallowing in one quick motion.

The driver didn't try to snatch the sandwich back. Instead, he simply observed Andre, who was hunched over and eating with a wild hunger, as though feeding an animal. "Eat, my boy, eat. You're starving, aren't you? Haven't eaten much, have you? Enjoy your dinner."

Bai Liu glanced at the scene and dryly commented, "This is his second dinner tonight. The first was when Andre stole Jeff's meal."

The mention of Jeff's stolen dinner made the man flinch. His face darkened as he lowered his head, but not before the same gill-like pattern appeared around his ears. For a brief moment, Jeff's gills opened in anger, and his teeth elongated, sharp and thin like a shark's.

But the unsettling scene was fleeting. As soon as Bai Liu glanced over again, Jeff had covered his face and avoided looking at anyone, though his eyes, reflecting eerily in the rearview mirror, still rested on Bai Liu.

[Jeff's Bloody Plot - 50% Progress on Branch]

Bai Liu frowned, sensing something had shifted. The quest progress jumped again. How was this task advancing so quickly? It seemed tied to something Jeff had triggered earlier, but what was this new development? Could it be linked to Andre's behavior? Bai Liu couldn't shake the feeling that things were accelerating dangerously.

When the van finally reached the port, Bai Liu couldn't ignore the fact that the driver's trust level was low, which likely meant he was somehow involved in Jeff's bloody plot.

As they disembarked, Bai Liu handed the driver a penny as a tip, in an attempt to gauge the situation. The driver looked at the money in Bai Liu's hand, his expression dark and sullen, before cracking a grim smile. He kissed the tip as if it were a prize, then waved it away carelessly.

"Have a good time," the driver said, his voice laced with a strange satisfaction.

[Jeff's Bloody Plot - 80% Progress on Branch]

Bai Liu, unfazed, noted the driver's greedy eyes fixated on the money in his pocket. "We will," he replied with his usual calm smile, as if nothing were amiss.

The place for the mermaid fishing was a massive ship.

The colossal vessel slowly pulled out of the harbor into the dark night, its deck silent except for the hushed movements of sailors. Some smaller boats, tethered to the larger ship, were filled with the fish-like fishermen.

These fishermen, who had been eyeing Bai Liu's group since boarding, stared at them with emotionless faces as the darkness settled in.

There was a stark contrast between the sailors on board the ship and the fishermen below. Most of the sailors looked human — no strange fish-like patterns on their skin or fishy smell emanating from them. They appeared paler, almost albino, similar to the receptionist at the hotel.

Bai Liu noticed that there weren't many people on board, which puzzled him. Why fish on such a large, seemingly extravagant ship? It seemed wasteful. Furthermore, the boat's draft was unusually deep, suggesting something heavy was on board, hidden beneath the surface.

As he surveyed the surroundings, Bai Liu caught sight of several sailors standing in dark corners, watching him intently. They whispered to one another, their smiles twisted and satisfied, as if sharing some private joke.

The ship sailed deeper into the night.

The sea was eerily calm, with only the light from the ship's searchlight illuminating a small patch of water. Beyond that, darkness seemed to swallow everything whole. The occasional sound of waves passing on either side was the only noise breaking the silence.

The sailors continued their work, distributing tasks methodically, while the fishermen began to lay out their nets, preparing for the night's catch.

The boat sailed further into the abyss of the night, its destination unclear but its atmosphere growing more ominous with each passing moment.

Lucy stood beside Bai Liu, wrapped in her cloak. Her lips, stained with lipstick, were now a deep purple from the cold wind as she huddled next to him for warmth. "Why is it so cold, Bai Liu? I asked the crew, and they said we need to go to the sea where the first mermaid was caught to catch more. They called it [Siren's Gift], a sea with a legendary tale."

Bai Liu turned his head slightly. "Siren's Gift?"

"Yeah," Lucy shivered as she pulled her cloak tighter. "It's freezing. I feel like we're heading into a hell filled with ghosts — the only place that's this cold and windy."

Bai Liu didn't feel the cold, but something nagged at his mind. He reached into his pocket and flicked a coin towards Lucy.

[NPC Name: Lucy (in alienation)]

Bai Liu touched her hand, noticing it was cold and oily, like freshly solidified wax.

Lucy smiled, her face stiff. Despite the attempt to express affection, her expression was frozen, twisted into something unnatural, as if trying to mimic emotion but failing, like a surreal Picasso painting.

Her voice grew dry, edged with an unsettling eagerness. "Your hands are so warm... Can I kiss you?"

Bai Liu gently declined. "I can't." He quickly added an excuse. "There are too many people here."

Lucy wasn't shivering from the cold. Her body temperature was dropping.

Jeff, who had appeared next to Bai Liu without warning, looked out at the sea with an almost reverent gaze. He murmured, "Yes, Siren's Gift.

Legend says the sea is a gift from the Siren King, capable of bringing the dead back to life."

Jeff's voice dropped, almost as if lost in the story. "Swimmers who fall into the waters and drown are reborn as mermaids, gifted with the Siren King's power. That's why fishermen can catch them here."

Bai Liu's thoughts flickered. If the Siren King had been fished out and placed in a wax museum, how could these waters still produce mermaids?

And if the Siren King had been caught long ago, why did the waters continue to create mermaids? It seemed less like a blessing and more like a curse, a mythos that had twisted over time.

Bai Liu mentally pieced the story together — the mermaids were no longer a divine gift but a revenge of the dead. Their wax figures were harvested, displayed for tourists, and some even made into food for the townsfolk. The wax figures, however, began to act on their own, and tourists started disappearing one by one...

A sailor approached with an air of authority. "We're entering Siren's Gift waters. Please stay close. We're not responsible for anything that happens if you wander."

The sailor's warning echoed as he turned to leave, heading below deck. Bai Liu noticed all the sailors were heading to the lowest part of the ship, leaving the deck eerily empty.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes, pretending to follow one sailor discreetly.

The sailors moved with purpose, descending into the lower cabin. Bai Liu observed them as they filed down a wooden ladder, their faces empty of emotion. When they returned, it was accompanied by whispers.

"I... no problem."

"Make sure these are fine."

"A few broke before, but after these four are eaten, there will be new ones to replace them."

The sailors were checking something crucial — something important and heavy in the lower compartment. Bai Liu's suspicions deepened. The weight in the bilge was significant, and the sailors' strange behavior only added to the mystery.

Once the last sailor left, Bai Liu noticed the bilge door had been left unlocked, the lock swaying with the ship's motion, almost inviting him to explore.

He couldn't resist. Bai Liu opened the door and descended a narrow staircase, the creaking wood making each step feel ominous. The darkness of the compartment swallowed the light from his torch, but he pressed forward, determined to find out what was hidden.

As he reached the bottom, Bai Liu's breath caught in his throat.

The entire compartment was filled with wax figures of mermaids — so many that the floor seemed to disappear beneath the sea of white, eerie forms. Each wax figure was arranged with its head tilted back, eyes fixed forward, all staring blankly at Bai Liu as if waiting for something.

The eerie stillness was broken only by the scraping and rustling noises coming from the shadows, places that the light from Bai Liu's torch couldn't reach.

He didn't recoil. Instead, he dropped the torch and reached out to touch one of the figures.

On the other side of a small TV screen, Wang Shun gasped, eyes wide in shock. "!!!!"

The small town of Siren

"Holy shit!" Wang Shun blurted out, his voice filled with panic. "I haven't gathered any information on god-tier NPCs yet, don't do anything reckless!"

"That wax figure will alienate you when you touch it," Wang Shun continued, his tone urgent. "And once you're alienated, your mental value will drop. If it reaches zero, you'll start to lose your grip on reality and spiral into delirium. Before you know it, you'll be screwed!"

Wang Shun's animated warning caught the attention of several players watching the broadcast on the small TV. The [Comedy of Death] division, where the game is often played with deadly excitement for the sake of entertainment, was buzzing with reactions. Some players loved the thrill of such risky moves, while others preferred to avoid danger at all costs.

As the audience watched, their eyes widened when they saw Bai Liu reaching out to touch the wax figure of a mermaid. "Wow, I've never seen this kind of death. He's touching a monster by himself... what's he thinking?" one spectator commented, clearly fascinated.

Wang Shun turned toward the audience, his voice dripping with disdain as he pointed at Bai Liu on the screen. "I followed this player all the way from the center screen. He's been racking up points so quickly—almost a hundred points in one go! And do you know what he spent those points on?"

"Hundreds of points?" the spectator replied, surprised as they glanced at the time record on the TV. "It's only the second day in the game and he's already got hundreds of points? That's impressive. So, it must be leading up to the [Comedy of Death] division."

Before the spectator could finish, Bai Liu on the screen was already nearly pressing his face to the wax figure, tracing its features with his fingers. The crowd gasped, eyes wide with disbelief.

"But it makes sense. With his style of play, he would've made it here quickly... But what did he buy?" the spectator mused. "If there's something useful for Siren, a hundred points could buy a lot... maybe a flaming torch or some water bubbles. That would be perfect for this situation."

"No, he didn't buy any of those," Wang Shun said, a sly grin spreading across his face. "He bought nine barrels of high-proof alcohol."

"No way?!" The audience collectively stared in disbelief. "Nine barrels of alcohol?! Who even buys that stuff?"

Wang Shun nodded, his face serious. "In theory, the flame and light intensity from burning alcohol wouldn't be enough to affect the mermaid wax figures or the sailors..."

He leaned in closer to the screen, his curiosity piqued. "But what's going on? He's been touching it for so long, why hasn't he started to alienate? He should've already begun to lose his mental value."

Other viewers furrowed their brows in confusion. "It's been five minutes… he should be alienated by now, his spirit value should be dropping to zero."

Bai Liu, unfazed by the situation, continued to casually touch the wax figures of the mermaids, his fingers moving along the lines of the sculpture as if he were a sculptor admiring his own work, not a player interacting with a monster.

His expression was calm, almost detached, as he spoke aloud to himself, as if conversing with the wax figure.

"Your face hasn't changed into mine yet. When those mermaid wax figures tried to attack and hatch me before, their faces would resemble mine. But yours… your face remains in the cocoon form, unchanged, meaning touching you doesn't alienate me. You're still in your chrysalis state — you can't hatch me because you're—"

"You're a talisman for the sailors. A cocoon for them. You won't hatch me. You're not coming back."

Bai Liu was holding a wax figure of a mermaid with the exact features of a sailor he had seen on deck. Up close, he noticed something unusual — the wax figures had lost their color, and the material felt brittle and thin, unlike the wax figures he had encountered elsewhere.

These wax figures seemed similar to the one in the hotel lobby known as the [Talisman], which, in monster lore, was called the [Cocoon Form]. If Bai Liu's theory was correct, the wax figures of the mermaids were amulets for the sailors on board. These figures were their [cocoons], lifeless and incapable of attack. When a wax figure transformed from [chrysalis] to [cocoon], it meant the creature inside had already metamorphosed into something else, leaving behind an empty shell.

The sailors wandering around the ship were the monsters trapped inside these cocoons.

Wang Shun and the spectator in front of the small TV were both staring in stunned silence.

Leaning closer to the screen, Wang Shun watched the refreshed monster book in disbelief. "I've watched the Siren Small Town clearance video so many times," he muttered, "and never once did I notice a monster here that I didn't have to avoid. Even God Mu, the top scorer for this version of Siren Town, missed the fact that this place is a cocoon, not a chrysalis."

He rubbed his eyes, trying to process what he was seeing. "Usually, you have to get chased by these amulets to trigger the mermaid sailor monsters and unlock this page of the monster book. How the hell did Bai Liu know he could avoid the wax figure?"

The spectator, equally bewildered, gasped. "Wait... is he going to collect all the monster books in Siren Town to clear the level? That's insane! The last time someone did that was God Mu!"

Wang Shun snapped back to reality, immediately shaking his head. "No way." He adjusted his glasses, eyes narrowing as he gave Bai Liu a mixture of appreciation and regret. "He wasn't lucky with the second page... the monster book that was swiped was a wandering NPC."

He leaned in, explaining further. "The Siren King has no weaknesses. To collect that page, players need to trigger the Siren King's awakening. But once that NPC attacks, it's game over — players are guaranteed to die."

The spectator was left speechless. "Wait, he even swiped a roaming

NPC?!" The crowd's excitement surged. "I've never seen a player with a wandering NPC still alive! Everyone who swiped it just quit the game... this guy is still going, and he's not even panicking?!"

Wang Shun chuckled. "You're all uninformed, I guess. He's new."

Their loud conversation drew the attention of more spectators, who were now gathered around, captivated by the unfolding drama on the screen. Bai Liu's actions, combined with the refresh of a three-page monster book on the very first day, drew in many curious onlookers.

The viewers in the [Comedy of Death] section, known for their love of players who break the mold, were particularly impressed.

"This is awesome!" one player shouted. "I love it when he plays like this, so crazy and fearless!"

"Don't back down, Bai Liu! Go for it! Let's see what you do next!"

Despite the growing excitement around him, Bai Liu's focus remained sharp. He had paused his ascent when he realized the sailors were monsters. "If I'm right," he mused, "the doorway to the warehouse that lured me down is definitely guarded by sailors. If I go up there now, I'll trigger a chase with the sailors — not a good idea."

The real danger came from the wax figures. "If players don't know these wax figures are harmless, they'll get ambushed when they rush away, and the sailors will attack. It's a death trap, no less."

Bai Liu smiled wryly, a slight amusement crossing his face. "The game design is so obvious; it's easy to figure out how to crack this chase. All I need to do is jump into the sea."

He paused for a moment, gazing out at the waves. "But I don't like the sea."

The small town of Siren

Bai Liu was browsing through the store when he came across a highly popular item called "Water Bubbles." It promised players the ability to breathe and float in a bubble for two full hours, while also repelling fish and keeping them at bay.

It seemed like a decent feature, but at a hefty price of over 70 points and a limit of only two uses, it was clearly an expendable item.

To Bai Liu's sharp eye, the bubble's only value was that it allowed someone to breathe underwater, and charging more than 70 points for it was nothing short of extortion. Anyone who bought it, in his opinion, was just paying an "IQ tax" to the game shop.

Of course, this had nothing to do with the fact that he didn't know how to swim or had no intention of jumping into water. As a gringo, Bai Liu naturally found this feature wasteful and wasn't interested in pursuing such a route in game design—one he found unattractive.

He glanced up at the warehouse door, which had started to creak, as though someone was preparing to lock it behind them.

A typical player would have felt nervous by now and would have scrambled to hide from the eerie, looming wax figures. Bai Liu, however, remained calm. He turned off his torchlight, walked over to a wax figure, found a dark corner, and wrapped himself in the grey cloth from the floor, pretending to be another motionless figure. He stayed still, blending in.

The group of cocooned mermaid wax figures, whose eyesight wasn't exactly sharp, searched the room blankly, but stopped once they couldn't find him.

The warehouse door creaked open a few times, and two sailors entered, their dim oil lamps casting faint light as they descended the stairs, whispering hoarsely to one another.

"Count the number of wax figures..." one muttered.

"I've counted them several times, can't be wrong..." the other replied.

"After tonight, there will be four more wax figures here. We'll send them over to the wax museum first. The ones there have been guarding Siren King for too long. It's time they moved on with their talismans..."

"Keep a close watch on Siren King and don't let him wake up in the water again, or we'll all..."

The two sailors stood above the warehouse, holding their old-fashioned oil lamps. As they descended, Bai Liu could barely make out their features in the dim light, unsure whether they were wax figures or actual people.

Their skin was so unnaturally pale, it looked like the color of death itself. Even from up close, Bai Liu couldn't see any veins in their faces or hands.

He was certain they weren't human, though. As he flicked his gaze at them, a quiet certainty settled in his mind.

But it wasn't quite right. These sailors, though resembling humans, were identified as "Mermaid Sailors" in the monster book. Bai Liu frowned, an unsettling feeling growing in his chest.

One of the sailors was the one who had told him to stay put on the deck. His eyes were lifeless, staring blankly. "Make sure these amulets are secure. If they're okay, lock them up so they don't break when the waves hit the ship."

The sailors immediately began securing the wax figures with chains.

Bai Liu held his breath, carefully eyeing the open warehouse door. He began to move closer, inching toward it.

Suddenly, one of the sailors paused, as if hearing something. He frowned and turned toward the wax figure Bai Liu was pretending to be. Muttering to himself, he asked, "You said you just saw a tourist come here?"

Bai Liu's face darkened in an instant.

It was a blunder. He hadn't realized that these sailors could actually communicate with the wax figures.

The chase seemed like it was going to be a non-chase, but it was already much better than being on deck, where there were only two sailors. Bai Liu's mind raced as he tried to come up with the best countermeasure. His physical condition was poor, and if it came down to a chase, it would likely end badly. That's why he wanted to avoid it from the start, but now, it felt like he was stuck in a dead-end loop. Whether he stayed or left, it seemed like he was bound to be caught.

He couldn't run, and going up the stairs wasn't an option either. If he went up, there would be even more sailors, turning it from a chase into a group confrontation, forcing him to jump overboard. Bai Liu didn't want to jump into the sea. So, he had to think carefully about what to do next.

The sailor approached the wax figure and suddenly, as though he had heard something amusing, let out a low laugh that echoed through the barn. "I didn't expect an honored guest would arrive early. Don't worry, you'll be here sooner or later."

As the sailor moved around the corners, his oil lamp cast an eerie light on his face, making his smile look more sinister. "Come out now, the evening catch is about to begin. The mermaids are waiting for you in the sea."

Bai Liu's mind quickly shifted gears. These sailors were clearly more dangerous than the wax figures. They were some kind of monster, too. What could their weakness be?

Within seconds, the sailor was right in front of Bai Liu. Reacting instinctively, Bai Liu pointed his torch directly at the sailor, but the sailor simply blocked his eyes with one hand before lowering it, as if unaffected. His smile grew even more secretive. "We're not like those things. We're not afraid of light."

The weakness wasn't light, then. Despite the sailors' reaction to the glare looking similar to that of a human, Bai Liu's mind raced for another solution. Almost immediately, he grabbed a barrel behind him and hurled it at the sailor. The barrel smashed into the sailor's body, scattering into wood chips.

These two sailors had tough, solid exoskeletons, unlike the fragile mermaid wax figures. It was as if they had broken free from their cocoons.

The sailor's eyes locked onto Bai Liu from the dim warehouse, and he reached out, grabbing Bai Liu's wrist. He turned his head sideways, flashing a wry smile. His teeth were thin and sharp. "Come on, guest, let's go watch the fishing below the surface."

Bai Liu studied the sailor. These sailors had no obvious weaknesses, but Bai Liu knew from the system's information that the Sailor King had no such weakness either. That meant there must be something that could be used to fight back. Otherwise, there would be no point to the game.

The sailors, though seemingly invulnerable, had a softness to them, both physically and optically. That shouldn't be the case, though. The mermaids and mermaid sailors, as Bai Liu had reasoned before, should be photophobic—afraid of light. The mermaid wax figures had confirmed this deduction, but these sailors were unaffected by the light...

Something was masking their weaknesses.

Earlier, the receptionist had mentioned that amulets could help protect them. Bai Liu's eyes scanned the wax figures around him, and he noticed one with a small crack on the top of its head. It looked like it had been struck with a wine cask. The wax figure's expression changed from affectionate to pained, and its hands were raised in front of its eyes as if shielding them from a light.

Bai Liu's mind clicked into place. He quickly kicked the wax figure of a mermaid in the face, sending it crashing to the ground. The figure shattered into pieces, oozing black, putrid blood. The sailor behind him, who had been holding Bai Liu's wrist, let out a shrill, fish-like cry that stung Bai Liu's ears.

The sailor's exoskeleton began to crack and break apart, falling away like lime, revealing his true form.

Bai Liu then grabbed another wax figure of a sailor, tore off its head, and smashed it onto his knee, breaking it.

As the sailor's body had been tough, like an exoskeleton, the wax figure acted as a fragile talisman, easily shattered. It was no wonder the sailors kept them in the bottom compartment for protection.

The two sailors let out a piercing shriek as their once-pale faces faded to a sickly greenish-black. Their eyes shifted to the sides, eventually settling into their temples.

One of the sailors, smelling strongly of fish, had his lower body transformed into a wet, curly, eel-like tail. His jagged teeth glistened as he crouched on the floor, moving like a gecko toward Bai Liu, his hands bulging with strength.

Bai Liu aimed his torch at the other sailor, who had just been unaffected by the glare, and the sailor immediately shuddered, letting out another high-pitched, shrill cry.

It was clear now—shattering their amulets made the glare effective against them.

Bai Liu backed up slowly, pointing his torch at the two sailors who were now crawling on the floor like geckos, recoiling from the light. They hissed, reluctant to come closer, but still trying to reach Bai Liu. He backed up further, turning his back on the door and exiting the warehouse, locking it behind him.

Even after closing the door, Bai Liu could still hear the pattering of fish tails slapping against the floor and the banging and shaking of the door as the sailors tried to break through.

Bai Liu straightened his collar as he made his way down the warehouse stairs. Lucy spotted him instantly, grabbing his arm with a mock pout. "Where were you? They said the fishing was about to start."

"We've reached the sea," Lucy continued with a smile, her face now bearing fish-scaled patterns and her eyes glowing in the darkness. She grabbed Bai Liu's hand with an odd, slippery grip, but he pulled it away without a word.

"Really?" Bai Liu asked.

"Yes," Lucy chuckled lowly, her voice becoming more guttural. "The mermaids are here."

The small town of Siren

The sailors lowered their nets on either side of the boat, murmuring something Bai Liu couldn't quite make out. All he heard were words like "gift from Siren King" and similar phrases, and Jeff, looking somewhat manic, explained, "They're praying to the Siren King for a bounty of mermaids."

Before Jeff could say anything more, the sailors on the edge of the boat began to jump over the nets, one by one. Lucy screamed in terror, "What are they doing? I thought we were catching mermaids! Why are they jumping down themselves?"

Bai Liu's response was calm and quiet: "They're just fishing for mermaids."

A long silence followed, before, slowly, a large net began to rise from beneath the sea's surface. The sight was gruesome—scattered limbs and fish tails, a dozen mermaids trapped in the net, broken and dead. Their tails were rotting, and the limbs stuck upwards in a haunting display.

The mermaids looked like discarded dolls, twisted into unnatural poses. Their eyes were wide open and lifeless, staring blankly at the sailors on board. Their faces bore expressions of fear and grimness, their bodies covered in bite marks, as though they had been attacked by deep-sea creatures before being thrown into the net.

Bai Liu took a deep breath, slowly calming himself as he observed the faces of the mermaids in the searchlight's glow.

The faces of these mermaids resembled those of the twelve missing tourists from the newspaper. Bai Liu's heart sank.

The sailors whispered among themselves in joyful tones.

"They'll be made into wax figures and sent to the wax museum..."

"But the museum can only handle four wax figures tonight, since only four visitors are coming. What about the extra mermaids?"

"Let's stash them in the bottom for now, it'll give us a reprieve..."

The sailors quickly hauled the mermaids away to an unknown destination, while Bai Liu and his group were left to eat some of the freshly caught common sea fish that had been caught along with the mermaids.

However, the fish had a strange taste, carrying the unmistakable scent of the mermaids. The taste was unusually sour and rotten, though once it passed through the throat, it turned into something that resembled normal fish meat, with a refreshing sweetness.

The three people, apart from Bai Liu, were eagerly devouring the fish, their fingers covered in the grease and fishy scent. Lucy had grabbed the fish's head, slurping it down so quickly that strands of hair clung to her cheeks. She looked up at Bai Liu with a greasy smile, "Bai Liu, why don't you come over and eat? The fish is really fresh tonight."

The small white eyes of the fish head in Lucy's hand seemed to glare menacingly at Bai Liu.

Meanwhile, Andre, holding a fish tail, had transformed almost entirely into a fish-like creature. His eyes were nearly invisible, positioned on the sides of his face, his nose flattened, and a foul-smelling substance dripped from his mouth as he chewed rapidly.

Jeff, barely holding onto his sanity, sliced through the fatty belly of his fish. His hands moved faster and faster as he stuffed the fish mechanically into his mouth, almost as if he had no control over himself anymore.

The sailors observed Bai Liu with an eerie smile, forcefully placing a plate full of sea fish in front of him. "It's a waste of time coming here if you don't eat fresh fish, Mr. Bai."

Bai Liu hesitated, tempted to refuse, but then the panel in front of him popped up with a clear message:

[Task Tip: If you don't eat the fish presented by the sailors, the fishing roundup will be considered a failure.]

He paused, considering the implications, and after a couple of seconds of silence, he picked up a piece and ate it.

The taste was strange at first—sour and rotten—but as it passed through his throat, it transformed into something more familiar. The fresh sweetness of the fish filled his mouth, and despite himself, Bai Liu felt an overwhelming urge to keep eating. The fish seemed to take on a strange allure, even for someone like him, who had never been particularly fond of fish.

Bai Liu fought to keep his thoughts from sinking, refusing to glance at the fish laid out on the table. He stood up and stepped onto the beach, the sea breeze brushing against his face as he inhaled the metallic scent of the coin lodged deep in his heart.

The scent of money had a calming effect on Bai Liu.

He could start piecing things together.

The Siren King had been restored, falling into a deep slumber, and with it, the power over these waters was lost. This allowed those who perished here to rise as mermaids, returning from death to walk the earth—a tale that had long been told, but the mermaid corpses of the twelve tourists confirmed the truth of this myth.

Indeed, those who died here could turn into mermaids.

But the question remained: why did this small, remote stretch of sea yield so many dead souls transformed into mermaids, enough to fill an entire wax museum? Why were there so many fatalities in these waters?

When Bai Liu saw the twelve mermaid corpses of the tourists that had been salvaged, he finally understood the grim reality.

This sea was a dumping ground for bodies.

The bodies of the missing tourists were likely cast into these waters before being retrieved by sailors, who treated them as large fish, transforming them into mermaids and later immortalizing them as wax figures.

But who had killed these tourists?

Bai Liu suspected that this town, notorious for its robberies, had likely seen many tourists lose their belongings. The town's economy wasn't driven by tourism itself, but by a parasitic looting industry tied to it.

What better prey than a tourist, far from home?

With so many dead tourists in such a treacherous place, Bai Liu was inclined to think that the tourists were robbed and murdered, then discarded in the sea. Though, it couldn't be entirely ruled out that the mermaids hunted them.

But considering how the mermaids feared bright light, it seemed unlikely that they hunted tourists during the day. At night, during the busy tourist season in Siren Town, the mermaids were captured and put on display for the visitors. The likelihood of mermaid attacks seemed low...

Wait a minute, Bai Liu thought.

Mermaid fishing only made sense if people had died here in these waters—without death, there would be no mermaids.

For instance, Bai Liu himself, the tourist rescued during this fishing trip, was the one who had gone missing previously...

It dawned on him that the people of this town may have deliberately killed tourists, disposed of their bodies, and transformed them into mermaids. These mermaids were then showcased as a tourist attraction, a way to lure more visitors and make it easier to rob them.

No wonder the keeper had said there would be no mermaid fishing without tourists—every captured mermaid had once been a tourist who met a tragic end.

The mayor of this town was a [people-loving] individual.

To stimulate the economy and cover up the townspeople's crimes—preventing their criminal records from being exposed—he likely oversaw the creation of wax figures from the bodies of the captured mermaids. These corpses were either preserved as waxwork or disposed of entirely.

It was clear that the police would never uncover the bodies, which had been hidden or transformed into exhibits in the wax museum.

These mermaid wax figures were filled with the souls of past visitors, now vengeful spirits. They turned into monsters, incubating a curse that haunted the townspeople, turning them into talismans of revenge.

As the inhabitants of the town underwent a transformation into fish-like creatures, the mermaid wax figures shifted into human forms, and the two exchanged identities.

The sailors wandering the ship were no longer human—they were ghosts, lost to the depths, and had become monsters.

By this logic, something crucial was still missing.

The mermaid wax figure has all three stages of transformation—pupa, cocoon, and butterfly. But Bai Liu narrowed his eyes, realizing that, according to the laws of growth, there was one state still absent: the larvae, the most fragile and numerous of them all.

And the larvae are...

Bai Liu slowly pressed his hand against his stomach. The piece of fish he had just eaten seemed to squirm wetly within him. As he gazed at his fingers, now beginning to glow with an eerie greenish-white hue, and the faint fish-scale patterns appearing on his skin, he could feel his jawline starting to itch, as though gill flakes were about to grow.

He turned slowly to the three men who had accompanied him, all still devouring their food, already on the verge of losing their human forms, especially Andre.

Andre had practically collapsed against the table, furiously shoveling food into his mouth. His hair had morphed into bony, fin-like spikes, and his nose was now covered in dark green fish scales.

[Warning: Player Bai Liu has entered a state of alienation. Mental value is decreasing. Please differentiate between game reality and game illusion.]

In his mind, Bai Liu realized that this was the final stage of the mermaid wax figure's transformation—the larval stage.

Any visitor who entered Siren Town, or any resident who stayed too long, was alienated into this form: the weakest and most vulnerable, susceptible to being preyed upon and robbed.

And now, Bai Liu was experiencing the mermaid wax figure in its most vulnerable state—the larval form.

Andre wiped the rotting froth from his mouth, pushing himself away from the table. His lips had turned into thin, sharp teeth that extended all the way through his jaw like a clown's grin. More bloody pieces of fish fell from his mouth as he spoke, "Bai Liu, remember our bet?"

Bai Liu, drawn to the distinctive, fishy scent emanating from Andre's body, blinked slowly, "I remember. We're spending the night on the boat, right?"

Andre grinned grotesquely, the smile stretching all the way to the back of his head. He then flicked out a long tongue to lick the remaining flesh from his face. "Why don't we just spend the night right here, in these waters full of mermaids?"

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Andre gazed at Bai Liu, his eyes filled with open hunger.

He let out a soft, humorless laugh. "I'm still hungry. If a man-fish shows up and capsizes my boat tonight, I'll drag it up, bite it to death, and feast on it."

The man was clearly talking about killing the mermaid, yet his eyes kept drifting to Bai Liu's neck, as though it wasn't the mermaid he was planning to bite, but Bai Liu himself.

Bai Liu's thoughts started to slow. The decline in his mental state was evident—his mental values were taking a toll.

He suddenly realized that Andre exuded an irresistible scent. For a moment, Bai Liu even considered biting the man himself. If Andre found him so aromatic, then Bai Liu, now more alienated than ever, would surely be an even more desirable target.

Andre was contemplating eating him.

But Bai Liu's stamina, intelligence, and reflexes had all dwindled. His panel attributes were steadily turning red, and his spirit level had fallen to the brink of sixty. If he were to spend the night at sea with someone like Andre, who had already undergone alienation, his survival was virtually impossible.

There had to be a way to counter Andre.

Yet, it felt as though a veil had covered his mind. He could faintly discern options, but couldn't summon them. He vaguely remembered preparing for such a moment, but the solution eluded him.

Bai Liu blinked and swayed slightly, murmuring to himself.

The spectators watching in front of the small TV screens could see Bai Liu's hesitation, their hearts leaping with concern.

Wang Shun, who had been following Bai Liu, knew the man was a highly skilled player. He'd seen others navigate Siren Town before, but never with this level of mental intensity.

Wang Shun held his breath, eyes wide. “He’s alienated, his spirit level is dropping to sixty. He’s about to start hallucinating.”

Nearby players were glued to the screen.

A player standing with Wang Shun spoke with a tinge of dread. “Sixty spirit... it's life and death now.”

A spirit level of sixty marked the dividing line between reality and illusion. Above sixty, you fought monsters. Below, you fought your own mind, your own illusions.

Illusions were far harder to combat.

Monsters had weaknesses you could exploit, but illusions—those were born from within. Their weaknesses were unpredictable, and you never knew what was real and what was a product of your mind.

The advantage a high-spirit player had in the game was immense, which was why Bai Liu had drawn so much attention before.

Players with low spirit levels often succumbed to the monsters’ influence, slipping into illusions that could kill them. This point, sixty, was referred to by players as the [Life and Death Level].

The audience sighed, sensing the inevitable.

"Without any spirit-cleansing items, his spirit level is just going to keep dropping. He’s hanging by a thread now."

“Siren Town is tough—it gives a 50% pass rate, but for newcomers who don’t know the strategy, survival is almost impossible.”

“Didn’t someone clear it in the last batch of newcomers?”

“Yeah, but that guy came out with 25 spirit points, totally crazy, barely made it out.”

“This guy's probably headed down the same path.”

The sailors aboard the ship appeared to be watching a show, preparing two small boats for both Andre and Bai Liu to launch into the deep waters.

Bai Liu, appearing disoriented, stood by the rail, requesting an extra blanket from the sailor, saying he might be cold during the night.

The sailor gave him a mocking glance, placing a few thick blankets in the boat. “Have a good night, Mr. Bai. If you wake up, that is.”

Bai Liu gave a dry laugh. “I will.”

Around the ship, small boats full of fishermen, resembling deep-sea fish, bobbed on the water. These fishermen looked eerily like Andre. In the dim light, their eyes glowed a ghostly green.

Standing motionless in their boats, the fishermen stared at Bai Liu, who clutched his blanket. The gills in their ears twitched slightly, making a faint, unsettling sound—like they had found their prey.

Andre, in another boat not far from Bai Liu, eyed him with an unsettling hunger. His lips glistened with saliva, his eyes glowing green like the fishermen’s. “Bai Liu,” he rasped, “take your foolish quilt and go sleep at the bottom of the sea.”

The large ship slowly sailed off, leaving them behind. The sailors told them they’d return in the morning to pick them up.

Bai Liu looked around, realizing that, apart from Andre, many of the fishermen had stayed behind and were now circling his boat.

Even in his foggy state, it was clear to him that, as the weakest of the “larvae” here, he would be torn apart and devoured by these ravenous fishermen in less than half an hour if he stayed with them.

And with Andre watching, he was even more vulnerable.

Although Bai Liu was still alienated, jumping into the sea wasn’t a good option.

His gills, which should have allowed him to breathe underwater, weren’t functioning properly, leaving him uncertain if he could survive submerged. Even if he could, swimming among these highly alienated fishermen and Andre would only guarantee his death.

Bai Liu also had a mission aboard this ship—his goal was to win over Andre, even with his mental state deteriorating. Surviving the night was looking increasingly impossible.

Wang Shun sighed deeply, setting down his pen. “If only he had a water bubble.”

“That item can repel the fish—buy two, use them three times, and it’ll get him through the night until dawn. It’s a bit expensive at 140 points, but it works. If Bai Liu hadn’t spent his points so recklessly earlier, it would’ve been easy for him to survive.”

A nearby player nodded, shaking his head with a helpless smile. “He’s a rookie. It’s normal to make mistakes. Bai Liu’s good, but he’s not perfect—he’s still learning, like every novice.”

“Well, that’s it then,” another player said, ready to leave.

Just as they turned to go, a loud noise erupted from Andre’s boat. A figure—no, a mermaid—leaped onto it, sharp teeth bared, sinking into Andre’s flesh with a vicious bite.

The audience, who had been about to leave, froze.

Wang Shun adjusted his glasses and leaned forward. “What’s going on? Shouldn’t the fishermen and Andre be in the water, attacking the players? Why are they going after Andre?”

The mermaid aboard Andre’s boat was wild with fury, flipping under the surface before latching onto Andre’s neck with a savage bite.

Andre screamed, his gills flapping from the pain. Black blood sprayed everywhere, coating the boat and splashing into the dark water.

The scent of blood hung in the air, and the fishermen’s eyes shifted toward Andre’s boat.

The fishermen, attracted by the smell of fresh blood, turned their small boats around and surrounded Andre, their hungry gazes fixated on him.

The sound of gnawing echoed as Andre’s boat was swarmed by hungry mermaids. Panicked, Andre tried to leap into the sea, but his legs were dragged back as mermaids devoured him.

With one last, pitiful whimper, Andre raised his hands in a futile gesture of surrender, only to be overwhelmed by the relentless swarm.

Chapter End Notes

Oh noooooo, poor Andre !

The small town of Siren

Bai Liu stood on the boat, rocking gently as he watched the chaotic scene unfold in silence. After a moment, he muttered to himself, almost as if in a daze, “Ah yes, I made sure to prepare well when I boarded, so I wouldn’t be vulnerable when my mental values dropped.”

On the small TV screen, Bai Liu appeared to be feeling a little cold after speaking. He wrapped himself in a quilt and drowsily continued watching the unfolding drama.

The viewers watching the small TV: "....."

What did he do before boarding the boat? Why did Andre suddenly die?

None of them had ever seen a fisherman eat Andre in the other games, and they were eager to find out what Bai Liu was up to—what they were missing.

“He must have pulled some kind of stunt before boarding!” someone said.

A nearby player, equally curious, closed their eyes in deep thought. “Wait! Let me think back. It was just the usual process: came here by car, paid the driver, then boarded the boat. The driver said he would prepare the venue and props for the night’s bet...”

Several players, who were about to leave, stayed behind as the crowd gathered once more, some shouting:

“Can anyone from the game system check the video replay to see what he did? I’m not a member, so I can’t access the gameplay replay.”

“I can! I’ll play it! I’ll project it for everyone to see!”

“Hmm, it feels like a normal game process. But how? Bai Liu only has a luck value of 0. It’s unlikely that luck caused a fisherman to take it upon themselves to bite Andre.”

“So how did he manage it?”

“Fk, I’m posting this to the game forum. I’ve watched it three times and still can’t figure out what he did to set it up—this is insane.”

[Game Forum - Help! Does anyone know how to get through the mermaid-eating-Andre situation?]

1L: “I just saw an amazing gameplay video from a player. Some of you have played 'Siren Small Town' before, right? Can anyone explain the mermaid-eating-Andre event in [True Love’s Ship]? I’ve never seen that before. (Attached is Bai Liu’s gameplay video.)”

2L: “I’ve got so many questions???”

“Wait, how did this play out? I’ve never seen a monster voluntarily help a player eat Andre for a quest. Is this some messed-up relationship line?”

3L: “This player must have a high luck value, right? High luck can lead to these kinds of unbelievable developments.”

Owner’s reply to 3L: “No, his luck value is 0. He’s extremely unlucky. His first dungeon was Siren Town, and the monster book drew a wandering NPC. Super unlucky. Then this happened... I can’t even explain it.”

4L: “This newbie... has some guts. How the hell did he pull that off?”

5L (Mu Sicheng): “You can trigger it if you hit the right spur.”

“When this branch is over 80%, the driver will lurk in the sea, waiting for the right moment to kill Andre. The smell of his blood attracts the fishermen, who will eat him.”

“But to trigger this, you need to control the mermaid sculpture on the first night of the sleepover and discover Jeff’s plot without Jeff realizing it, or you’ll be assassinated.”

“Is this player a total newbie? I’m impressed. I didn’t hit this spur on my first playthrough, and I had to struggle through it with skill. I only realized this spur existed when I replayed it later.”

7L: “The gods have revealed themselves! Bless me to pass this difficult dungeon once and for all!”

8L: “God Mu, kudos to the awesome newcomers! I want to see it! Owner, tell me which section the newbie is in! I want to join the strong huddle!”

9L: “Me too!”

“I’m still wondering how he pushed [Jeff’s Bloody Conspiracy] to 80%. It was only at 50% when we were in the car,” Wang Shun said, clearly puzzled. As a cloud player, knowing how to trigger the branch was vital to him.

Wang Shun pulled up his game manager and asked God Mu in the forum.

God Mu replied: “[He paid the driver again.]”

[The driver’s fee was already settled, but the player tipped generously. This tempted the driver to rob and kill them, but with the added spinoff, the driver killed Andre first.]

[To push the branch to 80%, you need to make the driver aware that you have valuable belongings. This tempts him to follow you, rob you, and kill Andre in the process.]

Wang Shun read God Mu’s reply and muttered, “So that’s what happened.”

But after a moment of thought, he was left in confusion.

Wang Shun typed his follow-up question: [God Mu, but wouldn’t the driver rob the player right after killing Andre?]

Mu Sicheng replied: [Yes, but the player must hide in water bubbles that can expel the fish.]

[The driver can kill Andre stealthily, but he isn’t as strong as Andre, who is the boss of this level.]

[Once Andre is dead, the bubbles will handle the driver and the other fish. After triggering this branch, the ‘True Love’s Ship’ mission becomes significantly easier.]

Wang Shun frowned as he watched Bai Liu on the small TV, scrolling through the forums: “Did you see God Mu’s reply? He said the mermaids will finish eating Andre and then turn on the players.”

“I saw,” the viewer beside Wang Shun replied with a sigh. “God Mu even praised this great newcomer. It’s a shame though. If he hadn’t wasted so many points on alcohol, he could have passed the level by buying water bubbles.”

Wang Shun shook his head, feeling helpless: “The difficulty has been reduced to this level, and we’re still stuck here!”

It wasn’t just Wang Shun who felt this way—many players who had come to watch because of God Mu were equally frustrated.

They saw Bai Liu, still lounging under his covers, as the mermaids devoured Andre and turned toward his boat.

Bai Liu, seemingly oblivious, continued to doze, unaware of the mermaids silently approaching.

The scene left the players speechless, unsure of what to say.

The small town of Siren

As Bai Liu was about to be bitten, the audience grew frantic, transforming into grumpy old men as they yelled at the small TV.

“Wake up! Get up and fight the monsters!”

“Why are you sleeping? You’re missing the action! Didn’t your mother teach you not to give up while playing games?”

“I’ve watched so many gameplay videos, but I’ve never seen someone like this. It’s clear he could win, but he's giving up!”

Bai Liu slowly opened his eyes, as if woken by the noise from the small TV.

He looked out at the fishermen who had cut through the surface of the water, their heads rising with their mouths open, reaching toward his boat.

Bai Liu could see their legs, transformed into eel-like tails, slithering beneath the water, flipping like snakes as they darted toward him.

Not far from Bai Liu, Andre’s boat was covered in blood, with a broken skeleton and torn flesh scattered around it.

Andre’s lower body had started to fuse, taking on a fish-like appearance, while the remnants of his clothing hung from the boat, floating alone on the water—a grim testament to the ferocity of these mermaids.

In a desperate move, Bai Liu slowly dipped his blanket into the sea, pulling it back up to cover his boat. He shivered underneath it, as if trying to escape his own body, an act that sparked a frenzy of frustration from the onlookers.

But Bai Liu continued, despite the difficulty, as if his body had turned to ice.

His once-white fingers now spread with marble-like veins, the cold seeping deeper into his bones.

He was now in the same state as Lucy had been before—his body temperature had dropped so much that it felt like he was turning to stone, leaving him sluggish in both mind and movement. The shaking was uncontrollable.

Bai Liu glanced at the barrels of alcohol in his panel and ordered: [Take out a barrel of alcohol].

[System Alert: Removed]

A barrel of alcohol appeared on the boat, weighing it down and frightening the spectators even more. The monster was almost at his boat.

Bai Liu pulled a box of matches from his pocket, huddled under the wet blanket, and, with trembling hands, struck a match.

His expression remained calm as he lit the match, then lifted a corner of the quilt, stood up, stepped onto the alcohol barrel, and carefully poured the liquid into the sea.

The audience covered their eyes in disbelief at this move.

“Pouring alcohol into the sea... Did he come up with this because his spirit level is down?”

“It’s not that we can’t burn it, the highly concentrated alcohol can float on the surface for a few minutes, but it’s a drop in the bucket. It won’t work on these mermaid monsters—they’re not afraid of fire.”

Bai Liu tossed the match onto the alcohol-soaked water. A fire flared up, and Bai Liu, still draped in his wet blanket, gazed at the approaching mermaids through the warmth of the flames, looking as calm as if he had been waiting for them all along.

A searing bonfire blazed in the deep, cold sea, as the mermaids circled the boat, waving their tails in hunger. Bai Liu sat in the middle of the fire, his eyes reflecting the flames and the sea.

With pupils the color of fire and alcohol, Bai Liu resembled a Siren more than a human, his alienated face exuding a strange, magnetic allure.

As the mermaids, desperate for food, poked their heads out of the water, they were swept into the flames with a sizzling sound, their bodies cooking and sending an eerie smell into the air. The mermaids let out a piercing scream, flipping onto their backs and floating to the surface to struggle.

The burned mermaids gave off a rancid aroma, and the remaining creatures swarmed to devour the cooked ones, the sickening sound of bones cracking filling the air.

The stench of blood and charred fish thickened in Bai Liu's nostrils, turning into an oddly appetizing scent that made him lick his lips, though his face remained emotionless.

Surrounded by mermaids devouring each other, Bai Liu sat still, his face pale and distant, but with a healthy flush from the heat of the fire. He glanced at Andre's empty boat and smiled softly.

It was a contented smile, one that mirrored the expression on the faces of the mermaids, though it was much more unsettling.

Bai Liu whispered hoarsely, "Good night, Andre."

[Side Quest - Ship of True Love: Bai Liu wins a bet against Andre, completes the quest, and receives 100 bonus points.]

[Side Mission - Jeff's Bloody Plot: 90% Progress]

[Main Quest - Participate in Mermaid Fishing Convention: Completed, reward: 50 points]

[Siren Small Town Monster Book Update - Mermaid (4/4)]

[Monster Name: Mermaid (Larvae State)]

[Weaknesses: Fire, light, fragility, proximity to humans.]

[Attack: Biting and scratching. Does not trigger alienation. Low intelligence. Does not use tools.]

The monster book has been updated. We hope you continue your research.

A long list of rewards and achievements flashed on the screen, almost blinding the viewers glued to the small TV.

After a long pause, the viewer who had previously criticized Bai Liu's "lying delivery" spoke up incredulously, "What the hell?!"

The exclamation snapped everyone back to attention, and the questions came flooding in.

"What just happened?!"

“Lying delivery, my ass! This guy actually won by lying down? This is insane.”

“Shit, I’m going to the forum to ask God Mu what happened!”

“Why didn’t the alcohol dissolve in water?!”

“I looked up the alcohol he used, and holy crap—it’s a semi-solid oil-based alcohol that’s been modified to be insoluble in water. How did this new guy find it?”

“Did he actually read all the instructions?”

“God Mu replied! He said that mermaid sculptures and sailors aren’t afraid of fire, but mermaid larvae are. A mermaid without an amulet is vulnerable to fire.”

“And Bai Liu figured out that cooked mermaid meat is highly attractive to these monsters, so instead of attacking the players, the mermaids went after the cooked larvae...”

...

[Player Bai Liu has gained over 2,000 likes in under a minute, and his reputation is soaring!]

[Congratulations to Bai Liu for entering the recommended position in the single-player leaderboard, with views skyrocketing...]

...

Bai Liu sat idly in the boat, watching the mermaids tear each other apart, his wet blanket protecting him from the flames.

Once they finished fighting, he poured more alcohol and lit it again.

The grilled mermaid meat proved far more enticing to the creatures than Bai Liu himself, so they continued to feast on each other, leaving him undisturbed. Bai Liu, like a barbecue chef, stood by as the mermaids enjoyed the cooked fish.

As he calculated, Bai Liu estimated that four or five more barrels of alcohol would last until dawn. That’s only 45 points, a small fraction of the 140 needed for two water bubbles.

And he still had five large barrels left.

Bai Liu had bought the alcohol after hearing from the keeper of the Siren Wax Museum that mermaids could be cooked—grilled, in fact—and everyone loved it.

It was surprising that fire worked so well, and the cooked mermaids proved just as irresistible to the monsters as raw fish.

It reminded him of Andre's craving for fish and chips—Andre had eaten far more cooked fish tonight than he had that morning.

The small town of Siren

Although Bai Liu knew his plan had a chance of success, the outcome was even better than he had expected.

The game's props seem to have an enhanced effect, as these barrels of highly concentrated alcohol burn much more intensely than anything Bai Liu has seen in real life. Similarly, the torch, which was blindingly bright earlier, continues to shine with an exaggerated intensity.

As the sun rises over the sea and the day begins, the photophobic, diurnal mermaids gradually dive beneath the surface and disappear from view.

Bai Liu made sure there were no mermaids nearby before he detached his mind and accessed the panel.

He hadn't had time to check it earlier because he was too busy… well, grilling—no, fighting off mermaids—but now Bai Liu examined the information on the panel and couldn't help narrowing his eyes.

[Side Mission: Jeff's Bloody Plot, 90% Completion]

Andre has been killed, the driver has been burned by Bai Liu, and there's still 10% of this side quest left to complete… How can he finish this remaining 10% of the Bloody Conspiracy?

[Points balance: 684. Do you want to buy props?]

Bai Liu stared at the unexpectedly high points balance for a moment. He clicked through the panel to check the points breakdown and found that over five hundred points had come from [Recharge].

In other words, after tossing and turning all night, more than eighty percent of his points were earned not from completing in-game quests, but from the rewards of those [viewers].

Bai Liu considered this—audience points are easier to earn than game points, and far more plentiful.

This didn't quite make sense. The game itself rewards players less than the external rewards, which could discourage players from progressing in the game and lead them to focus on appeasing the viewers, or even quit and resort to gimmicks to attract rewards.

Especially with the ability to buy props directly with points—if Bai Liu had enough points from bounties, he could bypass the game entirely and brute-force his way through without any experience.

But Bai Liu wouldn't have designed the game this way, and he didn't think the system would either.

There must be some sort of reward inside the game that balances the reward systems, motivating players to seek in-game rewards rather than relying on external ones.

Bai Liu's fingers repeatedly flipped a coin as he thought. All quest rewards in the game are instantaneous—points are awarded immediately upon completing tasks—but there was one exception:

—The Monster Book.

Rewards from the Monster Book can only be claimed once all pages are collected, and they are given after completing a level. Typically, these kinds of rewards are substantial.

Bai Liu now realized he had underestimated the value of the Monster Book rewards.

He believed that the rewards for completing the Monster Book would be significant—so valuable, in fact, that points alone couldn't easily buy them. This would help balance the game's reward system and ensure that players prioritized in-game achievements.

Bai Liu opened the Monster Book, glancing over each page before his eyes landed on the unlocked page for the [Siren King] and paused.

[Siren Small Town Monster Book - Siren King (2/4)]

[Monster Name: Siren King]

[Weaknesses: None at this time (players are not required to explore the monster's weaknesses)]

[Mode of Attack: ????? (Unknown, to be explored)]

[Note: A wandering god-level NPC. Danger level is extremely high. Explore with caution.]

Bai Liu mused, This attack method needs to be explored… In previous monsters, attacks were typically revealed once the player encountered them.

But with a monster of the Siren King's caliber, Bai Liu felt certain that if he attacked, he'd be in for a tough time.

Yet, it wasn't Bai Liu's style to leave a major reward hanging. He was sure that such a big, fat prize wouldn't just be left for nothing.

If Bai Liu had known the true viciousness of this NPC and heard rumors of this bug-like NPC, he probably would have given up. After all, when designing a game, the most feared thing is a bug—something that's not part of the game's logic and can't be fought.

But Bai Liu didn't know that now.

Not only did he not know, he considered this NPC just another boss. If he could defeat it, the reward would be great, and surely there was a solution. There had to be a way to defeat any boss.

He stared at the page for a moment, clicked his tongue, and closed the Monster Book. He opened the game shop: [I want to buy props].

[What props do you need? There's a recent sale on water bubbles. Do you need any?]

Bai Liu saw that the "Water Bubbles" item from "Siren Town" had dropped from 70 points to 40 points per item.

Beside it was [Highly Concentrated Alcohol], an item Bai Liu had bought before. Its price had risen from 9 points a barrel to almost 13 points a barrel.

Bai Liu smiled at the price change.

He had guessed correctly—the game's events were feeding back into the viewers, influencing their buying preferences, much like live bandwagoning. As long as Bai Liu could replicate the same effect with cheaper props, players would flock to buy them, causing a shift in the price curve.

This Siren event seemed like a copy of a game that didn't have a large user base, which is why the prices fluctuated so quickly.

For instance, Bai Liu had used a 3D projector and a torch to cross the map [Siren Wax Museum]. Normally, the solution would have been to use a flaming torch, but Bai Liu bypassed it with persistent props, treating the flaming torch as a consumable item.

For roughly the same price, players would prefer to buy long-lasting props, so the price of the torch dropped, while the price of the 3D projector rose.

Now Bai Liu was pulling the same trick again, taking advantage of the lower price of [Water Bubbles] to save money.

Bai Liu smiled: [I want to buy a water bubble].

[Good, 40 points. Thanks for your purchase.]

Wang Shun, who had rushed over from the Deadly Comedy section to the single-player section, was puzzled when he saw Bai Liu preparing to buy water bubbles. He approached the small TV.

After confirming that Bai Liu had indeed bought a water bubble, Wang Shun was even more confused: "Why did he buy water bubbles again?"

"Doesn't the back of 'Siren Town' mostly involve land chases? What would he need the water bubbles for?"

A player next to him offered a reasonable analysis: "Now that Bai Liu has more points, he probably bought one just in case, considering water bubbles are inexpensive at 40 points. It's like buying insurance —alcohol is too risky."

Having followed Bai Liu, Wang Shun had come to understand Bai Liu's style of spending his points at the edge of a knife. Previously, Bai Liu had favored riskier, lower-commitment options, like buying alcohol, rather than spending more points on the safer, higher-commitment option of water bubbles.

But now, to hedge his bets, Bai Liu had opted for the extra safety net of a water bubble, spending the additional 50 points.

Wang Shun couldn't quite believe it.

In fact, Wang Shun even entertained the absurd idea that Bai Liu might have manipulated the prices through some series of actions, waiting for the price of water bubbles to drop so he could buy them at a discount.

Wang Shun muttered to himself.

Caught in his thoughts, his voice was louder than he realized, and a nearby spectator overheard.

The player retorted casually, "You haven't become a fan of Bai Liu, have you? Price manipulation? He's just a newbie and hasn't really played the game yet. Sure, he's got game skills, but manipulating prop prices is a bit much."

The player dismissed the idea, "I think he just had an exciting night, maybe even a bit scared. As soon as he had the points, he bought whatever could save his life. Alcohol is more of a gamble."

The player sighed, "It's just a risky play—nothing special. I can't believe I'm even thinking of using this to advance to the Single Player Division."

There was a trace of jealousy in the player's expression. He seemed to think Bai Liu had used some clever strategies to reach the Single Player Division, but ultimately, it was just gambling his way through.

Forums were buzzing with discussions about Bai Liu's alcohol-fueled victories. After an initial wave of praise, more and more people began mocking Bai Liu for being opportunistic.

[What's the big deal with this strategy? I thought of it first, but there were safer options available, so why would I take the higher-risk route?]

[It's not the first time I've seen someone trying to act tough. Are there more of them in Dead Comedy?]

[In reality, you'd get a lot more than just a few bottles of alcohol. Four of them are already used, and five are saved to keep the fish. For those who praise this money-saving tactic, let me do the math for you: the 81 points spent here are 11 points more than the original price for water bubbles!]

[Some people just don't get it, huh? This strategy is all style with no substance.]

[If you really want to buy water bubbles after getting your bonus points, fine, but don't be a coward. If you think alcohol is no good and water bubbles are better, feel free to keep using the alcohol. Let's see how you'll handle burning the mermaid wax figure on land later!]

See the end of the chapter for more notes

There was a lot of debate on the forum about whether Bai Liu's performance was impressive or not, but Wang Shun had anticipated this.

Bai Liu's past performance was so extraordinary that he earned a substantial number of charge points, surpassing 500—an impressive feat for a newcomer. For comparison, Mu Sicheng, the previous record holder in Siren Village, had accumulated over 1,000 charge points.

Reaching over 500 charge points was a significant achievement for someone like Bai Liu, who was still new to the game.

While players at the bottom of the leaderboard struggled just to survive Siren and barely earned a couple of hundred points after deducting the cost of props, Bai Liu effortlessly fought monsters with only a few dozen points worth of props, still managing to accumulate hundreds of points.

His approach was both highly effective and cost-efficient, and in Wang Shun's eyes, if nothing else, Bai Liu would surely make it onto the Nightmare Rising Stars list.

However, Wang Shun was also curious about what Bai Liu was doing with the extra barrels of alcohol he had purchased.

He had always thought that Bai Liu was a player who wouldn't spend points recklessly, but his decision to purchase five barrels of alcohol and bubble water was something Wang Shun couldn't quite understand.

The next phase of the game required the player to reach the shore, where there were mermaid wax figures. Alcohol wouldn't be able to burn effectively there, and the light it emitted wasn't strong enough to affect the mermaids, who were sensitive to bright light...

Wang Shun, lost in thought, watched Bai Liu's performance on the small TV screen in the single-player section.

The single-player section was much larger than the previous Death Comedy section, which had looked like a 1980s arcade hall. Now, it was a spacious, clean gaming room with different recommended areas.

Bai Liu was currently in the [System Recommendation] section.

This area was located at the entrance to the single-player lobby and had a high traffic flow. The conditions for gaining entry here were relatively lenient, making the competition fierce. It was typically occupied by veteran players with a fan base who used their popularity to secure a spot in the next round.

The [System Recommendation] section was a prime location, offering good visibility and a boost for players who performed well, making it an ideal springboard for advancement. However, the spot was usually reserved for veteran players, and newcomers rarely made it this far.

Bai Liu, as a complete rookie, had secured this spot, sparking a lot of controversy and drawing curious spectators. The forum debates about his past actions only added to the intrigue, and more people came to watch this newcomer with a seemingly unusual approach to the game.

As Wang Shun pondered, the crowd behind him grew larger.

The viewing area around each player's small TV was vast, capable of holding thousands of viewers, even though it appeared small from the outside. A dense crowd of players gathered to discuss Bai Liu’s gameplay.

"Isn’t the [System Recommendation] slot usually reserved for veterans? How is this newbie here?" one player whispered.

"This new guy’s stats are impressive for a pure rookie. Looks like the system is giving him a boost. No wonder he got the recommendation spot," another player commented.

"But what about the player who was in this slot before? Who did Bai Liu push out?"

"Wait... is it Dog? He got squeezed out by Bai Liu?"

"Wow, this newbie is in for a tough time!"

As they spoke, a tall, burly man with a long scar over his right eye entered the area. His imposing figure stood out—his cheeks were heavy with flesh, and his teeth were clenched, resembling a savage beast ready to attack. He wore a black steel-studded belt with a machete strapped to his waist.

A few audience members quickly stepped aside.

This was Dog, a notorious player known for his brutal tactics. In his previous game, he had killed his own teammates for show and robbed them of their props and points, gaining a significant advantage in the process. His notoriety made him a feared presence in the game.

Wang Shun instinctively backed away when Dog approached, nervous about losing his prime viewing spot.

Dog sat down with a grunt, glaring at the screen. "I want to see what this brat can do. If he's taken my spot, I'll follow him into the next game and show him how it's done."

The murmurs among the players faded into silence.

Despite Bai Liu earning his spot through merit, facing off against a ruthless player like Dog meant that survival in this game would be difficult, and survival in the next round would be even harder.

In his last game, Dog had ruthlessly killed a teammate, collecting over 36,000 points and a stash of valuable props. His wealth from that game made him a formidable opponent for any newcomer.

Wang Shun frowned, opening his game manager to look up Dog's profile.

[Player Name: Li Gou]

[Occupation (Before Entering the Game): Butcher]

[Reason for Entering the Game: Imprisoned for the brutal rape and murder of a high school girl who bought meat from him. Entered the game after developing a strong desire to survive during his trial.]

[Core Desire: To escape prison, take revenge on those who testified against him, and burn down the family of the girl who reported him.]

[Recommended Items in Wish Fulfillment Shop: Crime Erasing Face Cream (changes your face, giving those with certain death sentences a new life and identity, lasting ten years, 12,000 points per bottle), No

Trace Arson Match (starts accidental fires with a single match, costing 21,000 points)]

Beneath the profile, there was a record of Li Gou's criminal history. Wang Shun hesitated before clicking on it.

Li Gou has a criminal record for forcing and killing a female high school student in an alleyway.

The girl, who was in her senior year of high school, had come down to help her parents, who were cooking, to buy some meat during a break in her studies. She was raped by Li Gou, who cut off the girl's hand in anger because she resisted so violently leading her to bleed to death in the process.

Li Gou, who didn't want to be discovered, destroyed the girl's body.

The girl's parents, who thought their daughter had gone for a walk because she was tired from revision and had come down to buy meat for herself, almost collapsed when they learned the truth afterward.

Li Gou, on the other hand, insisted that he had killed her unintentionally, that he had only wanted to flirt with her, but that he had accidentally killed her and subsequently destroyed her body because he regretted it, not because of any intentional abuse.

The girl's parents, on the other hand, sued him to death even though they had lost all their money, He was indeed sentenced to death, thus stirring up his resentment and vengeance.

This brutal background was the reason Li Gou had entered the game.

Chapter End Notes

Gonna root for Bai Liu now! I hope he gets rid of Li Gou

The small town of Siren

After reading Li Gou's biography, Wang Shun felt, for the first time, that having the ability to access a player's former [Know-it-all] was not such a great skill.

This game is for people with incredibly strong desires, and there's no shortage of vicious players here. On the contrary, this game serves as the perfect stage for them. Many high-rollers have blood on their hands.

Wang Shun glanced at Bai Liu on the small TV screen, concern creeping into his expression as he let out a long sigh.

The game hasn't logged out yet, and there's already a butcher watching from this side.

Bai Liu, you truly are a troublemaker.

[126 people liked Bai Liu's TV, 675 people favorited it, 0 people donated to it, 378 people disliked it.]

[Player Bai Liu gained 3,000 viewers in one minute, but with a like rate of less than one-tenth, it seems most viewers are just here to watch the drama and join in on the fun.]

[A high-ranking player, Li Gou, is watching Bai Liu's mini-TV. Congratulations to Bai Liu for getting his first high-ranking viewer!]

Bai Liu waited alone on the sea until dawn. Not long after, the large boat he left the previous night returned. Jeff and Lucy were at the bow, with Jeff comforting Lucy, his hand gently resting on her shoulder.

Lucy buried her head in Jeff's arms as if on the verge of collapsing, and Jeff softly soothed her.

Every now and then, Jeff kissed Lucy's tear-streaked face lovingly. Lucy didn't push him away, instead snuggling up to him with a hint of dependence. Bai Liu raised an eyebrow at this scene.

It seemed that after just one night, not only had Bai Liu's true love boat safely reached shore, but Jeff and Lucy also seemed to have boarded their own love boat.

But as the boat approached, Lucy and Jeff saw Bai Liu, wrapped in a blanket as if he had slept through the night. Lucy screamed sharply, clutching her chest and pushing Jeff away.

Jeff staggered back, unable to believe it, looking flustered as he gestured wildly, “Bai Liu, are you okay? I mean, are you really okay?”

Bai Liu calmly climbed up the rope ladder lowered from above. With a knowing smile, he looked at Lucy and Jeff, his eyes flicking between them. “I’m fine. Good morning, Jeff, Lucy. I had a rather pleasant evening. Looks like you two did, too?”

Lucy, panicked, reached out to hug Bai Liu’s arm, but he silently stepped back.

Tears streaming down her face, Lucy sobbed, “No, last night Jeff and I talked about how you and Andre were going to die, and I was so scared. I thought it was my fault, and Jeff comforted me.”

Bai Liu smiled but didn’t dwell on the matter, his attention shifting elsewhere.

Lucy’s face was pale, almost translucent, and her movements were off —there was a brittle, waxy texture to her skin, similar to the mermaid wax figures Bai Liu had touched earlier in the barn. The feel was like thin paraffin, and she lacked the strong ichthyological odor that typically accompanied mermaids.

Jeff began to defend himself, eyes averted. “Yes, Lucy thought something was going to happen to you and Andre, and stayed with me because she was scared. Nothing happened between us, I promise.”

He forced a smile, “I know she’s your girlfriend, Bai Liu, but I respect you. You’re my best friend.”

Bai Liu remained noncommittal. “Where did you spend the night, by the way? Siren Wax Museum, right?”

Lucy gasped, “How did you know?”

Then she rambled on, “Yeah, they wouldn’t let us go back to the hotel. Apparently, after participating in mermaid fishing, you need to stay overnight at the Siren Wax Museum to wash off the smell of murder and blood."

"It was horrible. The place was full of wax figures. It felt like they moved at night, and wherever Jeff and I went, there was always a wax figure in our way."

Jeff maintained a stiff smile, "Bai Liu, where's Andre? Where did he go?"

Bai Liu grinned. "He should be at the Siren Wax Museum right now, waiting for us."

Jeff glanced suspiciously at Andre's boat out on the sea.

The boat was covered in dark, blood-like paint, and pieces of leather resembling Andre's shirt were visible.

Jeff's eyes briefly flashed with grim satisfaction, and he lowered his head, unable to suppress a quick, twisted smile.

Bai Liu observed Jeff, noting that Andre's death seemed to please him.

But soon, Jeff approached Bai Liu with feigned confusion, pointing at Andre's boat. "But, Bai Liu, Andre's boat is still here. He can't be back on shore…"

Jeff glanced at Bai Liu, then scowled, choosing not to speak further.

Lucy gasped again, her voice trembling with disbelief, "Oh my God, Andre's not really dead! Bai Liu!"

She looked at him, shocked and disappointed. "You killed Andre, didn't you? You didn't push him into the sea, did you?"

Bai Liu briefly thought she might cry, but her eyes were dry. He absentmindedly wondered how a wax figure could shed tears.

Jeff, looking solemn, turned to Bai Liu. "You shouldn't have done that. Even though Andre wasn't a good person, he deserved to live."

Bai Liu chuckled softly, meeting Jeff's gaze. "I could probably say the same thing to you."

Jeff narrowed his eyes, wary of Bai Liu.

Bai Liu shrugged and smiled at Lucy, who was still accusing him. "You'll see Andre when we get to the wax museum. I wouldn't lie to you."

"If I did, we'd break up," he added with a sly grin.

Lucy hesitated for a moment, her gaze flicking to Bai Liu's pockets—where he kept his wallet. At the thought of the expensive vacation, she finally fell silent.

Bai Liu had figured out the final piece of [Jeff's Bloody Plot] side quest.

He realized that he had been overestimating the humanity of the game's NPCs. Not a single teammate was even slightly kind to him.

Bai Liu was used to being pressured by his boss to promote friendship and goodness in game design or at least create one pure-hearted character. But here, he found a cast of complete villains—Andre, who resorted to violence; Jeff, who was obsequious and cold-blooded; and Lucy, who seemed nice but was only dating him for money and could cheat at any moment.

This setup where everyone was bad… He actually loved it.

A small smile tugged at Bai Liu's lips.

Once he stopped thinking that NPCs like Jeff, who knew about the mermaid setting, had to be good guys, the last ten percent of [Jeff's Bloody Plot] fell into place.

No wonder Jeff was so guarded against Bai Liu. The progress bar for the Bloody Conspiracy quest had increased twice. From the start, there had always been two people Jeff wanted to kill—Bai Liu and Andre.

The task assigned to him wasn't just to kill Andre but also Bai Liu, possibly involving robbery and sharing the loot.

Thinking back, it was strange that the player and his group had arrived at Siren. The player was designed as a timid person who would never willingly go to a creepy place like Siren. Andre obviously didn't know about it, and Lucy was a first-timer. The only one who would recommend such a terrifying place was Jeff, a mermaid enthusiast.

Bai Liu's role as the cowardly player was likely due to Jeff's encouragement.

He had studied Siren and knew the town was rife with corrupt figures and a police force unable to solve crimes, with many missing persons never found.

Siren was the perfect place to dispose of a body.

Jeff, with his fake mermaid knowledge, had designed the entire scenario to set players up for murder.

[Unlock the hidden status of character - Jeff, who resents everything]

Bai Liu gave Jeff a coin swipe.

[npc name: Jeff (?????) status]

[Character Bio: An avid fan of mermaids, sea monsters, and unnatural creatures, Jeff joined Lucy and her group on their trip to Siren Town.]

[Character's hidden profile: After years of abuse from Andre, Jeff harbors a deep hatred for everything inside…]

[… After gaining your trust, he becomes jealous of you, feeling you're a hypocrite and trying to take everything from you. He wants to use you to kill Andre.]

[Once given the opportunity, Jeff realizes Siren is the perfect crime scene… He plans to have the mermaid he loves so much kill you and Andre.]

[Warning: Jeff has very low trust in the player and may attack at any moment, so take care of your safety.]

Wang Shun, watching the small TV, finally understood. "So that's what happened. No wonder Jeff kept trying to get players killed during the land chase. Even God Mu almost got screwed."

Other players were discussing their complaints.

"Damn! Jeff, so that's what you were really like! With his knowledge of mermaids, I thought he was one of those NPCs who just provided information and couldn't die. I even saved him a few times when I was being chased in this game!"

Before the audience could finish, Li Gou slammed his knife down impatiently, and the room fell silent.

Li Gou snorted, staring at Bai Liu on the small TV. "It's just a side quest. I thought it was something amazing. The forum's blowing it up like he's the next Mu Sicheng."

"The guy who said that must not have played many games or watched many streams. Him? The next Mu Sicheng? Please."

Wang Shun opened his mouth but didn't retort, shaking his head in resignation.

Less knowledgeable?

He had watched so many live streams of Siren Village that the only players who had beaten the nearly complete spinoff were Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu.

Mu Sicheng's Siren gameplay was in the system's VIP library, costing 40 points to watch.

That price showed the value of the video. Mu Sicheng's branch wasn't something anyone could just clear easily, or it wouldn't be in the VIP pool.

Even Mu Sicheng himself failed to get through all of Jeff's Bloody Plot.

Given that Bai Liu could do this, it was clear— Bai Liu was far superior to Mu Sicheng.

The small town of siren

After Bai Liu disembarked, the sailors insisted—following an old superstition—that he remain in the wax museum until evening. They believed this ritual would cleanse him of the sins from witnessing the mermaid hunt. Only then would he be allowed to leave and redeem himself.

Lucy and Jeff accompanied him to the wax museum.

In the early morning light, the wax museum felt dark and irrelevant, its atmosphere oppressive. A sailor dropped Bai Liu off, sternly warning him not to leave until nightfall. The keeper was left behind to ensure Bai Liu stayed put.

Lucy curled up behind Bai Liu, whispering uneasily, "Why does this wax museum feel so scary, even in the daytime?"

Wax figures lined the museum, their hollow gazes following Bai Liu and the others. The faces of the mermaid wax figures appeared even more vivid than those Bai Liu had seen the day before.

As he observed them, Bai Liu noticed something disturbing—two of the wax figures had tails that had partially transformed. Their fish tails now only extended to the knees, while their upper legs resembled human limbs.

Looking closer, Bai Liu realized these two figures bore an unsettling resemblance to Lucy and Jeff.

The wax figures smiled eerily, their lifeless eyes locked onto Bai Liu and his companions.

Bai Liu's suspicions deepened. The Lucy and Jeff who had stayed here overnight had likely been sacrificed, transformed into "mermaid wax amulets." Meanwhile, the mermaid wax figures who had enjoyed the sacrifices were slowly becoming Lucy and Jeff.

The transformation wasn't complete, though. The "butterfly" inside the wax figures had not fully hatched, leaving the "cocoon" that was Lucy and Jeff with a slim chance of survival.

Bai Liu didn't care for heroics. He wasn't interested in saving Lucy and Jeff out of altruism but rather because their completed transformation would result in two powerful butterfly-type monsters he'd have to face.

With this in mind, Bai Liu pulled out his torch, planning to force the mermaid wax figures back.

As soon as the torch's light ignited, Lucy and Jeff reacted violently, screaming in agony before the wax figures even moved.

Lucy collapsed, her body trembling, her head tilted back with a faintly hostile glare. "Bai Liu, your torch is too bright! Are you trying to blind us?"

Jeff clung to one of the wax figures, shouting hysterically, "Don't ever turn that thing on again!"

Bai Liu raised his hands mockingly, feigning innocence. "My bad. I didn't know you were so sensitive to light."

Of course, he had known. When people began turning into wax figures, they developed photophobia. But he hadn't anticipated how violently they would resist. Lucy and Jeff lunged for the torch, their movements unnervingly fast—matching his own.

This complicated things. If they could attack him each time he used the torch, it rendered the tool useless.

The game, it seemed, had reached the point where it was actively restricting his use of the torch. This likely meant a chase sequence with the mermaid wax figures was imminent, and the lack of light heightened the suspense.

Bai Liu himself often used such tricks when designing games—granting players tools like a demon mirror to repel enemies but adding cooldowns to keep the stakes high. The thrill of avoiding enemies during these intervals made the game scarier.

It was amusing when he was the designer. Experiencing it firsthand was less enjoyable.

Bai Liu sighed, stowing the torch with a gesture of surrender. He raised his hands, showing he wouldn't use it again—at least for now.

Still, his remaining light swept across the entrance of the wax museum. The figures stationed there seemed to inch closer, as though preparing to seal off any escape routes.

Turning on the torch would provoke Lucy and Jeff, but not using it left him vulnerable to the mermaid wax figures. Waiting until nightfall would mean certain death.

Not only would the wax figures possess him, increasing his alienation level and eventually turning him into a talismanic wax figure, but also very importantly—

Bai Liu flipped a coin in his hand, bringing up the system panel.

[Warning: Siren King will awaken in seven hours. Please clear the level before then.]

The audience watching Bai Liu's small TV let out collective gasps at the ominous message.

Li Gou, dragging his knife, leaned closer to the screen, squinting. Moments later, he burst into laughter. "A god-class NPC? This guy's done for! Serves him right for stealing my spot. He's going to be obliterated before I even get a chance to mess with him."

Other viewers were less amused, their reactions tinged with pity and disbelief.

"This map's normal strategy is to play hide-and-seek with the wax figures until nightfall, then escape Siren Town. But with a god-class NPC involved, he'll never survive the night."

"Escaping Siren Town only gives you a NORMAL END anyway. The rewards are mediocre."

"God Mu played the true ending—he sealed the ghost by returning Siren's corpse to the sea. But Bai Liu? He's facing the Siren King directly! There's no way he'll make it!"

Wang Shun, watching intently, clenched his fists.

He hadn't expected Bai Liu to walk willingly into the wax museum.

If Bai Liu had fled during the earlier chase, there might have been a slim chance to escape Siren Town. Now, he was trapped.

Wang Shun sighed, conflicted. Bai Liu was a skilled player, perhaps even on par with Mu Sicheng, but luck wasn't on his side this time.

Bai Liu strode toward the central exhibition hall, Lucy and Jeff trailing behind him.

At the heart of the gallery stood a glass display case holding the body of the Siren King. Suspended in a transparent, viscous liquid, the mermaid's form seemed almost alive. Wisps of snowy foam floated between the Siren King's long hair and pale eyelashes, giving the eerie illusion of frost settling on his still, lifeless body.

Bai Liu stepped closer, his gaze fixed on the figure. Despite the mermaid's decomposed state, its beauty was otherworldly, captivating and menacing all at once. It felt as if, at any moment, those eyes would snap open, the long, powerful tail would shatter the glass, and the creature would erupt into a massacre before vanishing into the sea.

Lucy glanced around uneasily. "Bai Liu, you said Andre was here in the wax museum. Where is he?"

Without looking away from the display, Bai Liu replied flatly, "Didn't you pass him on your way in? Jeff even helped him up."

Jeff frowned in confusion, pointing at himself. "Helped him up? Bai Liu, there's no one else in this museum but us."

"Exactly." Bai Liu's tone was casual, almost amused. "When did I ever say Andre was still human?"

Lucy instinctively stepped back, rubbing her arms as a chill ran down her spine. "Bai Liu, stop joking around. Where is Andre?"

Before Bai Liu could answer, a faint, shuffling sound echoed through the hall. His ears twitched, and he slowly turned his head.

Standing just behind Jeff and Lucy was a wax figure—grim-faced and lifelike. Its resemblance to Andre was unmistakable, and its posture suggested it was preparing to strike.

Bai Liu's lips curled into a faint smile. "Lucy, Andre is right behind you."

Lucy and Jeff turned as one, and their synchronized screams—a shrill male-female duet—reverberated through the hall. Bai Liu, anticipating the reaction, calmly plugged his ears.

Last night, the Siren Waxworks claimed two fresh offerings: Jeff and Lucy. Their transformation into mermaid wax figures was inevitable. Meanwhile, Andre's skeleton, taken by the mermaids, had been repurposed to fill the museum's collection.

Now, Andre's wax figure loomed behind them, and outside the hall, a crowd of other wax figures pressed against the entrance. Their expressions were eerily lifelike, with subtle, unsettling resemblances to Bai Liu's face. It was clear they sought to possess him next.

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, evading Lucy's desperate attempt to cling to him.

For Lucy and Jeff, these figures posed no threat—they were already transitioning into wax figures themselves. But for Bai Liu, they were a deadly danger. His options were limited: the torch was useless with Lucy and Jeff nearby, and alcohol wasn't potent enough to burn these figures.

His only viable weapon was direct eye contact, which could temporarily immobilize the wax figures. However, the method had a glaring flaw—humans blink.

Lucy and Jeff, no longer fully human, couldn't help him hold the wax figures at bay. Bai Liu could feel them creeping closer every time he blinked, the air thick with the stench of fish.

In the dim gallery, the wax figures began to distort. Their once-pristine faces melted, grotesquely shifting into uncanny approximations of Bai Liu's features, with wide, toothy grins. Scales flaked off their fish tails, revealing jagged, skeletal remains.

Jeff and Lucy stood unnervingly close to Bai Liu's sides, their instability a ticking time bomb. If he turned on the torch, they would attack him before the wax figures even had a chance. Killing Jeff and Lucy would escalate the situation further, as their wax counterparts would instantly transform into deadly mermaid sailors.

Bai Liu sighed, weighing his dwindling options. His stamina was in the red, and without the terrain advantage of the wax museum's bunker-like structure, he'd be overwhelmed.

At this point, Wang Shun, a spectator watching from the small TV feed, let out a sigh and prepared to turn off his recorder. Like many others, he was certain Bai Liu had no chance. The situation was hopeless, and no one wanted to watch a doomed gameplay video.

Yet just as Wang Shun turned away, he caught sight of Bai Liu on the screen—and froze.

Bai Liu was smiling.

“Why is he smiling?” Wang Shun muttered, leaning closer.

On the screen, Bai Liu lowered his head, his expression calm and composed. He was... enjoying himself.

It wasn’t panic or despair. He flipped through various system panels with practiced speed, his fingers a blur. Prop shops, monster books, quest objectives—they all popped up in rapid succession, dazzling the audience.

“What’s he doing?” one viewer whispered.

“Is he going to spend all his points before dying?” another speculated.

Wang Shun, however, recognized the method to Bai Liu’s apparent madness. He reopened his recorder, his heart pounding. Bai Liu wasn’t flailing aimlessly—he was executing a meticulously calculated plan.

“Pickaxe, 17 points. Sold,” Bai Liu muttered.

Panels opened in quick succession, their glowing light reflecting off Bai Liu’s determined face. His movements were so precise that even seasoned players were left stunned.

The tension in the room shifted. Those who had dismissed Bai Liu as doomed fell silent, captivated by his sudden burst of action.

“What’s he planning?”

Wang Shun's eyes lit up with realization. "He's completing the monster book! He's identifying the final weaknesses of all the fish monsters and planning to use those weaknesses to push them back!"

Around him, the crowd buzzed with disbelief.

"No way! Is he really trying to complete the monster book?"

"Impossible! Only God Mu has ever managed to complete the monster book for Siren Village. Most players are lucky to unlock even a single page. This newcomer thinks he can do it?"

"I don't buy it. I've watched countless Siren Small Town gameplay videos, and no one's ever figured out the third weakness for the mermaid wax figure or the mermaid sailor. It's just not possible."

.....

Bai Liu paid no attention to the incredulous remarks around him. With a lazy expression, he raised his pickaxe and brought it crashing down on the glass display case containing the Siren King.

The glass shattered with a deafening crack. The Siren King's figure slid out, carried by a viscous liquid that pooled around Bai Liu's feet.

Lucy and Jeff, standing nearby, screamed in terror. Covering their heads, they bolted from the central gallery like they had seen a demon.

Wang Shun's eyes sparkled with realization as he watched Bai Liu calmly dry his fingers, one by one, ignoring the chaos around him. Wang Shun inhaled sharply.

"The third weakness of the mermaid wax figures and mermaid sailors... is the Siren King!"

Bai Liu crouched next to the Siren King, tilting the figure's chin with calculated indifference.

The liquid dripped from the Siren King's lashes onto his full, glossy lips, forming a line of moisture that glistened in the dim light. His face, even in this vulnerable state, exuded an otherworldly beauty that seemed beyond human comprehension. Siren—the word itself was the only frame that could hold such allure.

Bai Liu ran his fingers over the Siren King's cool, delicate skin. Inwardly, he mused, The NPC modeling in this game is absurdly good. To create a character this stunning... impressive work.

But then, he remembered he was on air. This wasn't the moment for idle admiration. Instead, it was the perfect opportunity to deliver a dramatic, audience-captivating performance.

Exhaling slowly, Bai Liu smiled faintly and said, "It all starts and ends with you, beautiful Siren King."

He leaned down, loaded the Siren King onto his trolley, and with a playful tilt of his head and a confident smirk, pushed the trolley forward with his foot. He exited the wax museum, the Siren King in tow.

None of the mermaid wax figures dared to follow. They cowered in the shadowy corners of the gallery, too frightened to approach.

A notification blinked on the screen:

For a moment, a pin-drop silence hung in front of Bai Liu's small TV. Even Li Gou, mid-motion, froze in his tracks.

The silence shattered when Wang Shun shouted excitedly, “He’s almost there!”

Like a drop of water hitting a hot pan, the audience erupted into chaos. Players watching Bai Liu’s live broadcast couldn’t contain their excitement.

“I can’t believe it—a pure newcomer making it this far? That’s insane!”

Meanwhile, Li Gou scowled, slamming his knife into the counter. No amount of frustration could silence the rising tide of praise for Bai Liu.

Even those who had mocked him on the forums found themselves drawn to his mini-TV. Many of them, forced to eat their words, grumbled, “Big deal. It’s just a single-player section...”

As if on cue, the system announced:

[10,003 people liked Bai Liu's TV. 9,607 people favorited it. 1,300 viewers donated, earning Player Bai Liu 1,300 points.]

[Congratulations! Bai Liu has earned a center-lobby promotional spot on the main split-screen display. Viewer count is rising rapidly...]

The world was watching now. Bai Liu, unfazed, continued onward, one step closer to making history.

Wang Shun took a deep breath, his heart pounding for reasons he couldn’t quite place.

The exhilaration of witnessing such an unpredictable and exciting game was something he hadn’t felt in ages. He cast a final, lingering glance at Bai Liu's extinguished small TV before turning to sprint away.

I can’t afford to miss a single moment of this player’s future games!

His abrupt departure caught the attention of the other players.

“Central promotion slot?! Are you kidding me?! A pure newbie in his first game?!”

“Stop shouting and go! If you miss anything now, you’ll regret it later. They’ll move this to the VIP library for sure, and you’ll need membership to watch it again. Seeing it live is a privilege!”

A player who had smugly declared earlier, “If he’s that good, they’ll put him on the center screen,” turned red-faced as others threw teasing glances his way. Furious, he glared at Bai Liu's small TV before storming off.

At the back of the crowd, Li Gou stood silently, his expression thunderous. His grip on his sword tightened until it creaked. Without a word, he also made his way toward the central hall.

Central Hall.

In the center of the vast room, a young man crouched on the floor, wearing a massive headset shaped like a monkey gripping the ear hooks with its long arms. The monkey's design was unsettling—a cartoonish face with red eyes and sharp, cloth-stitched teeth resembling a children’s cult classic. Its eerie cuteness mirrored the man’s appearance: a round face, faintly red eyes, and sharp tiger-like teeth that peeked out when his mouth closed.

He lazily sucked on a lollipop, puffing one cheek out, while scanning the massive central screen.

“Not a single decent player,” he muttered, his voice impatient. “This list gets worse every day. None of them can even collect monster books. How are they getting featured here?”

Annoyed, he slapped his knees and stood, ready to leave.

Just then, one of the screens near the center flickered. A new small TV lit up, replacing the previous broadcast. The fresh image displayed a clean-cut young man with a deceptively harmless face, dragging a cart behind him.

The man on screen smiled as if handing in homework. But his actions were anything but innocent—he deftly shoved a stunningly beautiful mermaid straight toward an ugly, terrified mermaid sailor.

The sailor let out a high-pitched, terrified shriek before scrambling away. Its grotesque eyes brimmed with tears of fear as it fled.

Behind him, Bai Liu chuckled softly, his laughter tinged with satisfaction as he calmly pursued the fleeing creature.

The young man in the monkey headset froze mid-step.
"...?"
Then again:
"???"
"Who the hell is this guy?!"

He leaned closer, watching intently. "What kind of lunatic pushes monsters all over the map like they're props?!"

Curious, he tapped on the player profile attached to the small TV. His brow furrowed as he read the details.

"Bai Liu..." he murmured. "Why does that name sound familiar?"

He scrolled further, muttering to himself. "Three pages of the monster book collected... 100% completion on the side quest... Wait a second!"

Recognition dawned on him. This is the same rookie people were hyping up on the forums—the one they said might surpass the single-player points record for Siren's Town.

He recalled the mocking posts earlier: "That guy won't even get past True Love's Ship!" Yet here Bai Liu was, nearly completing the monster book and finishing the notoriously tricky Jeff's Bloody Plot side quest—something even he hadn't managed in his first run.

Worse still, Bai Liu had already earned more charge points in Siren's Town than he had at the height of his own run.

Intrigued—and a bit defiant—the man adjusted his headset and headed toward Bai Liu's small TV.

The system chimed with an announcement:

[Mu Sicheng, the fourth-ranked player on the Rising Star Rankings, has entered Bai Liu's mini-TV! He hasn't expressed his opinion yet, so make sure to impress him~]

The onlookers gasped. Heads swiveled, searching for Mu Sicheng.

"God Mu is here!"

"Holy crap, he's actually watching this live?!"

"This rookie's insane! Even God Mu's interested. He hasn't watched anyone's mini-TV in forever—he only checks the VIP library. The last time he did this was for Spades!"

"Spades is the king of the game—the number-one ranked player. It makes sense for God Mu to watch him. But what's so special about this newbie that he's drawn God Mu's attention?"

Standing quietly in the corner, Mu Sicheng had swapped his oversized monkey headset for a hat with a duck-bill brim. Shadows obscured his face, but his eyes glowed faintly red as he gazed at the small TV.

Onscreen, Bai Liu, dressed casually but exuding confidence, continued his antics with a sly, unbothered expression.

Mu Sicheng bit down on his lollipop, crushing it between sharp canines. Slowly, he tilted his head and broke into a faint, mischievous smile.

"This newcomer..." he murmured, almost to himself. "He's... interesting."

Bai Liu pushed the cart along the street with a calm, serene smile on his face, making the tense, thrilling atmosphere of the horror game feel like a casual stroll in a mini-game. Siren King sat atop the cart, seemingly oblivious to the chaos around him.

Trailing behind Bai Liu at a distance, the mermaid sailor grimaced, trying to get closer. However, his gaze remained fixed on Siren King, filled with both fear and resentment. The sailor couldn't help but eye the king with distrust, knowing full well the power Siren King wielded.

As Bai Liu pushed the cart toward the sea, it was as if he were holding the emperor hostage—completely indifferent to the tension he was causing. However, the relationship between Siren King, the mermaid sailors, and the mermaid wax figures was far more complicated than the simple bond of a ruler and his subordinates.

Bai Liu deduced that Siren King was the key weakness of both the mermaid sailors and the wax figures. This conclusion was based on two main observations:

First, Siren King had no weaknesses, making him the most formidable creature in the game. This, in turn, made him an even greater threat to the player than other monsters. But the twist was, his strength made him equally dangerous to other monsters. By manipulating this, Bai Liu shifted the focus of Siren King's threat from the players to the surrounding monsters, ensuring they were the ones who would suffer most.

Secondly, the storyline provided more context. The mermaid, the mermaid wax figure, and the mermaid sailor represented three stages in an evolutionary chain: larva, pupa, and butterfly. But beyond their progression in form, there was also a clear hierarchy among them.

The mermaid sailors and wax figures were known to consume weaker mermaids. During the process of alienation, mermaids could only serve the mermaid sailors, almost as subservient workers, taking whatever scraps remained after the sailors had eaten. These sailors controlled which wax figures could be hatched, effectively deciding who would join their ranks. This reflected a social hierarchy similar to an oppressive, corporate structure—where those in power (the sailors) determined the fate of the lower ranks (the wax figures and weaker mermaids).

This hierarchical chain was clear: mermaids were seen as mere slaves or food, the wax figures as henchmen, and the sailors as the elite. Siren King was the apex predator in this structure, holding power over all the lesser monsters. The sailors, and other fish monsters, feared him, knowing that any act of defiance would lead to their doom.

What Bai Liu discovered, however, was that these mermaid monsters weren't just afraid of Siren King—they were terrified of him.

He realized this through the peculiarities of the Siren Wax Museum. Despite the mermaids' dominance over the town, the museum's continued existence made little sense. There was no practical reason to keep the wax figures fixed in one place when they could be scattered throughout the town. But Bai Liu soon deduced the real purpose: the wax figures were guarding Siren King.

In essence, the Siren Wax Museum was less of a museum and more of a prison. The wax figures were stationed there to keep a watchful eye on Siren King, preventing him from awakening. The liquid inside the glass cases, which Bai Liu initially assumed was just for display, had a restraining effect on the Siren King—though it wasn't a permanent solution. Siren King would eventually awaken, and when he did, it would spell the end for the mermaid monsters.

Bai Liu was quick to understand this dynamic. He knew the system had set a timer: Siren King would not awaken for another five hours. His goal was clear—get to the sea, use the Siren's Gift to sink Siren King back to the ocean depths, and end the game before the King could regain his full strength.

The system suddenly notified Bai Liu:

[Congratulations to the player for unlocking the entire story plot and entering the finished prologue.]

[Due to players escaping from the wax museum during the day, and the fact that the mermaid wax figures cannot move during daylight, the weather is about to change to weaken the player's current advantage. Please prepare accordingly.]

[Weather Change: Cloudy → Stormy]

At that moment, the rain came down in torrents, a sudden downpour that struck with the force of beans being tossed from the sky. Dust and water mingled on the ground, and Bai Liu was instantly drenched, though he barely flinched.

Bai Liu held the cart in one hand, while with the other, he pushed his wet hair back from his eyelids, the droplets falling from the tips of his hair and cascading down his face. The rain poured heavily, the mist from the downpour quickly enveloping the world around him, turning everything into a haze of white.

Despite being soaked to the bone, the mermaid sailors trailing Bai Liu behind him raised their heads and eagerly gulped down the rain. It seemed as though the rain invigorated them, as their bodies transformed—gills sprouted from their mouths, fleshy membranes expanded over their hands, and green light began to glow from their eyes. They stepped forward, closing in on Bai Liu, one step at a time.

Nearby, some mermaid wax figures that had been lurking in the shadows began to stir. Their pure white stone fish tails came to life in the rain, moving across the ground with an unnatural speed, as if lubricated, swimming faster than ever before. Their faces, once frozen in serene smiles, twisted into grimaces and feral grins. The grey-black cracks around their eyes spread across their bodies, transforming their upper forms into jagged, fish-like shapes from the deep sea.

Meanwhile, Siren King's long eyelashes fluttered twice as the rain moistened his slimy fishtail. The rain began to wash away the remnants of the liquid that had restrained him, causing the silvery-blue scales on his body to gleam in the downpour.

Bai Liu scanned the monsters ahead using the coin game manager hanging around his neck:

[Monster Name: Mermaid Wax Figure (Rainwater enhancement in progress: faster movement on land, Siren King deterrent power reduced, attack power enhanced)]

[Monster Name: Mermaid Sailor (Rainwater enhancement in progress: faster movement on land, Siren King deterrent power reduced, attack power enhanced)]

[Monster Name: Siren King (Rain has no reinforcing effect, but due to the washing away of the restraining liquid, Siren King's awakening time has been accelerated—only three hours remain before Siren King will awaken. Please accelerate the game.)]

Bai Liu quickly scanned the panel messages, his expression unreadable. He sighed and muttered to himself, "This game is a bit of a rogue. It forces players to cut down if they can't play."

"And isn't this a bit too much? Not only have they enhanced all the monsters and shortened my clearance time, but this heavy rain has also slowed me down and muddled my sense of direction. My panel index is still glowing red. It's easy to die playing chase in this situation…"

"But it's not impossible." Bai Liu pushed the dripping hair back behind his head with his fingers, his movements calm despite the chaos around him.

The rain trickled down his jaw, soaking into his collar, making his soaked clothes cling to him and leaving him slightly breathless in the downpour. He unbuttoned the top button of his shirt, lifting his gaze with a faint, confident smile. "I just hope the game rewards me appropriately for all this effort. I don't play games with unbalanced rewards."

The system responded immediately:

[If you win, you will not be disappointed. Our rewards are sure to satisfy your innermost desires.]

Bai Liu smiled, "Thank you in advance for the reward, then."

His tone was so casual, as if he had already received the reward. This confident demeanor left the group of spectators watching his mini-TV dumbfounded.

Bai Liu's stream had gained a new wave of viewers, some of whom were drawn by the attraction of [Mu Sicheng watching the new main player mini-TV], due to his strong position in the central lobby. They hadn't seen Bai Liu's earlier miraculous actions but were now watching with disbelief as he casually dealt with the monsters' enhancements and a shortened game time, all while seemingly unphased by the threat around him.

"I thought God Mu was observing some amazing player, but it turns out it's just one of these guys. With monster enhancements, his own panel in the red, a shortened game time, and he's still cool enough to chat like it's nothing. Maybe I just don't get it…"

"I was reading the forum earlier, thinking this guy was something, but now I see he's playing like this? It's nothing impressive. How did he even get into the Power Push promotion spot—by face?"

Bai Liu, meanwhile, was aware of the mocking comments but paid little mind to them. He had been pursued by monsters from the [single-player section], and now the audience was bickering about his progress.

"Three pages of a monster book and you're still weak? Only one with long hands can play? Show us how many monster books you've collected."

"Let's see who's better than Bai Liu now. Oh, a bunch of viewers who haven't even charged over ten points, sure."

Players could check each other's charge points, and now those mocking Bai Liu found themselves in a heated argument, as their points were quickly called into question.

Despite the tension in the chat, Wang Shun continued watching Bai Liu's mini-TV, worry etched on his face. He remained silent, feeling the weight of the situation.

Bai Liu was indeed unlucky to be targeted both inside and outside the game. Worse still, he was now facing some of the meanest audience members in the system.

Wang Shun sighed deeply. In this game with a guild system, certain players, backed by their guilds, liked to stir up trouble. These players, while not particularly skilled, were known for bullying newcomers with potential, hoping to stomp out anyone who might take their spot at the top.

Bai Liu was now facing such an audience.

[32 people liked Bai Liu's TV, 89 people favorited Bai Liu's TV, 0 people charged Bai Liu's TV, and 3,807 people stepped on Bai Liu's TV.]

[Player Bai Liu has been stepped on by over 3,000 people in one minute, and your mini-TV has been stepped on by more than 5,000 people, earning you the title of "Abomination."]

[It seems everyone is eager for you to leave here… oh no, they want you to die here.]

[Player Bai Liu's Central Lobby Single Player Power Play promotion is about to expire.]

Wang Shun saw the system notification and let out a long sigh of relief, realizing this was the outcome he had expected.

Some viewers who had followed Bai Liu from the division were angry and red-faced, while others in the Central District, resentful of Bai Liu for taking the promotion spot, were smug.

At that moment, someone exclaimed, "There's another one in the newcomer section over here on the Central Hall fringe promotion!"

Another newcomer, following in Bai Liu's footsteps, was about to take their turn. Wang Shun looked over curiously and saw a player with a flaming torch, snorkelling and swimming on the surface of the water, using the torch to ward off the mermaid sailors chasing him. He was holding a mermaid's skeleton in his right hand—a real, bony skeleton, quite different from Bai Liu's version of the Siren King.

This player, too, had undergone some alienation, with his face covered in fish scales and his lower body resembling a fish's tail, allowing him to swim swiftly through the water.

It was clear this player had also reached the final prologue and would likely clear the level once he returned the Siren Banshee to the sea.

The survival rate of this player was much higher than Bai Liu's on every front, which provoked even more jeers from the guild players in the audience.

"I'm laughing my ass off! Didn't you brag about Bai Liu? Other newcomers with traditional programs are still ahead of him!" one of the viewers sneered.

"This Bai Liu just likes to play hard to get. I advise you to watch more serious gods' videos and spend more money instead of watching his free stream," another mocked.

"Let's go. We, the esteemed players from big guilds, don't have time for retail players like them. Don't bother watching. It's a waste of time."

As people continued leaving Bai Liu's TV, the once crowded viewing area quickly emptied out. Wang Shun sighed and walked to the front of Bai Liu's TV, a spot he had wanted but had been pushed away from due to the crowd.

[7,060 people left player Bai Liu's TV, of which 3,900 went to the newcomer's TV next door.]

[Player Bai Liu's performance was so poor that no one watched or liked his stream. Instead, there was a lot of stepping on it. All this resulted in scorn, and the system that highly recommended him was so disappointed that it decided to swap Bai Liu's promotion spot with the newcomer's next door.]

Wang Shun froze, and a system notification soon popped up.

[Player Bai Liu drops down to promotion spot in Central Lobby

Fringe.]

[Player Muke has been promoted to the Highly Recommended promotion in the Single Player section of the Central Lobby.]

Bai Liu had barely held his promotion spot for ten minutes before he was removed.

There weren't too many viewers who had followed Bai Liu's promotion along with Wang Shun, but one man with a strange monkey hat caught his attention. The man stood at the front of the small TV area, similar to Wang Shun.

Wang Shun gave him a curious look.

Bai Liu's ups and downs had been a sad experience for Wang Shun, as a viewer who had followed him. So he approached the man who had come along for the ride.

"Why did you come along? Do you like Bai Liu too?" Wang Shun asked.

The man in the monkey hat lifted the brim slightly, revealing a pair of sly red eyes. "Because I think this man, who is said to be able to replace me, is definitely more than that."

"Replace you?" Wang Shun was stunned. He nearly exclaimed but stopped himself when the man made a shushing gesture and laughed softly.

"And he played really well before, didn't he? Three pages of the monster book. It's the first time I've seen a player other than me collect it to that extent. And if it weren't for the Siren King, I'm sure he would have completed the last page by now."

"This guy isn't playing hard to get, he's really strong," Mu Sicheng said with a grin, looking sideways at Bai Liu's mini-TV. "I've never seen the system go so far to undermine a player's advantage."

Mu Sicheng continued with a chuckle, "The system says it's pursuing game balance, which means Bai Liu is so strong that they had to nerf him to make it 'balanced.' With a player this strong, it's amazing anyone thinks he couldn't clear this..."

Mu Sicheng let out a soft laugh. "This group of guild players who think they're above it all is just a bit funny."

[Mu Sicheng, the fourth-ranked player in the Rising Stars standings, enters Bai Liu's mini-TV.]

[Mu Sicheng liked player Bai Liu's TV. He seems to have a soft spot for players~]

[Mu Sicheng used his access as the fourth-ranked player in the Rising Stars standings to recommend Bai Liu's ongoing mini-TV on his own, drawing a massive audience to it.]

Wang Shun was completely dumbfounded. It took him a moment to react before he asked Mu Sicheng, somewhat puzzled, "So, God Mu, if you think Bai Liu is strong, then why didn't you just say so? Why wait until he fell to the fringe before recommending him?"

Had Mu Sicheng stepped in sooner, Bai Liu might have kept his highly recommended promotion spot. A recommendation from a god like Mu Sicheng could have helped a newcomer like Bai Liu.

Mu Sicheng curled his lips and gave Wang Shun a sidelong glance. "But I was waiting for him to fall to the edge."

"For strong players, snow is better than icing on the cake," Mu Sicheng continued. "My aim in recommending him now is so he'll owe me a favor."

Wang Shun choked on Mu Sicheng's blunt shamelessness and looked at the legendary player with incredulity.

This Mu Sicheng was nothing like the cold, calculating persona he had seen in the game.

So cheeky and shameless.

Bai Liu was unaware of the happenings outside his immediate environment.

Pushing his cart forward, moving slowly, Bai Liu was overtaken multiple times. Each time he was passed, he would swipe the Siren King backhandedly against the cart, forcing the pursuing mermaid monsters to retreat for a moment.

But it wasn't enough anymore. As the rain poured down, more and more monsters began chasing him, and the Siren King seemed to lose its ability to deter them.

Bai Liu was suddenly caught on the arm by the sharp claws of a mermaid sailor. Blood spurted from the wound as he hastily dragged the cart into an alleyway. Just as he did, his mind buzzed, and a red warning panel appeared on the system screen.

[Warning: Player Bai Liu has been scratched by a mermaid sailor and has become alienated. His spirit level has dropped to 60 and will soon fall below the safe threshold.]

Bai Liu clutched his still-bleeding arm and leaned back against the alley wall, taking a moment to catch his breath. His clothes were soaked from the rain, making him appear as if he had just been pulled out of the sea.

He closed his eyes to steady himself, trying to counter the dizziness and weakness creeping up on him.

Bai Liu had fallen once before, but after enduring the initial discomfort, his high mental strength had allowed him to recover quickly. This time, though, it wasn't the same.

Weakness overcame him, and Bai Liu collapsed to his knees. His face quickly became streaked with grey and black lines, dark green scales began to grow beneath his eyes, and his complexion turned deathly pale.

His breathing grew heavy, his head down as rain poured over him, resembling a dying fish that had been caught and stranded.

"That was a mistake on my part," Bai Liu murmured calmly. "I didn't expect the drop in spirit value to 60 to affect me so much."

Wang Shun, watching the scene on the small TV, tensed with worry. "His mental value is really low now (approaching below 60), if it drops one more point, hallucinations will start."

Mu Sicheng, who had been watching closely, seemed more serious. "When it hits 60, the player's chances of surviving a chase drop drastically. Hallucinations will make it impossible to tell real monsters from illusions, and they'll lose the way to escape."

"Would it help if he buys a spirit rinse now?" Wang Shun asked nervously. "Bai Liu has enough items to buy one. It would restore his spirit value."

Mu Sicheng, however, shook his head. "In this game, it's better not to use spirit rinse."

Wang Shun grew more confused. "Why?"

Mu Sicheng remained silent, not offering any explanation.

On the small TV, Bai Liu suddenly managed to stagger to his feet, using the wall for support. He squinted at the alley entrance, where several mermaid sailors and wax figures were slowly encroaching. Their black silhouettes loomed ominously through the foggy downpour.

If he tried to rush out now, they would catch him without question. Another scratch, and his spirit value would immediately fall below 60.

In the rain and with hallucinations clouding his mind, Bai Liu had no way of telling where he was going.

He needed a plan. His mind raced as he leaned against the wall.

The mermaids outside the alleyway began to sniff the air, crawling up the walls like geckos, moving quickly with angry green glints in their eyes and mucus dripping from their mouths.

They reached the alley entrance, tilting their heads, sniffing twice. A disturbing fish-lipped grin spread across their faces as they began to crawl closer, their hands and feet pressed against the wall.

Wang Shun held his breath, the words [Bai Liu, run!] almost slipping from his lips. His fists were clenched.

At this point, running was futile. Bai Liu’s speed was nowhere near fast enough to outrun the mermaid monsters. Running would only draw attention and lead to certain capture.

The only hope left was that the monsters wouldn’t find him in the alley.

But with the monsters closing in on the alley entrance, things were looking grim.

Wang Shun's thoughts were still racing when, to his shock, Bai Liu—dragging the cart, drenched in rain—suddenly dashed out of the alley without hesitation.

Wang Shun: "!!!!"

He was so anxious that he blurted out, "We can't run! If we do, we're finished!"

As Wang Shun feared, in an instant, the mermaid monsters converged at the alley entrance, swiftly followed by the wax figures. The narrow alley entrance was surrounded.

Bai Liu continued to move at a steady pace, calmly facing the monsters closing in on him.

Wang Shun: "No, he's trying to break through the circle!"

Wang Shun stamped his feet in panic, unable to comprehend why Bai Liu would make such a fatal mistake at this crucial moment. Even if he managed a breakthrough, the mermaids were faster and could catch him before he could escape.

Mu Sicheng furrowed his brow. "The drop in his mental value must have affected his decision-making. He shouldn't have run out like this."

Wang Shun: "Right." Wang Shun exhaled deeply, "We forgot to account for how the drop in mental value affects Bai Liu's thinking. He must be really panicking right now."

The expressions of the other viewers reflected a mix of disbelief and concern.

Some viewers began to complain that Mu Sicheng had recently developed a strange taste in players, liking to follow "vegetable" players.

Mu Sicheng, hearing this, pretended not to notice, pulling the brim of his hat lower.

Bai Liu, using the cart with the Siren King, slammed it into the circle, the monsters' eyes fixed on him as he ran away.

Wang Shun's heart was in his throat—they're catching up! The monsters were gaining on him!

But then, the mermaid monsters strangely stopped by the alley entrance, momentarily hovering before completely ignoring Bai Liu. Instead, they all poured into the alley.

Wang Shun: "???"

Mu Sicheng: "????"

Other viewers: "????????????"

Why weren't the monsters chasing the player? What were they doing in the alley?

The small TV's view shifted to show the interior of the alley. There, at the far end, stood another Bai Liu, holding the cart in front of the monsters, making aggressive moves.

Bai Liu tilted his chin slightly, hooking his index finger in a challenge, as though deliberately provoking the mermaid monsters to come and face him. True to his baiting, the monsters snarled and, teeth bared, charged at him in response.

This unexpected move sparked immediate discussions among the viewers.

"Wow, what is this?!"

"Shit, is this some kind of cheat? Can you really use such a diversionary prop in a level 1 copy like Siren Town?"

"You can't use high-level props in low-level areas, right? If you do, the system will kick you out for breaking the balance."

"So, what's going on here?"

The first mermaid monster lunged angrily, its claws swiping at Bai Liu. But, as the attack landed, Bai Liu's form dissolved into a stump before quickly reappearing, still sporting that lazy, almost mocking smile.

Wang Shun suddenly recalled something from Bai Liu's arsenal, his eyes widening with realization. "It's a 3D projector! Bai Liu is using a 3D projector!"

"The monsters in this copy of Siren Town have low intelligence, so they can't distinguish between a projection and a real person," Wang Shun continued, clicking on the projector's manual for further details. "In the rain, the 3D projection becomes more physical. With Bai Liu's provocative gestures, these low-intelligence monsters get angry and focus on attacking the illusion instead of the real Bai Liu."

Wang Shun's eyes gleamed with excitement. "So, when these monsters see someone acting like a threat, they instinctively target that person. Bai Liu has managed to shake off the monsters with this trick!"

A viewer raised a concern. "But no matter how low their intelligence, if they keep attacking an ineffective target, they'll eventually figure out it's a trick. Then they'll target the real Bai Liu, who's much slower than they are."

"Even if he dodges here, he'll still get caught unless he can restrict the monsters' movements."

No sooner had this remark been made than the monsters on the screen sniffed suspiciously at Bai Liu's projected image, one of them swiping with its flippers as it realized the illusion. With a howl of frustration, the monsters shrieked in rage, realizing they'd been tricked.

The group of mermaid monsters, now enraged, surged forward, ready to exit the alley and pursue the real Bai Liu.

But as they moved, Bai Liu, standing behind them, smiled slyly. Calmly, he took out a torch, pointing it at the backs of the monsters and flicked the switch, as though pulling a trigger.

In an instant, blinding beams of light shot through the alley, cutting through the wax figures of mermaids as they wailed, their eyes covered. The intense light pierced through the rain, directly targeting the advancing monsters.

The small town of siren

In the rain, far off, another beam of light appears from across the street and merges with the one in the alleyway, forming a powerful beam that stretches down the avenue of the town of Siren.

The light-fearing mermaid wax figure is immediately halted by the intense glow.

This blinding light stretches across almost the entire town of Siren, trapping the photophobic mermaid wax figures behind it, preventing them from advancing further to catch up with Bai Liu.

Even the mermaid sailors, who are protected by amulets and are less affected by the light, hesitate to cross it. They hover around, cautiously testing the boundaries.

Meanwhile, Bai Liu leans against a wall, catching his breath. Beside him is a 3D projector, with a projection of Bai Liu himself holding a torch, syncing with the light beam from the alleyway, creating this formidable barrier.

He wipes the rain from his forehead and exhales in relief. “Good thing this 3D projector is waterproof.”

On a small TV nearby, the blinding beam of light continues to shine brightly.

The viewers, watching intently, fall silent for a few moments. One of them, who had earlier doubted Bai Liu’s ability to escape, stares in stunned silence before muttering, “Well, that's impressive...”

“I doubted God Mu's judgment before, I was wrong! It’s not the player; it's me who couldn’t see it. I’ll get my eyes checked,” another voice says, reflecting a moment of realization.

“This new guy plays like he's in a Dead Comedy Zone—he’s treating this horror game as a game, focusing on the experience rather than the points.”

Mu Sicheng’s eyes narrow in amusement, his grin widening as he bites into a candy. “The system gave the rainy weather as a restriction for Bai Liu, but he’s using it to his advantage.”

Bai Liu, dragging his cart, eventually reaches the beach. After a brief hesitation, the mermaid sailors behind him decide to cross the beam and give chase—mermaid sailors are not afraid of the light.

However, the light-fearing mermaid wax figures remain trapped behind the beam, significantly reducing the danger.

At this point, the player only needs to dive into the sea and send Siren King to the bottom to complete the level. Since most players here are highly alienated, resembling mermaids, they can just descend and banish Siren King back into the depths.

Wang Shun now understands why Mu Sicheng had warned against drifting the spirit value.

The spirit value is tied to the alienation status—if it rises, the player will revert from [Mermaid] back to [Human] status, making it impossible to enter the deep and banish Siren King.

Wang Shun feels relieved that Bai Liu didn't drift, feeling a bit ashamed of his earlier doubts.

Mu Sicheng's gaming instinct is in a league of its own, far beyond his own, yet Bai Liu, despite being a newcomer, managed to stay afloat...

Shaking his head at his own thoughts, Wang Shun can't help but admire Bai Liu.

Instead of heading into the sea to evade the mermaid sailors, Bai Liu turns and heads toward the large boat where he had boarded the mermaid fishery earlier!

The boat is docked on the beach, and Bai Liu races toward it, dragging his cart!

Wang Shun feels a surge of panic, clutching his chest. "We're almost there! Why is he heading to the ship? What's he doing?"

Mu Sicheng is also caught off guard by Bai Liu's bold maneuver, biting his lollipop in surprise. He coughs a few times, his eyes narrowing as he analyzes the situation.

"Bai Liu is in danger of being caught by the mermaid sailors behind him, as they're faster in the water. Normally, players would use items to slow down the mermaid sailors, like floating on the surface with a fiery torch, or they'd tough it out as long as their spirit value holds out."

"Bai Liu probably hopes to lose the mermaid sailors by getting on the boat," Mu Sicheng continues. “But that wouldn't work. There are still mermaid sailors on board, and in such a confined space, Bai Liu would be easily caught. Plus, the mermaid sailors in the water can climb aboard, and they move faster than the boat, so getting on the boat doesn’t make sense.”

Just as Mu Sicheng finishes speaking, Bai Liu faces a new challenge.

He pushes his cart across the plank connecting the boat to the shore and races toward the vessel. The mermaid sailors aboard the boat spot him and rush to intercept, their sharp flippers extending to scratch Bai Liu’s face.

Wang Shun watches in horror, but Bai Liu remains unfazed. He calmly pulls a 3D projector from his pocket and tosses it overboard.

The projector lands and bounces twice, projecting an image of Bai Liu. The mermaid sailors hesitate for a moment, confused between the two projections, before heading toward the other Bai Liu.

Wang Shun breaks into a cold sweat. “Is Bai Liu using his old trick again, using the projector's light to control the mermaid sailors, or is he just stalling for time?”

But soon, doubt creeps in again. “But mermaid sailors aren’t afraid of light. Even if Bai Liu’s projection holds a strong torch, it wouldn’t stop them. The beam of light on land didn’t hold them back, and it won’t here.”

Mu Sicheng’s gaze sharpens as he watches Bai Liu on the TV, a spark of realization lighting up his eyes. “You missed something in the Mermaid Sailor’s monster book. Take another look at their weaknesses.”

Wang Shun quickly pulls up his electronic recorder and examines the details of the Mermaid Sailor's page:

[Siren Small Town Monster Book - Mermaid Sailor (3/4)]

Monster Name: Mermaid Sailor (Butterfly Status)
Weaknesses: Fear of light, amulet, Siren King
Mode of Attack: Biting and scratching (with a chance of triggering alienation status)
Mu Sicheng smiles as he watches Bai Liu’s calculated moves, impressed by his strategy. “Now it makes sense. This guy’s clever. No wonder the system is throwing everything at him."

"Eh, this is strange." Wang Shun pointed to the "Weakness" item on the electronic recorder, muttering to himself, "The Mermaid Sailor's weakness is clearly a fear of glare. So why does the Mermaid Sailor seem unaffected by light when on land?"

"The amulet," Mu Sicheng nudged Wang Shun. "With the protection of the amulet, the glare doesn't work on the mermaid sailors."

Wang Shun's eyes widened as realization hit. He looked up at the small TV. "Yes! That's it! So Bai Liu, this means—"

Mu Sicheng smiled, glancing at the screen. "Exactly. Bai Liu is heading to the ship's lower compartment. That's where the monsters store their amulets. He's going to smash their amulets, and without protection, the light will restrict their movements."

On the small TV, Bai Liu had already shaken off the monsters behind him and was making his way to the lower compartment. With his pickaxe, he smashed through the bulletproof glass and began destroying the wax figures of the mermaid amulets one by one.

The shattered wax figures crumbled underfoot. As Bai Liu continued to break the amulets, the [Bai Liu Projection] on the deck raised a torch. It looked as if two Bai Liu were fighting in synchrony—one below deck, the other above.

A bright beam of light cut through the group of mermaid sailors surrounding the [Bai Liu Projection], with Bai Liu's projection calmly holding the switch, a subtle smile on his face.

Wang Shun, Mu Sicheng, and the audience in the front row all raised their hands to shield their eyes from the blinding light.

"This new guy is too ruthless," Wang Shun said, conflicted. "I almost feel sorry for those monsters."

But the mermaid monsters began to swim away from the light, some diving into the sea to reemerge on the opposite side, preparing to ambush Bai Liu.

Wang Shun frowned. "Even with the torch, Bai Liu only has one beam of light. His 3D projector is out of commission. While the light can restrict their movements, it won't trap them completely like it did on shore."

Mu Sicheng hugged his chest and explained, "That's because two light sources, even if linked, won't fully restrain the mermaid sailors here. The ship's layout is different from the town's."

"Bai Liu could use the light to block the town's sea entrance, but here, with just one light, the mermaid sailors can escape into the sea from both sides."

"Right," Wang Shun muttered, deep in thought. "It's too late to buy another projector, so we'll need another torch. If we can create a triangle of light, we can trap the mermaid sailors inside."

"I had the same thought," Mu Sicheng agreed, nodding. "But at this stage, props are expensive. As we approach the end, crucial items like torches are going up in price. Right now in Siren Town, a torch costs at least 100 points."

"100 points?!" Wang Shun gasped. "That's ridiculous, isn't that a scam?"

Mu Sicheng shot him a sidelong glance. "So, do you want to buy a torch for 100 points right now?"

Wang Shun paused, then sighed, "Buy."

Bai Liu emerged from the basement, pickaxe in hand and a torch in the other. It seemed he had the same idea as Wang Shun and Mu Sicheng—heading to the system shop to buy props.

As Bai Liu scrolled through the shop's interface, Wang Shun caught sight of the price for the torch. "250 points for a torch? That's a total rip-off! What a crazy price!"

Bai Liu remained unfazed as he passed over the torch's sales page. Wang Shun, now worried, added, "Bai Liu, don't let the price stop you! It's life or death now! Don't worry about the points!"

The audience grew anxious as Bai Liu took his time selecting items, still seemingly unable to afford the torch, even though they were close to finishing the level. The tension mounted.

"Bai Liu! Don't worry about the money! I'll pay for the torch—just get it!"

"Yeah, yeah! Give us a torch! Bai Liu, your life is worth more than this!"

"Forget the price! Just get the torch and finish it! I'll chip in for you!"

Even Mu Sicheng tapped his [Points Wallet] panel, ready to recharge Bai Liu.

Finally, Bai Liu stopped scrolling, as if he had found what he needed. A faint smile appeared on his face as he confirmed his purchase.

[Does the player buy a high-definition reflector?]

Bai Liu: [Yes] without hesitation.

[System Alert: 3 points. Thank you for your patronage.]

Bai Liu placed the reflector in a corner of the boat and secured the torch to the bow with a flick of the switch.

The bright white light from the torch cut through the fog over the sea, reflected back through the reflector, merging with the light from the [Bai Liu Projection]. The result was a brilliant triangular area of light surrounding the ship. The mermaid sailors writhed in the light, covering their eyes and wailing, but they couldn't escape.

Bai Liu kneeled at the boat's bow, the sea wind and rain tousling his hair. His eyes were hidden beneath the dark strands, but his lips curled into a smile. "Stay on board, sailors."

[System Notice: As most of the monsters have been restricted by player Bai Liu, the heavy rain can no longer weaken him. The weather is changing, prepare accordingly.]

[Weather Conversion: Heavy Rain → Sunny.]

The light behind Bai Liu rose slowly as he stood, one foot on the trolley, the other stepping off the boat. The overlapping clouds parted, and golden sunlight poured down, casting a regal glow on Bai Liu's disheveled face, enhancing his calm smile.

[Player Bai Liu enters the final chapter of Siren Small Town - Returning the Siren King.]

After a brief silence in front of Bai Liu's small TV, the room erupted in a frenzy of shouting and charging. Players were hugging and high-fiving each other, as the number of likes surged exponentially every second.

Mu Sicheng pulled his hand away from the reward, and after a moment of stunned silence, he began clapping, a smile spreading across his face. "You really are something, Bai Liu."

Wang Shun joined in, his hands red from excitement, sweat streaming down his face.

The rest of the audience was just as animated as Wang Shun, so excited they seemed ready to break into song, singing "A Night to Remember."

"When it rains, it rains, and when it’s sunny, it’s sunny again! Are you a weather god, Bai Liu?!"

"Give me red! Give me a blast! If you've got my charge money, you'll be at the forefront! Bai Liu, go for it! Go to the top of the new star list!"

[12,011 people liked Bai Liu's TV. 12,000 people favorited it. 2,077 people charged Bai Liu’s TV. Player Bai Liu earned 3,011 points, with over 300 players contributing more than one point.]

[Player Bai Liu has gained over 10,000 likes and more than 3,000 points in under a minute, and his reputation is soaring! Bai Liu has earned the Frontrunner achievement!]

[Congratulations to Bai Liu for advancing to the highly recommended single-player split-screen position on the central lobby screen.]

[Welcome back to your original position, Player Bai Liu.]

As soon as Bai Liu made it to the power push screen, nearly all of the previously overlooked players flocked to him.

An impressive crowd of excited, red-faced spectators surged through the gaming hall, drawing the attention of passersby who approached to ask what little TV they were watching.

"What’s all the fuss about? Why’s there so much shouting?"

"Son of the Weather!" "Reflector God, damn!" "God Mu’s newly adopted son of a bull!"

Confused players asked, "?????? What’s on that little TV you’re watching?"

Curiosity led more players to join the growing crowd.

The fastest to run over were Wang Shun and Mu Sicheng. As Wang Shun kept up, he noticed Li Gou in the distance. Li Gou had spotted Mu Sicheng and, realizing that Bai Liu wasn't an easy target, had taken refuge behind him.

Now, Li Gou was trailing the group, carrying a knife, his face dark and sullen. It was clear that he understood Bai Liu was no longer someone he could easily take advantage of.

Wang Shun couldn't help but breathe a sigh of relief for Bai Liu. For players like Li Gou, it was better for Bai Liu to stay as far away as possible.

By the time Wang Shun and his group arrived at the push position, the area in front of Bai Liu's small TV was packed with spectators—from those who had watched earlier but left midway to those now witnessing Bai Liu's rise.

Among them were members of the Central District Guild, who had previously mocked Bai Liu as a pretentious aesthete.

Although these viewers had once disdained Bai Liu, now that he had risen, they began complaining loudly.

"Why is it rising again? This is so annoying to watch."

"How can so many people give him credit? What's the point? He's dragging down the strong push position. Ugh, I'm going to stomp him out. Someone, do it quickly!"

"I don't understand. What's so great about this guy pretending to be something he's not? He gets tens of thousands of likes, 4,000 or 5,000 people charging him, and they're all idiots spending points on him? Waste of life."

"Can't someone else get in? Can we get someone up there who's actually on God Mu's level?"

The group's interference disrupted the regular viewers who were trying to watch the mini-TV, but most didn't want to provoke this group of die-hard guild-backed fans, so they stayed quiet.

Mu Sicheng looked at the rowdy crowd. The corners of his mouth curled down slightly, his expression darkening just enough to hint at offense, though he still wore a smile.

He casually removed his monkey hat and walked to the front row, turning to face the shouting crowd. With one hand on his chest and the other holding the hat behind him, he gave a formal salute.

The sight of Mu Sicheng in a stuffed monkey hat performing a gentleman's salute was almost comical, but it didn't stop the audience from gasping in awe.

"God Mu!!! You're God Mu, aren't you! You're actually watching his little TV!"

One of them boldly asked, "God Mu, can I ask why you're recommending this player? It's so annoying. Why does he keep occupying a top spot when he has no skill?"

Mu Sicheng smiled. "Hey guys, I overheard your conversation, and it made me feel a little nostalgic."

The audience fell silent, their attention completely captured by his words. They murmured about Bai Liu as they processed his statement.

"God Mu, you find him annoying too, right? A pretentious monster. He should have dropped out by now, but he keeps blocking the spot for people who actually deserve it."

"I can't even enjoy the live stream because of people like him hogging the screen. I just hope he crashes out soon."

"God Mu, why don't you just go in and stream to kick him out?"

These voices rang loud and clear, and it was obvious they enjoyed the idea of a newcomer being pushed out—especially guild players who often disliked newcomers taking up their space.

Mu Sicheng's smile took on a more thoughtful quality as he spoke, casually licking his lollipop. "When I first made it onto the Power Push promotion spot, a lot of Central Screen viewers stepped on me, cursed me out, and said all kinds of things."

The audience fell suddenly silent. They exchanged uncomfortable glances and then fell quiet.

Mu Sicheng chuckled softly at the once-voicing crowd, now restrained in front of Bai Liu.

He leaned forward slightly, his eyes glinting with playful innocence as he addressed the silent group. "Do you know what happened to all those viewers who cursed me?"

The front-row viewers found themselves frozen by his gaze, the dark red of his eyes catching their attention.

It took a moment for them to realize that the dark red color wasn’t natural—it came from the monkeys reflected in his eyes, bright and eerie.

The small town of siren

Faced with the unsettling gaze of Mu Sicheng, the audience—who had been so full of pride moments ago—swallowed nervously, took two steps back, and shuddered, fear creeping down their spines.

Mu Sicheng grinned, pulling a cartoon monkey hat from behind his back and pointing at it casually: "I hate the audience, so I killed all those annoying people in the game."

He spoke nonchalantly, as if killing were an everyday occurrence, nothing to fuss about: "If Bai Liu shows up, I'll gladly support him in killing all of you noisy people too. Just a suggestion, of course."

"You guys are just so loud," Mu Sicheng added with a polite smile, "Disturbing me while I'm watching his TV, you bunch of idiots."

At that moment, the monkey on Mu Sicheng's hat suddenly opened its mouth and let out an eerie laugh, its eyes glowing red, as if in agreement with Mu Sicheng's ominous suggestion. It was both strange and unsettling.

The once overconfident audience, now terrified, screamed and fled in panic.

In their frantic escape, some of them collided and stumbled over each other, scrambling to crawl out in disarray, ending up scattered on the floor near Bai Liu's small TV viewing area.

Mu Sicheng stood calmly in the front row, slipping the hat into his pocket as if nothing had happened, resuming his indifferent posture while tilting his head back to continue watching Bai Liu’s broadcast.

The audience stepped back, giving Mu Sicheng plenty of space to watch from the front row.

Their conversations had quieted down significantly, as if they feared disturbing Mu Sicheng’s private viewing time with Bai Liu.

Behind Mu Sicheng, Wang Shun stood, his expression a mix of emotions.

This was the first time Wang Shun had confronted Mu Sicheng’s dangerous side head-on.

It was moments like this that explained why top streamers rarely faced finger-pointing or criticism from their viewers; most fans only praised them.

If you offended a god, it could be as easy as crushing an ant to be silenced.

Criticism was mostly reserved for the smaller streams, where new players or more passive viewers still had the courage to voice their opinions.

For someone like Mu Sicheng, even the idea of pushing him around in his own stream was tantamount to digging your own grave.

Many of Bai Liu's audience were from guilds, mostly low-level players with limited skill, some relying on cheats or brute force to get through games. These players, although not powerful themselves, often had a tendency to criticize newcomers who might steal their spotlight or paying audience. As a result, they harbored ill will toward players like Bai Liu and, at one point, Mu Sicheng.

Wang Shun hesitated, then sat beside Mu Sicheng, still a little wary of his presence but determined to stay in the front row.

Suppressing his curiosity, Wang Shun whispered, "God Mu, did you really kill those audience members who cursed you?"

Mu Sicheng smiled faintly and shook his head. "Of course not. I don't have time for that. I just said it to scare them off. It's annoying when they keep pushing me."

Wang Shun let out a relieved sigh. "Oh, I see. So it wasn't true."

"I didn't kill anyone, but my monkey hat loves to eat people I don't like," Mu Sicheng added with a sly grin. He turned his attention back to Bai Liu on the small TV and chuckled softly.

With a slight shrug, hands still in his pockets, he defended himself in a half-hearted way. "But honestly, they brought it upon themselves by insulting me. I don't think I should be blamed for what happened to them."

Wang Shun was speechless.

Bai Liu was back on the boat, his cart in tow.

A few mermaid sailors trailed behind, but their presence no longer commanded fear—Bai Liu was now dealing with the Siren King.

The mermaid sailors, lacking the advantage of weather manipulation or protective amulets, could only watch from a distance, their eyes filled with resentment and greed.

But Bai Liu was no longer concerned with these mermaid sailors.

What struck him as odd was that the system had stated that most land-based monsters were already constrained. This was why it had stopped using weather effects to weaken him. Yet, the monster book for Siren Town still had four pages: one for mermaid sailors, one for mermaid wax figures, and one for the Siren King.

What was missing, however, was the larval form of the mermaid—the weakest of these creatures.

Bai Liu had been chased along the shore for so long without encountering a single mermaid, which seemed impossible. If the system wasn't lying to him, the land-based monsters had already been mostly restricted. This meant that the weakest of the mermaids were most likely hiding in the sea.

Bai Liu's gaze turned to the calm, unruffled waters in front of him.

It was highly probable that the vast numbers of mermaids were lurking beneath the surface.

[System Notification: One hour until Siren King awakens. Please accelerate your pace and clear the level.]

For the next hour, Bai Liu mentally calculated how fast he could move the Siren King, but he was uncertain about the mermaids hiding in the sea. With these monsters potentially interfering, he wasn't sure if one hour would be enough.

Shrugging off the concern, Bai Liu left the cart on the beach and knelt beside the Siren King.

The Siren King, who had been unresponsive throughout the chase, was now showing signs of life. His fins fluttered gently, his chest rose and fell, and his jade-like skin glistened with vitality.

Bai Liu could sense that the Siren King was about to awaken. He placed a hand on his shoulder, took a deep breath, and ran toward the sea.

As the water enveloped his legs, Bai Liu's body began to transform. Silvery-green scales covered his legs, waist, and face, while cracked gills appeared on his cheeks. His eyes narrowed to slits.

Bai Liu took another deep breath, grasped Siren King's hand, and plunged into the endless blue depths.

Meanwhile, Wang Shun, watching on a small TV, sighed with relief. "Finally, they're in the sea. We should be nearing the end."

"Not necessarily," Mu Sicheng replied, arms crossed, a slight grimace on his face. "When I dragged the Siren Demoness to the sea, I thought I was done for, but as I neared the [Siren's Gift] zone, I found myself surrounded by mermaids with glowing green eyes. I almost died there."

Mu Sicheng grimaced at the memory. "I had to buy a powerful torch to drive them off, and it cost me over two hundred points."

Wang Shun's eyes widened. "Over two hundred points? That's insane!"

He quickly added, "The torch was already over 250 points before. When Bai Liu gets there, the price will likely go up even more, right?"

"Yeah, the system's pricing depends on two factors: market demand and how badly the player needs a particular item. The more desperate the system thinks you are, the higher the price," Mu Sicheng explained, smirking. "Bai Liu will have to spend at least 400 points for a torch when he's surrounded by mermaids. It's going to be a bloodbath for him."

As they continued to chat, Muke, a rookie player, had already reached the waters of [Siren's Gift].

Clutching the Siren's bone in one hand, Muke swam deeper into the dark waters, his fishtail propelling him forward. He seemed to be on the verge of clearing the level, his face lighting up with a triumphant smile.

Wang Shun, watching Muke's progress, sighed. "Muke is probably going to clear the level faster than Bai Liu. He'll be the first rookie to do so."

He continued, "The first player in each batch of newcomers gets a special reward: a personal skill. Bai Liu could have had that reward."

Looking at Bai Liu, still slowly swimming with the Siren King, Wang Shun shook his head. "If he hadn't wasted so much time, he could have been the first to clear it."

Because Bai Liu had fallen behind, Muke now ranked higher in the [Single Player Zone Highly Recommended Promotion] by the system.

Seeing Muke so confidently heading toward victory while Bai Liu appeared lost in thought, Wang Shun was convinced that Muke had the upper hand.

"It's like watching a gifted child who's too distracted to beat the average kid next door," Wang Shun muttered.

Mu Sicheng, however, wasn't convinced. "It's not over yet. We still don't know who the first rookie will be."

Most of the spectators watching Muke on his mini-TV agreed with Wang Shun. Many of them were mocking Bai Liu.

"Oh, Bai Liu is so far behind. Muke is going to clear the level and get the skill bonus. Bai Liu is just wasting time with these tricks."

They couldn't understand why Mu Sicheng was protecting a rookie who was destined to fail.

Some of the spectators, tired of the mockery, responded with frustration. One particularly bold player, unimpressed by the trash talk, retorted, "If you think people without skills are doomed, why don't you show us your skills? Or should I just kill you right now to make your dream of dying skill-less come true?"

The crowd of mockers fell silent. Several of the loudest voices shrank back, clearly reluctant to reveal their own lack of skill.

The tense silence was broken when Muke, nearing the sea floor, suddenly froze in place. Green eyes appeared all around him, at first just a few, then hundreds, glowing eerily in the dark waters.

Muke's vision adjusted, and he was horrified to see thousands of mermaid corpses staring at him from the sea floor. Their bloated, decayed bodies were being eaten by small fish, leaving only their glowing green eyes.

The sight was so disturbing that even the audience watching from Muke's mini-TV gasped and recoiled in shock.

Realizing the danger, Muke turned and swam frantically, pulling the Siren's skeleton away from the fish and mermaids, scrambling to open the shop and buy a prop to fend off the monsters. The fish, small but vicious, were already biting at him.

As he struggled to escape, blood stained the water, drawing more mermaids and fish to the scene.

The spectators, now fully engaged in the drama, urged Muke to buy the props, shouting in desperation, "Hurry, buy the props! Or you're going to die!"

Muke, with only one hand left, desperately tried to open the game shop to purchase an item that could keep the monsters at bay.

[I need a strong torch!]

[417 points. Thank you for your patronage.]

Muke, utterly dumbfounded, asked incredulously: [How many points?]

[417 points. Thank you for your patronage.]

Muke didn't have that many points. He was completely stunned, but quickly composed himself. It didn't have to be a torch to drive the fish back—the [Water Bubbles] also had that function.

However, with so many fish in the water, there was a good chance the [Water Bubbles] would be overwhelmed, but Muke had no choice but to take a gamble. He bit his tongue in frustration.

[I need bubbles in the water!]

[322 points. Thank you for your patronage.]

Muke's chest tightened. He was suffocating under the weight of his situation—he didn't have that many points!!!

The price of [Water Bubbles] had been reduced to 40 points before, but now it had been jacked up eight times! It felt like a complete robbery!

But there was no point arguing with the system. Muke frantically scanned his remaining props in panic and desperation. The Flaming Torch would work, but it couldn't ignite underwater. He had bought [Water Bubbles] twice before, but it was mostly used up during the [True Love's Boat] quest. He only had half an hour left.

Half an hour of [Water Bubbles] wouldn't be enough to get him through. He wouldn't even make it to the bottom of the sea in that time...

To make matters worse, his points were nearly exhausted from buying various props.

In his desperation, Muke suddenly remembered he could beg the audience for points. So, he began pleading for help, his voice pitiful, eyes filled with desperation.

As he ran, his cries echoed, but his tears dissolved into the sea, unseen by anyone.

The people who had once predicted a bright future for him, hoping to use him to stomp on Bai Liu, were now speechless.

Wang Shun could vaguely make out the situation on Muke's side. When he saw that Bai Liu had swum into the dark waters, he quickly opened his game manager and checked his point balance, visibly concerned.

He feared the same fate might befall Bai Liu. At least Wang Shun could help by contributing a few more points.

Mu Sicheng noticed Wang Shun's actions and spoke up, "Don't worry, this guy's got over 3,000 points. Even if the torches cost 400 points each, he can still buy ten."

Even so, Mu Sicheng couldn't resist checking his own points balance. After a quick glance, he relaxed, a small smile tugging at the corner of his mouth.

Bai Liu would have enough to make it through the game if he topped up his points.

Not just Wang Shun and Mu Sicheng, but many viewers watching Bai Liu's mini-TV also noticed the commotion on Muke's mini-TV. They immediately checked their own score wallets and murmured among themselves.

"Wait, if Bai Liu doesn't have enough points for props, I'll chip in ten points."

"I've got three or four points, that should be enough."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow, watching the viewers' reactions. Many of them seemed eager to donate points to Bai Liu, not wanting him to fail.

"This guy really has quite an audience," Mu Sicheng thought. "So many people are willing to spend their points on him."

It was a stark contrast to Mu Sicheng's own audience, who were divided—some adored him for his skills, while others despised him, calling him immoral.

Meanwhile, on the sea floor, Bai Liu soon noticed the eerie green glow beneath the water. Wang Shun held his breath, his anxiety mounting as he clenched his fists.

"Buy props, Bai Liu, buy props! We'll be too late if the monsters wake up down there!" Wang Shun urged.

Mu Sicheng, ever calm, responded, "Relax, he's not going to die anytime soon."

Despite his words, Mu Sicheng's eyes were locked on Bai Liu's mini-TV, his game manager in hand, ready to charge points if necessary.

The audience waited in suspense, many of them poised to hit the charging button at any moment.

But Bai Liu, unfazed by the monstrous schools of fish and mermaids, continued to swim downstream, provoking the creatures before darting away.

The audience gasped in shock, some screaming at the screen.

"Bai Liu, what are you doing?!" Wang Shun cried. "Why are you messing with the monsters?!"

The viewers were frantic, shouting in dismay.

"Get the props! Bai Liu!!!"

"Stop playing around! Come out and I'll play with you slowly!"

"We're almost there! Don't die now, Bai Liu!"

Wang Shun was on the edge of his seat, sweat dripping down his face, unable to blink as the mermaids and fish closed in on Bai Liu.

Even Mu Sicheng, usually composed, was frowning, his arms crossed, tapping his fingers in agitation.

"What the hell is Bai Liu doing?" he muttered.

Bai Liu glanced back casually, ensuring that most of the monsters were tailing him. He kicked his legs, making slow progress through the water as he tried to create some distance.

But the monsters quickly closed the gap. Their decaying faces and lifeless eyes sent chills through the water as they lunged toward him.

Bai Liu briefly considered the origins of these creatures. On land, they might have been something else entirely, but in the sea—where Siren's gift turned them into corpses—they had returned to their true forms. The only thing missing was the Siren King, which would turn them into real corpses upon its arrival.

As the mermaids attacked, Bai Liu awkwardly swerved to the side, but was still bitten on the palm. The blood quickly stained the water.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu has been attacked by a mermaid corpse, and his spirit value is dropping. Current value: 41.]

[System Warning: Only 21 minutes until the Siren King awakens. Hurry!]

Bai Liu's head spun, a sense of numbness spreading through his limbs. His movements grew clumsy, his legs tangling as he tried to swim.

Wang Shun, voice tight, observed, "With only 41 spirit, he's about to start hallucinating... and there's just 21 minutes before the Siren King wakes up."

Mu Sicheng, clearly frustrated, replied, "He could make it through, but..."

The spectators were in a frenzy, some of them practically screaming in panic.

As predicted, Bai Liu began to hallucinate. The monsters in front of him multiplied in his vision, each mermaid growing multiple heads. But Bai Liu simply shook his head and continued to avoid them.

Instead of diving straight toward the bottom, where he could escape, he swam in circles, confused and stumbling.

Bai Liu was attacked twice more—one mermaid took his foot, and another ripped at his injured palm. The pain caused him to curl up defensively, exposing his back to another monster.

The mermaid, grinning wickedly, swung its tail at him. The blow was so powerful that it created waves in the water, and though the sea softened the impact, the force was enough to break Bai Liu's spine.

Everyone instinctively closed their eyes, waiting for Bai Liu's death—when suddenly, a large plastic bubble appeared between him and the mermaid, bouncing the creature away. Bai Liu cowered behind the bubble, gasping for air.

Wang Shun exhaled in relief. "The water bubble! He bought one!"

The audience, though relieved, still looked uneasy. They knew something was bound to happen next.

"Bai Liu, give us a chance to live! Stop messing around and finish this!"

"Seriously, Bai Liu! I'm going to have a heart attack watching you!"

Mu Sicheng, still processing the situation, asked, "When did Bai Liu buy that bubble? Did he spend points on it?"

The bubble was an expensive item for mid-to-late stages, and Mu Sicheng hadn't seen Bai Liu buy it. If Bai Liu had hoarded it since the beginning, spending 70 points to keep it unused seemed risky.

Wang Shun, with a complicated expression, replied, "No, when Bai Liu bought it, the price was only 40 points."

"40 points?" Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. "The usual price is 70. How did he get it for 40?"

Wang Shun explained how Bai Liu had timed the purchase to take advantage of a price fluctuation, and Mu Sicheng was momentarily impressed by the newcomer's cleverness.

Early on, Bai Liu had anticipated that the prices of props would rise, so he stocked up on [Water Bubbles] when they were cheapest.

While Muke's [Water Bubbles] are now almost 400 points each, Bai Liu bought one for a fraction of the price—just a tenth of a point. As Muke gets caught in the system's trap, Bai Liu is already capitalizing on the system's price fluctuations to gain the upper hand.

The same viewer who previously criticized Bai Liu for hoarding props to save his life, and who claimed he knew nothing about the system shop, now watched in disbelief as Bai Liu's actions unfolded.

It was clear now that Bai Liu not only understood how the system shop worked but was using it to his advantage.

This viewer felt a pang of shame—how could people be so different from one another?

Mu Sicheng observed Bai Liu from the screen, who was hiding behind a bubble to catch his breath, and thought to himself, What a monster this newcomer is.

The last person Mu Sicheng saw daring enough to play with the system like this was Spades, the number one player in the rankings.

"I'm still curious, though," Mu Sicheng mused, tapping his chin thoughtfully as he watched Bai Liu. "How did he know that this [Water Bubble] would work for sure?"

"There are two possible endings to this part of Siren Town," Mu Sicheng continued, "The first is the NORMAL ending, where you just need to run out of Siren Town to clear the level. The later stages are all land-based chases, with no need for water bubbles. That's the route most players will take."

Mu Sicheng went on, "Only the TRUE ending requires going to sea, but that's essentially an additional side quest to return Siren King. The point reward isn't much higher than the normal ending, and the risk is considerably greater. No sane person would choose that path."

Wang Shun looked puzzled. "But Bai Liu is new. He might not know that, right?"

"I think he could have guessed," Mu Sicheng replied, shaking his head. "Bai Liu must have realized that the game allocates points based on the mission type. In terms of risk-reward, the normal ending offers much higher points than the true ending."

Wang Shun glanced at Mu Sicheng twice, then asked, "So, God Mu, why are you playing the true ending?"

Mu Sicheng fell silent for a moment before responding, "High risk does come with high rewards. The true ending may not offer many points, but the reward is something much more valuable than simple points—something worth the high stakes."

"What's that?" Wang Shun asked, intrigued.

Mu Sicheng gave him a knowing glance. "The reward after completing the monster book. The only way to get that is by taking the TRUE END route and setting the monster book. But Bai Liu won't be able to do that."

"Why not...?" Wang Shun began to protest, but then his eyes widened in realization. "Wait! The Siren King in Bai Liu's monster book is a god-tier NPC!"

Mu Sicheng's eyes darkened as he reflected. "I'm considering the worst-case scenario... Bai Liu probably doesn't know how dangerous the Siren King is, but I have a feeling he's prepared to collect the monster book. He's likely stalling for time, waiting for the Siren King to wake up. That's why he's not rushing to clear the level..."

Wang Shun, stunned, stared at the screen in disbelief. "No way..."

On the mini TV, Bai Liu continued to hide behind the bubble, playing a tense game of hide-and-seek with the mermaids and fish.

The crowd was growing increasingly anxious. Bai Liu always seemed to play his own game, driving everyone else into a frenzy.

"This bubble has very low defense," one viewer noted, "If these mermaids keep attacking, it won't be long before it breaks, and the prop will be wasted!"

Bai Liu glanced at the spot on the water bubble behind him where a crack had formed from the constant mermaid attacks. But the water didn't penetrate; only the mermaid's hand could reach into the bubble. Bai Liu finally smiled in relief, while the viewers watching from their screens were beside themselves, screaming in anxiety.

Meanwhile, Muke had also taken refuge in a bubble, stalling for time across the sea.

Those who had previously left Bai Liu to support Muke now returned, bored and eager to see Bai Liu's near-death struggle. They whispered amongst themselves, avoiding Mu Sicheng in the center.

"Why did they give Bai Liu and Muke so many points?" one viewer muttered, "It's so frustrating to watch—no vision at all. They might as well give the points to me. At least I won't be stuck in Siren Town."

"I was so close to getting that promotion spot," another complained. "Then these two new players came in and stole it from me. Hurry up and die, Bai Liu. Once you're gone, I can get the spot."

Bai Liu, oblivious to the frustration of the outside world, was now down to 40 mental points, dangerously close to the second mental hazard threshold.

Crossing this hurdle, he began to hallucinate. His vision blurred, and his focus shifted entirely to the bubble behind him.

A mermaid had already snuck in through the crack in the bubble. Bai Liu let go of the bubble, turned, and locked eyes with the decaying-faced mermaid inside. He sank slowly into the sea.

Bai Liu had become the bait, drawing the mermaids into his trap. The viewers, sensing something big was about to happen, watched in confusion.

"What can he possibly do now? The bubble's broken—there's no outer defense left, only the inner barrier, which just keeps the air inside. He doesn't have any props left, does he?"

The bubble was like an embryo, encapsulating the twisting, struggling mermaids. Bai Liu closed his eyes, leaned back, and took a long breath. A stream of bubbles rose from his gills. He released his hand, which had grown a fleshy membrane, and the bubbles floated before him.

Bai Liu then addressed the system: [Take out a bottle of alcohol.]

A bottle of clear alcohol appeared inside the bubble. Bai Liu kicked it away.

The alcohol slowly filled from the bottom. Bai Liu reached in, lit a lighter, and tossed it into the bubble with a nonchalant expression. He withdrew his hand just before the mermaid could touch it, and a ball of fire erupted in the deepest part of the sea.

The hissing of the mermaids and the dancing flames of the fire illuminated Bai Liu's face, casting strange shadows.

It was at this moment that the audience realized: Bai Liu was actually smiling.

His subtle smile, illuminated by the firelight and the shimmering green of the fish scales on his face, made him appear almost inhuman —a monster subdued deep in the sea, even more so than the mermaids burning in the bubbles.

The mermaid, engulfed in flames, slammed its palms desperately against the transparent bubble, leaving behind blue-green blood and grimy handprints on the walls. Smoke swirled in dizzying waves inside the bubble, quickly obscuring the mermaid's face as it twisted in pain, its features growing uglier and more monstrous with each struggling motion.

Bai Liu floated motionlessly in the water, watching the mermaids that had attacked him burn away effortlessly in the flames. His smile, distant and detached, carried a hint of cruelty that was more unnerving than any monster's grin—it was both chilling and powerful.

After using the burning bubble to dispatch a wave of attacking mermaids, Bai Liu dragged the bubble around, now repurposed as a "Flaming Torch in Water." Not only did it offer defense, but the small opening caused by the bubble's rupture served as a trap to swallow mermaid attacks, turning the bubble into both an offensive and defensive tool.

The rich, oily essence spilling from the burning mermaids fed the fire, causing it to grow more intense. The flames surged as they consumed the monsters at the bottom of the sea, and the strange, almost surreal sight unfolded: the mermaids, driven by pure instinct, burrowed into Bai Liu's bubble one after another to feed.

Bai Liu stood guard, calm as ever, watching the mermaids line up to destroy themselves in the water bubbles. He lounged at ease while the monsters perished around him.

The audience, dumbfounded, could only stare. Many were at a loss for words, unable to comprehend this unconventional, almost glitch-like method of breaking the game.

Even Mu Sicheng, accustomed to seeing strange strategies, couldn't help but sigh. Pulling his hat lower to cover his face, he muttered, "Bai Liu, that's too much. It makes me look ridiculous with my own attempts, running around like a headless chicken."

"I'm convinced," Wang Shun admitted in awe.

"Flame-based props are effective against mermaids, but they can't be used at the bottom of the sea, where there are no burning conditions —just like Muke's fiery torches couldn't be used earlier," Mu Sicheng explained. "But combined with the water bubbles, these props work."

"Exactly," Wang Shun added. "But only if the person inside the bubble lets it break a hole, losing the barrier function against the outside monsters."

"This is essentially sacrificing a defensive prop to turn it into an offensive one," Mu Sicheng continued. "Bai Liu used the broken gap to trap the mermaids and burn them to death—very bold, yet ingenious."

Wang Shun marveled, "How did he come up with that? I feel like I've been playing the game with my brain switched off compared to him."

Mu Sicheng shook his head, "I don't think it's about being clever—it's about his psychological strength."

Bai Liu had the new [water bubble] in his possession, which could have provided a safer route through the game. But instead of relying on its protective qualities, he deliberately broke the bubble's barrier and used himself as bait to lure mermaids in, burning them alive. His calm indifference toward his own survival was both extreme and crazy.

The audience, who had once urged Bai Liu to hide in the bubble, now felt embarrassed.

"Bai Liu bought alcohol so early in preparation for this—before, people mocked him for buying too much, but now we see who was stupid. I mean, I'm talking about myself."

"I counted nine bottles just right, and Bai Liu bought them at the cheapest possible time. His planning is flawless, everything connected perfectly. I'm in awe."

"...Bai Liu just cleared all the monsters in 'Siren Town,' right? I've never seen someone clear an entire map like this."

The players who had previously ridiculed Bai Liu were now silent, their faces flushed with shame.

On the small TV, Bai Liu dragged a burning “mermaid ball” in his left hand, clearing most of the mermaids from the sea floor, leaving only a few scattered ones who kept their distance.

But at that moment, the eyelids of Siren King, held in Bai Liu’s right hand, fluttered. The tail stirred slightly, and Bai Liu’s mind jolted.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu has been affected by Siren King's awakening. His mental value has dropped to 21, below the safety threshold of 40. He is about to experience intense hallucinations.]

Bai Liu felt his brain buzzing. The drop from 41 to 21 mental value felt like the aftermath of consuming toxic mushrooms—colors fragmented before his eyes, kaleidoscopic shards of light swirling.

It was as if he had stepped into an underground disco from the ‘70s or ‘80s, his head splitting and his limbs out of control. His retina refracted a thousand different colored halos, within which the faces of the mermaids and other people from his life crawled, including his boss and colleagues, all merging with the mermaids’ monstrous forms.

They grinned at him and lunged.

Bai Liu saw Siren King’s eyes slowly open, locking with his. Lucy’s hand reached into Bai Liu’s chest.

Blood dripped slowly, mixing with the water as Lucy devoured Bai Liu’s heart. She smiled in grotesque satisfaction, her mouth frothing with blood and flesh. She leaned in, about to kiss Bai Liu’s cheek.

The sharp, stinging pain in Bai Liu’s shoulder blade cleared his mind slightly.

It seems to be true, he thought absently.

Wang Shun, seeing Bai Liu floating in the sea with glazed eyes, weak limbs, said urgently, “No! Bai Liu’s entering the hallucination phase!”

Soon, something bit Bai Liu’s shoulder. His lack of response, except for a slight twitch of his shoulder, confirmed Wang Shun’s fears.

Wang Shun, desperate, shouted at the screen, “Buy spirit-restoring props! Bai Liu, restore your mental value!”

“No,” Mu Sicheng shook his head, cutting him off. “If his mental value drifts up to 60, Bai Liu will break out of his mermaid alienation state.”

“He’s still in deep water, and if he becomes ‘normal,’ he’ll drown instantly. The pressure difference could tear him apart.”

Wang Shun looked at Bai Liu, floating lifelessly in the water, his worry growing. “What do we do? If his mental value keeps dropping, he’ll turn into a monster!”

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath. “It’s up to Bai Liu himself now. He needs to stay conscious through these hallucinations.”

Bai Liu couldn’t distinguish between hallucination and reality, but he wasn’t unresponsive. He couldn’t tell where he was heading, but he knew he was sinking deeper into the sea. So he took the simplest approach—relaxing his body and letting himself sink.

He was a fish now, not a man, and with Siren King in hand, he could afford to sink. As for the mermaids attacking him during his descent…

Bai Liu closed his eyes and stretched his body fully. The coin on his shirt collar floated strangely, revealing that it wasn’t a real coin. The mermaids swam around him, ready to devour him.

The small town of siren

While the aroma of bubbling mermaid flesh in the water draws most of the mermaids and schools, a few are more intrigued by Bai Liu's raw flesh. They eagerly sink their teeth into his arms and ankles, leaving grotesque, circular bite marks.

Wang Shun stopped breathing as he watched, exclaiming, "Spirituality is dropping by 20!"

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's Mental Value is 17, below 20. The player is now in the (Berserk) state, and their attributes are about to increase…]

The moment the system notification sounded, Bai Liu's mouth curled into a smile. His attributes, which had always been low, surged upward:

[Player Name: Bai Liu (Berserk Attribute Bonus Panel)]

[Strength: 7 → 151]

[Agility: 3 → 149]

[Attack: 6 → 167]

[Resistance: 2 → 166]

[Combined Defense and Attack Power increased. Total attribute points exceed 500. Player Bai Liu's rank increased from F(?) to C. He can now resist mermaid sailors, wax figures, and larvae.]

Wang Shun stood frozen, before realizing, "Ah, right! When the spirit value drops below 20, players enter the Berserk state, boosting their attributes."

"Once the spirit value falls further, the panel attributes rise even more, up to the player's potential limit," Wang Shun continued, now optimistic. "This is good for Bai Liu. At least he can fight back against the mermaids!"

"Not necessarily," Mu Sicheng disagreed solemnly, his tone darkening. "While his attributes are rising, which is beneficial, most players lose their sanity in this state. The lower their mental value, the more monstrous they become, attacking indiscriminately. Their mental value drops faster with each attack until it reaches zero."

Bai Liu's eyes slowly opened on the small TV, his hands now sporting sharp claws, and his lower limbs undulated like fish tails. His eyes were no longer black but cracked, grayish veins stretching across the whites. His mouth was distorted into jagged, sharp teeth.

He struck a mermaid, slicing her in two with his claws. She sank to the depths, her gills flapping in agony, while Bai Liu watched coldly, unrecognizable from any other fish monster—if not for the Siren King in his hand.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's mental value continues to drop, now at 15. Berserk state is intensifying…]

[Player Name: Bai Liu (Berserk Attribute Bonus Panel)]

[Strength: 151 → 351]

[Agility: 149 → 249]

[Attack: 167 → 667]

[Resistance: 166 → 966]

[Combined Defense and Attack Power rising, panel attributes exceed 2000, rated as B player. Player Bai Liu's rank increased from C to B.]

Wang Shun was stunned. "Bai Liu's attributes are increasing too fast! He's already B rank! What potential!"

But then concern crept in. "But his mental value is still dropping. If it falls below 10, it's over."

No sooner had Wang Shun spoken than Bai Liu's small TV blared with an urgent alarm.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's mental value continues to drop, now at 9. Berserk state escalating…]

[System Warning: Siren King will awaken in 3 minutes. Complete the level quickly!]

"Only three minutes left! And his mental value is at 9!!!" Wang Shun's heart raced, gripped by the situation's urgency. He couldn't tear his eyes away from Bai Liu, emotionless and holding Siren King's hand as the mermaids scattered. Siren King's tail and eyes were starting to stir, but Bai Liu remained unmoved.

"Hang on, Bai Liu!" Wang Shun whispered, clenching his hands in anxiety.

Mu Sicheng, now an A-rank player, was also tense. "Three minutes to send Siren King back to the depths should be enough to clear the level. But I'm not sure how much of Bai Liu's sanity remains under the influence of these hallucinations and his Berserk state."

The rest of the audience was equally rattled by Bai Liu's near-manic gameplay, unsure whether he would survive the level. Even the spectators who had mocked him now watched in awe.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's mental value continues to drop, now at 8. Berserk state intensifying…]

[Player Name: Bai Liu (Berserk Attribute Bonus Panel)]

[Strength: 351 → 655]

[Agility: 249 → 733]

[Attack: 367 → 1555]

[Resistance: 366 → 1776]

[Combined Defense and Attack Power rising, total attributes exceed 4000, rated as A player. Player Bai Liu's rank increased from B to A.]

Bai Liu's face was now covered in fish scales, his eyes glowing faintly in the water, every scale radiating danger. As he dragged Siren King downward, Siren King's fins began to flutter, maintaining their own balance.

The moment Siren King spread his fins, all the surrounding mermaids fled, shrieking in terror. The eerie beauty of Siren King's face reflected on the small TV, silencing the room. It was as if the beauty of the creature itself held a deadly allure.

Bai Liu, now fully armored in scales, and Siren King, holding hands, seemed like two mythical figures, moving gracefully in the depths of the ocean.

But this fragile harmony would soon be shattered when Siren King awoke.

"He's risen to A-rank," Wang Shun murmured, torn between awe and worry. "I knew it, Bai Liu has potential, he can really do a lot in Berserk state."

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes. "Wait—Bai Liu knows that by lowering his mental value, he can enter Berserk state. And the system warns players when they're about to enter it…"

Mu Sicheng's eyes flicked to Bai Liu, sinking in the water. "Bai Liu is deliberately letting his mental value drop, forcing himself into Berserk state to enhance his attributes. He's using the mermaids to attack him, to drop his spirit and trigger the Berserk state, preparing himself to withstand Siren King's attack."

Wang Shun froze. "But why would he do that? Bai Liu could easily pass without triggering Berserk state."

Mu Sicheng continued, his voice low with realization. "He's not just fighting the mermaids. He's trying to clear the level while simultaneously preparing himself for Siren King's attack. Bai Liu is aiming for the Siren Town Monster Book. He needs to survive an attack from Siren King to complete it."

Wang Shun's jaw dropped. "You mean Bai Liu wants to take a hit from a god-tier NPC? He'd need S-rank attributes to survive that!"

Mu Sicheng's gaze was contemplative. "Exactly. Bai Liu believes there's a perfect solution to this, a way to pass the level and still survive. He's pushing himself to his limits, even if it means risking his life."

Bai Liu's eyes flickered between illusion and reality as he sank deeper into the ocean. Despite the painful hallucinations, he kept calm, trusting in his strategy.

[System Warning: One minute to go until Siren King awakens… 59…58…57…]

Wang Shun, heart pounding, was transfixed. "One minute left…"

The countdown to Siren King's awakening began, and Bai Liu held his breath.

As Siren King's eyes finally opened, Bai Liu released his grip, knowing the time had come.

The water stilled as Siren King hovered in the depths, his eyes gleaming white, his face the epitome of divine beauty. It was a sight that mesmerized everyone, yet also heralded Bai Liu's fate.

[System Warning: Siren King has awakened! Stay away from the small TV! Prolonged exposure risks mental contamination from this god-tier NPC!]

Mu Sicheng observed keenly as viewers began to succumb to the enchantment, their mental values plummeting as they moved closer to the screen.

Wang Shun, dazed, muttered, "So beautiful... don't hurt him."

The system warned of contamination spreading as the image of Siren King blurred, signaling the end of Bai Liu's intense trial.

Mu Sicheng chewed thoughtfully on a lollipop, his eyes narrowing. "God-tier NPCs aren't just powerful—they can warp reality itself. Bai Liu's plan is nothing short of madness."

And yet, in this madness, Bai Liu might just achieve the impossible.

Chapter Notes

Bai Liu and Siren King's heads were enveloped in a ball of fire, burning like the sun sinking into the sea. Beneath them lay countless sunken bodies and shipwrecks, while the sea itself was a floating mass of black debris, silently drifting between them. The scene appeared calm, but the constant sound of system alarms reminded everyone that this stillness was deceptive.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu’s spirit level continues to drop, currently at 6…]
[System Warning: Player Bai Liu’s spirit level continues to drop, currently at 5…]

Bai Liu’s entire face was covered in thick scales, his hands now tough like reptilian claws. His second knuckle curled as his lower limbs elongated, transforming into a fish tail, making him resemble a monster rather than a player.

Wang Shun’s heart pounded in his chest: "Spirituality down to 5…"

"Bai Liu, do you even remember that you're a player and not a monster?" Mu Sicheng muttered to himself, watching Bai Liu’s grotesque face on the small TV.

Siren King’s tail swayed gently as he approached Bai Liu, swimming unpredictably.

On the small TV, Siren King flickered for a moment, then reappeared on Bai Liu’s cheek. The audience gasped, but quickly stifled their shock with their hands.

Siren King, pale with long hair cascading over his high nose, reached out and gently tapped his index finger against Bai Liu’s brow. His lips moved, but no sound escaped; only Bai Liu seemed to understand the words.

"You’ve brought me to the deep," Siren King spoke, his voice low. "What is your wish? Speak, and I will grant it."

Bai Liu’s pupils constricted, the weight of the pressure almost crushing him. As Siren King neared, it felt as though his mind was being churned like in a blender, his body pressed by an invisible force.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's spirit level continues to drop, currently at 1…]

Wang Shun nearly tore at his hands in panic: "One more… only one left! Come on, come on!"

Mu Sicheng didn't speak, but his breathing slowed as he focused intently on the small TV.

The audience seemed to hold their collective breath, some muttering in unison:
"I need oxygen!"
"How many players have I seen who, even in life-or-death situations, still think they can pull off a miracle? My heart is racing…"

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's spirit level continues to drop, currently at 1 (Berserk). Limit reached…]

[Player Name: Bai Liu (Berserk Attribute Bonus Panel)]

[Stamina: 655→955]
[Agility: 733→1033]
[Attack: 555→955]
[Resistance: 776→1209]
[Combined Defense and Attack Power increase. Total attribute points exceed 4000, classified as Super A level player. Bai Liu's level rises from A to Super A.]

Wang Shun slapped his thigh in frustration, "The panel's only Super A at its peak! That's far from an S—S requires over 10,000 points!"

"Six thousand short of being able to withstand a god-ranked NPC's attack," Mu Sicheng remarked, his voice tinged with regret as he watched Bai Liu on the small TV. "Interesting player... too bad this is his last game."

Bai Liu's mouth and eyes bled, but he wiped it away, smiling as he faced Siren King. "My wish is simple. Attack me. Right now."

The Siren King paused, his silver eyes narrowing as he gazed at Bai Liu. "You want me to attack you? You might die."

"Who knows? Maybe not." Bai Liu's smile widened as his scales bled and quivered. He was almost entirely like a mermaid now, yet his defiance remained.

Though Bai Liu felt an overwhelming fear of Siren King, it didn't show. His expression was a mix of fear and biting determination. His right side showed controlled terror, tears flowing from his eyes as his lips pressed into a tight line. On the left side, however, his smile was easy and unconcerned, eyes indifferent, corners of his mouth curving up.

Bai Liu inched closer to Siren King, now almost nose-to-nose. He lowered his gaze, as if whispering a joke. "What if you can't kill me, but I can get something out of you instead? Like a reward... or points."

Siren King's pupils fixed on Bai Liu for a long moment before he finally spoke. "Mad traveler, as you wish. I'll attack. But if you survive, I owe you a wish. You can call on me anytime, as long as you hold a part of my body and speak my true name—Tawil."

"Thanks a lot," Bai Liu said, raising an eyebrow.

Siren King circled Bai Liu, his tail curling and flicking before delivering a powerful blow to Bai Liu's waist.

Bai Liu was sent crashing into the sea floor like a torpedo. The force of the impact sent a tremor through the small TV, and the fish scattered, staying clear of Siren King's presence.

Siren King's long hair swirled as he hovered above, his face untouched by human emotion. In the apocalyptic sea, he looked like a god.

The viewers, too stunned to watch further, closed their eyes. One whispered: "Is he dead?"

Wang Shun sighed in resignation, "With only 1 spirit left, even if he survived the attack, his spirit would be gone. He should be dead."

Mu Sicheng stood with his hands in his pockets, eyes narrowing as he watched the screen, his expression unreadable. "He's quite the interesting player. It's a shame this is his last game."

Just as many were about to give up, the small TV emitted a faint, glitchy warning beep, as if the signal was failing. After a brief moment of snow, the screen cleared. All eyes were drawn back.

--The TV hadn't shut off. That could only mean one thing: Bai Liu was still alive.

Wang Shun stared, eyes wide with disbelief. He was speechless. "Still alive... at 0.1 spirit? How…?"

Mu Sicheng stepped forward, squinting at the dust and trying to locate Bai Liu.

Siren King seemed to sense Bai Liu's continued existence. He slowly sank, sweeping his tail through the mud.

Bai Liu's limbs were twisted and buried in the seabed. His battered tail was half gone, his body covered in blood, but shockingly, he was laughing. His blood spilled as he grinned with a twisted joy.

Upon seeing Siren King, who had nearly crushed him with a tail strike, Bai Liu mustered the strength to raise his broken right hand in a languid wave. "Yo, Siren King."

Wang Shun, both amused and incredulous, burst into tears. "This guy doesn't feel pain? Greeting the monster with a broken hand, like it's nothing—this game's sensory experience is 100%!"

"Madman," Mu Sicheng chuckled, folding his arms.

Of course, Bai Liu was in agony, every part of him hurting. But he remained unfazed by the physical pain, as if it was irrelevant to the peace he felt mentally. His emotions were disconnected, like paint in separate compartments that didn't mix.

Siren King's face remained expressionless. "You're still alive."

"Yes," Bai Liu smiled, blood dribbling from his lips. "I told you, if you couldn't kill me, maybe I'd get something out of you."

Siren King lowered himself to look directly at Bai Liu, his pale lashes dropping. "What do you want from me?"

Bai Liu, in his dazed state, gazed at Siren King's delicate face up close and felt an impulsive urge to tease him.

He chuckled softly, his broken hand brushing Siren King's long hair before pressing it to his bleeding lips with a teasing kiss. "A kiss, perhaps? You're so beautiful, I couldn't have modeled it myself."

Siren King lowered his eyes and murmured, "Good."

Bai Liu blinked in confusion, wondering what he meant. Then, as Siren King's eyelids fluttered shut, he leaned in for the kiss.

"Good." Siren King closed his eyes, and without hesitation, he kissed down.

Bai Liu was momentarily stunned. He had only been joking, like a player who enjoys teasing the final boss during a level. Bai Liu hadn't expected this boss to be so cooperative. Siren King's lips were soft and cold, with a faint taste of vine. The sensation was immediate.

Siren King leaned against Bai Liu, his expression a mix of wonder and confusion. "You're hot."

"Of course," Bai Liu said, a little amused. "I'm a thermostat. See you next time, Tawil."

Bai Liu gave Siren King a gentle hug, patting him on the back as if he were a child. A boss.

Bai Liu had a soft spot for the final bosses in these games. They were usually the hardest to design and tended to be the most intricately crafted characters. He had rarely seen a boss as well-designed and beautiful as Siren King.

He couldn't help but exclaim, "Tawil, I like you a lot. The design, I mean."

But before Bai Liu could finish his sentence, before Siren King had a chance to respond, Bai Liu's body dissolved into a glowing light in the deepest darkness of the sea. It spilled from Siren King's fingertips and slowly ascended like a star through the black waters, eventually reaching a golden surface tinted by the rising sun.

Siren King watched the trail of light until it disappeared into the sea. He lay there for a long time, his hands folded, eyes closed, before drifting into a deep sleep. "See you next time, Bai Liu," he murmured softly.

[System: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for sending Siren King back to the bottom of the sea. "Siren Town" has been cleared.]

[System: Player has reached the true ending of Siren - "Back to the Peaceful Old Town."]

As the mermaid returned to the depths, the townspeople of Siren returned to normal. The statues were destroyed, and the ghosts of the dead lay dormant on the sea floor. No one knew about the taboo that could awaken the dead beneath the sea. Perhaps one day, greedy humans would touch that forbidden power, but for now, it remained untouched.

[System: Player Bai Liu - "Siren Town Monster Book - Siren King" page has been collected.]

[System: Congratulations to all players for collecting the full Siren Small Town Monster Book!]

There was silence in front of Bai Liu's small TV for a few minutes. Everyone had their heads bowed, and the only sound was the continuous drip of recharging points. Finally, someone couldn’t hold it in and cried out in excitement.

"Number One!!! Bai Liu has become the overall number one in Siren Village!!! We've powered him up to number one! We beat God Mu’s record!"

"I can’t believe it! I can’t believe we actually beat a god-tier NPC!!! This new player is amazing!"

"Damn, Bai Liu, that last 0.1 spirit point, I’m on my knees! That was insane!"

"Wasn't it said that it couldn’t be measured? But resisting a god-tier NPC? Bai Liu must have S-tier potential!"

"I feel like I’m witnessing history. Bai Liu is the second player whose data the system can't directly determine, after the god-level NPC!"

The crowd burst into tears and laughter, hugging each other in celebration. Even Wang Shun and Mu Sicheng exchanged high-fives and smiles. Only one player, who had been critical earlier, now wore a hard-to-hide grimace.

"Che, what's the big deal? It's just a single-player game," the player sneered.

"Let's see how long this lasts. He's just a newbie, passed his first game, and now acting like he's something special," they mocked.

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes, his hand slowly pulling his hat back over his head. The red light in his eyes flickered, and the monkey on his hat grinned menacingly.

Though Mu Sicheng typically didn't engage with new players, he had just enjoyed the show and was now annoyed by the taunts.

He glanced at the smug audience and was about to confront them, but Wang Shun quickly intervened.

"They're from the King's Guild," Wang Shun warned.

"Oh, the King's Guild?" Mu Sicheng scoffed. "A guild full of arrogant players who think they're something when they're not."

Wang Shun coughed awkwardly. "God Mu, I'm actually part of the King's Guild too..."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

"Look, God Mu, I know we've got some idiots in our guild, but just be careful. The president of the King's Guild is—"

Mu Sicheng interrupted, "I know, the president is Queen Hearts, right? She's the second-highest ranked player. She's ruthless. Best not to mess with anyone under her."

"Still, it's frustrating hearing these newbies judge Bai Liu like this..." Mu Sicheng grumbled, cracking a lollipop between his tiger-like teeth. "It reminds me of when I was a rookie."

Wang Shun sighed. "It's tough for newcomers. Especially for players like you who are loners. Big guilds can be a pain."

Many players in the game formed guilds to help each other, increasing their survival chances. Mu Sicheng had been approached by the King's Guild as a newcomer but had refused their offer. Since then, he'd been at odds with the guild.

Wang Shun knew that the lower-tier players in such large guilds often felt threatened by strong newcomers. If a new player rose through the ranks, they would quickly outpace the rest, leaving the lower-ranked members with fewer opportunities. Some of the more extreme players might even try to sabotage these newcomers to keep them down.

As Wang Shun observed the King's Guild members' sour expressions, he couldn't help but feel a little smug. Bai Liu had surpassed all of their expectations.

One of the players scoffed, "What's the big deal? He's not even close to the gods of the core promotion. Why are you all acting like he's something special?"

[24,000 people liked Bai Liu's TV, 26,700 favorited it, 7,190 recharged it, and player Bai Liu earned 10,200 points.]

[Player Bai Liu received 20,000 likes in one minute and 6,000 recharge points! Fame is rising fast! The audience can't get enough of him!]

[Congratulations to player Bai Liu for securing a spot in the central screen promotion, with views increasing rapidly...]

Wang Shun was in shock. "Core promotion?! Bai Liu made it to the core promotion?!"

Mu Sicheng glanced at Bai Liu's small TV, his eyes glinting with amusement. "I should've known not to waste so much on this promotion," he muttered.

The King's Guild members had seen Bai Liu's rapid rise and were in complete disbelief.

"Core promotion?! How can a newbie make it there on his first game?!" they gasped.

The system's response was blunt: [Player Bai Liu is ranked in the top 500 overall and eligible for the promotion.]

"Top 500?! That high?!" they exclaimed. "How is that possible for a first-time player?!"

The system was silent: [Bai Liu's TV composite is currently ranked 497th in the game.]

The King's Guild members were left stunned. Bai Liu was more powerful than they had imagined. His success was undeniable.

They could already imagine a future where Bai Liu would be pursued by major guilds, eventually surpassing them entirely.

If Bai Liu joined the King's Guild, he would become their top player, and they would be at his mercy...

The rest of the audience, meanwhile, continued to cheer for Bai Liu's promotion, eager to see the spectacle unfold.

Central hall, central screen, core promotional bit area.

The area was clearly more lavishly decorated than the fringe hall of the central zone, which had a gold theme, adorned with small TVs framed in gold and posters of prominent players. Players exchanged quiet, polite words as they interacted in the hall.

When Mu Sicheng looked up, he noticed Bai Liu on a small TV mounted on the opposite wall.

Bai Liu's presence was hard to ignore, especially since he was in the core promotion spot. He stood out because, unlike the other players in this spot, who charged for their broadcasts, Bai Liu's was the only one without a fee. As the King's Guild players had mentioned earlier, most of the top-tier players in this space had small TVs with a charge to watch, and only the highlights of their gameplay were available for free, captured by the system. Anyone who didn't pay had to settle for those highlights on nearby TVs.

Though Bai Liu's small TV was free to view, it hadn't yet drawn much of an audience. Compared to the glitzy atmosphere of the core area, the presence of Bai Liu's free broadcast felt somewhat out of place. The crowd was mostly interested in the premium content, which was considered more prestigious. Since players who suddenly reached such high spots were often considered fleeting, the crowd paid little attention.

But soon, the attention of the audience shifted toward Bai Liu's TV because of a system notification that kept interrupting the broadcast.

The first arc is now finished!!

Lobby

After a long list of awards and titles, the system politely bids farewell before Bai Liu's TV shuts off with a crisp "pop."

By then, a sizable audience has gathered in front of the screen, their awe turning into an animated discussion.

"A newcomer?! A pure newbie?! My whole neighborhood is shocked—since when were newbies this good? The pass reward broadcast lasted ten minutes!"

"Forget that! Did you see he collected the entire Monster Book? Even top-tier players struggle to do that before reaching the True End!"

"I already bought his video. It’s bound to be a masterpiece."

"Same! I was floored. That insane reward list? Over 10,000 recharge points? How the hell did he pull that off?"

"But what I really want to know is how he racked up a thousand stomps. His numbers are crazy—why was everyone stomping on him?"

Bai Liu's Siren Town gameplay video skyrockets in popularity, selling hundreds of copies in mere moments.

This is why everyone wants to enter the Core Zone. The audience here is not only generous but also rational. Whether it’s through recharge rewards or simply paying to watch a player’s performance, most are willing to spend a few dozen points to satisfy their curiosity. Is Bai Liu a rising star or a potential new demon?

Some quick-witted players calculate that the minimum guaranteed earnings for a Core promotion are in the thousands.

Wang Shun, still staring at Bai Liu’s now-blackened screen, sighs in reluctance.

"God Mu, when do you think Bai Liu will enter the game again? Do you think he’ll go solo? I kind of want to camp at his little TV."

"How would I know?" Mu Sicheng lazily narrows his eyes. "Bai Liu should be logging out of the newbie zone by now. If you’re that desperate, go find him yourself. Ask him directly. His mental state is probably still shot, so he might not be thinking clearly. If you strike a good deal now, maybe he'll take you along in the future."

"God Mu, you really... " Wang Shun looks at him with a complicated expression. "That's so shameless."

"So? You going or not?" Mu Sicheng is unfazed by the accusation. He shrugs, a mischievous smile curling his lips—though the effect is slightly ruined by the lollipop puffing out one cheek. "I'm curious about his [Newbie Skill]."

"The first player in a batch of newcomers always gets one, right? But the system hides it. They say the skill reflects the player's deepest desires." He tilts his head thoughtfully. "I wonder what someone like Bai Liu truly wants."

Wang Shun is intrigued as well but hesitates. "But people usually keep their skills a secret. Bai Liu won't just tell us."

Mu Sicheng smirks. "Bai Liu's mental value is at 0.1. Do you think that's normal? The fact that he's not a gibbering mess is a miracle. Right now, he's probably so out of it that he can't even stand properly. If we pretend to be system staff, we could get him to spill everything."

Wang Shun: "..."

Mu Sicheng, you criminal.

Bai Liu emerges from the game drenched, water dripping from his hair and clothes. He's soaked to the bone. His vision is hazy, like looking through frosted glass, and the world around him spins unsteadily.

He tries to stand up a few times, but his legs give out. Eventually, he gives up and slumps back down.

"I'm really weak," Bai Liu mutters to himself.

Taking a moment to rest, he begins sorting through the rewards and items he's obtained. With each new discovery, he lets out a quiet tsk.

He had been right—the Monster Book's rewards were the biggest.

Not in terms of sheer power, though. Items like [Sea Sneak] and [Sculpted Shell] simply increase attribute stats. As a game designer, Bai Liu finds these types of items rather ordinary.

But to him, they're still the most valuable rewards.

Why? Because they aren't sold in the game shop.

Bai Liu checks the shop multiple times but finds nothing that corresponds to his Monster Book rewards.

This means that [Monster Book] drops are [non-marketable] and classified as [limited items]. Players cannot buy them with points; they can only be obtained in two ways:

As drops upon completing a game.
Through player-to-player trades outside the system.
But since completing Monster Books is notoriously difficult, few players manage to obtain these items naturally. This makes them highly sought after in the trading market.

Which means... Bai Liu could sell his for an obscene price.

However, he won't. Not yet. He still needs to build his own foundation first. Bai Liu makes up his mind—he won't sell Monster Book items easily.

Among his newfound treasures, one item stands out: [The Siren's Amulet], a literal life-saving artifact.

Then there's [Siren's Reverse Scale], which comes with an enigmatic [Effectiveness Unknown] tag, and [Siren's Fish Bone], which vaguely claims to "tear through space and time" but offers no concrete explanation. The system doesn't even rate these two items—it simply labels them as [Unknown].

Curious, Bai Liu clicks on the [Unknown] tag, but all he gets is a message:

[System: Unable to evaluate.]

"The system can't evaluate them?" Bai Liu muses, raising an eyebrow. "Useless."

What he doesn't realize is that both items come from a god-level NPC, and to the system, god-level NPCs are nothing more than an unquantifiable mess of bugged data. Attempting to analyze a piece of bone and a scale from a walking anomaly is practically impossible.

Bai Liu moves on, scrolling through his interface, when something catches his eye.

A [Personal Skill Reward] notification—[Unlocked].

Intrigued, Bai Liu clicks it twice.

The interface fades. A prompt appears:

[Please close your eyes and imagine what you desire most.]

Bai Liu clasps his hands together and chants internally, "Money, money, money."

[Players may now open their eyes.]

Floating in front of him is... a tattered, well-worn leather wallet. The edges are frayed, the material scuffed beyond repair, and some areas are peeling enough to reveal the inner lining.

That's his skill?

[Player Bai Liu Skill: An Old Wallet with Nothing in It (Well-used but never discarded, proof of just how little money its owner has.)]

[Player Bai Liu Skill: Poor Vagrant (Unemployed. Broke. Rent is due. Your only path forward is wandering the streets.)]

Bai Liu: "..."

Is this skill designed to mock his poverty?

[System: Of course not.]

[Skill Description: You can trade anything you own with others. Anything they agree to exchange will enter your wallet.]

[Their skills, points, items, even their very souls and beliefs—everything can be turned into coins at your disposal. You are the Devil's Trader, the vagrant who appears destitute, but those who deal with you may lose everything.]

[Though you have nothing now, your desire for wealth is boundless. One day, your wallet will be the richest in the world, though it will be filled with the remnants of the helpless.]

Bai Liu blinks. "Wow. That skill doesn't sound very... human."

[System: Do you dislike it?]

Bai Liu grins. "No. I love it. It suits me perfectly."

"No." Bai Liu smiled, "On the contrary, I really like it, it suits me, and I would like to enquire if a deal is struck with me without the other party knowing I have this skill, does the deal stand?"

[System: A transaction is established when there is a (coin) relationship between the two parties and (coin) enters the prop wallet at least once.]

"A monetary relationship?" Bai Liu rubbed his chin. "Like what?"

[System: For example, if you want to obtain someone's item and you use the points (coins) in your wallet to buy it, the transaction is established the moment they accept—even if they don't know about your skill or aren't sincere in their agreement. As long as they take your points, the deal is sealed, and the item is yours.]

Bai Liu's grin widened. "So even if I jokingly offer just one point for a highly valuable prop, as long as they agree, it still counts?"

[System: Yes.]

"Gee, that's a cheeky skill." Bai Liu remarked with genuine amusement. "But I kind of can't wait to try it out."

[System: You currently have a balance of 15,781 points. Would you like to load all of them into your wallet?]

Bai Liu nodded. "Fake it."

After clearing his props, Bai Liu checked his panel attributes. Almost all of them were in the red—he had significantly overexerted himself during the game.

[Player Name: Bai Liu]

[Life Value: 20] (A two-hundred-pound man could sit on you and kill you. Slowly recovering.)
[Stamina: 7] (Unsteady standing. Auto-recovery in progress.)
[Agility: 7] (Full-body stiffness and muscle soreness. Auto-recovery in progress.)
[Attack: 1] (Your full-force strike is like a two-month-old kitten pawing at something. Auto-recovery in progress.)
[Intelligence: 45] (Originally 89. Halved due to critically low mental value. Will be restored when mental value recovers.)

[Luck: 0] (You've been cursed with misfortune your entire life. If anyone in the game encounters a godlike NPC, it will be you.)
[Skill: Empty Old Purse]
[Identity: Poor Vagrant]
[Mental Value: 3] (By all rights, you should have gone completely insane and become a monster. Frankly, I'm shocked you're still sane. Then again, perhaps sanity is the very thing that makes you monstrous. Terrifying player. (Auto-recovery in progress.)]
Bai Liu, entirely unfazed by the long string of commentary branding him a monster, calmly asked, "How long until my stats recover?"

[System: Based on your current recovery rate, full restoration will take three to five days after leaving the game.]

Bai Liu wasn't one to procrastinate. "Then let's exit the—"

Before he could finish, he noticed two figures hesitantly approaching the boarding gate.

Mu Sicheng and Wang Shun paused, taking in Bai Liu's disheveled state. He was slumped against the exit wall, clearly unconscious until moments ago, resting in a position that screamed exhaustion. The drop in his mental value had hit him hard.

Yet, when they stepped closer, Bai Liu casually lifted his head and met their gazes, his eyes sharp. His first words made both men freeze.

"Are you here to pry information about my personal skills?"

Mu Sicheng smirked, crouching down with his hands on his knees as he studied Bai Liu with amusement. "And what makes you so sure we're here for that? What if we came to kill or rob you instead? You should be loaded with points and valuable props by now."

Wang Shun almost pointed out that killing wasn't possible in the system lobby—but before he could, he realized something. Bai Liu had just exited the game; he shouldn't know that yet.

"It shouldn't be possible to kill anyone in this hall," Bai Liu mused after only a few seconds of thought.

Wang Shun blurted, "How did you know?"

Mu Sicheng's interest piqued. He had seen Bai Liu instinctively flinch when the idea of being attacked was brought up—a natural human response to potential danger. Clearly, Bai Liu hadn't known at first.

And yet, in mere seconds, he reached the right conclusion.

"Reason?" Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow.

"If killing was allowed here, there'd be people camping the entrance for easy loot," Bai Liu explained with a shrug. "I've been out for ten minutes and haven't seen a single soul besides you two. If murder were an option, this place would be crawling with robbers. But it's not. That suggests killing—and likely theft—are both restricted here."

Mu Sicheng whistled, eyes glinting with appreciation. "Bingo. Nailed it."

Wang Shun looked conflicted. He had planned to trick Bai Liu into revealing his skills. But now, it was clear—Bai Liu hadn't fallen for even a single lie.

"I'm curious," Mu Sicheng said, tilting his head. "What's your mental value right now? You don't seem like someone who just had a 0.1 mental value. Did you use a spirit bleach to recover?"

Bai Liu, looking perfectly composed, replied calmly, "I'm currently at 3. Still recovering."

Mu Sicheng: "……"
Wang Shun: "……"

They both stared at Bai Liu, momentarily stunned into silence.

"Wait—how much?" Wang Shun asked, his voice slightly unsteady.

"Three," Bai Liu repeated, completely at ease. "What's wrong?"

Wang Shun struggled to process it. "Do you even understand what a mental value of 3 means? You should be experiencing overlapping hallucinations and extreme psychological torment. Most players who drop below 20 go completely insane the moment they leave the game. But you—"

He gestured wildly at Bai Liu, as if trying to encapsulate the sheer absurdity of the situation. "You're just sitting here like nothing's wrong! You're talking like a rational person! You should be struggling to form coherent thoughts—your intelligence is literally halved!"

Bai Liu nodded agreeably. "That's true. My intelligence is currently 45 instead of 89. But honestly, that's still more than enough to answer your questions. They weren't particularly difficult."

Wang Shun was speechless.

In truth, Bai Liu was experiencing an overwhelming wave of dark urges—violent, impulsive thoughts whispering to him, trying to push him into monstrous behavior. But Bai Liu had lived with a ruthless obsession for money long before entering this game. He had always fought against his own greed, resisting the temptation to cross legal or moral boundaries.

Compared to that? This was nothing.

Still, something Mu Sicheng had said caught his attention.

Spirit Bleach.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes. That sounded like an item designed to restore a player's status, much like a "Blue Pill" in other games. But rather than asking Wang Shun about it—he had already tried to deceive him—Bai Liu turned to Mu Sicheng instead. The man clearly seemed more entertained by the situation.

Wang Shun, still trying to process everything, finally asked, "Bai Liu, how did you guess we were here to ask about your personal skills?"

"If you weren't here to kill me, then your purpose must be to either seek my help, propose cooperation, or gather information," Bai Liu explained leisurely. "As a newcomer, I shouldn't have much valuable information, since all my stats and rewards are publicly visible. The only thing hidden is my personal skill."

He smiled. "So I figured that's what you came to ask about. Normally, I wouldn't tell you. But since my mental value is critically low, you must have thought I'd be too delirious to keep secrets. Am I wrong?"

Wang Shun let out a long sigh. Bai Liu had guessed everything—right down to the loophole they'd planned to exploit.

Mu Sicheng leaned in closer, intrigued. "I'm seriously doubting your mental value right now. There's no way I'm getting your skill info today, am I?"

"Not necessarily," Bai Liu said pleasantly. "How about we make a deal? I'll show you my skill—if you give me a spirit bleach in exchange."

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes. "……Are you serious?"

Bai Liu flicked a single silver coin between his fingers. "I don’t expect it for free. I’ll give you a point in return."

Lobby

Mu Sicheng stared at the silver one-point coin balanced on Bai Liu's fingertips with an expression that could only be described as ghostly. He glanced up at Bai Liu, bewildered.

"Bai Liu, are you kidding me?" Mu Sicheng scoffed. "One point? And you want to use that to buy spirit bleach? Do you even know how expensive spiritual bleach is? Mine's all premium—over a thousand points per bottle! What's the difference between that and regular bleach?"

Bai Liu's smile remained unchanged. "One point plus a demonstration of my personal skill. Is that a deal?" He twirled the coin between his fingers. "You can see my skill first, then rinse my spirit. How about it? You'll probably be the first player to witness my personal skill in action."

Hearing Bai Liu's coaxing tone, Mu Sicheng felt momentarily tempted. But skepticism quickly crept in.

He could just watch Bai Liu's skill and refuse to bleach his spirit afterward. Bai Liu, even in his single-digit spirit state, still seemed lucid—though obviously, he couldn't do anything to Mu Sicheng.

Even if Bai Liu's skill allowed him to steal things, personal skills couldn't be forcibly used in the lobby…

But Bai Liu didn't know that yet.

After thinking it through, Mu Sicheng figured he wouldn't be at a disadvantage anyway. Besides, he was genuinely curious about this newcomer's personal skill.

With a smirk, Mu Sicheng rubbed his nose and reached out, plucking the coin from Bai Liu's fingertips. "Deal. Now show me what you've got, Bai Liu!"

[System Alert: A trade between Player Bai Liu and Player Mu Sicheng has been established. Bai Liu, the poor wanderer, has received a bottle of spiritual bleach.]

[System Reminder: Player Mu Sicheng has gifted Player Bai Liu a bottle of high-quality Spirit Bleach, valued at 1,700 points. This item can restore a player's spirit value from below 20 to its original state.]

A sleek aluminum canister dropped into Bai Liu's hand, resembling a spray paint can. He picked it up, shook it, and—before Mu Sicheng could react—sprayed it directly onto himself.

A white mist of spirit bleach enveloped Bai Liu's face.

Mu Sicheng let out a cry of dismay. "That was the high-spec bleach I stocked up on during the sale!!!"

But before he could snatch it back, Bai Liu had already finished spraying.

As the mist dissipated, Bai Liu stood there, visibly refreshed. Mu Sicheng stared at him, looking utterly betrayed. "What the hell is your personal skill?! Stealing? But you can't steal from other players in the lobby! Only trades are allowed, not theft! How did you take the bleach from my system warehouse?!"

Bai Liu smiled, patting the sulking Mu Sicheng on the shoulder. "I just demonstrated it for you."

"Thanks for the spirit bleach, Mu Sicheng. It works great."

Mu Sicheng was completely dumbfounded. He scrambled to his feet, chasing after Bai Liu like an enraged little monkey. "Explain! What's your personal skill?!"

He even used a strange truth-testing scale prop on Bai Liu.

[Result: Yes.] Which meant Bai Liu hadn't lied to him about anything from the start.

This only made Mu Sicheng even more confused.

Meanwhile, Bai Liu approached Wang Shun for some basic information about the game. When Bai Liu asked about the other newcomers, Wang Shun shook his head regretfully.

"Almost all of them have been wiped out," he admitted. "Except for you. There was one other promising newcomer—Muke. He's still struggling, but he won't last much longer. I just checked on him. He's already dropped into the [Death Comedy] section."

Bai Liu's expression subtly shifted. "What did you say his name was? Muke?"

Wang Shun nodded.

Bai Liu was silent for a moment.

Muke.

The same name as the spoiled young master who had cost Bai Liu his job.

One of the reasons Bai Liu had been fired was because the son of a wealthy executive had parachuted into his company to "experience the struggles of the working class." Bai Liu, who had long been disliked by his supervisor, was conveniently dismissed to make room for this privileged intern.

That young master's name was Muke.

He was infamously bad-tempered. The day Bai Liu was forced out, Muke had taken over his desk—and without a second thought, had thrown away Bai Liu's personal computer, along with all his important files, horror game drafts, and data.

Not just the computer. Everything Bai Liu had left on the desk was gone.

When Bai Liu confronted him, Muke had shrugged indifferently. "It looked old and boring, so I threw it away. If you want, I can buy you a brand-new top-of-the-line model."

Bai Liu had wanted to protest—he had dozens of gigabytes of valuable work stored on that machine. But he was also unemployed, and there was no point in arguing. He couldn't exactly beat the other guy up.

Besides, Muke had a pre-existing heart condition. He was pampered, spoiled, and got whatever he wanted. His little "work experience" in Bai Liu's company had been nothing more than a game of corporate musical chairs.

In the end, Bai Liu had simply taken the high-end computer Muke had offered, paid for all the belongings Muke had discarded (including a half-used pack of tissues), and walked away.

Now, that same Muke was in the game.

Bai Liu's gaze darkened with amusement.

"I want to see this Muke," he said.

Wang Shun hesitated, surprised by Bai Liu's interest, but eventually nodded. "Alright. I'll take you to the [Death Comedy] section."

Muke's small TV sat in a desolate corner.

In Death Comedy, scenes of players struggling to survive were unpopular—too dull, lacking comedic effect. Only one or two spectators glanced at Muke's tear-streaked face as he desperately fought for his life before quickly losing interest and looking away. Players like him—on the brink of death—were a common sight in this game, no longer entertaining or noteworthy to the audience.

Bai Liu opened his game panel to check [Muke]'s progress and found that he had already unlocked two pages in Muke's [Monster Book]. One of them was [Mermaid Sailor], and the reward on that page was the [Mermaid's Amulet]—a highly valuable item in Bai Liu's eyes.

"Muke has a strong will to live," Wang Shun remarked. He had seen countless players meet their end and offered only a small sigh at Muke's predicament, showing little pity. "But his chances of survival are slim. He managed to get a [Bubble in the Water] through a bounty, but the mermaids popped it almost immediately. After that, no one else placed a bounty for him, and he fell into this section."

"That's not bad for a rookie," Mu Sicheng commented, crossing his arms. "If he were willing to trade that [Mermaid's Amulet] after clearing the level, I'd have given him a bounty pass myself. That item is pretty good. But most players won't easily part with a [Monster Book] item, so I'll just have to watch him die."

Bai Liu also coveted the [Mermaid's Amulet]. From his years of game design experience, he could tell that it was an extremely valuable prop.

But as Mu Sicheng pointed out, even if Bai Liu helped Muke survive by giving him a bounty pass, there was no guarantee that Muke would hand over the amulet afterward. Bai Liu wouldn't give something for nothing.

That said, it wasn't Bai Liu's style to let valuable props sink into oblivion without trying to claim them.

He asked the system in his mind: [System, can I trade with Muke while he's inside the game?]

[System: You and player Muke are not in the same spatial dimension and cannot trade.]

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. Trade required both parties to exist in the same latitude.

[What defines a latitude?]

[System: A latitude is a unified, continuous, and unbroken state of time and space. You and player Muke currently exist in separate dimensions, making trade impossible.]

“Time and space, huh…” Bai Liu absently toyed with the coin hanging around his neck, murmuring, “That doesn’t mean it’s entirely impossible.”

[System, retrieve Siren’s Fishbone.]

[System: Loading item.]

A three-meter-long fishbone, glowing with a faint white fluorescence, materialized in front of Bai Liu.

Its pristine, ivory-white surface was almost translucent, with an amber-like luster. Beautiful—like its original owner, the Siren King. But beneath that beauty lay something brutal. This fishbone had been extracted from an entire mermaid spine, and the gruesome truth gave it an edge of eerie menace.

One end tapered into a sharp spike, while the other formed a smooth, whip-like grip, perfectly balanced.

As if alive, the fishbone coiled around Bai Liu’s waist, its cold, scale-like texture sending a shiver down his spine. Eventually, it settled obediently against his skin, resembling an intricate chain of bones draped over his suit trousers and white shirt.

The spiked tip rested just above Bai Liu’s navel, while the grip end dangled at his hip. At a glance, it looked like an odd fashion accessory —one that didn’t quite fit Bai Liu’s usual attire.

Curious, Mu Sicheng reached out to touch it.

The moment his fingers brushed Bai Liu’s waist, the fishbone snapped at him, driving its spike into his hand with alarming speed. Mu Sicheng yelped, jerking his hand back.

“The hell is this thing?!” He clutched his hand, looking both shocked and pissed. “How can it attack me? Players are supposed to be separated in the system lobby!”

Even as an A-rank player, Mu Sicheng had lost half his HP from a single strike.

But that wasn’t the most shocking part. The real issue was—you weren’t supposed to be able to attack players inside the lobby.

Lobby

How had that thing managed to drop his life bar into the red?

“Siren’s Fishbone.” Bai Liu made no attempt to hide it. Lifting his shirt slightly, he revealed the fishbone wrapped around his waist. Before he could fully expose it, however, the bone whip abruptly contracted, coiling tightly around his torso and covering any skin that might have been revealed.

Bai Liu remained unbothered. “You should’ve seen this prop in my reward list.”

There was no reason to conceal it. The system had already displayed it publicly, and Bai Liu had no particular intention of hiding the prop’s function. However, his personal skill was a different matter—something worth keeping secret for as long as possible.

That said, Bai Liu was still uncertain about the fishbone’s exact capabilities. He needed to test it. Doing so inside a game was too dangerous—if the item backfired against a monster, it could easily lead to his death.

Testing it outside the game required a subject.

Muke, trapped and on the verge of death, seemed like an ideal candidate—desperate, compliant, and conveniently available.

Bai Liu hadn’t intended to experiment on Mu Sicheng, but the latter’s itchy hands had forced his discovery: the fishbone could attack players inside the system hall. In other words, it could breach space itself.

“They say it can tear through time and space,” Bai Liu mused, glancing at Muke’s small TV. “I’m going to test it on him.” He lifted the whip, preparing to strike.

Wang Shun, already struggling to comprehend Bai Liu’s thought process, panicked. “Wait! Bai Liu, what are you doing?! What if you kill Muke by accident?”

Mu Sicheng, quicker to catch on, let out a low chuckle. “Oh? You’re planning to save him? That’s surprisingly charitable.”

“No.” Bai Liu smiled faintly. “I wouldn’t call it a rescue. I’m going to trade with him.”

With that, Bai Liu uncoiled the fishbone from his waist, giving it a few experimental flicks. Then, taking a deep breath, he raised the whip high and swung it down at Muke's small TV.

The instant he exerted force, his left arm felt as if it had been weighed down by a thousand pounds. The fishbone barely made it through the motion before colliding with an invisible barrier in front of the TV. The impact sent it rebounding, but even that slight contact caused the underwater scene within Muke's TV to tremble violently. The screen flickered as if struggling to maintain a signal.

Then, in an instant—everything shattered.

The world around Bai Liu fractured into something resembling broken glass. Mu Sicheng and Wang Shun became distorted, their forms blurring and stretching like figures on a malfunctioning television screen.

A deep darkness pressed in.

Through it, Bai Liu could hear the distant, rhythmic crash of ocean waves. More distinctly—he heard Muke's hysterical cries for help echoing from the small TV, as if he were physically there.

Muke, sensing someone had arrived in the depths, immediately began screaming.

"Somebody help me!!!"

At the bottom of the ocean, Muke had collapsed in a burst bubble of water, his body trembling as he sobbed uncontrollably. He was desperate—willing to do anything.

"Please! Save me!"

Bai Liu lifted the whip again, ready to take another swing—

But the system's voice cut in abruptly.

[System Warning: The use of this item places an extreme burden on Bai Liu. If he attempts to use it again, he will be forcibly pulled into the game.]

Bai Liu immediately gave up the idea.

[So… am I currently in the same latitude as Muke?]

[System: Calculating…]

[Player Bai Liu and Player Muke's latitudes have partially overlapped due to an external force. Player Bai Liu is currently in the rift between two torn latitudes. At this moment, he can transmit sound but not images, allowing for limited transactions.]

"…Only my voice, huh?" Bai Liu murmured, considering the implications.

He lowered his gaze to Muke's trembling figure on the small TV. Then, in a low, measured voice, he whispered:

"Muke."

Muke jerked violently at the sound of his name. He scrambled forward on his hands and knees, gasping, his entire body wracked with terror and desperation. His cries turned raw, almost animalistic.

"I'm here!! Who—what are you?! Please—help me!"

Bai Liu's voice remained calm.

"I'm a vagrant."

He watched as Muke curled in on himself, utterly broken.

It was almost impossible to reconcile this sobbing, pleading man with the arrogant young master who had once dismissed him so condescendingly.

Once upon a time, Muke had treated Bai Liu as nothing more than a worthless drifter—someone beneath notice, someone to be cast aside.

Now, in a bitter twist of fate, he was begging that very same drifter for his life.

And Bai Liu?

He would take everything Muke had left—whatever scraps of value remained.

A terrible bargain was about to be made.

And Bai Liu would enjoy every second of it.

"I can save you, but not for free—I'm poor too," Bai Liu said matter-of-factly. "You'll have to make a deal with me. In exchange for rescuing you, I'll give you reward points, but you'll need to offer me something in return."

"Yes! Anything you want! Just save me!!!" Muke cried desperately, reaching out as if grasping for an unseen god. "Are you a god? Or part of the system? Where are you?! What do you want from me? Money? Something else? I don't have anything on me right now... but please, don't leave me! I want to live!!!"

"I'm no god," Bai Liu replied coolly. "And objectively speaking, I doubt you'd consider me a good presence in your life."

He had no deep-seated malice toward the young master—just an ordinary level of dislike. But Bai Liu was self-aware enough to know that even his "ordinary" dislike could be terrifying in itself. He thought about it for a moment before concluding, "If anything, you should probably see me as more of a devil."

"A devil..." Muke's breath hitched, his pupils contracting. Then, as if something clicked, his eyes suddenly burned with determination. "Do you want my soul? If you save me, I'll give it to you!"

Bai Liu had originally intended to ask for Muke's [Mermaid's Amulet], but his brow arched in mild surprise. This was... an unexpected proposal.

He did need the amulet, but he also needed a test subject to experiment with his strange skill, [Old Wallet]. One of its descriptions implied that he could trade souls...

"Deal." Bai Liu smiled, pulling two hundred points from his crumpled wallet. He tossed them toward Muke's small TV. The coin on his chest flickered, and the points vanished.

[System: Player Bai Liu has spent 200 points to purchase Player Muke's soul.]
[System Notification: Player Muke has received 200 points.]

Muke gasped, staring at the system notification as though he couldn't believe his eyes. "You really are a devil! I sold you my soul, and all I got was 200 points?! That's barely enough to buy props!"

"I told you—I'm a poor wanderer." Bai Liu responded calmly. "But 200 points, plus that broken air bubble you're in, is enough to keep you alive. Now, open your system shop and buy alcohol. Yes, alcohol. And can you stop crying already? You're wailing louder than I can talk, brother..."

When Muke finally cleared the level, Bai Liu noticed something new in his wallet—a coin unlike the others. It resembled a Polaroid, with Muke's black-and-white smiling face printed on its surface. In the corner, the number [200 points] was stamped, and on the back, the words [Soul Coin] were inscribed.

[Item: Player Muke's Soul Coin]
[Effect: You own the soul debt of Player Muke and have full rights to dominate, control, raise, and erase Player Muke.]

Dominate, regulate, nurture, erase. Bai Liu narrowed his eyes. That's... everything the system does to players.

So this was called [soul debt ownership]?

In other words, the system held the soul debts of all players. If that was the case, didn't that mean every player had already sold their soul to the system the moment they entered the game?

Interesting.

Bai Liu tilted his head thoughtfully. "So... does this mean I'm Muke's system now? Between me and the official game system, who has more authority over him?"

[System: Calculating...]
[Result: When Player Bai Liu's commands regarding Player Muke conflict with the system's, the system's decision will take priority—due to Player Bai Liu's current lack of power.]

Ah, so it was based on strength.

If I get stronger... can I strip the system of its authority over Muke? He smirked. Or maybe... even dominate the system itself?

The thought was exhilarating.

Stepping out of the dark void, Bai Liu felt an intense dizziness spiral through him, his legs nearly giving out beneath him. The exhaustion from overusing his abilities hit him like a freight train.

Wang Shun rushed over, catching Bai Liu before he collapsed. "What just happened to you? You swung the whip and then suddenly froze!"

Mu Sicheng, however, was watching him intently, eyes gleaming with intrigue. "How did you do that? Just now, Muke cleared the level in exactly the same way you did before."

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

"My personal skills," Bai Liu said, smiling weakly at him. "Curious, aren't you? Want me to show you my personal skills again? I'm at zero stamina right now, so if you give me a bottle of stamina restorer, I'll show you once more."

"Of course, I'm not going to just give you a stamina restorer for nothing," Bai Liu continued, pulling out another point coin and flashing his usual mischievous grin. "How about a point for you?"

Mu Sicheng stared at him, unamused. "....."

Well, I wouldn't trade with you!

One minute later...

[System Alert: Trade established. Bai Liu the Wanderer receives a bottle of Stamina Restorer.]

[System Reminder: Player Mu Sicheng has given Player Bai Liu a bottle of Stamina Restorer, worth 180 points, which can restore 90 points of stamina to the player.]

Mu Sicheng was livid. He wanted to pounce on Bai Liu and strangle him while he lazily drank the rejuvenator. He demanded, "How the hell did you do that?! Stealing and looting are forbidden here! Only trading and giving props to each other is allowed! You can't steal from my game warehouse!"

Twice, Bai Liu had done it. Twice with the plum!

Only Mu Sicheng had ever stolen from others—this was the first time in his life someone had stolen from him!

Bai Liu casually drained the stamina restorer in one gulp. He stretched, feeling the strength return to his arms and legs, and then glanced at Mu Sicheng with a sly smile. "If you want me to show you more, you can..."

"No, it's not necessary," Mu Sicheng interrupted with an expressionless face. He was not going to fall for Bai Liu's trick again.

"Ah, my residency fee from yesterday is due. I need to quit the game," Wang Shun said, stepping forward and preparing to exit. "Bai Liu, to stay in this lobby, you need to pay the system's daily stay fee. For your level, it's 100 points per day."

"My fee's due, so I'll be off now. See you next time." Wang Shun bid Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng a polite farewell.

"Tch, I'm getting off too." Mu Sicheng glanced at his watch and then at Bai Liu. "I've got things to do in the real world, so I'll see you next time, Bai Liu."

"Next time I come to play a game with you," Mu Sicheng added, his grin turning nasty. "I'll get back everything you cheated out of me today."

With those words, the two of them vanished from the game hall. Bai Liu followed Wang Shun to the exit of the [Newcomers' Area], where Muke cowered in a corner, trembling, tears staining his face.

The young master had a delicate, almost boyish look, a soft, Japanese appearance that was undeniably pretty. His red eyes, with tears clinging to his eyelashes, could easily evoke sympathy from any girl.

But Bai Liu, a money-driven, androgynous game designer with little empathy for human appearance, wasn't easily moved. It took someone like Siren King to catch his attention.

Bai Liu crouched down in front of Muke, who flinched warily, his body tense, tears still in his eyes. A fierce hostility lingered on his face as he hissed, "Get out of my way!"

"No," Bai Liu replied calmly, his gaze unwavering. "Second meeting, young master Mu."

Muke froze, staring up at Bai Liu with confusion in his eyes. His tears dripped onto the floor, and he hiccupped, unsure how to react. For a moment, he stopped yelling at Bai Liu and just stared at him blankly.

He knew this voice. This was the voice of the one who had saved his life when he was on the brink of death—the one who had burned away the monsters he couldn't escape, for just 200 points. The one who claimed to be a poor wanderer.

Bai Liu continued to look down at Muke, his tone composed. "It's the second time you've seen me, but it seems you don't remember. That's fine. We're starting a new relationship now."

Bai Liu extended a hand toward Muke. "So, Muke, first time meeting. I'm the owner of your soul contract. My name is Bai Liu."

It was only after a long pause that Muke suddenly broke into tears, as if he had been holding them back for too long. He rushed forward, clinging to Bai Liu tightly.

"What took you so long to get here?!"

In that moment, Muke felt as though he was embracing a demon he had no choice but to rely on. But later, he would realize that the demon was, in fact, a god in disguise.

He had given his faith and soul to Bai Liu, who in return gave him a new life, and perhaps... something more.

Later that evening, Bai Liu logged out of the game with Muke, who was still clinging to him.

Muke's eyes were red and swollen from crying, and he cried through the night, clutching Bai Liu's sleeve. He had sold his soul to Bai Liu, but he couldn't bear the thought of being abandoned.

It was a strange comfort.

Bai Liu understood that Muke's overwhelming sense of security came from the idea that Bai Liu, the supposed bad guy, was the one he relied on. But Bai Liu knew better: if Muke didn't snap out of his fear soon, he wouldn't be leaving Bai Liu's house anytime soon.

And yet, Bai Liu didn't want to keep Muke in his house for too long.

The reason was simple—Muke was terribly annoying when he cried.

So, five minutes after Muke had finally fallen asleep, Bai Liu called his boss and asked him to collect Muke, who was still staying at his place.

His boss, shocked by the sudden call, spilled coffee on his keyboard.

He had never liked Bai Liu as a subordinate. Bai Liu had too many of his own ideas about game design and rarely followed market trends. Every time his boss asked for something, Bai Liu would insist the game was complete and that adding anything else would break the plot.

It wasn't that Bai Liu was disobedient or seeking a raise. It was just that he was blunt and honest—something his boss had never appreciated until he was the one dealing with Muke.

Now that Muke was under his care, his boss realized what Bai Liu had been putting up with. But he had no choice—Muke was a handful, and he had to pick him up, no matter how awkward it was.

When he arrived at Bai Liu's house, his boss was a little embarrassed to see Bai Liu. But Bai Liu felt nothing.

With the money in his hand, Bai Liu calmly observed everyone around him. Even when he saw the boss, the one who was always trying to tell him what to do and knew nothing, Bai Liu politely opened the door and let him in. "Muke is still sleeping," he said. "He cried all night and just fell asleep. Please, don't wake him."

Bai Liu's intention was simple: let Muke sleep and avoid further aggravating his distress. But as Muke clung to Bai Liu's shirt (which Bai Liu had carelessly handed over to him) and curled up into a ball on the bed, his red eyes and bruised skin – signs of the game's aftermath – became evident. Bai Liu's words prompted the boss to stiffen in realization.

So, Bai Liu and Muke shared that kind of relationship? Why didn't Bai Liu mention this earlier? If he had, the boss might not have dared to fire anyone.

"Well, in that case," the supervisor stammered, "you can let Muke continue to sleep here, Bai Liu. The young master is incredibly temperamental when woken up, especially after such a long night."

The boss glanced uneasily at Muke, noting the strange behavior – Bai Liu had tossed the young master around like this, only to call someone in to collect him afterward. It felt... a bit scummy.

But Bai Liu simply refused. "No. Get rid of him. His crying is annoying me."

The boss froze. What a scumbag! How could Bai Liu get away with making such a callous remark?

Muke began to stir as the conversation continued. His eyelashes fluttered, and he groggily hugged Bai Liu's shirt tighter, murmuring, "Bai Liu…"

Bai Liu didn't acknowledge it. He had grown used to the judgmental looks his boss gave him when he made comments or requested something. Calmly, he called out, "Muke, get up. Someone's here to pick you up."

Muke slowly opened his eyes. Upon seeing his boss by his bedside, he understood – Bai Liu had called someone to take him away.

Muke's reaction was immediate. He tried to grab Bai Liu's hand, scolding his boss irritably, his back arching like a cat being dragged to a place it hated. "Go away! I'm not going back! I'm staying here!"

"This is my place." Bai Liu's voice remained cool as he dodged Muke's hand. "And I won't let you stay here. Muke, go back."

Muke froze, his attempt to grab Bai Liu's hand faltering midway. His eyes started to redden again, and his lips trembled. "Bai Liu, I'll be good. Don't drive me away…"

Bai Liu didn't soften. "I'm telling you what to do, Muke. You don't have the right to refuse."

Bai Liu understood why Muke didn't want to leave. The man's survival instinct was strong, and after Bai Liu saved him, Muke subconsciously equated staying with Bai Liu to staying alive. He feared the environment outside Bai Liu's protection.

Tears streamed down Muke's face as he bit his lip. After a long moment, he finally got out of bed, pale and trembling, standing behind his boss like a frightened child. His fear was palpable.

Bai Liu studied Muke with a cold, calculating gaze. He had to guide this player, whose soul seemed so fragile, just like the system would guide a new player.

"Muke, if you continue being this weak, unable to live without me, and without anything valuable to offer, then I'll abandon you," Bai Liu whispered. "Understand? Because I can always find more people like you, but you only have me."

"I… I know," Muke replied softly, his lips pale. He wiped his eyes, trying to control his sobs. "I'll try to be useful to you."

The boss, who had witnessed the entire interaction, felt as though he had just watched a cold, ruthless display. He stood frozen in shock, fear creeping into his expression. How could Bai Liu speak to Muke, the young master, in such a way?

Muke, still in a daze, followed his boss. As they reached the door, he asked quietly, “Mr. Mu, what is your relationship with Bai Liu?”

“What relationship?” Muke’s eyes were vacant, as if he were speaking to himself. “I belong to him. He owns my soul. He’s my master.”

The boss blinked in stunned silence. What the hell are they playing at?

Bai Liu, of course, was no stranger to the rumors and reactions surrounding his manipulative nature. In the eyes of others, he was a cunning strategist, an S-type dominant with a grip on Muke’s every weakness.

With Muke gone, Bai Liu sat before his top-tier alien computer, a gift from Muke, and began searching for information on Siren Village. He scrolled through searches, tried reverse lookups, and even checked the name “Jeff Andre.” But nothing came up.

Bai Liu rubbed his stiff neck, deep in thought. If the game was a mere virtual product, then how had it followed him into the real world?

His eyes darkened as his fingers absentmindedly brushed against a coin dangling from a thin thread around his neck, a memento of his in-game manager. But as he fiddled with the coin, something else caught his attention—a translucent, ice-like fish scale hanging alongside it.

It was then that Bai Liu realized he now wore an extra scale, one that had inexplicably followed him out of the game. This was the [Siren's Reverse Scale], an item he didn’t remember pulling out.

The system’s message for the scale lingered in his mind: The fish scale represents Siren King’s reply to your fondness and is expected to be worn by the player for a long time.

Though Bai Liu had worn it overnight without noticing anything odd, he now found himself thinking about the implications. If the game was entirely virtual, how could physical objects like coins and scales manifest in reality?

He sat in silence, pondering the situation. There had to be a reason these traces were here. Yet, strangely, despite hundreds of players logged into the game, no traces of its existence could be found online.

Everything should have left a mark. Bai Liu narrowed his eyes.

Unless the traces had been erased.

He quickly opened his Weibo account, typed out a specific message about Siren and the game, and clicked send. As soon as he did, the message vanished, as if it had never existed.

Reality

Sure enough, the [Game] has authority over the [real world] and can manipulate [facts] in reality.

This is a world that has been tampered with, and they, the chosen [players] who have discovered this [reality], are [banned] from revealing even the slightest hint of it.

I don't know how far this [ban] can extend, but things that are objectively recorded can be easily altered or erased. For example, the words written on paper or tweets sent to friends can be deleted without a trace.

Bai Liu found his old phone in the drawer, its screen still broken. He dialed a friend's number from it and began explaining everything that had happened to him, cutting him off before he could respond. "Six, five..."

"What are you counting down for? Tell me more about this, is it true? You're not making it up, right? This is too exciting!" his friend exclaimed.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "Three, two, one."

His friend's voice abruptly stopped, only to become confused. "Eh? Bai Liu, why are you calling me? When did I even answer your phone? I don't remember anything!"

"It's nothing," Bai Liu replied casually, "I just missed you and called."

Seven seconds—that was the time it took for Bai Liu's tweet to disappear completely, a fact he marked in his mind. He didn't realize that the [game] could tamper with something as [non-objective] as human memory so easily. In just seven seconds, the memory had been erased without a second wasted.

It seems that altering a person's memory is no more difficult for [the game] than modifying a piece of data.

His friend, who knew Bai Liu well, laughed and asked, "Seriously, what's going on? Why are you calling me? What's up?"

"I was thinking about something," Bai Liu said, tapping his fingers absentmindedly on the table. He began writing down his experiences in the game, watching as the words vanished one by one. “Lu Yizhan, do you think people only have seven seconds of memory?”

Lu Yizhan’s voice sounded confused. “Why are you thinking about such a philosophical question? And isn’t it wrong? The original saying is that a fish only has a seven-second memory.”

“Am I misremembering?” Bai Liu lazily propped himself up. “Maybe. With only seven seconds of memory, misremembering seems normal. But, hey, what if the original saying was [Humans only have seven seconds of memory], and then something tampered with it, changing it to [Fish only have seven seconds of memory], just to fool us humans who only remember for seven seconds?”

Lu Yizhan, used to Bai Liu’s strange musings since he lost his job, laughed and cried at the same time. “What are you thinking about after losing your job? I got paid today; I’ll buy you dinner. Stop thinking about fish and seven-second memories. If people only had seven seconds of memory, what would we do? We’d never be able to memorize the terms and conditions!”

“I’ll come if you invite me to dinner,” Bai Liu said casually, tossing the coin around his neck into his collar. The cool touch of Siren King’s scales pressed against his heart. Before he could hang up, he asked, almost haunted, “If humans and fish both only have seven seconds of memory, then how long do you think a mermaid’s memory lasts?”

“Why are you still stuck on this, and now bringing up mermaids?” Lu Yizhan chuckled helplessly. “According to your theory, if both humans and fish have seven-second memories, then a mermaid’s memory must be even shorter—just a fraction of a second?”

“I suppose so.”

Even though he’d said goodbye to the mermaid named Tawil, the man likely forgot about him the moment Bai Liu left.

Bai Liu rarely felt a sense of loss from being forgotten or ignored. He didn’t seek human approval and was content as long as he had money to entertain himself. But Siren King—he was a beautiful anomaly in the data. Even someone like Bai Liu, who rarely felt emotion, couldn’t help but feel a tinge of regret at having those few seconds erased from his partner’s memory.

But it was just a little bit—a bit the size of a fish scale.

The two had become unshakable friends, bonding over shared information about discount raffles. Some people even thought they only hung out because they were both orphans who understood each other's misery.

When Bai Liu sat down at the barbecue stall, Lu Yizhan winked at him. "Bai Liu, I'm getting married."

"Congratulations," Bai Liu replied without surprise. He'd known Lu Yizhan and his girlfriend had been together for years, so marriage was natural. "Then today's meal is on me. I'll give you two thousand for your share later."

Lu Yizhan nearly sprayed cold beer in Bai Liu's face, his eyes wide with shock. "Are you crazy? Another treat to pay for my share? And two thousand?! Didn't you say you'd never pay for a wedding?"

Yes, Bai Liu had made that statement at a colleague's wedding.

This colleague, who didn't get along with Bai Liu and often gossiped about him, had been trying to get Bai Liu to pay for his share, claiming that others had contributed 12,000, so Bai Liu should do the same.

That's when Bai Liu had coldly said, "I'm not married, so I'm not paying for a stranger's wedding. It's an investment that won't pay off."

The colleague had turned red with anger and cursed at Bai Liu behind his back, saying he'd be cut off from his grandchildren.

But Bai Liu wasn't fazed. He didn't care about having kids, so the curse didn't bother him. It was simply an objective prediction about his future.

"Not necessarily," Bai Liu replied, taking a sip of beer. "I just don't give money to strangers. But you're not a stranger. We've been through some things, and it's not an invalid investment for me to pay for your share."

"I'm just happy you're getting married and invited me. I don't have many friends, so I'm glad you're here. Really, forget about it."

"We'll talk about it when you have money," Lu Yizhan said, waving his hand as if pushing the topic away.

Bai Liu's meticulousness was just his nature, while Lu Yizhan's tendency to scrounge was a way of life.

Lu Yizhan, a poor policeman, had recently seen an improvement in his financial situation, but he was still better off than Bai Liu, who was unemployed. He really didn't want Bai Liu paying for his share.

After eating a skewer of grilled meat, Bai Liu wiped his mouth and casually said, "I've made 100,000 this week."

"Pfft—!!!" Lu Yizhan sputtered. "What have you been doing?!"

He knew Bai Liu wouldn't lie about earning 100,000, but he was genuinely shocked. "You're not doing something illegal, are you? I'll arrest you myself!"

Lu Yizhan knew Bai Liu had a sharp mind, but it was often used in strange ways, like designing horror games or devising plots for unmarked crimes. So when he heard Bai Liu had become rich, his first reaction wasn't jealousy but to pull out his phone, ready to call the police.

Lu Yizhan knew that Bai Liu had a low moral compass, and with his "money hoarding" issues, it was hard to tell what Bai Liu might do without a legitimate income.

"I changed jobs. Don't be so nervous. It's legal," Bai Liu said, grinning as he peeled peanuts. "The job pays well. It's just a bit more dangerous, but it suits me fine."

"What kind of job pays that much?" Lu Yizhan asked, skeptical. "100,000 a week?"

"Well, it's probably selling my soul to some underground organization I can't tell you about." Bai Liu stroked his chin, trying to explain his experiences in [the game] without revealing too much.

"Then I'd perform on stage, or livestream, selling my body and soul. Some people would abuse and bully me, and then show it to the audience. A few people watching would reward me with money, and that's how I'd make 100,000."

"..." Lu Yizhan looked at him with a mixture of confusion, shock, horror, and finally pity. He sighed, "Are you working as a duck in a nightclub, Bai Liu?"

Bai Liu: "..."

After Bai Liu's explanation, Lu Yizhan reluctantly believed he wasn't doing that, but insisted that he wouldn't accept any money from Bai Liu. He couldn't take it!

Bai Liu: "..."

If this is how Yizhan interpreted things, then maybe it wasn't entirely impossible.

After a brief celebration, Bai Liu returned home to rest for two days. He paid his landlord six months' rent, tidied up his apartment, and prepared to enter the [game].

Although the [game] only required players to log in once every seven days, Bai Liu felt an undeniable pull to enter early. He needed to uncover something else, something more urgent.

But before that, a meal. Even if he died in the game, it would be like a last meal before death. With that thought, Bai Liu headed downstairs to enjoy a bowl of noodles topped with a fried egg.

The small noodle shop downstairs was well-known for its flavor. The greasy television set perched above the counter showed social news, broadcasting directly in Bai Liu's line of sight as he ate.

The female news anchor's voice echoed clearly: "Lawyers for Li Gou, the prime suspect in the rape and murder of a senior schoolgirl, have filed a lawsuit claiming insufficient evidence to uphold his death sentence. They are preparing for a second trial—"

A stark image appeared on the screen: a grim-faced suspect with his eyes mosaicked, juxtaposed with a smiling girl in a school uniform, her eyes also blurred out. The juxtaposition felt disturbingly wrong.

The male owner of the noodle shop glanced up at the screen, wiping his hands on his apron. He shook his head, sighing. "What a sin... Such a good girl ruined. If I were her parents, I'd be going out of my mind right now. Everything was set for the sentence, and now they say there's not enough evidence? Suddenly, the evidence vanishes? The internet's furious about it."

The news anchor's voice continued in a calm, yet unsettling tone: "The victim's family is in deep emotional turmoil and has gathered outside the courthouse, demanding justice. Authorities are investigating and trying to defuse the situation."

The background video cut to a scene where a middle-aged woman, gaunt and frail, was being restrained by a group of people. Her eyes were sunken, hollowed by grief, and she wiped away her tears with a trembling hand, only for more to fall with every breath.

Her cry shattered the silence: "She was only 18! Why is the evidence gone? Where is the proof of what that monster did to my daughter, Guoguo? Are you covering for him?"

A middle-aged man, pinned to the ground by security, screamed in agony. His clothes were torn from the struggle, his face drenched in tears. "Let me go! Give my daughter justice! I swore to her grave I'd make that bastard pay!"

Then, on the screen, Li Gou's face appeared, his eyes mosaicked, his lips curled into a subtle smirk. Despite the mosaic, his smugness seeped through. "I didn't do it. All the evidence was fabricated by those two families to frame me," he sneered.

"I'm a good man," Li Gou murmured in a low, hoarse voice. His smile widened as he continued, "Those who spread rumors about me deserve to burn." His eerie expression grew even more sinister.

"Such a tragedy," the panel boss said from the television, his voice soft and choked as he wiped away tears. "I know these two families. They used to live on our street. Their daughter, Guoguo, was such a good girl... How could something like this happen?"

Bai Liu took the last bite of his noodles, his gaze locked on the screen. He raised an eyebrow, his thoughts shifting. "Evidence disappearing suddenly... That method of erasing things from existence... It's reminiscent of the [game]'s [ban] technique."

"Where is this girl's grave?" Bai Liu asked, looking at the noodle shop owner. "Or do you have her parents' contact information?"

The noodle shop owner blinked, caught off guard. "I do, but... why do you want it, Bai Liu?"

"I might be able to help them," Bai Liu replied, wiping his mouth and standing up. He placed a ten-dollar bill under his bowl and pushed it gently aside.

The noodle shop owner stared at him in confusion. "Help them? How?"

"By using unconventional, but legal means," Bai Liu said coolly.

Bai Liu had already realized the true nature of the game. It wasn't just a game—it was a pyramid scheme, and the players were the pawns. One event after another, seemingly unrelated, was set into motion, leading each player down a path of despair, one that eventually trapped them into violent desires. And then, those desires fed the game itself, turning people into players who sold their souls in exchange for temporary satisfaction.

To enter the game, a person's desire had to be so overpowering it transcended life and death. Bai Liu's own desire for money was a perfect example.

If Bai Liu's assumption was correct, another set of parents would soon be drawn into the world of [players].

Li Gou, too, was likely a player. He must have used some kind of tool to erase the evidence of his crime. His actions had pushed the grieving parents into such desperation that they now sought vengeance—a perfect match for the game's criteria.

It reminded Bai Liu of [Muke], who parachuted into Bai Liu's previous life because of a twisted desire to experience something different, forcing Bai Liu into the game after losing his job and succumbing to his unquenchable thirst for money.

Everyone in this world was just a pawn, a mere block in the game. [The game] toyed with their lives like a god, playing them as if they were nothing more than pieces on a board, each move calculated to bring about their inevitable downfall.

What a cunning, cruel [game].

Reality

The noodle shop owner handed Bai Liu two one-dollar coins, which he tucked into his old wallet. After a long hesitation, the kind-faced shop owner passed him a slip of paper with their phone number and address, speaking with a sigh. “If you can help, do so. It’s not easy to live.”

It was drizzling when Bai Liu left the noodle shop. With a plain black umbrella in hand, he took the bus to the cemetery the shop owner had mentioned. Among the gravestones, he soon found the parents who had appeared on television.

They stood in front of their daughter's tombstone, umbrella-less, red-eyed, and drenched in rain. The only umbrella they had was placed over a black-and-white photograph of a smiling Guoguo on the stone.

“You are... Bai Liu?” The mother’s voice was hoarse, muffled from crying all morning. She glared at him, suspicion in her eyes. “You called, saying you could bring Li Gou to justice. What do you have in mind? Or do you want money?”

Bai Liu smiled through the rain, the mist creating a strange halo around his face. His expression had an oddly holy air to it. “I’ve come to make a deal, but I don’t want money.”

This was probably the first time in Bai Liu’s life he had ever said such a thing.

“I will help you fulfill your wishes,” he continued, “I’ll help you dismember Li Gou, but in return, you’ll sell me your souls.”

The mother snorted. “A soul? Another liar.”

She turned her attention back to the black-and-white photograph of Guoguo, her eyes welling up again.

The father eyed Bai Liu warily. Over the years, they had sought help from many people regarding the Guoguo case, trying all kinds of methods. They had encountered their fair share of scammers.

They had come to this man, believing he could bring retribution to Li Gou, and were ready for him to be a fraud. But still, they were willing to take the chance.

“Liar,” the father spat. “Get out!”

Bai Liu remained unmoved, squatting down on one knee. He looked up at the photograph of Guoguo, reading the details aloud:

“Li Gou, age 47, killed Liu Guoguo, a schoolgirl, at the entrance of Ma Family Lane a few months ago. He was sentenced to death for the severity of the crime. But a week ago, all evidence and documents related to the case mysteriously disappeared. People involved now have vague memories, unsure whether they ever saw the evidence.”

Liu Guoguo’s parents' eyes filled with rage. Both clenched their fists, teeth gritted, glaring at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu continued, his voice steady and calm, unaware that his words were pushing the parents toward a boiling point. “If I’m not mistaken, Li Gou himself said he would get out of jail. He claimed the evidence would disappear.”

“How do you know?” the mother asked, her voice shaking.

They had kept a close eye on Li Gou’s behavior in prison. He had been violent and deranged when he was first incarcerated. Over the last week or two, he’d become unnervingly calm, even humming songs, speaking about how he would eventually be free, how the evidence would vanish, how God wouldn’t wrong the good guys.

“It seems he was expecting to be released,” the mother murmured, her suspicion rising.

“Well, you can understand it as Li Gou making a deal with some kind of devil,” Bai Liu said, his eyes now focused on the hesitant, suspicious parents. “He sold his soul to erase the evidence without even realizing it. I’m here to make a deal with this demon.”

Liu Guoguo’s parents exchanged skeptical looks. They weren’t entirely convinced, but desperation and hope hung in their gazes.

It was possible that Bai Liu was a fraud who knew something about Li Gou. After all, they had already tried everything, even hiring a fortune-teller to perform a superstition for Guoguo’s soul—a practice they would have once laughed at.

“What are your terms?” the mother asked cautiously. “Is it money? Because we don’t have much left.”

Bai Liu smiled. “I told you from the start—I don’t want money. What I want is the right to your soul debts. Unharmed.”

He was just curious what would happen to the system if he preemptively acquired these [player] souls before they even entered [the game].

Would it give him higher access to these players than the system had?

If Bai Liu had more soul authority than [the system] itself over the parents, could he manipulate their systems to his advantage? Ultimately, could he dominate the system?

Bai Liu liked money, but he hated the idea of being controlled in order to earn it. That oppressive feeling, like being the lowliest employee in a company, was something he wanted to avoid. So, he wanted to see if he could turn the tables, seize control, and gain supreme authority.

Suddenly, the coin hanging from Bai Liu’s chest began to glow, sending a jolt of warning signals into his ears.

[System Warning: About to block player Bai Liu’s old wallet skill!]

Bai Liu sighed, clearly disappointed. “Can’t I even grab the soul of a [reserve player] that [the game] has taken a liking to while the [real world] is under observation...?”

It made sense that [the game] wouldn’t allow a player to have higher privileges than it. If Bai Liu were the game designer, he’d do the same. But still, it was worth a try, even if it didn’t work.

He was about to give up when he noticed something strange: the fish scales hanging from his chest began to grow, slowly wrapping around the coin.

The cool scales wrapped around the warm coin, cooling it down instantly. The system emitted a harsh, electric scream.

[Warning – Zizi – Invasion by anomalous data in fish scale – Invasion by bug data – Undergoing anomalous data clearance – Clearance failed – Anomalous data overwhelming – Zizzy Zizzy]

A sudden jolt of electricity surged through the system, and then a cold, magnetic voice emerged from the chaos.

[System: Hello, Bai Liu. Do you wish to use your personal skills?]

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, intrigued. The voice had a slight familiarity to it, colder than the system's usual voice but almost... pleasant. It reminded him of the NPC he met, [Siren King]...

He smirked. [Of course, I will.]

Liu Guoguo's parents couldn't make sense of what Bai Liu was saying. They hesitated, but desperation still outweighed their doubt. Even if Bai Liu was a fraud, even if it was all nonsense, they were willing to try anything for a glimmer of hope.

The mother broke down first, covering her face and kneeling. Tearfully, she said, "If you can get Li Gou killed, you can have anything you want! Take it all! I'll give you all the money I have!"

She was treating Bai Liu like some sort of triad.

Bai Liu smirked, shaking his head. "No, I won't ask for a penny of your money. On the contrary, I'll return something to you."

He pulled the two coins the noodle shop owner had given him from his old wallet, spread them out in the palm of his hand, and handed them over.

"I'll buy your souls for a dollar each," he said softly. "Will you make this deal with me?"

The mother gritted her teeth and took the coin. After a few seconds of hesitation, the father took it as well.

"Willingly."

No matter what this man did, as long as he helped them take revenge for Guoguo, they were willing to give it a shot, even if he was a psychopath spouting nonsense.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu used 2 RMB to purchase the souls of Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu is the preferred purchaser of Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua and has the highest authority to transfer the right to sell Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua's soul debt in part.]

Xiang Chunhua felt a strange warmth spreading through her body, like something heavy was being pulled from her soul and stored somewhere else.

She looked at Bai Liu, who was smiling, and felt an inexplicable sense of trust and sincerity.

“Your name is Bai Liu, right?” she asked drowsily. “What do you do? Where can we find you?”

“I’m unemployed,” Bai Liu answered with a glance at a new coin in his wallet. “You’ll find me in a game, and hopefully, when I see you again, you’ll have made it through the first game alive.”

The coin in his hand shimmered, showing Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu standing beside Guoguo’s tombstone. Their tear-streaked faces were filled with despair, as they gently stroked the stone as if caressing their child’s head. The photograph on the stone was of Guoguo, smiling as if under an umbrella, protected from the rain. At the bottom right corner of the coin was [2 Yuan], and on the back, [Soul Coin]. The coin’s inscription read: [Not issued by the system bank, highest authority does not belong to the system, belongs to the owner Bai Liu.]

Bai Liu smiled slightly.

[Hey, new system, well done.]

The system was silent for two seconds. [Thanks for the compliment.]

The fish scales around the coin warmed before returning to their usual coldness.

With less than two days left before the system’s mandatory weekly game countdown, Bai Liu prepared for the game.

He finished up his tasks, messaged Muke that he was entering the game, and tried calling Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu, but they didn’t answer. They were likely already asleep, ready for the game.

Bai Liu showered, changed into his favorite cozy clown nightcap with pompoms, and pulled on Benny’s pajamas. Lying under the duvet, he held the coin close to his chest and murmured to himself.

[Login to the game.]

[System: Is player Bai Liu confirmed to log in?]

Bai Liu closed his eyes. [Confirmed.]

[System: Accessing…]

Suddenly, Bai Liu snapped his eyes open, jumped out of bed, ran to the bathroom to turn off all the valves—gas, water, and electricity—and then lay back down with a satisfied sigh.

“Now, you can start logging in, or I’ll waste money by leaving these valves open while I’m asleep, leaking water, electricity, and gas.”

[System: ……]

[System: Logging into the game now…]

Bai Liu fell into a swirling black sleep. When he awoke, he found himself standing in a hall full of people.

[System: Since player Bai Liu has a small amount of popularity, would you like to adjust your appearance to hide your identity?]

[You can adjust your appearance? Bai Liu thought, curious. [Can I design my own appearance?]]

He was quite good at sketching faces.

[System: Yes, you can enter the independent face design program for 300 points. Will player Bai Liu proceed?]

[Oh, I have to pay, huh? Bai Liu quickly gave up, thinking, [Then just do whatever you want for free.]

[System: Entering random face adjustment program—eye color change (black → blue), hair color change (black → seven colors), lip color (flesh → black)...]

Bai Liu wasn’t expecting anything too appealing, but he didn’t mind. He accepted the weird, killer look with open arms. After all, he wouldn’t even be able to see it.

Lobby

Bai Liu was browsing the forums on the game manager, walking around to learn more about the inner workings of the game.

The game lobby consists of three areas: the [Live TV] area, the [Game Login] area, and the [Game Logout] area.

Players can log in to the game in the [Game Login Area]. After logging in, the game will be featured on various mini TVs in the [Live Mini TV] area. Those who succeed will log out in the [Game Logout Area], while those who fail will be trapped in the game forever, either fully transformed into monsters or dying.

The most complex of the three areas is the [Live Small TV] area.

This area is a maze, with different sections decorated in a variety of ways, set in a mosaic of each other. Bai Liu almost lost his focus in the overwhelming variety of zones and promotions, with millions of small TVs showing different players playing the game.

Bai Liu's TVB has been to the [Newcomer Zone], [Deadly Comedy Zone], and [Single Player Zone]—just three of the thousands of zones in the [Live TVB Zone]. The promotions vary greatly, with dozens of different categories in one zone.

However, some promotion spots are more prestigious than others.

Among all the promotion spots, the most difficult to attain and the most valuable is the [King of Central Hall Promotion Spot]. This can only be accessed by the top 10 players in the day's overall stats, and it has almost become a place for the gods.

Bai Liu had seen on the forums that no newcomer has reached this promotion spot in a long time. The first and second places are so unchanging that as soon as [Spades] and [Queen Hearts] enter the game, their little TVs are the first and second on the [King's Promotion].

The top promotion for newcomers is the [Central Hall Nightmare Rising Star Promotion], where Mu Sicheng is perennially in fourth place.

The [Central Lobby Core Promotion] that Bai Liu was in last time is decent, but among all the promotions, it's considered a [Premium Promotion], a spot with more paying users. It’s still one level below the [Top Promotion], the most prestigious spot that nearly all players pay attention to and spend points to view.

Mu Sicheng often says he has trouble getting into the Central Lobby core promotion because his performance is inconsistent. When Mu Sicheng plays well, he skips the promotion and heads straight for the Nightmare Nova promotion. But when his performance is lacking, he can't even reach the core promotion.

Along with the best promotion spots, there are, of course, the worst.

Bai Liu's footsteps stopped at the entrance of a deserted, dump-like area.

The walls in this area were pure white, and the small TVs were stacked haphazardly in a small mountain of crookedly arranged screens. The players inside appeared to be struggling to survive.

Most of the TVs were full of static. It didn’t look like the small TVs were of good quality, and some were even snowy, making it unclear whether the players inside were dead or alive.

The ‘TV mountain’ stretched endlessly, like a train spilling out from the doorway where Bai Liu stood, into a void of pure white.

The sounds of countless players, twisted and desperate, filled the space, much like the futuristic, abandoned electronic landscapes Bai Liu had seen on TV. The sign at the entrance of this area, which looked ready to fall off at any moment, read in crooked letters: [The Land of the Nameless].

This game is so blatantly cruel that the highest player rank is [King], while the lowest-ranked players don't even deserve a name.

This is the only area without categorized promotion spots, and there’s no need to differentiate. The promotion in this area should be the same for every small live TV, as there isn’t a single viewer. Players who fall into this area have almost no chance of turning things around. It's like a prison for the game, a place where only those who have been completely abandoned and given up end up.

Bai Liu stood in this cold, silent [no man's land], pondering something, while the forum buzzed with discussion about him.

[The seven-day countdown is almost up for Bai Liu, the new player who made it into the VIP pool on his first video. Place your bets on what game he picks next!]

1L: He's really good at playing with unconventional strategies. I've replayed his last gameplay video of Siren Smallville three times, and each time, I have a new experience. I'm dying to see him play a new game!

2L: Me too! I want to see him play multiplayer! Single-player games aren't nearly as rewarding or exciting as multiplayer. In multiplayer, it's so much more competitive and fun. It's like I'm watching Bai Liu go up against the big boys!

3L: It's true that Bai Liu likes to play unconventional strategies, but in multiplayer, it's easier to do that, right? I can't be sure that everyone will follow his strange ideas. Multiplayer is far more variable than single-player.

Second, if he encounters killer-type players, those who steal points and props, Bai Liu could easily become a target and get killed. The lobby prohibits stealing and murder, but the game doesn't.

4L: I think he'd be better off staying in the single-player area. The multiplayer area, where all the big players are, is not suited for Bai Liu. His F-level panel attributes might not even allow him to complete the first main quest before he's killed by other players...

5L: Not necessarily. Didn't Bai Liu reach Super A level in Siren Town by dropping his Mental Value and going berserk? It doesn't mean he'll get abused when facing big players, does it?

7L: ... I weakly say this, but I think Bai Liu's "Berserk Peak" from last time, with his spirit value of 1, to reach Super A player level, was pure luck. If his spirit value doesn't stabilize, he could die right away.

8L: Multiplayer areas need players with balanced attributes. Bai Liu's intelligence is too high, and his attack value is too low. He's really not suited for multiplayer. He'd be seeking death if he entered that area.

9L: The core point of multiplayer games is competition. The first-place player in the game gets the rewards, and other players get nothing. In multiplayer, everyone is racing to the top, but Bai Liu has no competitive advantage in a single-player environment. Seems like he's depending on some big player as his think tank...

10L: If a guild is willing to support him, equip Bai Liu with a high-attack team, and let him manipulate other players as the “brain,” it could work in multiplayer. Just like that one player, ranked 199th in the leaderboard, [the Puppet Master], who reached the top 200 by controlling other players.

11L: What’s wrong with you upstairs? I’m actually a fan of [Puppet Master]. You clearly don’t get it. [The Puppet Master] is a big name in the King’s Guild, and the Guild is supporting him lavishly! All the [Puppet Players] under his control are hand-picked by the King’s Guild. Each one of them could easily beat Bai Liu in terms of panel attributes, and [Puppet Master] himself has an intelligence value of 93, okay?

Bai Liu is only at 89! Except for last time when he was lucky and there were no big gods on the stream, Bai Liu accidentally made it into the top 100. But now, his ranking has fallen to over 3,000. [Puppet Master] is consistently in the top 200!

12L: [Puppet Master] is so cautious and smart. I’ve followed his game videos for many periods, but I still can’t figure out what he looks like. Sometimes I can’t even figure out which player he is...

13L: Don’t even think about it, they’ve already recruited. A player named Li Gou seems to have applied...

Wang Shun chuckled at most of the comments on the forum, particularly those claiming that Bai Liu’s success in the core promotion was just luck. He shook his head and closed the game manager.

It seems everyone has completely forgotten that Bai Liu’s Luck is only 0. If Bai Liu is lucky, then aren’t they the darlings of the gods of luck, with the average player having a random Luck value of 30?

However, Wang Shun did agree with some points made on the forum.

Bai Liu isn’t really suited to multiplayer games right now, since they concentrate over 80% of players in one place, and the competition is fierce. Bai Liu did achieve Super A player-level physical quality last time, but he had to drop his mental value to 1 to do so.

With a spirit value of 1, it's far too dangerous for him to even try clearing the monsters.

Although Bai Liu has potential, he's still in the developmental stage. It's best not to jump into the brutal [multiplayer zone], where the death rate is high and competition even more intense. It's better to focus on building up his panel attributes in the [single-player] zone first.

Or, he could join a Grand Guild directly.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

As a member of the King's Guild, Wang Shun's personal skills were primarily focused on information gathering, so he was responsible for two main tasks: one was to collect data on all kinds of game passages, and the other was to find potential newcomers for the guild and recruit them. Wang Shun hesitated when he saw the announcement that the King's Guild was recruiting [puppet players].

If he reported Bai Liu now, Bai Liu's superior intelligence and mental stats would likely be noticed by the [Puppet Master], forcing him to be selected as a [Puppet Player].

For the average player, being chosen as a [puppet player] seemed like a good opportunity, but for a newcomer like Bai Liu, who had the potential to develop into an S-rank player, it would be a waste to become a puppet.

When Wang Shun analyzed the stats, he found that the players who had been turned into puppets by the [Puppeteer] had either stagnated or their stats had slowly deteriorated after becoming puppets.

The [Puppeteer], on the other hand, had gone from a mere 71 IQ points to 93, with the rest of his stats also soaring.

Only Wang Shun, who handled data collection and analysis within the King's Guild, knew these figures well. He had suspected for some time that the [Puppeteer]'s personal skill was not just [Player Manipulation] but also [Potential Siphoning]. Many players were unaware of this, believing the [Puppeteer]'s skill was only [Player Manipulation].

Wang Shun had seen many high-potential players he had rated end up as puppets, their abilities drained, becoming mediocre or even dying in the game. They went from being a polished gem to a broken piece of clay.

Wang Shun, though feeling sorry for them, had to accept the unavoidable reality: the game was a harsh place where the weak were exploited and discarded by the strong.

This was why joining a guild wasn't always the best option for players like Bai Liu, who was too valuable and could easily be controlled and exploited by the guild's higher-ups.

Coincidentally, it was the same [Puppeteer] who had wanted Mu Sicheng to join the King's Guild. Mu Sicheng had outright rejected the invitation, stating that he would never be a puppet under anyone's control.

Mu Sicheng had suffered greatly at the hands of this [Puppeteer] but later grew stronger, climbing to around 300 in the overall rankings before being abandoned by the [Puppeteer].

But Bai Liu, a promising new player ranked in the mid-3,000s, was not so easily overlooked by the [Puppeteer].

Although Wang Shun had refrained from submitting Bai Liu's information to the King's Guild for selfish reasons, Bai Liu's exceptional performance and stats had caught the attention of the [Puppeteer].

The [Puppeteer] had been stuck at 93 IQ points for a long time, needing a player with high intelligence as "sustenance" for his growing mental capacity.

Who better than a new player like Bai Liu, who had only played one game? No one.

Wang Shun wanted to warn Bai Liu about the [Puppeteer], who was also eyeing him, but Bai Liu's bizarre appearance—wearing a colorful chicken's nest head and black lipstick—was so unusual that even Lu Yizhan, who had known Bai Liu for over ten years, might not have recognized him.

Surprisingly, someone did recognize Bai Liu through his odd appearance.

Mu Sicheng crossed his arms and looked at Bai Liu, standing at the entrance of the game. "...Bai Liu, what has the real world done to you, turning you into this...thing in just a few days?"

"You can recognize me?" Bai Liu was slightly surprised.

He had been wandering around in this disguise for several rounds without anyone recognizing him, but Mu Sicheng recognized him instantly.

Mu Sicheng smiled smugly, revealing a hint of his tiger teeth. “I can recognize you in any disguise, Bai Liu. I told you I’d make you pay back everything you stole from me last time. You can’t hide from me! I can find you!”

“You don’t recognize people by appearance...” Bai Liu glanced at the creepy hip-hop monkey hat on Mu Sicheng’s head. “You recognized me by my sense of smell, didn’t you? Your skill is related to this monkey, right? Enhanced five senses?”

Mu Sicheng’s smile grew wider. “Wrong guess. My skill isn’t enhanced five senses, but I did recognize you by your smell. You have a strong scent of copper... or money.”

“That should smell pretty good.” Bai Liu shrugged noncommittally as he looked at Mu Sicheng. “What do you want from me?”

“One player looking for another player…” Mu Sicheng glanced at the massive game login screen behind Bai Liu, a smile on his face. “To play the game, of course. I won’t let you hunker down in a single-player game. It’s too boring and the death rate is too low.”

Bai Liu nodded approvingly. “I gave up on this poverty division once I found out that multiplayer rewards ten times the points of single-player.”

“...” Mu Sicheng’s attempts to scare Bai Liu were falling flat. He looked at Bai Liu, who was carefully choosing a multiplayer game, with an incomprehensible expression. “Wait, Bai Liu, aren’t you afraid? It’s easy to die in multiplayer games.”

Behind Bai Liu, the huge entrance screen displayed a variety of games. Bai Liu, with his chin resting on his hand, scanned through them without sparing Mu Sicheng a glance. He spoke lightly: “Objectively speaking, I have a fear of death, but this fear is nothing compared to the fear that poverty brings.”

Mu Sicheng, still puzzled, asked, “You didn’t panic when you entered this game? Aren’t you too calm?”

Bai Liu, still looking at the screen, responded with two minds. “The reason I’m calm and not scared is probably because I came to this game with the mindset of coming to work.”

“Come to work?” Mu Sicheng was speechless. “You came to work in a horror game?”

“Yeah, I get five days off a week for a good job, make at least 200,000 each time, there’s no boss docking my pay, and I don’t have to deal with humans who don’t understand me, or fudge or barely communicate with them. I just do what I’m good at—play horror games. That’s it.”

Bai Liu finally turned to look at Mu Sicheng and shrugged. “Apart from the slightly higher mortality rate, but I work late at night in the real world and don’t know when I’ll suddenly die, so the high mortality rate doesn’t bother me. Honestly, this job pays well, and I would never find that in the real world.”

Mu Sicheng: “…”

Mu Sicheng felt like he’d just been convinced by Bai Liu.

“Can I ask you something?” Bai Liu pointed to the variety of games displayed on the huge wall. “Are there only 100 horror games on this screen? The number of small TVs and players suggests there should be more. I’m curious if there are other games.”

Bai Liu had been browsing for a while but hadn’t found any popular threads about the games. Now that Mu Sicheng was here, he took the opportunity to ask.

“There are more types of horror games, and we don’t know exactly how many there are.” Mu Sicheng shrugged. “This wall only shows 100 games at a time. Once those 100 are filled, the screen refreshes with new games. Sometimes, the same games appear again.”

Bai Liu rubbed his chin thoughtfully. “So, there’s a general ‘pool’ of games, and players don’t know exactly how many are in there.”

“Right.” Mu Sicheng confirmed.

Bai Liu nodded. “So, each time the system picks 100 games from the pool and shows them here. Sometimes we get a repeat, but usually, it’s all new questions. Guilds probably track the answers to difficult games, helping members clear them faster. New players get recruited and learn these answers to progress.”

Bai Liu’s gaze hardened slightly. “And once they hit a certain level, guilds stop relying on answers and focus on senior players. That’s when the exploitation begins. Low-level players pay points and give up their props to senior players who keep them in the guild.”

Bai Liu sighed. “The guild’s structure is designed for exploitation. Newcomers are the bottom leeks, harvested by those above them.”

Mu Sicheng stayed silent, but Bai Liu’s analysis was spot on.

Bai Liu glanced at him. “What are you looking at me like that for?”

“I was thinking…” Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. “Is your intelligence really only 89? You’re more perceptive than that!”

Bai Liu shrugged nonchalantly, as if it were no big deal.

Just outrageous! How the hell did this guy deduce that?

He had only answered a few words about the type of game, and this guy had already flipped the whole system of guilds in the game over and over to smooth it out!

"A lot of newcomers join guilds in order to survive, because the high rollers in the guild protect them through the levels. Although they need to pay a third of the points they get for passing, it makes them safer and less likely to die. But a high-potential newcomer like you should be groomed straight away. I was just about to ask you why you didn’t join the guild," Mu Sicheng ripped open a lollipop and held it in his mouth, looking somewhat defeated. "Now I don’t think I need to ask."

"Because it’s stupid to join a guild," Bai Liu said bluntly. "There won’t be any public interest groups in a game like this that will kill you, and it’s bound to be profitable to help you."

"Although in the short term it may seem that the guild helps you reduce your mortality rate, paying large amounts of points to the guild is self-defeating in a game like this, where personal performance is what attracts an audience. And by the time the guild can no longer benefit from you, it will surely give up on you. With most of your points and props surrendered, you’ll have no capital to survive on your own, and you’ll inevitably die."

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu with amazement, a little amused. "What exactly do you do in the real world? How do you know so much about how guild organizations work?"

Indeed, many useless low-level players were rarely brought in by later guild high rollers.

"That's how the vast majority of companies in this world run," Bai Liu said flatly. "They paint a big picture and supposedly offer internal resources to attract employees. Then, when the employees are worn out and their productivity drops, they fire them to hire younger workers and squeeze them dry."

Bai Liu's face remained expressionless. "I'm just a bottom-tier social animal who gets fired and exploited in the real world, so entering the game and joining the guild to be exploited is absolutely out of the question."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

This guy exudes so much resentment when he talks about life as a social animal…

"So, have you decided which game you want to go to?" Mu Sicheng glanced at the screen. "Is there a game you like, or do you want to take another look?"

"The login limit for single-player games is one hundred, and all the single-player games on this screen are already full," Mu Sicheng pointed to the [FULL] symbol in the bottom right corner of a game icon. With a lollipop in his mouth, he vaguely explained to Bai Liu, "If the game icon has this mark [FULL], it means the game is full, and no new players can log in."

"And for multiplayer games, each one has a different login limit. I've played games with only four people and others with fifty, depending on the game. By the way, this Haunted Mansions, City of Doom, and Ghost Power multiplayer game are all games that have appeared before."

Mu Sicheng pointed at a few games. "Do you want to play any of these? I can help you find some clearance information for them, but not for free."

"No." Bai Liu refused without hesitation. "Even with the information, playing an old game would mean I'm much slower to react than players who've been in the guild for a long time and are familiar with the strategies. My strengths would be better used in a new game."

"That's true," Mu Sicheng said, nibbling on his lollipop. "You're quite adventurous. Most newcomers still go for the old games for stability."

"My aim is to earn money, not to survive," Bai Liu replied flatly. "I need to win, and I need to be number one to get enough points."

"You're really weird—" Mu Sicheng thought for a moment, giving up on understanding Bai Liu's reasoning. He wrinkled his nose in a thoughtless manner. "You earn so many points, but if you die in the game, you won't have anywhere to spend them."

Bai Liu replied naturally, "I don't earn points to spend them. I earn them to hoard, and..." He suddenly smiled in a strange, unsettling way. Bai Liu turned his head to look at Mu Sicheng, who froze for a moment at the suddenness of his smile. "Do you think I'll die in the game?"

"I'm still a bit confident that playing horror games, which is what I'm best at, I probably won't die that easily," Bai Liu smiled. "I'm better at designing levels in games and letting other players die, but I've never died in a game designed by someone else."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

What the hell does this guy do in real life? Is he really not a criminal or something?

"Why isn't there a single logged-in player for this game?" Bai Liu tapped on the game icon of a burning train on the screen. The icon zoomed into the game manager on Bai Liu's chest. Bai Liu tapped on the icon to check the game's specific information. "Burst Last Train?"

It stood out a bit among the hundred games on the screen, being the only one still empty.

[Game Copy Name: "Bursting Last Train"]
[Level: Level 2 (games with a player mortality rate greater than fifty percent and less than eighty percent are Level 2 games)]
[Mode: Multiplayer (0/7)]
[General Description: This is an exciting collection-oriented multiplayer game. The burning last train in flames, shattered glass fragments, and charred corpses hanging from hoops have made many players linger and stay forever~]

Mu Sicheng furrowed his brow at the icon. "You want to play this?"

"What's wrong with this game?" Bai Liu asked.

Mu Sicheng paused. "It's actually an old game that's been on the game screen a few times, but there's no clearance information available."

Bai Liu instantly understood. The game wall refreshes only when all games are full, so several groups of players must have entered already. But there were no records of any passes…

Bai Liu looked sideways at Mu Sicheng. "All the players who went in before died?"

"It's strange. If there aren't any players passing..." Bai Liu's eyes swept over the "Burst Last Train" icon. His finger tapped twice on the "mortality rate" line. "How is the mortality rate of this game less than 80% and more than 50%? The mortality rate should be 100% based on the number of players wiped out."

Mu Sicheng scoffed, poking his pocket in disbelief. "It's just a grading system for games. Almost all games have this kind of grading."

"If the mortality rate is actually measured like you said, then any game that doesn't have a 100% mortality rate should have pass players and pass stats. But I've watched VIP library videos and asked a lot of qualified players, and I haven't found any who've cleared this 'Burst Last Train.' I think there really haven't been any clearances."

Bai Liu suddenly gave Mu Sicheng a meaningful look. "Just because you haven't noticed it doesn't mean it's not there."

"The mortality rate of 'Burst Last Train' is between 80% and 50%, so if you're saying that at least 20% of players who've cleared this game actually exist—" Mu Sicheng started to speak but paused, realizing the implications. "With such a small group of players having successfully cleared it, they would have posted about it on forums, or someone would've seen the TV or video, right? There can't be no trace of them."

"How many players do you think there are in this game?" Bai Liu turned his head to look directly at Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng was stunned. "I don't know, but there must be a lot."

"Has such a group of players ever existed in real life?" Bai Liu rhetorically asked. "Can everything we say about the game be seen by people in the real world? Can what we say about the game exist in any form or be remembered by anyone outside the game? For those not in the game, does the player even have a trace of existence? Of course not."

Mu Sicheng was completely dumbfounded by Bai Liu's question.

Bai Liu asked the final question without skipping a beat. "Okay, now back to the first question: If game players have no trace of existence in the real world, do you think we exist?"

"Of course we exist," Bai Liu answered quickly. "Our traces of existence have just been erased. So is it possible that at least 20% of the players who've cleared 'Burst Last Train' are the same way? That their existence has been erased by the game or the system?"

Mu Sicheng enlightened. "Their clearance data and player data have been deleted!"

"It's likely that they've been 'deleted' themselves," Bai Liu said, staring at the icon for 'Burst Last Train.' "These players who cleared the game are probably dead, or they wouldn't have returned for a second look."

Mu Sicheng got goosebumps from Bai Liu, but he was still a bit offended. "But everything you say is based on the fact that the game's mortality rate is actually measured. What if the player mortality rate is just virtual in the game…"

Mu Sicheng froze mid-sentence.

Bai Liu glanced up at him. "As you've probably realized by now, mortality is a statistic that can't be measured virtually."

"Have you studied statistics?" Bai Liu asked Mu Sicheng. "There are two values in statistics that must actually be measured: one is the birth rate, and the other is the death rate."

As he spoke, he casually tapped twice on the 'Burst Last Train' icon on his game panel. To Mu Sicheng's horrified stare and screams, Bai Liu eased into the game.

Mu Sicheng broke down. "How did you suddenly get in there?!"

Bai Liu faded from view, thoughtfully replying to Mu Sicheng's words, "I'm curious about what exactly this player data from the cleared 'Burst Last Train' the system specifically removed. Experience has taught me that the deeper something is hidden by the higher-ups, the more lucrative it is..."

[The game "Burst Last Train" has gathered one player; six more players are needed to start]

Chapter End Notes

YEAH!!! Another arc begins :)

Statistics make my head hurt, thought 🤯

Burst Last Train

Bai Liu's silhouette disappears under Mu Sicheng's frantic jumping feet.

Mu Sicheng bit his nail caps and circled anxiously around the spot where Bai Liu had disappeared, crouching down and pulling his hair out a few times, crushing the lollipop in his mouth, before finally stifling and gnashing his teeth as he clicked on the "Burst Last Train" icon on the screen and entered the game right after Bai Liu.

Mu Sicheng, a second before entering the game, was mumbling to himself in a depressed voice: "Shit, this Bai Liu guy, he's got me curious too, I've never entered a secondary game without any preparation!"

Two players have been added to the game, five more players are needed to start the game.

Two minutes after Mu Sicheng disappeared, four players of almost identical height, build, and appearance appeared outside the screen.

Their faces were covered in those bizarre oil-painted puppet masks, and they walked as if they were puppets on strings, their limbs stopping at each step in a strange way, as if they were four identical puppet toys made by one skilled craftsman, the difference barely discernible to the naked eye.

The man at the head, or puppet, inquired in a low tone, "Bai Liu is into this game?"

The 'puppet' spoke with a wide curve of his mouth moving up and down, much like a puppet show in which the lower lip pretends to move and speak while the low, hoarse voice emanates from the string-bearer behind him.

The other puppet, who carried a butcher's knife behind his back, had a flash of vengeance in his eyes as he answered him with a respectful arch of his hand, "Yes, Lord [Puppeteer]."

"Bursting Last Train, is it?" The ink eyes painted on the puppet's face narrowed realistically, eventually giving an evil laugh, "A level 2 game, it seems that even if I don't lay a hand on Bai Liu, Bai Liu is unlikely to come out of this game alive. Such a high talent, what a shame to die, just the thing to use as my puppet."

"Go!"

In one neat movement, the four puppets tapped the screen for Burst Last Train and disappeared in unison to the boarding gate.

[The game "Burst Last Train" has 6 players and needs one more player to start]

A man in a pullover jumper, with thick flat glasses and a very thick, large part in his hand, a student boy at first glance, appeared on the screen next to the boarding entrance.

His beer-bottle-thick, square-framed glasses are so large they cover half of his face, and the bottom half of his face, with scattered freckles on the bridge of his nose and his head cowering under his jumper, might, if Bai Liu were to look at him, identify this player as Jeff from Siren.

But he looks a little softer and more normal than Jeff, and seems to be a normal student.

But it's in the game, a normally dressed student, that seems surprisingly out of place.

"Eh, let's see, which game do I pick ....." The player pushed his glasses, looking closer to the screen as if he was wearing presbyopic glasses, tapping on his Game Manager's admin panel as he did so.

The personal panel on his game manager clearly shows:

[Player name: Du Sanying]

[Today's Rising Star Ranking: 3rd place - You have surpassed Mu Sicheng, the 4th place player in the Rising Star Ranking, by 170,000 points, he will never be able to catch up with you in the near future.]

[Achieved: The winner who did nothing, the lucky one who survived, the player who was inexplicably ignored by the monster, the fighter who missed a hundred shots against your attacks.]

[The items you bought in the game shop are being discounted from 10,000 points to one point, do you want to buy them?]

[Congratulations to player Du Sanying who has won the top player prize pack with a 1 in 100,000 chance of winning! Will you collect it now?]

...

Du Sanying seemed to have grown accustomed to these skyrocketing fortunes to the point of numbness. He did not claim any of the rewards or freebies and crossed off the screens all the way to the last page of his personal panel. Du Sanying pushed his glasses on and almost put his face to the panel squinting his eyes, searching for the information he wanted on the panel.

[Luck Value: 100 (You are also the luckiest person in the world today, you are the favored one by the god of luck, follow your intuition and choose the game you want! Choose the one that makes you the luckiest!]

"Is the luck value a hundred today too?" Du Sanying scanned the entire screen a little hesitantly, "In that case, then it's best to go with your gut instinct and pick, then-"

Du Sanying's hand hovered over the icon, and he had a sudden, creepy feeling that something very lucky and very unlucky would happen if he clicked on it, something he had never felt before when Du Sanying was 100% lucky to choose a game.

He's always had the feeling of being very sure that he'll be lucky if he picks it before, but this time it feels like if he picks this game something will happen that will make him suffer a lot but make him very lucky at the same time ...

Du Sanying tossed his head and hesitated for a long time before double-clicking on the game icon for "Last Train to Burst".

[Game "Explosive Last Train" is complete, the game begins -]

A [FULL] mark pops up in the bottom right corner of the icon of the train under fire on the big screen in "Explosive Last Train," and the next second, Bai Liu opens his eyes in a crowded underground station.

At the same time, seven small TV screens lit up in the hall, one of which showed Bai Liu's calm, unmoving face in a crowded underground station.

Wang Shun's game manager, standing in the hall looking for Bai Liu, suddenly vibrated in quick succession.

[System Alert: Your favorite player Bai Liu has logged in to the game~ Please go and watch~]

[System Alert: You have collected the small TV player Mu Sicheng ……]

[System Alert: You have bookmarked …… player Zhang Gui Login to the game ……]

[System Alert: Your Collection …… Du Sanying Login to the game ……]

"No way ……" Wang Shun fell into an unprecedented trance after checking the message alerts on his game manager, "This guy, Bai Liu, 3rd and 4th on the Rising Stars list, and [Lift the Line Puppet Master] actually got into a multiplayer game, this is going to be a godsend ……"

As soon as Bai Liu opened his eyes, he received a system alert.

[Welcome players to "Bursting Last Train"]

[You are a passenger, now, please use the ticket in your pocket to enter the station in ten minutes and wait to board the last train that will explode.]

Bai Liu reached into his suit trouser pocket and took out a thin rigid metro ticket which read [Metro Line 4: Antique City → Antique City]. Bai Liu raised his eyebrows in slight surprise. The starting and ending stations on this ticket were actually the same name, if not for the fact that the two platforms were renamed...

Bai Liu glanced at the interior of the station, trying to find a map of the line inside this station, and soon Bai Liu saw it next to the ticket counter.

Line 4 is a very eye-catching red line, which Bai Liu instantly found on the line map.

"It's true, Line 4 is a closed loop metro line." Bai Liu looked knowingly at the red Line 4 that wrapped around the city, "The starting and ending stations overlap, they're both the same, they're both this station called Antique City."

Bai Liu wandered around the station and found no extra information other than a few more advertisements. The only thing he found a bit out of place was the design of the station, which normally has escalators at both the exit and entry points.

Normally, the escalators at the exit should go up for the convenience of passengers, while the escalators at the entrance should go down, but here the design of the station is reversed, which is slightly unnatural for Bai Liu.

Another thing that struck Bai Liu as odd — he glanced at the electronic LED clock hanging on top of the station.

[07:34].

It seemed relatively normal, but Bai Liu looked at the time a few more times and realised that it was not going forward, but backwards, and Bai Liu's eyes blinked and it became [07:12], which made him react quickly.

"It's a countdown clock watch, not a clock." Bai Liu pondered, "And it still looks like a countdown for me, meaning I have six minutes left before I have to enter the station."

Bai Liu was in no hurry, even though there were only six or seven minutes left in the countdown. He exited the station once and found that it was pitch black outside, no sound, no light, nothing.

Bai Liu took his time to look at the map again, this time focusing on the names of the stations on Line 4.

"The name Mirror Museum ....." Bai Liu's eyes fell on it, caught up in a seemingly enlightened memory, "Why do I feel like I've heard that name before..."

Bai Liu was trying to remember where he'd heard that name before when a male voice interrupted his memory: "Shit! Bai Liu! Why aren't you inside yet!" Mu Sicheng glanced back from the platform to see a pervert stroking his chin and squinting at the underground map, and walked over to him while speechless: "Only a minute or so left, what are you doing here? Remembering the map?"

Bai Liu was not surprised that Mu Sicheng had followed him in. He glanced at the red LED light, which was already counting down the seconds, and replied to Mu Sicheng with a nonchalant "hmm": "I was wondering if I had been to this place before... ..."

Mu Sicheng was stunned: "You've played this game?" But he quickly denied it again, "No way, you are indeed new."

"Yes, I haven't been to this place in the game." Bai Liu admits.

Mu Sicheng frowned at Bai Liu: "Then how could you have been to this place ....."

"Just because I haven't been here in the game doesn't mean I can't have been to this place, I think I should have been to this place in reality." Bai Liu withdrew his gaze from the underground line.

"Reality?!" Mu Sicheng was shocked, "You've been to this underground station in reality? How do you know?"

"If I'm right, it's supposed to be a horror game based on real-life events, have you heard of [Mirror City Bombing]?"

"Just social news about two thieves hiding a bomb in an antique mirror and robbing the museum by threatening it when they were about to deliver it to the local museum, only for the bomb to go out of control on the way and the whole underground to explode?"

Bai Liu talks to Mu Sicheng as he walks, he pulls out his ticket and [beeps] at the entry point and enters the station without a hitch: "I studied the underground station distribution and the underground map just now, and it's very likely that the game was designed after [the Mirror City bombing]."

"I've heard of it ....." Mu Sicheng also pulled out his ticket and followed him into the station, "but it's useless even if we knew, right? That case is so important because of its implications and it's still not known how the perpetrators hid the bomb. The case is not known because of its implications and it is still unknown how the perpetrators hid the bomb in the mirror to avoid security checks, and a lot of information has not been released to the public."

Mu Sicheng, after analyzing it, mocked with a noncommittal show of hands, "Even if we knew that the game was based on this case, we still don't know anything about what's going to happen on this last train that's going to explode, we don't know the details, we just know a source of inspiration, it's not useful at all, okay?"

"I might actually know what's going to happen on this train ....." Bai Liu rubbed his nose and gave Mu Sicheng an amiable smile, "I was on that underground train that day, I got off at the explosion stop before the explosion."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

Bai Liu shrugged innocently and said kindly to a stunned Mu Sicheng,

"Am I, in fact, getting important information that makes this game passable?"

"Sure, Mu Sicheng, I can tell you all the information I know, but not give it to you for free. If you don't believe me, you can verify if what I'm saying is true, I remember you have a prop to take a lie detector test."

This is what Mu Sicheng had said to Bai Liu before he entered the game, and now Bai Liu had returned it to Mu Sicheng intact.

Mu Sicheng was silent for a long time, then let out a stifled "fuck."

So, can you fucking well! This shit is actually on this train!!!

Mu Sicheng was quiet for a moment before tapping his points wallet. "Tell me what you know. How many points do you want? I'll consider buying your information for under three hundred points."

Mu Sicheng, who had watched Bai Liu's games once, had already discovered Bai Liu’s money-loving nature.

This man would never refuse a point that came his way, nor would he waste one more.

Bai Liu survived the blast, and he was one of those players who had managed to survive this [last train] in reality.

"Just give as many points as you like." Bai Liu reached into his jacket pocket, found an old wallet, and smiled more sincerely. "Mu Sicheng, what I want to talk to you about is this: I’ll tell you the settings and information of this game, and you can help me out when necessary. How about we cooperate for mutual benefit?"

Mu Sicheng looked Bai Liu up and down. Bai Liu met his gaze with sincere eyes. Mu Sicheng crossed his arms, raised an eyebrow, and showed a meaningful smile. "Cooperate with me? So you're giving me your information for free?"

"It can't be free," Bai Liu sighed, pretending to be generous as he waved his hand. "You're such a wealthy player, it’s a bit shameless to whore out my rich game material..."

He paused. "How about this: you give me a couple of hundred points, just a symbolic amount."

Mu Sicheng’s smile turned nasty. "A couple of hundred? You want to cooperate with a high roller like me, and you want me to spend a couple of hundred points on a reference material that you don’t even know how much it’s worth? You’re a dreamer. I still haven’t settled the account with you for stealing my 2,000-point prop for one point!"

Bai Liu: "...one point is fine."

"Wait," Mu Sicheng said, narrowing his eyes suspiciously. "I find it strange that you would seek cooperation with another player in this game. You don't seem like such a naive and gullible player. Do you really think that if I verbally promise to help you, I'll actually come through when the time comes?"

"Even though you're a newcomer, I see you as a competitor, and I don't underestimate you. You've got a lot of tricks up your sleeve—maybe even I'll fall prey to you. It's too strange for you to ask me for cooperation. It feels like a conspiracy."

Mu Sicheng eyed Bai Liu suspiciously, unable to believe that Bai Liu hadn't thought of this.

Apart from player collaborations in guilds, which have some credibility, the cooperation of other players in this game is essentially a blank check with no real guarantees.

For example, Mu Sicheng is a Super A player. When he gets information from Bai Liu, he can help if he wants to, but if he doesn't, what can Bai Liu do to a player ranked fourth in the Rising Stars?

"There is no conspiracy," Bai Liu spread his hands. "I truly want you to cooperate. This is a game with a level two mortality rate, and my panel attributes are only F. I die too easily if I don't seek cooperation with a great player like you. Also, I think we have a common enemy."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. "A common enemy?"

"The Puppeteer is also in this game," Bai Liu smiled. "I don't suppose you want to face a swarm-type player like the [Wire Puppeteer] alone?"

Mu Sicheng's face changed. "How did you know he's in this game?"

It was no surprise Mu Sicheng reacted strongly, as this man had haunted his mind during his struggling rookie days.

At one point, the Puppeteer had tried to make Mu Sicheng his puppet, and after being rejected multiple times, the Puppeteer still didn't give up. He joined forces with other players to capture Mu Sicheng, relentlessly hunting him with no regard for his life.

Each time, Mu Sicheng barely escaped. If not for his personal skills allowing him to move very fast, he would have been captured and turned into a puppet.

Even now, though Mu Sicheng was stronger, he was still extremely disgusted by the Puppeteer and didn't want to encounter him again.

If Bai Liu's approach to the game was unconventional, the [Puppeteer]'s approach was downright twisted.

The [Puppeteer], having failed to catch Mu Sicheng using conventional methods, soon devised a new plan using his brilliant mind—93 points of intelligence—and quickly found a way to trap Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng had almost been turned into a puppet.

No matter how fast Mu Sicheng ran, there was always someone who could catch him—someone he couldn't outrun.

At the time, Mu Sicheng was collaborating with a friend as a rookie. The two often played together, and because of their real-world relationship, they were close.

The Puppeteer somehow managed to turn this friend into a member of the King's Guild and secretly cooperated with his plan to ambush Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng had been deliberately introduced into a game by this friend, where the Puppeteer was waiting to ambush him.

Mu Sicheng was unprepared for the chaos and danger that awaited him.

Eventually, Mu Sicheng lost a hand, dropped to 18 spirit level, and had to fight his way out, killing all of the Puppeteer's [puppet players] before escaping. His body was half-alienated and drenched in blood, looking miserable and near delirium.

Since then, Mu Sicheng had become very hostile to the idea of cooperation.

It made sense that Bai Liu, the first to enter the game, didn't know who the other players were, so how could Bai Liu know that the later players included [The Puppeteer]?

Unless Bai Liu had made an arrangement to enter the same game as the Puppeteer.

This reminded Mu Sicheng of his own ambush, and his face grew more unpleasant. The red light in his eyes flashed like a warning signal.

Mu Sicheng's hand turned into a sharp, grey-black monkey claw, flexing his fingers as he concealed it behind his back, staring at Bai Liu. "Bai Liu, if you can't give me a reasonable explanation as to why you know that [The Puppeteer] is in this game, this could be the end of your journey."

Bai Liu opened his game manager for Mu Sicheng to see. The game panel had a red post: [The Puppeteer has entered the "Last Train to Explosion" and said he wants to capture Bai Liu as a puppet!]

Mu Sicheng froze, his dangerous expression momentarily stunned. "How can you open the forum? I don't remember being able to access it once I enter the game."

"My personal skill," Bai Liu explained, smiling as he extended his hand to Mu Sicheng. "I saw the forum post. I know you've been hunted down as a puppet."

Without saying much more, Bai Liu added, "All in all, we're on the same side now. Cooperation?"

"Of course, I don't accept freebies. One point is a good way to show your sincerity," Bai Liu joked, smiling.

Mu Sicheng narrowed his eyes as he ripped open a lollipop and popped it into his mouth. After a long stare, he finally reached out and conjured a point coin from thin air.

With a condescending smile, he pressed the coin into Bai Liu's hand. "Okay, let's work together. We'll share information and help each other. One point for good faith."

Mu Sicheng still held a grudge against Bai Liu for using the one-point trick and gave him one point in return.

Bai Liu closed his fingers around the point coin, his smile deepening. "I sense your sincerity now."

"My sincerity is—if you're crying and begging for my help by then," Mu Sicheng flicked the giant monkey headset he wore on his head, hanging it around his neck. The eerie voice ceased as he stuck his hands in his pockets and snorted. "Bai Liu, if you cry sincerely, I might reluctantly lend a helping hand."

Bai Liu raised the corner of his mouth, complying with Mu Sicheng's words. "No problem, I'll cry so sincerely, you won't be able to resist helping me."

At the same time, a system beep sounded in Bai Liu's head.

System Alert: A partnership deal between player Bai Liu and player Mu Sicheng has been struck.

In this game, player Mu Sicheng must help player Bai Liu whenever asked. If Mu Sicheng refuses, the system will force him to comply.

Looking at the meek, smiling Bai Liu, a sudden chill ran down Mu Sicheng's spine before he could ask for more details.

What's with this feeling of being taken advantage of?

While Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng waited for the last train, the game lobby and forums were buzzing with activity. The multiplayer section was packed with players eager to witness this rare gathering of gods.

"Holy shit! It's really the Puppeteer, God Mu, and the Parrot! How did the three of them end up in the same game?"

"It's so rare for gods to even crash a game anymore. They usually avoid each other. Three gods in one game? And it's a tier 2 game that hasn't been cleared before?!"

"Looks like the gods want something thrilling, huh... but this is way too exciting!"

"I'm so torn on who to watch. I'm a fan of the Parakeet, but he's always winning and the game ends too quickly. I want something more intense. Who should I pick for my show, God Mu or the Puppet Master?"

"I'm in the same dilemma. I just discovered Bai Liu! Ooooh, he was so cool last time. I recommend checking out his stream. It's just as good as God Mu and Puppet Master's!"

"Ugh, not this guy again. Why does Bai Liu always force his encore? It's a multiplayer game—no one's opening their mic, okay?"

"I just saw that he's talking about cooperating with God Mu. Does he not know that God Mu never teams up with anyone because he's been backstabbed? I think Bai Liu's gonna get tricked by him."

Bai Liu was becoming quite the sensation. Though his rank wasn't very high, his name was everywhere.

Last time, his intensely personal videos caught the attention of some viewers who admired him.

But, of course, opinions were divided. Some liked him, but others couldn't stand him—especially given his rapid progress despite his terrible personal stats, making him seem unconvincing. As a result, Bai Liu had a pretty bad reputation among the lower-tier players.

Burst last train

Most of the threads on the forum discussing Bai Liu end in heated arguments, especially when it comes to the recent [core promotion] and whether Bai Liu deserved it or not.

Many players believe Bai Liu doesn't deserve such a prestigious promotion because, despite his cleverness, his performance is poor. Others argue that if Bai Liu's on the promotion list, who cares whether he deserves it or not?

Wang Shun has watched a few of the debates and concluded that most players who dislike Bai Liu feel that he [doesn't deserve his position].

The last player to stir up such a major debate was Du Sanying, a newcomer.

Du Sanying's luck rating is 100, and everything he does seems perfect. His points flow into his account like money.

Some say Du Sanying is strong, that he has great personal skills, but this argument is often met with the response, [You can get Du Sanying's luck to clear it before you call him strong].

However, this criticism softened over time as Du Sanying rose to the top three on the Rising Stars list, and fewer players dared to speak out against him.

Now, Bai Liu, who has zero luck and has earned his [core promotion] purely through skill and ideas, still faces the same scrutiny. These players continue to believe he's [unworthy of his position].

It seems that it doesn't matter whether it's "virtuous" or not; what matters is the position itself. Anyone who reaches that level, regardless of who they are, is always deemed undeserving. As long as it's not themselves, others will always find a way to criticize and magnify their flaws.

Wang Shun shook his head and stopped listening to the discussions, but as he glanced at the small TVs in front of him, he struggled with the same question: whose small TV should he choose for the huddle?

Du Sanying is ranked third among the Rising Stars, but because he's never made a splash in the game, he doesn't attract many paying viewers. As a result, Du Sanying's TV streams are never pay-to-view.

Bai Liu, a newcomer, isn't on a paid model either.

However, Bai Liu, being a non-paying player, had far fewer viewers than Mu Sicheng and [Puppet Master], and he was even less popular than Du Sanying.

Du Sanying was always popular, and with no charge for his streams, this time—especially with the three gods in one game—many players who didn't want to pay flocked to Du Sanying's mini-TV stream. His audience was far larger than Mu Sicheng's and Puppet Master's.

Even the three [puppet players] under [Puppet Master], like Li Gou, were more popular than Bai Liu, thanks to the presence of a great god like [Puppet Master].

There was only one Bai Liu, and his stream was nearly empty.

With a sigh, Wang Shun walked into Bai Liu's section.

With so many gods crashing into the game, most viewers couldn't even watch their mini-TVs. Why would they pay attention to a newcomer? Bai Liu's mini-TV had lost most of its audience, so it was no surprise that no one was interested in it.

[301 people liked Bai Liu's TV, 170 people favorited it, 210 were watching, and no one was paying for it.]

[Please support player Bai Liu! Your likes are only one-hundredth of Du Sanying's, the top-ranked player in the combined small and medium TV stats for "Bursting Last Train"!]

"Du Sanying's likes are already at 30,000... How long has it been since the game started?" Wang Shun sighed deeply as he saw Du Sanying instantly claim the top spot and leave for the central lobby. Wang Shun gave Bai Liu a like, muttering, "Come on, Bai Liu, don't get stuck in the no-name section..."

Du Sanying stood outside the platform, almost pressing his glasses to the ticket to read the location. "How strange," he muttered to himself, "this ticket starts and ends at the same station..."

The countdown on the station LED clock reached [00:10], and as the stopwatch ticked into the 10-second countdown, the station lights suddenly flickered out. After a brief moment, they came back on, but now the light was a flickering, dark red.

At the end of the track, a train with red headlights emerged from the dark tunnel, like a beast with glowing red eyes ready to devour its prey. It slowly came to a stop in front of Du Sanying.

The female voice of the underground station announcer came through in a mechanical and cold tone: "Passengers on the train have arrived at the terminal station of Antique City. Please disembark at Antique City. The train will begin its next round of operation. If you need to depart, please board the train now—please get off at the destination of..."

As the announcement ended, the train doors slowly opened before Du Sanying. The smell of burnt meat wafted out, mixing with the wind from the train's high-speed arrival.

Du Sanying looked up at the underground line 4 train he was about to board. Under the flickering lights, he saw the train was empty at one end, the handrails swaying, and at the other end, it was filled with blurry-looking passengers, as crowded as a rush hour subway in a major city. Du Sanying couldn't even get on.

The red LED clock behind him flickered to [00:05], and the sound of the countdown made the station's air vents suddenly stop working.

The temperature in the station began rising rapidly, the loudspeakers distorting as the female voice became garbled, stuck on the strange word [44444], repeating endlessly. Du Sanying thought she was supposed to be saying "Line 4."

Around him, passengers slowly walked toward the train, their figures flickering eerily under the red and black light. Some suddenly burst into flames, turning into violently burning corpses.

The skin of these burning passengers cracked as flames consumed them, edges blackening and curling to reveal the yellowish, melted human fat beneath. The fat dripped to the ground as their limbs spasmed, sending up pungent black smoke. But they seemed oblivious to their condition, continuing to walk toward the train.

The train filled up with these charred bodies, some sitting, some standing, some holding onto handrails, others leaning against doors. The plastic handrails began to melt like butter under the heat, dripping onto the passengers, while the glass cracked under the pressure.

The passengers, oblivious to the horror, continued looking at their phones, which were so badly burned that the wiring was exposed.

If not for the flames on their bodies, they would look like tired commuters on the last train home.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying, please board the train quickly.]

"No way..." Du Sanying muttered, "What's with this game? A drive-by kill? This train is burnt to a crisp. Am I not just walking into a live barbecue?"

The audience watching the mini-TV laughed.

"Drive-by kill, this is hilarious! Don't worry, the only one dying is your little parrot!"

"Parrot, you need to believe in your luck! Maybe the flames will go out once you get on!"

"Shit, no!! Watch out, guys! There are players on the train!!!"

Among the passengers—burned, blackened, and smoking—one man in a white shirt and suit trousers, who appeared to be a regular office worker, leaned toward a man next to him, speaking in a strange manner.

The other man, a college student with a lollipop in his mouth, listened intently, his head tilted as he smiled impishly. His features were handsome, and the pair stood out like a beacon amid the chaos.

On a train full of charred and burning passengers, these two normal-looking figures were an eye-catching anomaly.

The small TV audience exploded in excitement:

"Shit, shit, shit!!! It's God Mu!!! God Mu is so handsome!!!"

"Holy shit, who's that commuter player? So calm."

Mu Sicheng watched with some amusement as Bai Liu reverted to his usual self. "Why have you switched back? You're not a killer anymore?"

"It's live, so of course I have to turn on the charm to seduce the audience." Bai Liu straightened his shirt sleeves and shamelessly added, "People are creatures of appearance, and I've got a good face, so I have to make the most of it to earn some money."

"But there's another reason." Bai Liu gave Mu Sicheng a sideways glance. "It makes it easier for the puppet master to find me."

The smile on Mu Sicheng's lips tightened, his annoyance barely concealed. "Bai Liu, are you really going to use yourself as bait to lure Zhang Gui? He's good, and your plan has a lot of holes. Even if I help, we might not be able to pull it off..."

"Shh." Bai Liu put a finger to his lips, glancing at the LED countdown clock that read [00:01]. "The countdown's almost up, a player's about to board."

"Suit yourself." Mu Sicheng leaned against the car door, arms crossed. "You're the one risking your life, not me. I don't care. You're just willing to get yourself killed."

Burst last train

The bodies hanging from the hoops and the other passengers in the carriage stayed in place, not attacking him. The flames blazing through Du Sanying's hair were a little hot but lacked the true texture of fire.

Bai Liu smiled kindly at Du Sanying. "Hello, my name is Bai Liu. I'm one of the players in this game."

Du Sanying awkwardly extended his hand. "Well, hello, my name is Du Sanying..."

Mu Sicheng looked at Du Sanying with surprise, as if he hadn't expected him to be in this game. However, he soon grunted, crossed his arms, and smiled coldly, ignoring him without saying a word.

Du Sanying, seemingly having expected this, grew more and more embarrassed. He cowered in the corner, barely speaking, until he couldn't hold his curiosity anymore and finally asked, "Bai Liu, how do you... know that the car won't be attacked?"

"These should just be a simple transitional animation," Bai Liu analyzed. "Since we haven't gotten the first mission that gives points, which means the game hasn't officially started yet, these are probably just here to scare the players and explain the background of the story. They won't really kill anyone."

Bai Liu then turned to Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying, who clearly had issues with each other. He asked Mu Sicheng, who hadn't said anything since Du Sanying's arrival, "What, do you have a grudge against this Du Sanying guy?"

Mu Sicheng shot Du Sanying a cold, hostile glance. Du Sanying was left feeling awkward, cowering behind a burning corpse as he peeked at their conversation.

Du Sanying wasn't very tall, a head shorter than Bai Liu, with thick bottle-cap glasses and a small frame that made him seem like a nerdy, over-prepared senior—harmless in that way that made Bai Liu call him "little friend."

"You'll understand after playing a game with Du Sanying once." Mu Sicheng seemed to recall something unpleasant, and the lollipop in his mouth creaked. "This guy's luck value is 100, and no matter how hard you try, he always ends up first in the game, taking your winning results in ways you wouldn't expect."

Du Sanying's small fanbase instantly burst into laughter.

"Didn't God Mu just remember the last multiplayer game where the little parrot picked up his slack and came in first?"

"That's not called picking up by the little parrot; that's called a heavenly delivery. He didn't even bend down to pick it up. It was God Mu himself who delivered it. I must say, God Mu's delivery service is still spot on."

"So Du Sanying, this guy, even though he's third on the Rising Stars list, doesn't even know stuff like [opening animation]." Mu Sicheng snorted. "This guy's just luck. He has no game sense at all. I advise you not to deal with him, or all the clearance props, messages, and such you collect will end up in his hands somehow."

"He's lucky, but everyone around him is unlucky. Every time a player is in a game with Du Sanying, their luck drops."

Mu Sicheng spoke with disdain, but in truth, he was shocked when Bai Liu calmly pulled him onto the burning train. It was only when Bai Liu mentioned that they hadn't received their points yet and that the opening might just be an animation effect that Mu Sicheng realized.

It wasn't common for players to think about opening animations, and even when they did, most wouldn't dare board with such certainty. But Bai Liu did so without hesitation.

Bai Liu was a gambler at heart. If gambling weren't illegal, he'd probably be doing it. He's the type of person to guess there's an 80% chance of success and then try for 100%.

Mu Sicheng would never have been so honest about getting into a car with the bold Bai Liu, but he didn't understand this aspect of Bai Liu and was easily fooled by his confident expression.

That said, Mu Sicheng continued to explain Du Sanying to Bai Liu.

"No," Mu Sicheng said, opening the game manager to show Bai Liu his luck panel. His face darkened. "My luck has dropped from 56 to 43. Tsk, Du Sanying's getting more dangerous. Bai Liu, your luck will also drop..."

Bai Liu silently exchanged a glance with Mu Sicheng. “What, you can have negative luck attributes in this game?”

Mu Sicheng: "....."

Shit, he forgot Bai Liu only had 0 luck.

Du Sanying noticed Mu Sicheng explaining his ability to make people’s luck drop and seemed aware of his ability to make others uncomfortable.

Suddenly, all the burning corpses in the carriage turned into normal passengers. Their heads turned in unison, smiling eerily at Bai Liu, then vanished into ashes as the female voice in the carriage sweetly announced, “Passengers, welcome aboard Line 4. Next stop—Mirror City Museum.”

Bai Liu turned to see the LED countdown light on the underground station, now showing [60:00] after clearing.

The one-hour countdown. Bai Liu mused, that’s about the time it takes for a train to travel from the starting station to the final stop. It looked like the explosion would happen in an hour.

Bai Liu remembered that in the Mirror City bombing, the game prototype for "The Last Train" took place at the Mirror City Museum, the underground station where he got off at the last stop. But in reality, the last stop wasn’t the Antique City where Bai Liu boarded, nor was the underground line designed to circle the city.

Bai Liu had been on the last train with Lu Yizhan. He was supposed to get off a few stops after Mirror City, but Lu Yizhan had dragged him off at the last moment. Otherwise, Bai Liu—unlucky both in and outside the game—would have been blown to bits in the Mirror City bombing.

The Mirror City bombing occurred when two thieves stole a valuable antique mirror, pretending to be its owner. They claimed they wanted to donate it to the local museum, but only if they were escorted personally.

The antique mirror was said to be worth over a hundred million dollars. It was rare for the museum to receive such a large donation, so they agreed to the thieves’ unreasonable requests.

Bai Liu’s city was called Mirror City, and the museum was called the Mirror City Museum. The thieves' real goal was to rob the museum's collection by transporting the antique mirror backstage, where they planned to threaten the museum with a bomb hidden inside the mirror.

During the transport, the bomb inside the mirror exploded, killing nearly everyone on the train, including the thieves and the museum commissioner escorting the mirror. Almost everyone died instantly.

Soon after, the thieves' crime was revealed: they had stolen the mirror and planned to rob the museum. It was concluded that the bombing was a terrorist theft.

Bai Liu and Lu Yizhan discussed the bombing, and both agreed there were still suspicions surrounding it. Two things stood out:

First: How did the thieves manage to get enough explosives to blow up an entire train carriage past security and transport them hidden inside the mirror?

Second: If the thieves were after money, why did they generously donate the mirror, worth a fortune, to the museum instead of selling it privately?

According to Bai Liu, the Mirror City Museum's collection wasn't valued higher than the mirror. If the thieves were after money, they could have sold the mirror themselves, rather than going through the trouble of transporting it into the museum and looting its contents.

Such an operation was too risky, and if they used bombs, they would have no chance of escaping, even if one of them wasn't injured.

When Bai Liu discussed the bombing, he said that if he were to rob the museum, he would've sold the mirror, bribed the guards to let him in, then killed them and framed them for the theft. This way, he could make a clean getaway and sell the goods abroad.

Lu Yizhan was speechless and said, "Bai Liu, I asked you about this bombing to get ideas for solving the case, not so you could think of a more perfect way to commit the crime!"

Bai Liu then apologized insincerely, saying he only thought in terms of those with the highest vested interests.

Lu Yizhan, outraged, accused Bai Liu of saying, "With that kind of thinking, you're going to get yourself into big trouble one day!"

Now, the question was, as Bai Liu was in the game “Bursting Last Train,” he had to figure out why the two stupid thieves would do something so foolish.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes, his mind racing. These two thieves didn’t want to be alone in a car with the mirror. They preferred public transport, like the underground, where there were many people. They weren’t afraid of damaging the mirror by hiding explosives inside it.

It went against a thief’s nature to enrich themselves by risking everything for a mirror, rather than exchanging it for other valuable items in the museum’s collection.

The obvious conclusion: the thieves were afraid of the mirror.

The two thieves didn’t dare to be alone with the 100 million mirror, possibly having struck it but failing for some unknown reason. After the incident, they pretended to donate it, hoping to hold the mirror in the museum.

The thieves even stuffed the mirror with explosives, hoping to destroy it. But despite everything they did to try and get rid of it, something unfortunate happened—the mirror exploded on the underground.

If Bai Liu was right, the key to this game wasn’t the last train that was about to explode, nor the burned-out passengers, nor the underground stations that Du Sanying was gawking at.

It was the mirror.

The system notification echoed through the underground, meaning everyone could hear Bai Liu triggering the main quest.

Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng stared in disbelief as they watched Bai Liu, casually leaning against the underground station, mindlessly fiddling with the coins in his hand.

Bai Liu had just been sitting there while Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying were actively searching for clues in the carriage. Bai Liu had simply said, “I need to sort out the information in my head,” with a blank expression, and then sat still. Mu Sicheng had been speechless.

Bai Liu had told Mu Sicheng everything he knew about the bombing, but Mu Sicheng hadn’t thought much of it, focusing instead on searching the carriage to trigger the main mission.

The Last Train was a collectible horror game. In Mu Sicheng’s experience, the first thing you needed to collect was usually the item that triggered the main quest.

What Mu Sicheng didn’t know was that the game could also trigger a collection-oriented main quest by parsing out key items in the background of the game.

Mu Sicheng couldn’t be blamed for not thinking deeply about it—it was all in the mind.

Usually, newcomers to the game weren’t given enough information to locate the first item needed to trigger a quest.

But Bai Liu was a bug in the system. He was new to the game but also a game designer, so he didn’t have the usual mindset. He was accustomed to thinking from the game’s background and knew enough to work backward to find the things he needed to collect.

And Bai Liu’s lack of hesitation only proved this further.

When the system beeped to signal Bai Liu had triggered the main quest, Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying both froze, turning to look at him, still sitting in his seat.

Du Sanying didn't know Bai Liu well enough to ask him directly, but curiosity filled his gaze. How could this man trigger the main quest without moving?

Mu Sicheng didn't hold back. He stepped forward and asked, "How did you trigger the main quest? You didn't even move!"

It was the question on everyone's mind. When the system beep had sounded just moments ago, no one had expected the first player to trigger the main quest to be a new player sitting still, especially when players like the third and fourth-ranked Rising Stars, or even the [Puppeteer], were present.

It didn't make sense.

"Shit! How did he trigger it?" one of the viewers muttered. "I swear he didn't move an inch!"

"Did he just sit directly on the broken lens to trigger the quest?" another said. "Hiss, I suddenly feel a pain in my butt just thinking about it."

"Doesn't this kind of thing usually happen to the little parrots? How did this newbie get the chance?" someone else added.

Mu Sicheng hoisted Bai Liu up by his arms, looking suspiciously under his seat. "Did you sit on the lens or something? Did that trigger the main quest?"

Bai Liu clenched his fist, his expression unchanged. "Mu Sicheng, put me down."

Bai Liu was 177 cm, and he hated when people lifted him like this. As a child, his dream had been to cut down anyone taller than him with a machete.

Someone dared to lift him? They would soon learn that being tall was a crime—if not for the fact that Bai Liu would need Mu Sicheng later.

Bai Liu paused, catching himself before his tyrannical thoughts ran wild. Hesitantly, Mu Sicheng set him down, turning to face him with a chill at his back.

"How did you trigger the quest, then? You didn't move," Mu Sicheng asked.

“Why would I need to move?” Bai Liu said, brushing off the non-existent dust on his clothes where Mu Sicheng had touched him. He gave Mu Sicheng a smile. “My brain is moving, Mu Sicheng.”

Mu Sicheng, at a loss for words, was left staring at him, utterly bewildered.

After straightening his clothes, Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng again. “Didn’t I tell you the key information? You couldn’t figure it out yourself? What’s your intelligence worth if you can’t even grasp something like this?”

Mu Sicheng frowned deeply, biting back the urge to say more. "You told me about the broken mirror, Bai Liu. If it was up to you, you’d kill the keeper and steal the mirror and the collection. What key information are you talking about?"

Bai Liu's expression was one of mock innocence. "You should be grateful for the information I gave you. But you’re just too slow to put it together."

Bai Liu clapped his hands together, walking ahead. Du Sanying cautiously followed, not too far behind. Bai Liu didn’t lower his voice, and Du Sanying was left somewhat surprised as he listened—so this is how you deduce it?

The audience reacted with similar astonishment.

"Who’s this new player? He’s got an interesting way of thinking. I want to watch him more closely."

"I’ve never seen anyone trigger the main quest in a collection game like this. Even Du Sanying, with his 100% luck, didn’t trigger it this fast. This newcomer’s impressive."

Mu Sicheng bit into his lollipop and glanced sideways at Du Sanying, who was following behind them, pretending to search. “So you’re just going to give him the information? He’ll find plenty of mirror pieces later.”

"This guy’s luck value is insane," Mu Sicheng added. "He’s good at finding things, and if anyone’s going to collect the lenses, it’ll be Du Sanying, in all sorts of strange ways. Don’t you think we should keep an eye on him?”

Bai Liu looked back at him, his gaze calm. “Why should I protect myself from him?”

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Didn’t I tell you? The lenses we’re looking for could be taken by Du Sanying. If we try to grab them, he’ll make us pay for it."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Who told you we’re looking for lenses?"

He glanced at Du Sanying behind them before continuing, "Let Du Sanying search. Isn’t he good at it? Let him take his time. It would be even better if he collects them all, right?”

Mu Sicheng was stunned. “Wait… You want to wait for Du Sanying to collect them, and then you’ll just rob him?”

Bai Liu’s smile was cold. “Exactly.”

Mu Sicheng ran his tongue over his teeth. "As much as I’d love to see that, Bai Liu, it won’t work. You have no idea what Du Sanying’s luck value of 100% means."

Mu Sicheng’s expression turned grim. He seemed to remember something unpleasant as his teeth ground together. "If you try to rob Du Sanying, your luck value will start falling. Everything will go wrong for you, and even if you get close to his system storage, monsters will interrupt you. You just won’t be able to grab anything from him."

Bai Liu remained unfazed. "That’s because you can’t. I might be able to."

Mu Sicheng was genuinely frustrated. “You really don’t get it, do you? Du Sanying’s luck value is 100%. No one can steal from him—not even Spades.”

The system had confirmed it: [Du Sanying is a favorite of the gods of luck.]

Bai Liu glanced at him. “You’re saying Du Sanying influences the fortunes of things around him, right? But I can’t be affected by him. My luck is zero, and it can’t go lower. His luck can’t make me any more unlucky.”

Mu Sicheng was taken aback.

Bai Liu smiled faintly. "But my misfortune might make him even more miserable. Don't you think so?"

Du Sanying, trailing behind, felt a chill run down his spine. He suddenly had goosebumps, feeling an ominous premonition.

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. "If you're not after the broken lenses, what's your plan in this game, Bai Liu? Just sitting still like you did earlier?"

Bai Liu smiled, his eyes glinting as he looked ahead at the empty carriage, clearly satisfied. "Of course not. You told me robbery is allowed in this game, right? Do you think Puppeteers have money?"

Mu Sicheng snorted. "You talk big, but you might end up the one who dies when the time comes."

Bai Liu was noncommittal. "It's possible. But if I were him, I'd let me live. There's value in keeping me alive, and he should've realized that when he tried to turn me into a puppet."

"Let's see who becomes the puppet of whom." Bai Liu's smile was soft but deadly.

Zhang Gui's eyes narrowed as he scanned the carriage. His ten fingers manipulated transparent silk threads that extended out and stabbed into the necks of the other three players.

One of them, crouched on the ground searching for something, suddenly straightened, as if tugged by a slight movement of Zhang Gui's finger.

Li Gou answered. "No."

Zhang Gui clicked his tongue impatiently, his puppet-like face displaying frustration.

"Been searching the carriage for almost half the time, and you haven't found it yet?"

The three puppets trembled, heads bowed. Sweat dripped down their foreheads in large blue drops, like animated raindrops.

Li Gou winced and stepped forward, repeating in a low voice, "Master, we haven't found any broken lenses yet."

"Don't bother looking," Zhang Gui commanded. His fingers snapped, and the puppets stood in formation before him, perfectly aligned.

Li Gou hesitated. “Master, aren’t we supposed to be collecting broken lenses? How can we pass the game without them?”

“Stupid,” Zhang Gui sneered. “Don’t question my decisions, you idiot.”

"We didn’t trigger the main quest, but we should’ve been the first to start searching. We had the numbers advantage, yet we found nothing. Do you understand?" Zhang Gui glared at Li Gou.

Li Gou, cold sweat running down his face, looked utterly confused. “U-Understand… What?”

Zhang Gui grunted arrogantly. "Stupid! One of those three is Bai Liu. This guy has a poor panel and can't move as fast as you guys under my control. There's no way he can search the carriage faster than you."

"Mu Sicheng is fast, but not as intelligent as Bai Liu, so he can't match my intelligence and your puppet players in finding things."

"But these two will certainly not cooperate." Zhang Gui's smile turned malicious as he casually kicked one of the three puppets in front of him. The puppet fell and bowed its head, clattering to its knees before Zhang Gui.

Zhang Gui stepped carelessly on the back of the kneeling puppet, leaned down, and laughed. "Hey, Mu Sicheng's once good friend, Liu Huai, don't you think?"

The puppet player, Liu Huai, didn't respond, his limbs trembling slightly.

"I brought you here specifically when I knew there was Mu Sicheng in this game," Zhang Gui tsked. "Mu Sicheng wouldn't expect you to become a puppet player under me, would he?"

"He almost became my puppet because of your betrayal. But in the end, Mu Sicheng stayed calm with his spirit level down to 18 and escaped by killing four of my puppets. With so many puppet players dead, I had to take your place."

"But I think you're happy to be my puppet, aren't you? If you see Mu Sicheng later, make sure you do a good job of messing with his mind, okay? If you let him get away again, you won't have a good job as my puppet."

Zhang Gui patted Liu Huai's face, a cold sweat dripping down the puppet's face. Liu dared not say a word.

Zhang Gui seemed bored and quickly withdrew his hand. "Mu Sicheng will never cooperate with anyone, let alone someone like Bai Liu, who has a lot of heart. Even if Bai Liu is willing to cooperate with him, Mu Sicheng will definitely go against him. We should be the fastest players in the game to find something, but we still haven't found it. So, there are only two possibilities—"

He held up two fingers and elaborated. "First possibility: the broken lenses this game says it wants to collect aren't even in the train."

"There's another way," Zhang Gui's eyes narrowed meaningfully. "There are seven players in this game: Mu Sicheng, Bai Liu, the three of you, and me. That makes six spots. The last player to enter—if they have the ability—could find all the broken lenses before we do."

Li Gou, though fearful, still looked up, confused. "But master, we've searched half the car at full speed and still haven't seen any broken lenses. Not all the lenses may be in the other half of the car, collected by the last player who came in, is it?"

"How is that impossible?" Zhang Gui gritted his teeth when he said the name of the man. "If the last person to come in was Du Sanying, then even if all the broken lenses were piled up in front of him, waiting for him to pick them up, it would be possible!"

Bai Liu glanced behind him at Du Sanying, who looked somewhat distressed, searching the carriages from seat to seat. He had yet to find a single broken lens, despite having followed Bai Liu and the others through two carriages.

"It shouldn't be..." Du Sanying muttered to himself, genuinely surprised. "How come not a single broken lens was found?"

He had done collection-oriented tasks like this before without fail, but this time, after searching for so long, he had come up empty.

Du Sanying pushed up his glasses and checked his luck value through the game manager. Still at 100 percent, he was deep in confusion.

"...How can that be? Luck 100 percent is always great for finding things..."

Du Sanying had a strong feeling that following Bai Liu would get him through, though it came with a creeping discomfort. Still, he never doubted his instincts—his instincts told him that if following Bai Liu would get him through, it would.

Bai Liu, seeing Du Sanying check the panel's luck value, withdrew his gaze and turned to Mu Sicheng. "There aren't any broken lenses in this compartment."

Mu Sicheng, having given up trying to figure out Bai Liu's reasoning, asked directly, "Why?"

"If there were broken lenses in the train," Bai Liu said, "Du Sanying, with his 100 percent luck, would have found them."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. "Have you forgotten that there's a puppet master in this game? Du Sanying is very good at finding things, but there are four of them on the Puppeteer's side. The puppet player moves quickly under his manipulation and could very well find the broken lenses in these carriages before we do."

"Not likely," Bai Liu shook his head. "Firstly, you said Du Sanying's luck value is an advantage in this kind of game. Secondly, if the puppet master had found the broken lens and identified the key to pass this game, he would most likely come to attack us by now. We've gone through so many carriages without encountering them. I think they are intentionally avoiding us to avoid conflict. It doesn't seem like a sign of having found it."

Mu Sicheng clutched his chest and averted his eyes, giving a sarcastic laugh. "You smart people understand each other, you all like to play this game."

"I don't like that kind of thing about him," Bai Liu clarified lightly, understanding Mu Sicheng's mockery. "If I need someone to work with me, I will make him willingly work with me."

"Like my partnership with you, right?" Mu Sicheng smiled twice. "Bai Liu, my verbal agreement with you without proof isn't very solid."

"It's a money deal," Bai Liu emphasized, smiling slightly. "You gave me a point, Mu Sicheng."

Mu Sicheng laughed mockingly but didn't dwell on the matter. "So if there were no broken lenses on the train, as you say, where would they be? Outside the train? In an underground station? Do we wait until we get off the train to look in the underground station?"

Bai Liu rubbed his chin thoughtfully for a moment. "I actually think it's highly unlikely that the broken lens is at the underground station."

"Not on the train, not off the train. The map is that big," Mu Sicheng spread his hands. "So where else do you think it could be?"

Bai Liu didn't answer as the train arrived at the station. The female announcement voice of the train arriving at the station interrupted Bai Liu, who had his lips slightly parted: "The train has arrived at [Mirror City Museum]. Please get off the train in an orderly manner if you need to get off at this station, and please get on the train in an orderly manner if you need to get on at this station..."

The doors of the train slowly opened, and Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying, upon seeing what was outside the train, instantly changed their expressions. Bai Liu, however, kept his bemused expression as expected.

On the platform outside the doors were charred corpses of all kinds. Some had their eyes burned away, others had their limbs shriveled, and their teeth were exposed.

The eerie thing was that the bodies all maintained normal human forms—one was even looking down at his watch, though the watch on his wrist had long since burned beyond recognition.

The charred passengers were scattered thickly throughout the station. Their heads all raised in unison as the doors opened, their dark eyes staring into the car at Bai Liu's group.

The underground station was a mess, littered with blackened charcoal marks from flames. The smell of burnt human flesh was so strong it made the throat itch.

Du Sanying leaned weakly behind Bai Liu and asked in a small voice, "Bai Liu, do you think this will also be an over-the-top animation? Will they... will they attack people?"

"I probably wouldn't design two similar transitions in the opening scene of a game," Bai Liu responded. "It's too boring and a waste of time."

Du Sanying, getting weaker, his sweat standing on end, felt a rising sense of danger that made him want to run.

But once he left Bai Liu, the overwhelming feeling of misfortune that he might die loomed large. Feeling he had no choice, Du Sanying asked, "Bai Liu, what will you design?"

"If it were me..." Bai Liu spoke as he darted through his system interface, looking for props. When he found what he was looking for, he continued, "I would probably design a very high-risk train chase to add excitement to the opening scene."

Mu Sicheng caught Bai Liu's meaning and looked out of the car door at the charred corpses. He muttered darkly, "This is going to be a chase war."

Burst last train

"I suggest you use props that increase your movement speed." Bai Liu glanced at the [passengers] gathering outside toward the car door after putting on the prop. "This monster should move fast."

Mu Sicheng quickly put on his prop wrist guard, which increased his movement speed, and let out a sudden, strange laugh with his lollipop in his mouth.

Bai Liu turned his head at the sound of the eerie laugh and saw Mu Sicheng with his feet on the wall of the train, gripping it with his monkey paws, attaching himself to it, and wearing a speed boost. It was a pose ready for escape.

When Mu Sicheng saw Bai Liu looking back at him, he grinned and uncrossed one of his monkey paws to give Bai Liu a two-fingered salute, a distinctly mischievous look in his eyes. "I'll leave you to it then, Bai Liu. I'm not going to be part of your flawed plan to kill the Puppeteer. You do your best."

"And—" Mu Sicheng raised his eyebrows and waved a small white mermaid sculpture in his hand at Bai Liu, "Your prop [Mermaid's Amulet], I, Mu Sicheng, will take it. That's the price you pay for cheating me out of two thousand points. As I said, no one can make me suffer."

"By the way, Bai Liu," Mu Sicheng stepped on one monkey paw and disappeared into the carriage like a gust of wind. All Bai Liu could hear was Mu Sicheng's nasty grin. "I hate working with people. This is a lesson for you. If you survive, don't thank me. Bye!"

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng used the skill (Thief's Monkey Paw) to steal the item (Mermaid's Amulet) from player Bai Liu's system backpack.]

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng uses skill (Thief's Sneak), movement speed +7000.]

In a flash, Mu Sicheng disappeared from Bai Liu's sight, leaving a dumbfounded Du Sanying and a still calm Bai Liu staring at each other in disbelief.

Du Sanying was dumbfounded. He looked at Bai Liu and questioned him with an even more shocked expression than Bai Liu, gesturing back and forth between Mu Sicheng's direction and Bai Liu. "You two aren't working together? Why did Mu Sicheng leave you and run away? Why did he steal from you? Aren't you friends?"

Seeing that Mu Sicheng had indeed made his move, Wang Shun let out a long, complicated sigh in front of the small TV. It was true that Mu Sicheng, the thief, had followed Bai Liu into the game because he wanted to steal the items he wanted from him.

"Siren Town" has recently been a warm-up game for newcomers, but the game wall is rarely refreshed. Old players can't get in, and new players can't get out. Props like the "Mermaid's Amulet," which can only be obtained by collecting the back pages of the monster book, are hard to find. The amulet is also a rare item.

But it was probably Bai Liu's stinginess and shamelessness that made Mu Sicheng realize that Bai Liu would never appreciate him selling him the [Mermaid's Amulet] and was ready to steal it from him straight away.

But Bai Liu was lucky to be 0. Wang Shun sighed. He ran into Du Sanying, who is 100% lucky and best at this, and sought cooperation with Mu Sicheng, who hates his companions and has bad intentions, and the ruthless Zhang Gui. He was also told by the ruthless Zhang Gui that he would be captured and made into a puppet...

It's like stepping on every mine that can be stepped on. It's hard for him.

But not everyone is as sympathetic as Wang Shun, and most viewers are thin-skinned and realistic. Bai Liu's initiative to seek a partnership, only to be backstabbed by Mu Sicheng, disappointed some viewers who were expecting him.

Bai Liu had already been sucked away by the three big players. The remaining viewers were few, but he played a series of mistakes. Although no viewers stepped on it, the number of viewers who liked it was also small, leading to Bai Liu's small TV data being quite unattractive.

[107 new people liked Bai Liu's TV, 161 new people favorited Bai Liu's TV, no one recharged the player.]

[120 new people are watching Bai Liu's mini-TV. The difference between the last gameplay video data is too big. Player Bai Liu will be dropped from (Multiplayer Zone) to (Graveyard Bounce Zone). Please player Bai Liu, take the game seriously!]

[Graveyard Bounce Zone's welcome banner for player Bai Liu: yo~ you're acting like you're jumping across the death line repeatedly~ yo~ so clumsy I want to laugh~ yo~ Graveyard Bounce Zone welcomes players who don't want to play the game properly, and has prepared a small TV in the shape of a premium eight-hearted eight-brick grave for you to bounce around on!]

In stark contrast to this was Mu Sicheng's mini-TV. The effect of this back-stabbing Bai Liu's stealing operation brought about an instant spike in Mu Sicheng's mini-TV's numbers, with Mu Sicheng leaving the section immediately after Du Sanying's mini-TV and making it into the central hall without incident.

"Grave Bounce Zone?" Wang Shun's face finally sank when he saw the name of this zone, turning ugly. "Only players who performed too badly between last time and this time will enter this zone. Although Bai Liu's stats aren't too good now, it's not so bad as to directly beat Bai Liu to this zone! It's only been how long since the game started!"

But it soon dawned on Wang Shun why Bai Liu had been knocked straight into this section. It wasn't a bad performance this time; it was a great performance last time.

The system assessed Bai Liu as not taking the game seriously—i.e., paddling—and therefore issued a warning to him.

But no matter how much he disagreed, there was nothing Wang Shun could do to change the fact that Bai Liu was going to this [Graveyard Bounce Zone].

There were some who followed Wang Shun, but many more left Bai Liu's TV with a frown and a sigh of relief and moved on to other gods' TVs.

Wang Shun arrived almost alone in the miserable white graveyard bouncy area. The small TVs all had crosses on their heads and looked like little tombstones, with two large wreaths placed at the entrance. Elegiacs fell to the ground from the center of the wreath, which read on one side: [All Stars] and on the other side: [Death Without a Burial].

The [Graveyard Bounce Zone] is decorated in a style very much like a storage room for bone altars, and the images on the small TVs held inside are in black and white.

The players above are mostly described as miserable, with the black and white tones resembling posthumous photos. At a glance, it's not some small live TV area in the yang world; the atmosphere is very nether-seeping.

The crowd here was also small, mostly anxious and cranky, cheering on the players on the small TVs, everyone with an unbelievable look of hatred, similar to the look on Wang Shun's face right now.

This is normal because the [Graveyard Bounce Zone] is alias [Land of the Falling Nova]. Players whose stats were too high last time and too bad this time are judged by the system not to be serious about the game and are then sent to this place.

This is also considered the [cold room] of the game hall.

Many players have been knocked into the [Cold Palace], but few can leave because the requirement for a player to be able to leave the [Graveyard Bounce Zone] is that the player's small TV stats have to surpass the last small TV stats in this [Graveyard Bounce Zone] before the system will assign a new promotion spot to leave.

Bai Liu's last small TV composite figure was over 100,000. Wang Shun has never heard of a player being able to live stream over 100,000 in the Graveyard Bounce Zone since he entered the game. But if Bai Liu gets trapped in this Graveyard Bounce Zone, he could easily fall into No Man's Land and never get up again...

But unlike Wang Shun, who is now in a sombre mood, the forum is a frenzy of underclass players who can't stand Bai Liu.

[Congratulations to Bai Liu, the newcomer who is touted to be the star of tomorrow, for his 8 hearts and 8 diamonds graveyard TV!]

"I'm in a hurry! I'm in a hurry! I'm in a hurry—when the hell did Bai Liu fall into no man's land! Come on! I bet he falls in three hours later!"

"I'd like to ask now, where are all the people who were so vocal about this Bai Liu? Have they all gone to the cold palace to be with the White Queen? Did they not praise Bai Liu before? Now you're out on the line!"

Bai Liu, who knew nothing of the bloodshed that had fallen upon him, now faced an even more daunting challenge.

The charred corpses outside the car poured frantically into the carriage. They crouched on the ground in strange positions, their heads raised up to their backs, their necks appearing as though they had been snapped off. Their feet ploughed desperately on the ground, resembling human-faced spiders, while their charred faces contorted into all manner of expressions.

It was as if normal passengers, numbly swiping their mobile phones, were squeezed into the underground with the crowded passengers. Some passengers had no time to run and were crushed against the window glass by those who poured in from behind, their bodies instantly reduced to bloody messes, giving Bai Liu the illusion that this train was during the morning rush.

Du Sanying dodged a corpse passenger that came in, slapping his chest and laughing heartily, "This monster is so fast and strong." As he spoke, he equipped himself with a prop.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying uses the prop (Lucky Bumper Car) to move at a speed of +1890 and can luckily avoid all creatures that come at you.]

Du Sanying instantly hopped into a pink, colorful bumper car adorned with pictures of little BMWL, which looked juvenile, but the skinny Du Sanying didn't feel out of place in it.

He waved anxiously at Bai Liu. "Bai Liu, come up here! I'll drive you away! The monsters are coming in!"

Du Sanying wasn't just trying to save Bai Liu. His strong sixth sense told him that Bai Liu was the key to his success in this game, and no matter what, this man could not die.

Bai Liu, still calm, politely declined Du Sanying's help and equipped himself with a prop as well.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has equipped the item (Sculpture's Shell), Defense +100. As this is a heavy item, player Bai Liu's movement speed is reduced by -13.]

"Pfft!" Du Sanying sputtered upon seeing Bai Liu wearing a bulky marble armor shell that crushed his entire body, causing him to sway and fall to his knees.

His face split open in disbelief. "Bai Liu! You've got the wrong prop! You're wearing a defensive prop! It's clearly a speed reduction prop! Take it off!"

Bai Liu, weighed down by dozens of pounds of marble armor, could not stand up but spoke with conviction. "It's not the wrong prop. I'm not taking it off."

Bai Liu's face made Du Sanying's small TV audience erupt.

"What's he doing?! A self-loathing fool falling into the graveyard area?"

"He shouldn't have known he's in the graveyard area, but carrying a rock in a chase station is definitely confusing behavior..."

"I see the little parrot looking so distraught! Stop saving this fool! Screw him on his knees and go to hell! Run away yourself!"

Du Sanying felt desperate. His premonition screamed at him to rescue Bai Liu. "Do you have any transport? The speedy kind! Forget it, get out of that useless armor! It's too late to get into my car!"

"This armor has a use." Bai Liu calmly clicked on his personal skill and added, "I've got transport, don't worry about me."

Du Sanying was in a rush. "What's your transport prop speed? If it's less than 1890, you'd better take my car!"

"Movement speed?" Bai Liu clicked on his personal skill [Old Wallet] in his panel and smiled strangely. "Probably Mu Sicheng's movement speed."

Du Sanying was shocked. "A 7,000 movement speed transport prop? Is there such a thing?"

Bai Liu's back burned as twisted, flaming passengers rushed toward him, their blackened hands smoking and sparking, trying to reach his back. Sparks drifted across his pale cheeks, but his eyes remained unmoving.

At the last moment, Bai Liu cupped his hands to form a trumpet and shouted lazily, "Mu Sicheng, I need your help, help—!"

Du Sanying was confused. "?????"

Didn't Mu Sicheng just steal your stuff and leave? Why are you asking him for help? I don't think Mu Sicheng is going to help you!

The audience on Du Sanying's mini-TV was just as puzzled, some even considering that Bai Liu might be a psychopath.

But the viewers of Mu Sicheng's mini-TV were even more baffled.

They watched as Mu Sicheng, who had fled the scene of the burglary with pleasure, stopped dead in his tracks when he heard the voice, [Mu Sicheng, I need your help]. His face changed as if he had been strangled by something.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng must cooperate with all actions of player Bai Liu as he has activated his personal skill.]

[- Now, player Bai Liu asks you to rewind and do everything he wants, give everything you have to help him and get him out of harm's way -]

"FUCK YOU!!!" Mu Sicheng's face darkened as if he had been manipulated to stiffen. He turned and started speeding toward the carriage he had just left. "Fuck you, Bai Liu!!!"

"You actually manipulated me with your personal skill!!! Isn't your guy's personal skill stealing things!!!"

Mu Sicheng's face was twisted with rage. He almost looked like he was about to snap.

In almost the same breath, Du Sanying saw Bai Liu about to be swallowed by the monsters behind him. Du Sanying scratched his ears, but Bai Liu just smiled, kneeling on the ground in his heavy marble armor, his head tilted up, his arms slightly open, as if waiting for someone to come and get him.

Du Sanying was bewildered and intrigued by this action. "Bai Liu, what the hell are you doing in your armor?"

"This armor adds defense." Bai Liu shrugged, but the armor was too heavy, making him struggle. "I'm afraid my 7,000 mph transport will beat me up later out of anger, so I'll put it on first to make myself a bit more resistant."

"?????" Du Sanying was at a loss.

A vehicle for beating people up?! What the hell is all this?!

The moment Du Sanying wanted to curse, a figure almost too fast to see grabbed Bai Liu's collar and yanked him up.

"Bai Liu—! You bastard—! What have you done to me—! Why am I under your control—!!!"

Mu Sicheng yanked back with all his strength, but the flaming passengers behind Bai Liu and fireballs from his arms swept right past Bai Liu's face. He dodged them, but they still singed his eyelashes.

Bai Liu calmly lifted his burned eyelashes, blinking them out slowly, and smiled indifferently. "I just asked you for help, Mu Sicheng. Didn't we agree on that?"

"I asked you for help and you came to help me. Isn't that what you promised to do? How can you say it's control? How insulting."

Mu Sicheng grimaced, and Bai Liu ran forward a few carriages. Du Sanying saw that Mu Sicheng was not in the right state and hurriedly followed in his little bumper car.

Mu Sicheng backhanded Bai Liu, slamming him to the ground like a rag doll. His expression was full of rage as he stomped on Bai Liu's neck, his eyes bloodshot and breathing erratic. His chest heaved violently, veins bulging on his forehead and arms as he gripped Bai Liu's shirt collar.

Mu Sicheng laughed darkly, lowering his head to glare at Bai Liu, squeezing the words out through clenched teeth. "Very good, Bai Liu. You're a bully."

"All my life, I've hated it when people control me." Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth and gave a creepy grin. "You're really pissing me off."

The marble coat on Bai Liu's body slowly crumbled into pieces, like dried plaster, and fell to the ground.

"Are you sure you want to kill me?" Bai Liu asked, his lips stained with blood as he smiled. "This skill I used on you is a control skill that binds both my life and yours. If I die, you might die too, Mu Sicheng."

Bai Liu was scamming Mu Sicheng.

The control skill bound the life values of both the person being controlled and the manipulator.

Mu Sicheng took several deep breaths to steady himself, his eyes wide with shock as he gritted his teeth. "After this game, I'll find a way to end our relationship and kill you, Bai Liu."

Bai Liu smiled, knowing he had succeeded in his swindle. "That's later. What about now?"

For a moment, Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu, who seemed to have everything under control, locked eyes. Then, Mu Sicheng cursed, "I'd love to fuck you to death, you son of a bitch!"

After cursing, Mu Sicheng glanced at the charred corpses trailing behind him. With a swift tug on Bai Liu's collar, he darted forward, his expression cold.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng uses skill (Thief's Sneak), movement speed +7000, speed reduced due to carrying player Bai Liu (weight 57kg, lightly injured). Final movement speed: +6900.]

Du Sanying stood dumbfounded, staring at Mu Sicheng's back as he sped away. Then his gaze shifted to Bai Liu's armor, shattered by Mu Sicheng's punch, and muttered, "So that 7,000 movement speed vehicle Bai Liu was talking about—was Mu Sicheng?"

Du Sanying, a naïve player who had never seen Bai Liu's deadly use of players as transportation, watched as Mu Sicheng carried Bai Liu, gritting his teeth. He couldn't help but shudder.

What was happening was the chilling realization of the future of someone like Mu Sicheng—a tool used by Bai Liu.

It was horrifying. How could Bai Liu be so calm, knowing that Mu Sicheng might actually kill him in a fit of anger? He was so casual about using his transport skill to "beat people up." Mu Sicheng really seemed to want to kill him...

Dazed, Du Sanying drove his little BMW bumper car, trailing Bai Liu and the others.

For several minutes, everyone watched the small TV in silence, unsure of what to say. Anything they said now would feel like a slap in the face for mocking Bai Liu earlier. Finally, one audience member coughed awkwardly and pretended to speak.

"This Bai Liu... has a couple of tricks up his sleeve, hahahaha..."

"More than two, huh..." someone else muttered, emotions mixed. "He actually controlled Mu Sicheng. This is something even the wire-puppet guild couldn't do..."

"Does this guy have the same skill as the Puppeteer from Lifeline? All about controlling players?"

"I think so. This is a battle between two players with manipulation skills. Even though the Puppeteer has three puppets, Mu Sicheng became Bai Liu's puppet. Four against two. I still think the Puppeteer has a better chance, but Bai Liu's move is too powerful. The win probability is down to 40%..."

"Poor Mu Sicheng. He escaped the first day of the month but not the fifteenth. In the end, he became a puppet after all..."

"I'd like to see Mu Sicheng's reaction on Bai Liu's small TV... Does he even realize what's happening?"

"I'll go watch Bai Liu too... He's in the graveyard bounce zone, right? Pity, he wouldn't have fallen into the graveyard if he had gotten out of that situation earlier..."

Mu Sicheng's audience continued to lose ground to Bai Liu.

Gradually, the crowd gathered around Bai Liu's small TV in the graveyard bounce zone, but none of it caught Wang Shun's attention.

Wang Shun was focused on Bai Liu on the small TV, stunned for a few seconds. He recalled that Bai Liu's personal skill wasn't stealing, was it?

Eventually, Wang Shun shook his head in disbelief. Could it be that Bai Liu had been planning to trick Mu Sicheng all along? Get Mu Sicheng to lower his guard, believing Bai Liu's skill was stealing, just to control him?

Bai Liu would have been wary of any other personal skill, but Mu Sicheng would never have suspected the skill of stealing.

Why? Because Mu Sicheng was the strongest thief in the game—he had stolen from Spades and was unbeatable.

But Bai Liu stole from him again and again, the most powerful thief of all.

The first time it was mental bleach, the second time it was a stamina supplement, and the third time Mu Sicheng had his entire body stolen by Bai Liu.

And for the fourth time—Wang Shun's eyes locked on the growing audience in front of him, his emotions overwhelming—Bai Liu had stolen Mu Sicheng's audience.

Mu Sicheng had run around the car more times than he could count. Only after reaching a new platform did he finally get a chance to catch his breath. Lying on his back, he downed a stamina rejuvenator, wiped the sweat from his face, and shot Bai Liu a grim look as the other player rested.

"Bai Liu, did you already guess that my personal skill was theft?" Mu Sicheng asked, coming to the same conclusion as Wang Shun. "You baited me by stealing from me, making me assume your skill was theft, lowering my guard."

"You deliberately pretended not to know my skill at the game entrance and casually claimed it was Five Senses Enhancement. But you already knew, didn't you?" Mu Sicheng’s gaze was sharp as he stared Bai Liu down.

"Yes," Bai Liu admitted without hesitation.

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath, eyes locked onto Bai Liu. "When did you figure it out?"

Personal skills weren’t openly discussed on the forums. Revealing them could offend people—except for Puppeteers, who had to expose their skills by nature. Bai Liu was a newcomer, and the only way he could know Mu Sicheng’s skill was by purchasing gameplay videos.

However, a player's skill panel wasn’t visible to viewers, meaning Bai Liu would have had to either buy multiple videos or discuss Mu Sicheng’s skills with veteran players.

But Bai Liu had never bought a Mu Sicheng video. And since he was the first to find Mu Sicheng this time, he hadn't even had the chance to ask around.

So how the hell did he know?!

"I figured it out after logging out of Siren Small Town and meeting you," Bai Liu said.

Mu Sicheng looked at him in disbelief. "Siren Town? I found you almost the second you logged out—there's no way you had time to figure out my skill!"

"I only meant to con you out of a bottle of mental bleach at first—I wasn't planning on setting you up," Bai Liu admitted, rubbing his nose. "But your reaction gave it away. And since you yourself said you were fourth on the Rising Stars list, I thought it'd be a waste not to do something about you."

What the hell?! A waste?! Was this guy some kind of evil mastermind?!

Mu Sicheng's chest rose and fell sharply as he glared at Bai Liu. "How did my reaction reveal my skill?"

Bai Liu turned his head toward him. "Because when I stole your mental bleach, your first reaction was to assume my skill was theft."

"...What else could it be?" Mu Sicheng scoffed. "What other skill could take items straight from my system storage?"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "In the system lobby, theft is explicitly forbidden. But even when I took your stamina supplement the second time, you were still convinced my skill was theft. A normal player would have at least considered other possibilities—like how I might've tricked you into gifting it to me. But you didn't."

"You stuck to that assumption until we entered the game."

Mu Sicheng froze.

Bai Liu scanned him. "That was your subconscious reaction. It means you have a deep-seated attachment to the concept of theft. And since personal skills are tied to desire, I figured your skill was probably related to theft."

"Fuck," Mu Sicheng muttered, his face darkening. "Even if you were scheming to manipulate me that early, there was no guarantee I'd follow you into the game. If I didn't, all that effort would've been wasted!"

"I wasn't 100% sure you'd follow," Bai Liu admitted matter-of-factly. "But I was about 80% sure."

His eyes glinted. "Because I had something you wanted to steal—the Mermaid's Amulet. Right?"

Mu Sicheng exhaled sharply.

"Something else didn't add up," Bai Liu continued. "Why did you come find me after I logged out? You're a top player. Even if you were curious about my skill, you wouldn't have stuck around after losing 2,000 points."

Bai Liu looked up at him. "You're not stupid. If you weren't interested in me, there had to be something I had that you wanted—and that you were confident you could steal. In thief jargon, that's called stamping, isn't it?"

Mu Sicheng's expression turned completely black. "You knew I wanted to steal the Mermaid's Amulet?! You used it as bait?!"

Bai Liu gave him an easygoing smile. "Now, now, God Mu. How can you call it bait? I was seeking your cooperation. Consider it a gift from me to you. You see? I can manipulate you now, and I'm not even asking you to give it back, am I?"

He couldn't force Mu Sicheng to hand over the amulet, so at this moment, their skills were truly working together.

Mu Sicheng's expression eased slightly. At least Bai Liu wasn't treating him like a disposable puppet.

Still, Mu Sicheng refused to talk to him anymore—this guy was so infuriating it made his liver hurt. Instead, he opened his personal panel.

[Player Mu Sicheng's Personal Panel]
Vitality: 94 (reduced due to burns)
Stamina: 30 (depleted, recovering)
Mental Value: 75 (mild alienation from passenger attacks)

If Mu Sicheng had been running alone, his stamina wouldn't have dropped so drastically, and he wouldn't have been burned by the monsters. But because he was carrying Bai Liu, the energy cost of maintaining his top speed had nearly doubled.

Mu Sicheng didn't dare attack Bai Liu outright—he wasn't sure how much control Bai Liu had over him yet. But that didn't stop him from being sarcastic.

"You actually ran out of stamina while being carried by me? With panel stats this weak, you should've been dead a long time ago."

Bai Liu, ever shameless, lazily replied, "Didn't God Mu lend me a helping hand? I didn't die, did I?"

He opened his panel. "A great disaster brings great fortune. We triggered the first monster book."

[Bursting Last Train - Monster Book Unlocked: Bursting Passenger (1/3)]
Monster Name: Bursting Passenger
Traits: Extreme movement speed (1,000 speed points, flame bonus effect)
Weakness: ????? (To be explored)
Attack: Burns with flames, reducing life and mental value

Mu Sicheng scoffed. "So what if we triggered the first monster book? You're not planning to collect all the monster books in a Level 2 instance like Bursting Last Train, are you? Bai Liu, even I wouldn't dare do that in a game no one's cleared before."

Bai Liu smiled idly, his words as infuriating as ever. "There's always a first time for everything. I'm here, aren't I? God Mu, why don't we give it a shot? Let's cooperate."

The way he said cooperate made it clear he was threatening Mu Sicheng into helping.

Mu Sicheng felt his anger surge all over again. He took two deep breaths to steady himself before he actually died from frustration. "You have zero panel life, and you still want to collect monster books? You really would risk your life for money."

Bai Liu nodded serenely. "You're right. That's exactly the kind of person I am."

Mu Sicheng: "……"

He was so done.

Bai Liu's stats really were pitiful compared to his own top-tier A-list panel.

[Player Bai Liu's Personal Panel]

Life: 31 (Dropped after being attacked by Player Mu Sicheng and burned by flames)
Stamina Value: 8 (Depleted, recovering)
Mental Value: 90 (Mildly alienated by passenger attack)

Mu Sicheng exhaled deeply, forcing himself to suppress his frustration. Now that he was stuck in the same boat as Bai Liu, he barely maintained his composure as he spoke.

"You've already experienced the consequences of a drop in mental value. Maybe you don't realize how crucial life value is, so let me explain."

"Life value is the only attribute players can't restore automatically in the game. If it hits zero, you die. No items can bring it back. Bai Liu, you only have 31 life value left—that's already dangerous. A random monster in this Level 2 instance could finish you off in just a few hits. I strongly advise you to forget about collecting monster books."

Bai Liu neither agreed nor disagreed. Instead, he changed the subject. "We still need to collect that broken lens."

Mu Sicheng closed his eyes, choosing to rest and recover his strength rather than argue. Bai Liu, however, continued his analysis.

"This game seems to operate like a single train station where passengers board and exit simultaneously. When we board, we face a chase. When they exit, the underground doors close immediately after. If the broken lens isn't on the train but on the station outside, then we only have one chance to search for it."

Bai Liu's gaze sharpened. "That means when the passengers board, we need to search the station for the lens and return before the doors shut. Otherwise, we'll be trapped with the 'passengers.' I think the Puppeteer must have been on the station during the chase."

"How do you know?" Du Sanying, who had been hiding in the corner, finally spoke up, his curiosity piqued.

Out of all of them, he was in the best condition. His bumper car was covered in blood, and Ma Baoli's face was a mess of charred flesh, but Du Sanying himself remained unscathed.

"Because we ran back and forth through the entire train during the chase and didn't encounter anyone else," Bai Liu replied, leaning against the wall as he wiped the sweat from his face. "If we never once ran into this Puppeteer, it means he wasn't on the train when we were being chased."

Du Sanying's anxiety spiked. "Then wouldn't the Puppeteer be able to quickly collect all the mirror pieces and clear the level?"

"I don't think so." Bai Liu's eyes flickered as he glanced at Du Sanying. "It's likely that he didn't find the broken lens on the platform."

Du Sanying blinked in confusion. "Why do you think that?"

"If I were him, there's only one thing I'd do after confirming the broken lens was on the platform." Bai Liu raised a single finger, his tone steady. "I'd come to us."

Du Sanying's face twisted in bewilderment. "Why would he come to us if he already knew the lens was on the platform?"

"The train only stops for two minutes at each station," Bai Liu explained. "I analyzed the size of the platform—there's no way the Puppeteer could search the entire area and return to the train in that time. Even if he had three puppets as fast as Mu Sicheng—"

Mu Sicheng ground his teeth audibly at the remark.

"—finding something takes time. It's not just about speed; it requires searching. There are 11 platforms on this subway line. Apart from [Antique City], where we boarded, there are 10 more. It took us over three minutes to reach the first station, plus two minutes for the stop. That's about five minutes per platform. Since the countdown timer is only one hour, we likely get just one full loop before the explosion."

"If the lens is on the platform, that means we have exactly one chance to find it. But even with three puppets, the Puppeteer wouldn't be able to search an entire platform in just two minutes."

"So, he'll come to us," Bai Liu concluded.

Du Sanying's head spun. "Why?!"

Bai Liu's last sentence didn't logically connect with his conclusion at all!

There's no way the Puppeteer would come to them just because he couldn't search the whole platform. It's not like they'd help him—

Wait.

A sudden realization dawned on Du Sanying, his eyes widening in alarm as he looked at Bai Liu.

"He needs more people," Bai Liu said, his gaze drifting toward the empty end of the swaying train. "Once he confirms that the broken lenses are on the platform, he'll need a way to bring us under his control."

"But he won't make a move on us until he's sure."

"My Lord, the broken lenses aren't on the platform."

Li Gou's voice was hushed, his posture reverent to the point of trembling. "The three of us searched most of the area near the tracks as you ordered, but they weren't there."

"Not a single one?" Zhang Gui's puppet-like face remained expressionless, his narrow eyes dark as ink. "Strange. The game should allow players to find the lenses on the station… unless we didn't search thoroughly enough?"

Li Gou hesitated before answering. "Only the upper part of the platform remains unchecked, but the burning passengers made it impossible for us to go up there."

"I know," Zhang Gui said coldly. "I was standing by the doors, controlling you. Do you think I need extra eyes to see?"

Li Gou immediately stiffened, kneeling as Zhang Gui's transparent puppet strings tightened around his limbs.

"I'm strategizing our next move. Don't interrupt me," Zhang Gui snapped impatiently.

Li Gou clenched his teeth, remaining silent. But after a moment, unable to suppress himself, he spoke again in a low voice. "My Lord, if we're at a dead end, why not deal with Bai Liu and the others first?"

A deep-seated resentment flickered in his eyes. He still hadn't forgotten how Bai Liu had stolen his promotion spot. If not for that, he would've collected enough points to escape the prison and be enjoying himself by now.

Zhang Gui looked down at Li Gou as if he were an idiot.

"Not until I confirm where the lenses are hidden."

"If we attack them now, we risk starting a conflict. They have Mu Sicheng, who holds a grudge against me. He'll definitely cause trouble. Our priority is clearing the game. Everything else comes after. Don't get ahead of yourself."

Li Gou clenched his jaw but bowed his head in obedience. "Yes, Master."

A heavy silence settled before Li Gou hesitantly asked, "Then, Master, if the broken lens isn't on the platform or the train… where could it be?"

Zhang Gui's fingers twitched. His expression shifted suddenly, his pale cheeks flushing as a realization struck him.

"Wait—" His voice dropped to a whisper.

"Could it be in—?"

"Mu Sicheng, did you try to steal something from the monster?" Bai Liu asked as he moved closer to Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng impatiently pushed Bai Liu away. "No way. I can steal from players—I've stolen from Spades—but not from monsters."

"Why?" Bai Liu pondered. "Did the system decide it was invalid and couldn't be stolen, or...?"

Mu Sicheng shot Bai Liu a sidelong glance. "I don't know what you're scheming, but let me tell you straight—yes, I can steal some items from monsters. But once I do, the monster's hate value gets permanently locked onto me. It'll chase me until the end of the game, and I'll be dead in no time. Even in a level 1 game, I'd be done for, let alone in a level 2 game. So if you're planning to use me again, you better not waste me on something this suicidal."

"Hate value..." Bai Liu fell into thought, fingers idly fiddling with the coin in his hand. Suddenly, he lifted his gaze to Du Sanying, who was sitting in the corner, nibbling on a biscuit to recover his strength.

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed with a smile that looked suspiciously like the Big Bad Wolf tricking Little Red Riding Hood. "Du Sanying, have you ever played a major online game?"

Little Red Riding Hood—aka Du Sanying—blinked in confusion, biscuit crumbs still stuck to the corner of his mouth. He hesitated for a second before answering the Big Bad Wolf's question honestly. "Yeah, I have."

"Do you know how to play with hate transfer?" Bai Liu crouched closer.

Du Sanying didn't know why, but the back of his neck felt chilly. He instinctively scooted back, swallowed nervously, and mumbled, "A little... Something about OT, right?"

"Exactly!" Bai Liu snapped his fingers, his smile growing even more suspiciously kind. "It's just like how, after Mu Sicheng steals from a monster, the monster's hate value gets locked onto him. But if I attack the monster, the hate value transfers to me. Then, we can drag the monster along behind us while Mu Sicheng keeps stealing. Kind of like driving a train, you know? Pulling a long chain of monsters behind us..."

"Wait!" Du Sanying was too distracted to notice how Bai Liu's wording had subtly changed from I to we. He interrupted, stammering in confusion, "Isn't this a collection-oriented game? What does this have to do with online game mechanics and hate transfer and train driving?! Isn't our main task supposed to be finding broken lenses?"

"Right." Bai Liu spread his hands. "But if the broken lenses aren't on the train or the platform, where else could they be?"

Du Sanying's confusion only deepened. "Where else... could they be?"

Bai Liu smirked. "I've been thinking. It's unlikely that the broken lenses ended up outside the train since the explosion happened inside the carriage. If they're not on the platform either, then... isn't it possible that the broken lenses got embedded in the passengers' bodies when the mirror shards scattered during the explosion?"

Du Sanying: "....."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

Fuck.

"So—" Bai Liu turned to Mu Sicheng with an expression of feigned innocence. "God Mu, looks like you'll have to try stealing from some non-human things after all."

Burst last train

"One minute until the next stop at Hexagon Avenue. Please prepare to disembark," the sweet, mechanical voice of the train's announcement system rang out. "To prevent congestion, please allow passengers to board before exiting—"

Mu Sicheng's expression was as dark as the bottom of a pot. He flexed his fingers anxiously, then shot a sharp glance at Bai Liu, who was comfortably seated in the small Ma Baoli kart with Du Sanying. "Bai Liu, what if you can't shift the hate? If these monsters keep their aggro locked on me, I'm dead."

"You still have my [Mermaid Amulet]," Bai Liu said smoothly. "It gives you one free escape. We're just testing things out this time—if it doesn’t work, you can teleport away."

Mu Sicheng's face twisted in frustration. "Don't tell me you made me steal that thing just for this!" He gritted his teeth. "Teleporting won’t change the fact that the monsters will chase me the moment they see me!"

Du Sanying, watching their exchange, hesitated. "Bai Liu... are you sure the broken lens is on the passengers? If that's true, then this game is a bit too..." He swallowed the word he wanted to say—'impossible.'

"If the lens really is on the passengers," Mu Sicheng scoffed, swapping his wristband for an acceleration buff, "then this isn't just a tough Tier 2 game. This is insane. Bai Liu, you've got a real talent for picking games."

Bai Liu barely reacted. "I should be able to redirect the hate," he said. "I have a weapon with strong aggro-shifting mechanics, though it's a bit of a gamble. Oh, that reminds me—"

As if suddenly remembering, Bai Liu fished out a thousand points from his pocket and handed them to Du Sanying, who was still dazed. "Keep buying stamina supplements for me. The price will probably rise on my end, so if it doesn’t go up on yours, stock up for me."

Du Sanying, still jittery from the impending battle, instinctively took the points. "Oh, uh... so, I just buy energy supplements, right? Got it."

Bulk-buying the same item would drive up the unit price in the player shop.

The moment Du Sanying accepted the points, Bai Liu suddenly smiled and patted his shoulder. "We're in this together, so help me out when I need it, alright, Du Sanying?"

Still holding the points, Du Sanying nodded dumbly. "O-okay."

"The train has arrived at the station—"

Outside, the charred corpses—or rather, passengers—stood waiting. Mu Sicheng clicked his tongue impatiently and pressed the monkey-shaped headset over his ears. The moment he did, his entire form began to shift—his face taking on a more simian appearance, his eyes glowing a piercing red, fangs peeking from his lips. His hands transformed into long, dexterous black claws tipped with sharp nails, coarse yellowish fur sprouting at his collar. A black-and-white tail curled into a question mark behind him.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has activated the personal skill (Thief's Full Armor) -]

Bai Liu crouched in the small kart behind him, secured by a seatbelt Du Sanying had fastened to keep him from being thrown off.

He reached for his waist, drawing out a snow-white bone whip. With a flick of his wrist, he adjusted his grip, his focus sharpening to an eerie degree.

Du Sanying barely even heard Bai Liu breathing anymore. His entire presence seemed to shrink, locking in on Mu Sicheng with an almost mechanical intensity.

The simple words "concentration" or "focus" weren't enough to describe it.

Du Sanying watched, awestruck, as Bai Liu's pupils contracted—he hadn't blinked in nearly a minute.

He wasn't just a player. He was a finely-tuned weapon, calibrating its next strike.

The doors slid open.

A wave of scorching heat rushed in, distorting the air. Charred, flaming corpses clawed their way into the train, their blackened flesh crackling, their jaws twisted in silent wails. Even the gelatinous door frames of the train melted under the sheer heat.

Mu Sicheng's breath hitched.

The passengers' bodies burned and writhed in the flames, trapped in their endless torment.

If Bai Liu was wrong—if there were no lenses inside these things—if Bai Liu failed to shift the aggro—if Bai Liu was just using him as a disposable pawn...

Then Mu Sicheng was the first one dead.

The visions of burning passengers overlapped with his own potential fate, filling his mind with a suffocating mix of doubt, anxiety, fear, and outright despair.

Anyone would hesitate.

Anyone but Bai Liu.

"Mu Sicheng," Bai Liu said suddenly, his tone light, but his eyes gleaming cold and inhuman. "You're the most useful card in my hand. You're too valuable. I won't let you die—you will survive."

"So stop hesitating. Do your job. Leave the rest to me."

Through the smoke and leaping flames, Mu Sicheng locked eyes with Bai Liu.

The train car had become a battlefield where death was all but certain.

Bai Liu's words sounded less like reassurance and more like a ruthless general forcing his soldiers into war—for his own gain.

But bizarrely, Mu Sicheng actually felt... motivated.

Somehow, looking into Bai Liu's unwavering gaze, he believed him.

"Tch." Mu Sicheng exhaled sharply, forcing a grin. His heart pounded, but he took a deep breath to steady himself. "If I die, Bai Liu, I swear I'll haunt you."

The red light in his eyes flared.

The monkey's laughter screeched through his headset.

Mu Sicheng's tail wrapped around the overhead rings as he launched forward, darting between the burning creatures with inhuman speed. Du Sanying could barely follow his movements—only flickering shadows gave him away.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has taken flame damage. -1 Life, -1 Spirit.]

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has taken flame damage. -1 Life, -1 Spirit.]

Sweat dripped from behind Mu Sicheng's ears, sizzling as it hit the searing metal floor.

And then—finally—the alert changed.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has obtained a broken lens (1/????). Congratulations to Player Mu Sicheng for being the first to obtain a broken lens!]

A shattered fragment, about the size of a three-carat diamond, glinted between Mu Sicheng's blackened fingers.

He whistled, tossing it up once before catching it again. "Got it. Damn, Bai Liu, you were right. This game is a hellscape. The lens is tiny—I nearly missed it! Do you know how much effort I just put into catching this thing?!"

But before he could celebrate, the situation turned.

The burning passengers—now aware they had been robbed—staggered to their feet. Their molten eyes locked onto Mu Sicheng, their bodies igniting even further as they lunged toward him.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has stolen from five passengers. The passengers are furious and have decided to catch this despicable thief and punish him severely.]

Mu Sicheng dodged an outstretched, flaming hand by swinging himself upward. But four more lunged for him.

Veins bulging, he shouted, "Bai Liu—!! Pull them off me!!!"

Atop the pink bumper car, Bai Liu stood tall, one hand gripping the bone whip.

The scorching wind billowed his loose white shirt, making it balloon slightly. His hair lifted, revealing his laser-sharp gaze.

With a flick of his wrist, the whip cracked through the air, striking the back of a passenger's outstretched hand.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu used (Siren's Fishbone) to attack a passenger. Target's hate value has shifted. The passenger now finds Bai Liu extremely naughty and has decided to punish him severely.]

Bai Liu smiled.

Burst last train

After the whip, Bai Liu's stamina bar was nearly depleted from using the high-level fishbone. With a gasp, his legs went weak, and he collapsed halfway onto the car hood. His face was pale, and sweat soaked through his shirt.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's stamina has dropped by 80 due to the use of an item (Siren's Fishbone). Please replenish your stamina in time! Avoid running out of stamina and becoming unable to move!]

The passenger Bai Liu had struck let out a pained whimper, his burnt eyes twisting unnervingly in their sockets. Without hesitation, he turned and scuttled toward Bai Liu on all fours.

Bai Liu tilted his head back and downed a bottle of stamina supplements, his expression calm. He backhanded another passenger lunging at Mu Sicheng, his voice hoarse. "Second one. Three more."

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu used (Siren's Fishbone) to attack the passenger. Target hate value shifted. He has decided to capture Bai Liu…]

Whip after whip, Bai Liu kept his focus on the passengers while repeatedly calling for more stamina supplements. The rapid depletion and replenishment of his stamina pushed his condition to a visibly alarming state.

His face was ghostly white, his body drenched in cold sweat. His wrist trembled as he wielded the whip, barely able to stay upright in the car, held in place only by a seatbelt tied around his ankle.

Yet, even in this weakened state, every strike landed precisely. Each time a passenger raised a hand to attack Mu Sicheng, Bai Liu's whip would lash down on the exact same spot, over and over.

Du Sanying stared in disbelief.

This is insane… Are newcomers always this overpowered now?!

He couldn't understand how Bai Liu's aim remained so precise despite his rapidly draining stats. Bai Liu's stamina hovered dangerously close to zero, while Du Sanying himself already felt like a half-dead dog from exhaustion.

And yet—Bai Liu's attention never wavered from Mu Sicheng.

"The fifth one." Bai Liu looked as if he had been pulled from a lake, hair damp and clinging to his forehead. His dark eyes, shadowed by sweat, reflected only Mu Sicheng. He smiled faintly and exhaled, voice steady. "Go on, Mu Sicheng. The plan's working. Keep going."

His legs gave out, and he nearly slipped off the bike, but Du Sanying grabbed his ankle just in time, hauling him back up. Bai Liu slumped against the car hood, panting as he downed another bottle of stamina supplements.

Driving his go-kart around the carriage, Du Sanying glanced worriedly at Bai Liu, who was barely staying upright. "Bai Liu, you're in a terrible state! Do you need to rest?!"

"No. The train is about to leave." Bai Liu's tone was flat, issuing orders to both himself and Mu Sicheng. He forced himself to his feet, leaning on the car hood for support. "Keep going, Mu Sicheng. Don't grab every passenger—you're losing life points too fast. Focus on the ones with lenses."

"I don't want to!!!" Mu Sicheng snapped. Every time he grabbed a passenger, he got burned, losing life points. With this many passengers, catching them all was suicide. "But I can't even tell which ones have lenses!"

The passengers were nothing but charred black husks, still burning. Who the hell could spot a broken lens barely a few carats in size?

"Isn't finding stolen goods what thieves like you do best?" Bai Liu had the nerve to tease him.

The swirling flames and drifting ashes made it impossible for Bai Liu to identify the right targets. But then, his sharp gaze flickered to the five passengers trailing behind Du Sanying's kart. One of them—Mu Sicheng had stolen a broken lens from him earlier.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes.

That passenger was moving slower than the others, wandering aimlessly like a headless fly. Yet Bai Liu distinctly remembered that before losing the lens, this passenger had been much faster.

"Mu Sicheng, the passengers with broken lenses are weaker without them!" Bai Liu spoke quickly. "The lenses must give them some kind of buff. Focus on the ones moving faster and burning brighter!"

"I can't see that from here!" Mu Sicheng groaned, back pressed against the carriage roof, waving ashes out of his face. He squinted at the chaotic mess of red and black below. "All I see is a giant fireball and a bunch of passengers clumped together! I was catching them blind!"

With that, Mu Sicheng suddenly let go of his grip and plunged into the flames, gritting his teeth as he reached for another passenger.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng was injured by the flames. -1 Life, -1 Spirit.]

"Stop, Mu Sicheng!" Bai Liu's whip lashed out just as a passenger tried to bite Mu Sicheng, knocking it aside. "You're too injured! If you keep going, you'll die! Only one out of every five attempts has been effective so far—there's an 80% chance this won't work!"

Mu Sicheng smirked and held up another broken lens. "Guess what? This time, it worked."

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng has obtained a broken lens (2/????).]

Bai Liu glanced up at him. "You can tell now?"

"Yeah, by diving straight into the passenger pile." Mu Sicheng wiped the soot from his face and grinned. "You guessed right. Otherwise, I wouldn't have dared. Falling in blind would've gotten me torn apart."

"I promise I'll whip accurately every time," Bai Liu said, eyes glinting as he raised his whip in invitation. "Keep going."

Suspended by his tail from the hoop, Mu Sicheng dove into the flames like a monkey leaping for the moon. Passengers lunged at him, their hatred locked onto him—but before they could sink their teeth in, a snow-white bone whip would always lash through, striking true.

It was a theft without worry.

Mu Sicheng stole two, three, four, or more lenses at a time, never once having to look over his shoulder. Bai Liu's whip cut down every threat before it could reach him.

Bai Liu was, as he claimed, precise every single time. No matter how reckless Mu Sicheng got, Bai Liu always had his back.

Perhaps that's why Mu Sicheng completely forgot that he was entrusting his life to a player with an F-rank panel, only in his second game.

With each swing of the whip draining 60% of Bai Liu's stamina, and all the stolen passengers now locked onto Du Sanying's kart, Mu Sicheng felt the pressure easing. Stealing became almost… fun.

But for Bai Liu and Du Sanying, the situation was only getting worse.

Du Sanying's kart sped along the carriage walls, bolstered by his [luck buff]. Even so, his face was ghostly pale as he glanced back at the long line of burning, snarling corpses chasing them. Some were moving so fast they nearly caught onto the car, only to be whipped away at the last second by Bai Liu.

"B-Bai Liu…" Du Sanying stammered, staring at the horde of flaming monsters gaining on them. "We can't keep this up! If we pull any more, we'll tip over!"

"You won't." Bai Liu didn't even look at him, still focused on clearing passengers for Mu Sicheng. His tone was almost encouraging. "Believe in yourself. You're 100% lucky."

It was the first time anyone had called Du Sanying's luck '100%' in such a positive way.

But he wasn't happy at all.

"I'M NOT INVINCIBLE!" Du Sanying wailed. "LUCK DOESN'T MEAN I CAN'T DIE!"

Then, a sudden chill ran down his spine.

For the first time, Du Sanying had a very strong feeling.

An overwhelming sense of bad luck.

Du Sanying had always been an intuitive person, and his instincts were nearly always right. They had saved him from countless disasters. Generally speaking, such a premonition meant something bad was about to happen, and it was time to run!

"I told you to believe in yourself, Du Sanying." Bai Liu stood in the car, his gaze cold as he looked out of the corner of his eye. His eyes were as black as burning carbon, devoid of warmth. The smile on his face was deceptively kind, making it even more unsettling—sending a shiver down your spine. Bai Liu whispered to Du Sanying, "I need you, Du Sanying."

Du Sanying's sweat stood on end. The sense of danger hit him so hard it almost physically choked him. This was the strongest crisis signal he had ever felt in the game. It wasn't just from a player; his instincts screamed to escape. He subconsciously wanted to leap out of the car and run—but then—

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu needs help from player Du Sanying. Player Du Sanying must assist player Bai Liu and cooperate with all his actions.]

Du Sanying panicked. "!!! When did you control me?! I put on a [control-proof coat]! Even the [Puppet Master] can't control me with this! Why can you still control me?!"

"I told you I had no control over you." Bai Liu coughed weakly and wiped away the stamina supplement spilling from his mouth, smiling all the while. "I'm just a collaborator asking for your help. Just a little trick to ensure things go smoothly."

"Keep driving." Bai Liu looked at Du Sanying and said, "Du Sanying, if you run now, Mu Sicheng and I will both die. You must stay calm, understand?"

Bai Liu glanced down at the trembling Du Sanying. "Don't worry, I won't let Mu Sicheng die, and I won't let you die either."

He smiled. The bloodstains and ashes on his cheeks only made the smile seem colder, more dangerous. "You are all valuable to me."

"The train is about to start. All passengers who wish to alight, please line up and exit in order—"

A group of charred corpses shuffled out of the bloody carriage one by one, leaving behind three men so drained they leaned together, barely standing.

Du Sanying lay in his disfigured go-kart, staring blankly, feeling like he might foam at the mouth at any second. "I don't want to drive anymore…"

Mu Sicheng, kneeling with his head resting against the car door, had transformed from a capuchin monkey back into his human form. However, his body was charred beyond recognition. His cheekbones, the corners of his mouth, and the backs of his hands were badly burned, with red flesh exposed. The monkey on his headphones seemed to be dying, curled in a pitiful ball, making faint, gibbering noises. The red light in its eyes was dimming.

But Bai Liu was in the worst shape of the three.

His body was bloodless, pale like a snow-white mannequin. Blood dripped from the corners of his mouth after a few weak coughs, his mouth full of blood and bits of his insides, which he wiped away carelessly. His fingertips absently played with a diamond-like fragment Mu Sicheng had gathered from the broken lenses.

Repeated stamina supplements and overdrafts had taken a heavy toll. A depleted physical state was just as draining as a drained mental state.

Mu Sicheng knew the nauseating feeling of being drained and forcibly replenished—it felt like being washed in a tumble dryer with his internal organs about to explode. Bai Liu looked like a hungover man, dazed and unsteady.

Mu Sicheng glanced at the empty bottle at Bai Liu's feet, giving a soft, bemused tsk.

This insane bastard, so full of stamina supplements that he could barely stand when he got off the train, and now, the first thing he asks for is broken lenses?

"Bai Liu, how much life do you have left?" Mu Sicheng asked.

Bai Liu nodded slowly at his panel, his wrist no longer able to move as quickly from the whip wielding.

[Player Bai Liu's personal panel]

[Life: 21 (Drops after being attacked by player Mu Sicheng and burned by flames)]

[Stamina Value: 31 (depleted, recovering)]

[Mental Value: 89 (mildly alienated by passenger attack)]

"21," Bai Liu replied, looking up from his panel. "That last wave took 10 life points from me. What about you, Mu Sicheng?"

Mu Sicheng opened his personal panel, his face darkening as he checked it.

[Player Mu Sicheng's personal panel]

[Vitality: 70 (drops after being burned by flames)]

[Stamina: 59 (depleted, recovering)]

[Mental Value: 61 (mildly alienated by passenger attack)]

"Tch, I got eaten for 24 life points," Mu Sicheng muttered, eyes shadowed. "I paid attention back there, but the flames burned so hot that my spirit value barely dropped. Still, my spirit value is still low, and I need to float it."

"Don't you dare drift yet. Your low spirit value is useful to me." Bai Liu said, continuing to check his panel, scrolling through the monster book and the progress on the main quest:

"This is bad. I'm in big trouble here..." Bai Liu's expression hardened.

Bai Liu rarely admitted to difficulty, but when he did, it was unsettling. He usually said, "Don't be afraid of anything! Overcome the challenges by facing them head-on!" Yet now, he looked as if he were losing control of the situation.

"What's wrong?" Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying asked in unison, their faces taut with worry.

"I bought 80 bottles of stamina supplements, and I've used 33," Bai Liu muttered, looking deep in thought. "I still have 47 left, but there are more stops coming. Those 47 bottles might not be enough... And I just realized that I can't buy more. I'm poor, and that's a big problem."

[System Alert: Bai Liu account points balance 179. Balance cannot be used to purchase stamina supplements.]

"I need your help!" Bai Liu looked at Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng, his expression pleading. "Can you sponsor me some points? Please! I need your help!"

Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng just stared at him.

Using them and asking for money at the same time—could he be any more shameless?

[Graveyard Bounce] Zone.

The area was a rare crowded place, with almost everyone flowing into one spot. Bai Liu's small TV was filled with spectators, all looking up at it with rapt attention.

From the second round of the chase—or theft war—that had just started on the passengers, to Mu Sicheng stealing the broken lenses and being attacked, Bai Liu wielding the whip to shift the hate value, Du Sanying breaking down and backtracking, and Bai Liu taking control of the whole situation, so much had happened in just two minutes.

Everyone watched without blinking, subconsciously holding their breath. A steady stream of spectators came from all directions, silently joining the ranks of those tilting their heads to watch Bai Liu's small TV.

Almost no one spoke. In such a fierce battle, until the result was known, all discussion would pale in comparison. This was a battle led by Bai Liu—a big gamble, a win-lose showdown. Until we knew who had won, the judgment of the audience outside the game would be one-sided.

Only the results of success or failure could assess the rightness or wrongness of Bai Liu's crazy move.

And he, the madman, manipulated the third and fourth players on the Rising Stars list—and succeeded.

Wang Shun, who stood closest to Bai Liu's small TV, let out a long breath. He had been breathing slowly for two minutes because he was so nervous, but now he took deep breaths all at once, his heart racing, his fingertips numb.

Wang Shun looked at Bai Liu's still quiet face on the screen in a trance, unable for a moment to find a reasonable word to assess this newcomer.

Bai Liu once again refreshed Wang Shun's perception of him.

Finding the broken lenses and deciphering the monster book was a normal part of the game process, but few people could maintain the high level of clarity and almost brutal calm that Bai Liu had, executing decisions without hesitation.

Like Mu Sicheng's faltering, Du Sanying's fear—humans often find it difficult to put life and death behind victory in a game where life and death are decided. Though the two are somehow linked, few players are willing to recklessly give up their lives to ensure victory in a lethal situation.

But Bai Liu... from start to finish, he considered Mu Sicheng’s survival rate, Du Sanying’s survival rate, and the course of the game. But the only thing he didn’t consider was whether he himself would survive.

Strength drained and filled up in seconds, his body spilling blood from extreme exertion, his vitality dropping rapidly, Bai Liu swung the whip an unknown number of times. By the end of it, his body was slumping back and forth, his ankles dangling from a seatbelt because of his terrible state.

But his whip never lost its precision. The first thing Bai Liu did when he got out of the car was grab Mu Sicheng’s shirt in a death grip and demand the broken lens.

Bai Liu’s insane, chilling desire to win shocked Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying inside the game, as well as everyone watching outside the game. They couldn’t help but come to the Graveyard Bounce area to get a first-hand look at how far this newcomer could go.

"This guy... he's so uncompromising." Wang Shun moved his tingling fingertips as he took another deep breath and opened his points wallet. "It's too stifling to see you fight so hard only to lose because you don't have the money."

The rest of the audience kept their heads down, whispering.

"If Bai Liu gets out alive this time, he'll be a god in the future."

"Only 21 life points left... yet I always feel like he won't lose, what's going on?"

"It's horrible... 33 bottles of stamina refills in two minutes, isn't this rookie panel an F?! My God, how can he stand it? With my C-rank panel, a minute of draining and refilling my stamina three times and I'd throw up..."

"...I'm a viewer on the small TV side of Du Sanying and I've never seen a cockatoo fight so hard..."

"I'm from God Mu's side, and I've never seen God Mu pushed like that..."

"Bai Liu, a newcomer, is so strong that Du Sanying, third in the Rising Stars list, and Mu Sicheng, fourth, are completely overwhelmed by him and are acting on his command..."

There was a steady stream of whispered discussions, exchanges of opinions, and the sound of heads tapping their wallets. Wang Shun looked back at the crowd and the audience that had somehow gathered behind him, their expressions filled with impressed praise, with a mixed and slightly relieved sigh.

Bai Liu, the man who dropped to [Graveyard Bounce], was able to turn it around with an absolute performance.

It's a match for Spades, who topped the table.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has gained 12,081 points. Is he buying props?]

Bai Liu's lips curled into a faint smile: [A great harvest, I want to buy props.]

After finishing his deception of the audience, Bai Liu quickly navigated the system shop interface. As his finger swiped, it finally halted as he discovered something. He paused and asked, [Why aren't rocket launchers, atomic bombs, fire hydrants, and high-pressure water guns available for purchase in this game?]

[System: The game will prohibit players from purchasing items that would significantly damage the balance of the game.]

Items that drastically affect the balance of the game... Bai Liu's eyes narrowed. [Help me check if there are any items related to bombs or water that I can purchase.]

The system remained silent for a moment. [Sorry, player Bai Liu. These items are not available for purchase.]

Bai Liu chuckled quietly to himself. So it really is impossible... No wonder Mu Sicheng didn't try to buy props to douse the flames on the passengers earlier. It turns out it just can't be done...

An idea seemed to cross his mind. [Looks like bombs and water will have to be sourced locally...]

At that moment, Mu Sicheng snapped Bai Liu out of his thoughts. "Bai Liu, you guessed right. The broken lens is indeed inside the passenger, but your plan is draining all of us too much. I've lost 24 life points in one station. I won't last the remaining 8 stations. I'll only survive 3 stations at full health."

Mu Sicheng paused and added, "And you, Bai Liu, only have 21 life points left. You can last at most two more stations. We won't be able to collect all the broken lenses."

Bai Liu glanced at the broken lens in his hand and tossed the pile to Du Sanying, who was nervously huddling in the corner. "You keep the broken lenses, Du Sanying."

Du Sanying, in a daze, pointed to himself. "Me? Are you sure you want to give them to me?!"

"It's for you," Bai Liu replied, cutting off Mu Sicheng before he could speak. "Du Sanying, you're the safest choice to hold these. No one can easily take them from you, especially not the [Puppet Master]."

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu, urgency flashing in his eyes. "What are you planning now?"

Instead of answering directly, Bai Liu sat cross-legged and began writing on the ground with his finger, analyzing the game's mechanics. "I just checked the shop. All water and fire-related props are banned. This means players can't use props to put out the [passenger's] body flames."

Bai Liu dipped his finger into some black ash and wrote two numbers: [700] and [20].

"We have seven players with a total of 700 life points. Given this game's mortality rate of 50-80%, one life point equals one shard. This means the total number of shards will be between 350 and 560," he said, scribbling the range on the ground.

He continued, "In one station, we collected 20 fragments. With the three of us occupying half the carriage and the other four players in the other half, we can assume they're collecting the same amount. That means about 40 fragments in total per station."

"There are 10 stations. So, the total number of lenses we need is around 400." He made a note of this and then circled the range of [350-560] again. "This is the number of fragments we need to collect, and I think it's most likely correct."

"400 fragments means 400 life points will be spent. There are two options: First, we could partner up. If each of the seven players spends 57 life points, we could all survive and collect the shards. But Zhang Gui will never agree to this."

He paused. "The second option: sacrifice four players, using 100 life points each, to pass the game." Bai Liu looked at them, his calculated smile returning. "I know you two were forced to work with me before, but I'm sure you've seen how hard I'm trying to keep you both alive. I know you don't want to be one of the four players sacrificed, do you?"

Mu Sicheng snorted. "You can't control us? Why are you talking about cooperation when you could just manipulate us?"

"There's a good chance I won't be able to control you for the rest of the game," Bai Liu answered honestly. "You can leave if you don't want to cooperate. But I'm sure you'd prefer not to be targeted by the Puppeteer, right?"

There was a strange silence that fell between them. The only sounds were the wind howling through the train, its creaks and groans, and the faint breathing of the three men.

Bai Liu's words hung heavily in the air. The implications of his plan were far from subtle.

Finally, Mu Sicheng spoke, his expression grim. "Tell me your specific proposal."

Du Sanying, still hesitant, chewed on his lip. His luck value kept him from being one of the expendable players, but Bai Liu's ruthless style made him wary. He'd already been burned by him once before...

Bai Liu seemed to sense Du Sanying's reluctance and tilted his head, laughing. "Du Sanying, did you really think the Puppeteer would let you off the hook if you didn't cooperate? That you'd somehow survive after the Puppeteer picked you out as a target?"

Du Sanying blinked, his confusion apparent.

Bai Liu smirked, his eyes narrowing. "Let me tell you something. Even if the Puppeteer kills me and Mu Sicheng, it won't be enough to win. He'll choose to sacrifice you before us."

He let the words sink in. "Mu Sicheng and I are far more valuable to the Puppeteer. The reason he came into this game was to capture us as puppets. And you, Du Sanying, are just a roadblock to him. With your luck value, you're the first player he'll sacrifice."

Du Sanying's eyes widened in shock. "Why me? He has more of a grudge against you two!"

Bai Liu chuckled darkly. "Wrong. He'll sacrifice you first, then take control of me and Mu Sicheng. After turning us into puppets, he'll randomly sacrifice three of his own inconsequential puppets. And with that, the Puppeteer wins with a full load."

Du Sanying stood frozen, the weight of Bai Liu's words sinking in. The back of his neck tingled, and for a moment, he couldn't speak.

Mu Sicheng, watching this exchange, felt a sense of déjà vu. This was eerily familiar—the exact same manipulation that had been used on Bai Liu earlier.

Bai Liu had set them up from the start. Now, all three of them were tied to his plan. There was no escape. To survive, they would have to cooperate.

Du Sanying finally looked up at Bai Liu, his voice trembling. "Bai... Bai Liu... What's your plan?"

Chapter Notes

Bai Liu slowly curled his lips into a smile. "If I'm right, the Puppeteer will come looking for us soon, and they'll figure out that the broken lenses are inside the passengers' bodies. The Puppeteer will be short on manpower, and they'll need to control us to help search for the pieces. We obviously can't defeat the Puppeteer, so here's my plan—"

He paused briefly, then added, "-How about we propose an alliance with the Puppeteer, in exchange for Mu Sicheng and I being under his control?"

Mu Sicheng listened for a moment before his anger flared. "Bai Liu, what the fuck are you talking about?!"

Zhang Gui fiddled with a diamond-shaped object formed from the broken lenses in his hand, his long, narrow eyes glaring at it with cold calculation. "I have twenty of these. Mu Sicheng, a man skilled in stealing, must have twenty as well—almost forty at one station, and there are ten stations in total..."

His three puppets stood motionless, staring at Zhang Gui, who had abruptly stopped talking. They seemed unresponsive, lost in a daze.

The truth was, Zhang Gui had stopped short of revealing more because he feared the others would realize something was wrong with the game.

But Zhang Gui remembered how long he'd been using these puppets, how he'd drained the intelligence from all of them, save for Li Gou, who wasn't particularly bright to begin with. So, it wasn't surprising that these fools couldn't grasp the game's key aspects.

One life for one shard. Four hundred shards would cost four lives. Even if he killed all three of Mu Sicheng's men, he'd still be short of one puppet to complete the collection.

Zhang Gui never cared about his puppets—they were always expendable. The King's Guild had a stockpile of spare golems, and if his puppets were lost, they'd recruit new ones for him. The only ones he cared about were the ones particularly useful to him.

Despite his ruthless treatment of his puppets, there was a steady stream of people willing to become his, drawn by the fact that surviving the game on your own was far riskier than following Zhang Gui.

"We've identified the key clues," Zhang Gui said, feigning amiability. "We're going after Bai Liu's group next. We can't just wear you out."

"I'll control them, get them to help me search for the shards and consume them," he added smoothly.

Li Gou, burned and battered, brightened up. "Master, is it time to deal with Bai Liu?"

"No." Zhang Gui glanced at the monstrously shattered mirror shard in his hand, a slow smile curling on his lips. "First, we'll deal with the seventh player who stirred things up. I'm now certain the seventh player is most likely Du Sanying."

Li Gou looked more confused. "Master, how did you confirm that?"

"Just a guess," Zhang Gui replied nonchalantly, twirling the broken lens in his fingers. "Bai Liu is a player with zero luck. With his bad luck, he must have run into me during both chases. He should've crossed paths with me long ago."

"After all," Zhang Gui added with a smug smile, "the fact that I'm in this game is likely Bai Liu's greatest misfortune."

Zhang Gui grinned arrogantly, then tossed the broken mirror to Li Gou, who caught it with a start, his eyes filled with fear. "Master? Why are you giving me this?"

"Of course it's because I think highly of you, Li Gou," Zhang Gui said with a saccharine smile, patting Li Gou's shoulder. "Keep it safe. This is an important task for you. Do it well."

If Bai Liu were present, he would have recognized Zhang Gui's smile as the signature "fake leader smile."

In fact, Zhang Gui giving the broken lens to Li Gou was no different from Bai Liu's action of giving it to Du Sanying—both were strategies to reduce the risk of carrying important items, while also creating confusion.

Du Sanying and Li Gou were both under the control of Bai Liu and Zhang Gui, respectively. Even if they exchanged these items, it wouldn't affect either of them significantly—they could always retrieve them before the game ended.

But both of these manipulative figures wrapped their dark intentions in seemingly sweet, trustworthy gestures.

Bai Liu's was: [This is the trust I give you, Du Sanying.]

Zhang Gui's was: [It's because I value you, Li Gou.]

"Now, let's find out where those three are hiding," Zhang Gui said, flicking his finger. The transparent silk threads attached to his finger snaked into the joints of his three puppets' hands and feet. As he flicked the threads, the puppets trembled as if shocked by electricity.

"But before that, I've got a little reinforcement for you. Puppet players other than Liu Huai, reinforcement!"

Li Gou and Fang Ke's eyes glazed over, their expressions blank, as though in a trance. They were clearly in pain, their puppet faces contorting with strange, agonizing expressions. The drop in their mental values triggered a hallucination phase, leaving them mentally paralyzed and suffering.

Zhang Gui, however, showed no concern for their suffering. His fingers moved with casual satisfaction, manipulating his powerful puppets to perform various actions, a look of raw superiority in his eyes.

"Although losing mental value makes you lose your ability to think on your own," he mused, "your stupid brains were doing nothing useful anyway. Might as well make them do something else."

The only unenhanced puppet, Liu Huai, cowered in a corner, trembling so violently that he could barely speak.

Zhang Gui regarded his puppet like an artist admiring a perfect, mindless masterpiece. It was a creature that obeyed his every command without thought—completely under his control. The sight sent a chill down Liu Huai's spine.

Zhang Gui was a cruel player who took perverse pleasure in controlling and destroying others.

Liu Huai regretted betraying Mu Sicheng. Though Mu Sicheng wasn't a kind person, at least he didn't discard people like Zhang Gui did. But there was no use in regret now. There was no way back for him.

Zhang Gui settled into a chair in the underground lair. Li Gou and Fang Ke's eyes were blank, like dolls with no batteries, their limbs spread out at his feet. With a sly smile, Zhang Gui beckoned Liu Huai. "Come here, I've got a job for you. Go to Mu Sicheng and tell him you betrayed me and want to join them. Tell them you want to defect."

Liu Huai swallowed hard. "They won't believe me, will they? I'm still a puppet for you, master."

"Isn't it hard to believe a betrayer's second betrayal?" Zhang Gui spread his arms in a mock shrug and sneered. He reclined in his chair, crossing his fingers under his chin. "Just tell them I'm inhumane, ready to consume you endlessly for shards, and you don't want to die —you're betraying me to survive."

"But—" Liu Huai's voice faltered, panic rising. "Even then, they won't accept me, will they? I still have your puppet silk on me! You can control me anytime!"

At that moment, Liu Huai felt a sharp cramp in his limbs, collapsing to his knees with a scream, clutching his elbows.

Liu Huai, dumbfounded, hadn't expected Zhang Gui to so easily retrieve the Puppet Silk. He stood frozen, unsure how to react.

Zhang Gui wiped the blood from the puppet silk on Li Gou's body, speaking slowly as he did so. "They'll definitely accept you, as I said. They're short on players, and they need expendable ones. Even if they see through your ulterior motives, they'll use you as a pawn to search for shards."

Liu Huai said nothing, carefully removing the puppet hood from his neck and placing it on the seat. "Then… I'll go, Master."

Before Liu Huai could leave, a slow voice came from behind him.

"Liu Huai, do you know how to control someone who might betray you repeatedly?"

Liu Huai's spine stiffened, his voice trembling. "No, master, I don't."

Zhang Gui suddenly laughed. "Then don't give them the opportunity to betray you." He grinned, a predatory gleam in his eyes. "You don't think I've removed all the puppet silk from you, do you? Look down."

Liu Huai glanced down, his heart sinking as he saw a nearly invisible thread—like fishing line—running through his chest. It led directly to Zhang Gui's little thumb.

Zhang Gui smiled coldly. "Do you think I'm a fool, like Mu Sicheng, relying on trust to keep people in line? Liu Huai, if you misbehave, I'll kill you."

"I have no shortage of anything but smug fools and puppet players," Zhang Gui continued, withdrawing his hand and raising an eyebrow at Liu Huai, who was pale and trembling. "And unfortunately for you, you seem to be both."

Liu Huai's face shifted between shades of blue and white as he staggered through the swaying train. He might have entertained the idea of betraying Zhang Gui before, but now, he realized there was nothing he could do to oppose him.

Zhang Gui left no room for error in his plans.

Liu Huai didn't believe Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu could challenge Zhang Gui. The disparity in rank was too vast.

Liu Huai had seen Bai Liu's videos before. He had to admit, Bai Liu was clever, but not nearly as clever as Zhang Gui, who would never mix with Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying in a collector's game. One was a thief, the other a scavenger.

But Zhang Gui didn't underestimate Bai Liu.

Liu Huai's mind replayed Zhang Gui's strategy.

"Now, this game has turned into a head-hunting competition due to the life-value requirement for broken lenses. We have three heads on our side, though I'm not counting mine."

"Three heads on Bai Liu's side. But because the four on our side are bound, they won't be able to grab them easily. Bai Liu will likely assume we'll take the initiative and set a trap, so I'm sending you to test the waters."

"Because this damn game requires 400 shards, I'm not about to deplete myself. I need you to tell them that my golem stormed off after I tried to use it for shards, causing our side to implode. I'm not in a position of absolute protection right now."

"My puppet manipulation skills aren't flawless. If there's a struggle, I'll face backlash, so I'll retract the more obvious puppet strings from you. The one on your heart will be invisible to everyone except you and me. You can tell them that it's a result of your struggle and that I retracted the visible puppet silk to avoid backlash."

"Du Sanying is irreplaceable on their side. Bai Liu is a panel F player, and Mu Sicheng is definitely expendable. His spirit should be encrusted by now after two rounds of pursuit. Although it can be restored with bleach, I think Bai Liu will prevent that."

"I don’t think Bai Liu can control Mu Sicheng. He needs Mu Sicheng in a berserk state to increase his strength."

"Before the next train arrives, I’m sure some thief, cornered and with a grudge against me, will try to steal from us. Once I’m under control, things will be easier. My golems are all B-rank players without my skill enhancements and should be easy to take down individually."

Liu Huai couldn’t understand why Zhang Gui’s plans had to be so complicated.

Why all these spy-counter-spy tactics? Zhang Gui was strong enough to defeat his opponents head-on.

But Zhang Gui only gave Liu Huai a look of disdain, the same stupid expression he always wore: "Of course it’s to preserve everyone’s life points. I don’t want to deplete our side’s life points, nor Mu Sicheng’s or Bai Liu’s. It’s better to play ambush one by one. Head-to-head conflicts are too costly for all of us. If our life points drop below 400, we all die together."

"For Bai Liu to have lasted this long, I think he’s partnered with Mu Sicheng. But it’s a shaky alliance."

Zhang Gui smiled, then patted Liu Huai’s face with the back of his hand, lowering his eyelids and elongating his tone: "When Mu Sicheng sees you, Liu Huai, he’ll remember his bitter partnership with you. Just keep reminding him you betrayed him."

As Liu Huai recalled these words, he wiped the blood from the corner of his mouth, a result of Zhang Gui’s earlier attack, trying to make his betrayal seem convincing.

But deep down, Liu Huai still feared Mu Sicheng wouldn’t believe him. After all, he had once betrayed him just to survive.

Zhang Gui, his eyes glinting with amusement, added, "It’s because you betrayed Mu Sicheng to live that makes your betrayal of me seem so believable. Remember, you really wanted to live. You really did betray me for that reason. That’s why I chose you."

Liu Huai took a deep breath, continuing his journey. Bloody handprints slowly began to appear on the train's interior, remnants of previous battles. Clearly, other players had been here not long ago.

[The train is approaching the station. The next stop is Yellow Springs

Road. Please line up by the door if you want to disembark. First board, then get off.]

The lights in the carriage flickered erratically as Liu Huai walked to the last car. Mu Sicheng leaned against the wall with his arms crossed, while Du Sanying crouched beside his battered go-kart.

As soon as Liu Huai stepped inside, Mu Sicheng opened his hands warily. Liu Huai raised his hands, showing embarrassment and fear, and whispered, "Fourth Brother, I've come to surrender to you."

Mu Sicheng's expression darkened. His hands contracted, and he snorted, "Zhang Gui actually brought you along?"

"I… Fourth Brother…" Liu Huai didn't dare look Mu Sicheng in the eyes, lowering his head as his voice faltered. "I did it to survive."

"To survive, you offered to cut off one of my hands and give it to Zhang Gui as proof of loyalty?" Mu Sicheng laughed coldly, the red glow in his eyes blood-like. "Didn't you join the King's Guild? Did Zhang Gui bring you here? You've been treated well, a high-ranking player willing to take you on, and now you want to betray him? It's the same trick again, isn't it? I won't fall for it twice."

Du Sanying tried to stop Mu Sicheng before things escalated. There was no point in pushing someone out the door if they were fake!

Liu Huai relayed exactly what Zhang Gui had instructed him to say.

Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng exchanged glances. Liu Huai's story mirrored Bai Liu's and their own analysis—Zhang Gui had sacrificed his golem for the shard.

"Wait!" Mu Sicheng's eyes darkened as he pulled out a balance prop, his expression growing suspicious. Suddenly, he grabbed Liu Huai by the throat.

Liu Huai's vision blurred as he struggled to breathe, his blood splattering onto his eyes. I'm really here for help!

Mu Sicheng grunted, his grip tightening, "You said you weren't lying. I have my ways of knowing."

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng uses prop (Judge's Scales) on player Liu Huai – Honest or not, the weight of your conscience.]

[The Judge's Scales can only be used three times per day on one player, and can only determine simple yes/no answers.]

"Alright, now you'll answer," Mu Sicheng sneered, a wicked smile tugging at the corner of his mouth. One hand still choking Liu Huai, the other raised the strange scale, marked with "Cheng" on the left and "Lie" on the right. "First question: Did Zhang Gui send you here?"

Liu Huai choked out a response, fear clouding his voice as he lied instinctively, "No, it's not!!!"

The scales tilted toward [Lie].

Mu Sicheng sneered. "Second question: Is Zhang Gui safe now?"

Liu Huai gasped, his eyes watering from the choking. "Fourth Brother! Fourth Brother! I didn't know you had this prop! Please let me go! You still need me!"

Mu Sicheng was unmoved, tightening his grip. "Answer me."

"YES!!!" Liu Huai screamed, driven to the brink of madness. Tears streamed down his face, "He's safe now! He's protected by the two enhanced puppets! I came here because he asked me to! But I didn't come here to harm you! I came here to be with you! I won't betray you again like I did before! I won't cut off your hands for Zhang Gui anymore! He's a madman! I couldn't survive without coming to you, Fourth Brother!"

Mu Sicheng's eyes gleamed with an unsettling intensity, his hands trembling as blood seeped from his fingers. The hallucinations began. Liu Huai could see the blood, like a cruel reminder of the past.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng's mood has fluctuated too much. Mental value has dropped to 60%. He's experiencing mild hallucinations. Restore mental value!]

Mu Sicheng blinked slowly, blood dripping onto Liu Huai's face, his expression unreadable as he lowered his head. "Okay, one last question. You say you won't betray me again—"

He paused, eyes unwavering. "Are you still loyal to Zhang Gui, still part of his plan, or have you truly betrayed him and joined our side?"

Liu Huai's chest heaved as his palms grew sweaty. Every muscle tensed, knowing that his answer could mean life or death.

This was the look Mu Sicheng wore when his spirit dropped below a dangerous threshold, a state that could easily lead to a killing spree.

It was in this state that Mu Sicheng killed Zhang Gui's four puppets, and Liu Huai barely escaped by betraying him and overloading his spirit.

"I came to you as part of Zhang Gui's plan, but I'm truly betraying him..." Liu Huai's words faltered as the transparent puppet strings in his heart suddenly surrendered to his will.

At that moment, Liu Huai realized something—Zhang Gui had planned this all along, knowing Mu Sicheng had the scales prop.

Shivers ran down his spine.

Mu Sicheng continued his questioning, but this time, Liu Huai told the truth. Even if he had planned to strike later, he was instructed to separate from Bai Liu.

Suddenly, Liu Huai noticed something strange. He hadn't seen Bai Liu at all.

"Where's Bai Liu?" he asked, looking around.

Du Sanying scratched his face awkwardly. "Well... Bai Liu wanted to cooperate with the puppet master, but Mu Sicheng disagreed. They fought, and Bai Liu broke off from us, joining Zhang Gui."

Mu Sicheng scoffed, turning away. "Bai Liu and I don't need anyone to divide us. We can break up on our own!"

Liu Huai stood there, utterly confused.

What was going on? Who did Bai Liu join?

[The train is coming to the station, the next stop is Yellow Springs Road, please line up next to the door if you want to get off, first get on then get off -]

Bai Liu made his way to the front of the car and found Zhang Gui sitting neatly in his seat with two hollow-eyed puppets standing in front of him. He didn't seem surprised to see Bai Liu and greeted him naturally. "Here you are. Have a seat. It's a bit quicker than I thought."

Bai Liu sat down opposite Zhang Gui and sighed. "You sent Liu Huai here, so Mu Sicheng is no longer a pawn for me. Now, I have no choice but to defect."

"You're the smart one," Zhang Gui smiled meaningfully. "Just a little unlucky to have run into a smarter me."

Zhang Gui crossed his legs and spread his arms on the back of his seat in a very relaxed and conceited posture. He raised his chin and looked at Bai Liu askance, smiling. "This game requires the sacrifice of four people to pass. If you choose to stand on my opposite side and fight me, your panel attributes are so poor that I'll definitely win. But then the overall life points will be consumed ineffectively. After I have you under control, I'll most likely sacrifice you to get four hundred life points to help me pass the game."

"For you, Bai Liu, I actually think the best plan is to work with me. Although there's a possibility I'll control you, at least I won't sacrifice you so easily."

"But Mu Sicheng will definitely not agree to work with me," Zhang Gui smiled, his tone falsely regretful. "And you won't come to me easily to seek cooperation. After all, not many people want to be subject to others. You might even have the idea of asking Mu Sicheng to steal from me. I have no choice but to ask Liu Huai to persuade you."

The fish Zhang Gui wanted to catch from the beginning was Bai Liu, not Mu Sicheng.

To catch Bai Liu, it was necessary to shake up the partnership between Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu.

There was nothing like Liu Huai to shake Mu Sicheng's trust in his teammates.

While a sane Mu Sicheng might have been able to maintain his partnership with Bai Liu despite the fact that this was a secondary game, an abnormal Mu Sicheng—especially with Liu Huai present, reminding him of what happened—would be unable to control his suspicion and hatred toward his teammate. The team's suspicion and hatred of him would become uncontrollable.

Of course, Mu Sicheng could bring his spirit back to normal, but this was definitely not what Bai Liu wanted. If Bai Liu chose to continue his partnership with Mu Sicheng and stand against Zhang Gui, he would need Mu Sicheng to go berserk in order to maintain a high level of combat power to defend himself against Zhang Gui.

Bai Liu could certainly put himself into a berserker state and become a strong fighter, but Zhang Gui didn't think Bai Liu would do so easily.

Bai Liu, an F-ranked player, had much weaker basic attributes than Mu Sicheng, an A-ranked player. Bai Liu was a fragile, high-output player who could easily die in a berserk state.

Zhang Gui's plan was to take Bai Liu first, then use Liu Huai to control Mu Sicheng.

As for Du Sanying, Zhang Gui didn't care about him. He wasn't interested in a man like Du Sanying, who had no power and relied on luck to get ahead.

Bai Liu was honest. "I actually tried to persuade Mu Sicheng to work with you. But not only was he reluctant, he beat me up."

Bai Liu showed Zhang Gui his personal panel. The life expectancy item clearly showed: [Attacked by player Mu Sicheng -40].

This was the result of Bai Liu taking Mu Sicheng as a transport vehicle at the beginning. Mu Sicheng's anger and frustration when he punched Bai Liu down were now used by Bai Liu as evidence of his own defection, and he didn't even blush.

Bai Liu sighed regretfully. "I only have about 20 lives left, so I can't get through with them. I was hoping that Mu Sicheng would be able to kill you when he was berserk. But after I learned of Liu Huai's existence, I gave up working with Mu Sicheng altogether."

Zhang Gui gave Bai Liu an approving look. "Because in Liu Huai's presence, Mu Sicheng's berserk state will be more unstable, and he will be more inclined to attack his own teammates when the time comes."

"It's too easy to die with the amount of life I have," Bai Liu spread his hands. "As much as I want to win the game, I want to stay alive more than anything. So, I've come to you for cooperation."

If Mu Sicheng were here, he would have cursed Bai Liu, a psychopath who wanted money rather than life, for speaking such nonsense. But Zhang Gui didn't know that Bai Liu was a psychopath who wanted money more than life. So, Zhang Gui smiled with satisfaction as he drew out a roll of transparent puppet silk and raised an eyebrow.

"Then you know what working with me means: you have to be my puppet."

"Yes." Bai Liu agreed, or perhaps he had expected this outcome, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. "But cooperation is a mutual matter, right? Zhang Gui, I'll be your puppet, so you have to show me your sincerity. What are the benefits of being your puppet?"

Zhang Gui quickly replied, "What do you want me to do to show my sincerity in working with you?"

"I have a prop that Mu Sicheng stole. It's called the [Mermaid's Amulet]." Bai Liu's eyes fell slowly. "I also fought with Mu Sicheng because of this. I'd like you to help me get it back if you can."

"That's it?" Zhang Gui seemed a little surprised, as if he hadn't expected Bai Liu to make such a simple offer.

"It's a life-saving prop." Bai Liu's eyes rolled as he whispered, a brilliant smile curling at the corners of his mouth. "I'm low on life, so I want you to grab it for me before this train leaves. That way, at least I'll be safer back there. You wouldn't want to go through all the trouble to get me, and then I just die, would you?"

"Fine," Zhang Gui smiled. "I prefer a willing puppet, and surprisingly, Bai Liu, you know so much and are willing to make a deal with me. So I'll—"

The puppet thread in Zhang Gui's hand trembled violently. The sharp, needle-like end dug into Bai Liu's bones, wrapping several times around them.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has become the puppet of player Zhang Gui.]

Zhang Gui slowly pulled back the corners of his mouth, his normal smile turning eerie and wicked. "- It's come to this, and you actually think you can still negotiate with me, Bai Liu. I'll have to teach you the rules."

[System Alert: Player Zhang Gui has used his personal skill (String Doll) on Bai Liu.]

"Now, Bai Liu, take everything you have on you and pay me, especially the weapons." Zhang Gui tickled the silk threads on his fingers. "I won't give you any more chances to roll over."

Bai Liu moved stiffly, his face still pale with pain. His hand froze as he clicked on his system panel, tossing out various items.

A snow-white fish bone, some small messy things, an old wallet. Bai Liu's face changed violently when he saw the old wallet being thrown out, catching Zhang Gui's attention. He lowered himself to pick it up. "What's this? Your personal skills?"

Zhang Gui patted the wallet and gave a dismissive laugh. "That's pretty shabby." He flipped it open and raised his eyebrows when he saw the contents. Zhang Gui pulled out a stack of point notes and showed them to Bai Liu with amusement. "What's this? A tangible points wallet? You like this mess, but there's a lot of points in it... Let me count: 12,000."

"Then I'll laugh at it all," Zhang Gui laughed.

Bai Liu, who was already under control and whose face was still pale, lowered his head without saying a word. He bit his lower lip as if he was suffocating, not knowing what to say. Finally, he only said stubbornly, "Take it, and I'll take it as payment for your help."

Zhang Gui sneered meaningfully. "If you want to be so self-congratulatory, that's fine."

But if Zhang Gui had looked at Bai Liu's expression, he would have seen a calm gaze and a small, slow curve in his bitten bottom lip.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu gives Player Zhang Gui 12,000 points to make a deal. Player Zhang Gui needs to retrieve the item (Mermaid's Amulet) for Player Bai Liu before the train starts again.]

[If one of the parties does not complete the deal, the system will impose a penalty. The party that does not complete the deal will be imprisoned in the system (old wallet) and become soul money.]

Chapter End Notes

Burst last train

This is a warning from the system to Bai Liu when he receives the [Old Wallet], designed to restrain him from abusing the skill.

It's a restrictive measure aimed at Bai Liu's trustworthiness, akin to the [small dark room] used by Taobao merchants. However, it's suspected that Bai Liu uses it to manipulate trade objects.

For someone like Zhang Gui, who relishes setting up traps and thinking himself clever, the best strategy is to play along with Bai Liu's plan, letting his prey fall deeper into his trap. Only then, at the moment Bai Liu might seek a breakthrough, can Zhang Gui strike.

Bai Liu's gaze dropped as he thought this over.

But Mu Sicheng was in trouble. He had just learned about Mu Sicheng's complex relationship with Liu Huai, and Zhang Gui had brought Liu Huai up here. For someone like Mu Sicheng, who has normal emotions and desires, the psychological effect of hallucinations involving a betraying friend could be devastating.

Mu Sicheng's behavior was erratic whenever Liu Huai was mentioned.

Bai Liu also learned that most people in this game had mental capacities around 70, with 60 being dangerously low. Anyone with a mental capacity under 20 who could escape the game without going mad had extreme mental strength. But Bai Liu needed Mu Sicheng's mental capacity to drop even further—down to 18, where the hallucinations and psychological effects would intensify.

With Liu Huai as the trigger, Mu Sicheng was bound to experience serious problems.

It was a difficult task, but necessary.

[The train has arrived at the Yellow Springs Road – please board and disembark in order.]

Zhang Gui's fingers moved like a pianist's, pulling on the transparent threads in his hands, immediately dragging Bai Liu behind him.

"I know you're not entirely willing. You might be pretending to surrender to me, or maybe you've got something else planned with Mu Sicheng," Zhang Gui's lips curled into a malicious smile, as though Bai

Liu were trapped in chains, the heavy puppet hood slowly dropping over his head.

Bai Liu's face was gradually covered by the puppet's hood. As he looked up at Zhang Gui, the last expression he saw before the hood fell was one of malice and certainty. His eyelids lowered, eyes filled with arrogance, as if he already held control of everything.

Zhang Gui's tone was low and raspy. "But Bai Liu, you've overlooked Liu Huai's influence on Mu Sicheng. With Liu Huai around, Mu Sicheng will never stay steady with you. No matter how many backstops you have, as soon as Mu Sicheng breaks down—"

Zhang Gui's laugh was cut off as he maliciously added, "—Mu Sicheng is your strongest card. As soon as he falls, your plan collapses entirely."

Bai Liu's face was still, but his heart raced.

In a way, Zhang Gui was right. Mu Sicheng was crucial to his strategy.

[Mermaid's Amulet] was on Mu Sicheng.

If Mu Sicheng completely crumbled and lost his resistance, and Zhang Gui acquired the [Mermaid's Amulet], the deal would be sealed. Bai Liu had considered using Mu Sicheng just for the amulet before, but—

[System Tip: During the trading period, the item to be traded, i.e. (the Mermaid's Amulet), must exist. Otherwise, the trade is invalid.]

If Mu Sicheng was pushed to the breaking point or refused to cooperate and used the amulet, Bai Liu would be finished, becoming Zhang Gui's puppet.

So Mu Sicheng was an essential part of Bai Liu's plan, and if he broke, the risks to Bai Liu's side would skyrocket.

Bai Liu was gambling, a high-stakes game with only one chip: Mu Sicheng. An extremely volatile one. The chances of winning were slim, but Bai Liu had considered using Du Sanying. However, Du Sanying was instinctive and unpredictable, like a sharp rodent. He might throw the sculpture at Zhang Gui just to reduce the immediate danger, much like how he'd fled the car when he sensed peril.

Du Sanying's instability was a problem. With Bai Liu under the Puppeteer's control, he couldn't remotely command Du Sanying. Mu Sicheng, with his vendetta against [the Puppeteer] and strong resolve, was far more valuable.

In the end, Bai Liu chose Mu Sicheng.

The doors opened slowly, and the charred [passenger] bodies wailed and burned as they poured into the carriage. Zhang Gui moved quickly, maneuvering the two golems forward to retrieve the pieces, avoiding using Bai Liu, who he knew had a low life expectancy and could easily be killed with casual effort.

Zhang Gui's hand was swift. In less than ten seconds, the two puppets had crossed a carriage and presented Zhang Gui with a pile of shattered lenses, which he took without a glance. His face darkened. "Go, clear the next carriage."

Zhang Gui's precision and speed made it seem effortless. The golems cleared one carriage after another in less than a minute, while Bai Liu —small, weak, and unable to defend himself—was outclassed.

Mu Sicheng had told Bai Liu that Zhang Gui's personal skills consisted of two main techniques. The first was [Puppet with Thread], where he controlled the puppet with thread, but the puppet maintained its awareness, with only the limbs under his control.

This was why Zhang Gui preferred voluntary puppets, as involuntary ones—like Mu Sicheng—were harder to control.

The second skill was [Puppet Enhancement], which came at the cost of 50 mental points for the puppet, stripping away its consciousness but doubling its panel attributes. These puppets were hard to control, as they entered the [Mental Value Danger Zone], experiencing pain and struggle, but in their berserk state, they were immune to fear and relentless in battle.

However, Mu Sicheng warned that this technique couldn't be used on players with a mental value under 20, as they would have entered a berserk state, making them uncontrollable.

"No one in this game has ever tried to control a player with a mental value below 20. Not even Zhang Gui could do it," Mu Sicheng had told Bai Liu. "Except for you, Bai Liu. You tried to make me—at a mental value of 10—remember the mission you gave me. That's impossible."

Bai Liu just smiled. "How will we know unless we try? We don't have another option, do we?”

As Bai Liu thought, the female voice on the train’s intercom sounded.

“Due to heavy passenger load and special items boarding, the stopping time has been extended to five minutes for the safety of passengers and belongings. Please remain calm and keep away from the doors.”

A huge charred corpse, several times the size of a regular passenger, pried open the door with its massive, burning hands, squeezing its head in.

Its eyes were burnt out, with black carbon marks from the fire. Its skin was burned away, leaving bloody muscle exposed. Embedded in its chest was a hexagonal shattered lens, like a heart guard, glowing in the flames.

The massive corpse roared in frustration, slamming its fist into the roof of the carriage, creating a gaping hole, flames pouring through and filling the carriage with a loud pop.

Zhang Gui’s face darkened as he swiftly retreated into another carriage, pulling the two puppets into his hand.

[System Alert: Players Zhang Gui, Bai Liu, Fang Ke, and Li Gou have been attacked by the monster’s flames, losing -10 Life. Player Zhang Gui and Player Bai Liu lose -20 Spirit, and Player Fang Ke and Player Li Gou lose -9 Spirit due to being in a puppet state.]

Bai Liu coughed from the burn, blood dripping from his mouth. Hidden beneath his puppet hood, his face grew paler as he checked his attributes.

[Life: 11 (decreased after being attacked by Mu Sicheng and burned by flames)] [Stamina: 70 (recovering)] [Mental Value: 69 (slightly altered by monster attack)]

Bai Liu glanced at the monster book.

[Explosive Last Train Monster Book Refresh - Brotherhood of Thieves (2/3)]

[Monster Name: Thief Brothers (Brother)] [Characteristics: Extremely strong, fast, and able to use a wide range of attacks (1400 speed, fire enhances attacks, prefers using fists)] [Weakness: ????? (to be discovered)] [Attacks: Rage Hammer, Flame Blast (if Bai Liu takes either of these, he's likely finished.)]

Bai Liu licked the blood from the corner of his mouth. "That big broken lens in its heart should be its weakness. We need to collect it."

"You talk too much!" Zhang Gui interrupted, eyeing the approaching monster warily. His fingers moved swiftly as he prepared his golems. "This game's a mess. They extended the stop and now we have a boss..."

The second level of Explosive Last Train had a mortality rate close to eighty percent, and even Zhang Gui struggled to get through it.

"You really picked the hardest game in Level 2 in one go!" Zhang Gui muttered.

"I appreciate the compliment," Bai Liu replied dryly. "Aren't you going to try grabbing that broken lens from the monster?"

"Try my ass!" Zhang Gui spat. "Look at its attack and speed. This monster's at least A-rank, and my golems are just cannon fodder. Even with six full-blooded puppets, I wouldn't guarantee I could clear it."

Zhang Gui ground his teeth and reluctantly calmed himself. "My golems can't take it. Only a berserk Mu Sicheng might stand a chance... but he's close to dying."

"I can handle it in a rage, can't I?" Bai Liu asked, redirecting Zhang Gui's thoughts with a calm gaze.

For Bai Liu, Mu Sicheng couldn't die. If he did, the [Mermaid's Amulet] would explode, and Zhang Gui would have full control, turning Bai Liu into his puppet.

"Indeed," Zhang Gui grunted, narrowing his eyes. "But you're almost dead. One more hit and you're done."

He sneered as he manipulated the puppet threads. "Then you can go to hell."

[System Alert: Player Zhang Gui has used the prop (Good to See You) on player Liu Huai and will move to Liu Huai's location within ten seconds.]

Bai Liu felt a wave of dizziness and, when he looked up again, saw Liu Huai, Mu Sicheng, and Du Sanying, who were also collecting the broken lenses in the other compartment.

The three of them were working in tandem, struggling but holding up as best they could.

However, it was Mu Sicheng who suffered the most. Without Bai Liu to attract the enemies' attention, most of the passengers were focused on him. Although Liu Huai helped block some of the attacks, Mu Sicheng's condition deteriorated rapidly. His face was drenched in blood, his eyes flickered red, and he was struggling to breathe.

Zhang Gui's expression remained cold as he withdrew his hand and tugged at the silk thread tied around his pinky.

He saw Zhang Gui, hidden behind a carriage, shrouded by countless bodies and flames.

Zhang Gui pointed at Mu Sicheng with a blank expression, then gave him a swift slash across the neck, his lips forming the words: "Change of plan. There's a big boss. Don't worry about life or death."

Liu Huai heard the message and understood the significance of the "big boss." But seeing how easily Zhang Gui was willing to sacrifice Mu Sicheng made Liu Huai's heart tremble, his face paling.

—This "big boss" was probably going to be very difficult to deal with, and it would likely take Mu Sicheng in a berserk state to defeat it.

But wasn't this just a level 2 game? How could there be monsters that would require Mu Sicheng to go berserk to deal with?

As Liu Huai hesitated, the massive corpse surged forward, crashing through everything in its path. The car windows shattered, flames spiraled, and the passengers were reduced to ash, screaming in agony as they were consumed by the raging fire. The power and heat of its attack were overwhelming.

Zhang Gui pulled the three golems forward into the carriage with Mu Sicheng and the others, and the sight of the large corpse startled Du Sanying. He couldn't help but exclaim, "Holy shit! What the hell is that?!"

Zhang Gui tightened the puppet thread around his pinky and shouted at Liu Huai, "Liu Huai! Do it! Or we all die!"

Liu Huai felt the strain of the puppet thread on his heart and gritted his teeth. He threw down two swords from his sleeves, one in each hand. Standing behind Mu Sicheng, he lowered his head and whispered, "Sorry," before stabbing forward without hesitation.

Du Sanying, horrified, yelled, "Mu Sicheng! Watch your back!"

Mu Sicheng, already sensing the danger, rolled away from Liu Huai's backstab. He sprang to his feet, wiping the blood dripping from his eyebrow with his elbow. His face was a mix of anger and disbelief. "You? Impossible."

Liu Huai's smile was complex, tinged with sadness and a bit of ruthlessness. "Fourth Brother," he said, "We were once the best of friends, the perfect pair—assassins and thieves. We could do anything, take anything, and that included each other, didn't it?"

"We're both doing this for ourselves, Fourth Brother," Liu Huai continued, his voice growing colder as he raised his sword from his sleeve. "You stole from me for yourself, and I assassinated you for myself. We're all just selfish, self-serving people."

"Master!" Liu Huai shouted, his voice filled with urgency. "Grab Mu Sicheng!"

Without hesitation, Zhang Gui threw a sharp puppet wire at Mu Sicheng's ankle. Mu Sicheng narrowly avoided it, his hand hooking onto the hoop to pull himself free.

Du Sanying, his face red and sweat beading on his forehead, struggled to keep his composure. "Bai Liu says Mu Sicheng has to hold out until the train starts without getting caught by Zhang Gui and the others! But how the hell can we hold out like this?"

Du Sanying glanced at Bai Liu. Mu Sicheng was barely holding on, even with the three of them supporting him, but soon the massive corpse would tip the balance. It was about to crash into their carriage. Mu Sicheng's hands were covered in scratches from the puppet silk, his wrists bound tightly by Zhang Gui's threads.

Zhang Gui gasped, "Liu Huai, do it!"

Liu Huai, panting, stepped closer to Mu Sicheng, his hands already raising the sword hidden in his sleeve.

Mu Sicheng suddenly clutched the puppet threads wrapped around his body and said through gritted teeth, "Bai Liu, if you have anything left, use it now. I can't hold on much longer. I'm holding onto Zhang Gui's puppet threads for you, but my fingers will be cut by the threads soon. You can act now."

Zhang Gui glared at Bai Liu, who had somehow managed to get behind Mu Sicheng. He saw Mu Sicheng's hands tightly gripping the puppet silk, blood dripping from his fingers and hitting the hot floor, evaporating in an instant.

Bai Liu slowly lifted the puppet hood behind Mu Sicheng, his face radiating an innocent smile.

Zhang Gui's expression shifted to one of fury.

"Fuck!!! These two are still in alliance! Liu Huai, do it!!!" Zhang Gui tried to manipulate the puppet wire again, but his efforts failed as Mu Sicheng held the threads tight. He couldn't control Bai Liu. Zhang Gui's face darkened as he tugged at the threads, trying to sever Mu Sicheng's fingers while shouting, "Liu Huai! Hurry! Bai Liu has no offensive power now!"

Du Sanying's voice cracked as he gasped, "Bai Liu! Hurry!"

Without a second thought, Liu Huai struck. Mu Sicheng, feeling the movement, glanced back at Bai Liu, who still wore the same innocent smile. Bai Liu's hands gently pressed against Mu Sicheng's back, giving him a slight push forward.

Mu Sicheng's pupils dilated.

Du Sanying's mouth dropped open in disbelief. Zhang Gui let go of the puppet threads in shock, and Liu Huai stared blankly at Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng. Blood from Liu Huai's sleeve sword slid down the blade.

Bai Liu's hands pushed Mu Sicheng forward into Liu Huai's sword, which pierced Mu Sicheng's shoulder, severing his arms cleanly.

Mu Sicheng's hands fell to the floor with a soft thud, landing silently on the ground.

It was like the last time Liu Huai betrayed him and severed his arms.

But that time it was Liu Huai.

This time, it was Bai Liu.

Blood poured from Mu Sicheng's broken shoulder.

"I think Master Zhang Gui makes a valid point," Bai Liu said, his voice grating and eerily calm. His smile never faltered. "Mu Sicheng, if you don't go berserk, we all die."

"It's no longer useful to work with you. You're too weak to make it through," Bai Liu's voice was chilling, a cool, gentle smile on his face. "So I've decided to wholeheartedly become my master's puppet and follow his orders."

Burst last train

Mu Sicheng staggered twice, his eyes hollow, his movements slow and rigid. He looked down at his hands on the floor, disoriented.

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai has attacked Mu Sicheng with a Dagger of Darkness, corrupting Mu Sicheng's spirit level with darkness.]

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng's mental field has been violently shaken, and his mental value has dropped drastically.]

[System Warning: Player Mu Sicheng's Spirit Level has dropped from 40... 30... 20... 10. Player Mu Sicheng now has a Spirit Level of 8! Entering Berserk Phase!]

[Player Mu Sicheng's Personal Panel (Berserk Status)]

[Combined Defense Attack Power increased. Total Panel Attribute Points exceed 6000, Rated as A++ Player. Player Mu Sicheng level increased from A to A++.]

[Player Mu Sicheng's alienation level has increased due to his status in The Book of Monsters: Capuchin Tamed by Thieves.]

Black flesh sprouted rapidly from Mu Sicheng's severed arm, wriggling and gathering until it twisted into two black monkey claws that extended past his waist.

Mu Sicheng tilted his head back, loosening his bones, exhaled a white breath, and flung his newly-formed arms to the floor. His eyes had vanished, leaving behind only blank white orbs. His fangs jutted from his mouth, and his ears had transformed into monkey ears. A tail, now slowly resting on the floor, flapped from side to side. The monkey headset behind him giggled maniacally, its eyes glowing with a piercing red light. In a shrill, monkeyish voice, Mu Sicheng screamed: "Crazy!"

His pure white eyes twitched slightly, and he bared his teeth in a snarl, followed by a creepy, bestial laugh. With a burst of speed, Mu Sicheng flung his arms and, moving faster than the eye could follow, launched a horizontal kick from his waist, sending the brother of the flaming thief flying out of the carriage.

The thief's brother crashed into another carriage, his massive palms attempting to grab the window to stop his fall, only to shatter the glass and leave a long, dark carbon trail across the floor. Flames flickered in his eyes, and the creature instinctively roared in anger and confusion, unsure how the small man who had been running through the carriage had suddenly acquired the strength to kick him away.

Mu Sicheng exhaled another breath of white, flaming air, his mouth curling into a strange grin. His sharp teeth gleamed as he took a flying leap, stepping off the wall of the carriage and dashing forward. His claws were ready to tear into the heart of the monster.

The thief's brother roared again and delivered a crushing blow to Mu Sicheng, sending them both into a sea of flames that engulfed them in a violent burst of fire.

Mu Sicheng was no longer human, not in any way recognizable as one.

But Bai Liu? He was even less human.

Du Sanying stared at Bai Liu in disbelief, completely stunned. He hadn’t expected Mu Sicheng to be so neatly betrayed by Bai Liu, the mastermind behind it all.

What Du Sanying didn’t expect was that Bai Liu, after buying Mu Sicheng, wouldn’t hesitate to sell Du Sanying out as well.

Bai Liu turned to Zhang Gui with an unbothered expression and spoke calmly, "Master, the broken lens is on Du Sanying. Let’s take him out while Mu Sicheng and the thief’s brother are busy struggling with each other."

Bai Liu’s "master" was more traditional than Liu Huai’s, who had been Zhang Gui’s puppet for some time.

Du Sanying’s anger boiled over as he shouted, his eyes brimming with tears, "Fuck, Bai Liu, you’re really not human! We agreed to go against Zhang Gui! You’ve really turned on us!"

Bai Liu offered a hollow apology, "I’m sorry. This big monster that got on board messed up my plans. He’s so strong that I realized I couldn’t win with you guys, so I decided to submit to my master and abandon the plan we had."

Liu Huai stood frozen, dumbfounded by Bai Liu's betrayal. He had regretted betraying Mu Sicheng, cursing himself before he ended up serving Zhang Gui. But now, he saw Bai Liu act with no remorse, betraying others with speed and ease, leaving Liu Huai wondering if Bai Liu had always been Zhang Gui's ally.

Bai Liu analyzed the situation coldly. "Du Sanying is trapped in this carriage. He has nowhere to go but forward into the thief's brother, or out the door where passengers are bursting in. With or without luck, he's caught. There's no better time than now to take him."

Du Sanying ran frantically, tears streaking down his face, screaming, "Bai Liu, you fuck! You're not human! Don't you have a heart?!"

As Bai Liu had predicted, Du Sanying was caught in a trap with no escape. Even if he could hold out for a while with his luck, it was only a matter of time before Zhang Gui caught him.

Zhang Gui didn't hesitate. He extended his puppet threads to trap Du Sanying while Liu Huai joined the pursuit. The other two puppets dealt with the passengers trying to stop them.

Du Sanying, crying and cursing, was running in circles, but Bai Liu stood silently in the corner, untouched. Despite the chaos, Bai Liu was safe, even protected by Zhang Gui's puppets who fended off anyone who came near him.

Zhang Gui's instincts began to feel uneasy. Something was wrong.

When had Bai Liu taken control behind the scenes like this?

Zhang Gui's heart sank as he began to piece it together. From the moment Bai Liu had pushed Mu Sicheng into fighting the monster, it seemed like Bai Liu had been in control all along, directing everything without moving a finger. Zhang Gui had unconsciously trusted Bai Liu, thinking him a pawn, but now it was clear he had been led the whole time.

Zhang Gui's face hardened as he realized the truth.

"No!" he shouted, tugging the puppet threads violently. "Liu Huai, come back! Watch out for Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng! We've been played! Du Sanying has no more than 20 shards left, and his luck is at its peak. We're wasting time on him! The real target is Mu Sicheng's lenses from the monster!"

Bai Liu sighed, looking at the countdown on the train's LED screen. "But it's about time," he murmured. "The train is leaving."

[System Tip: The train will start soon. Please fulfill your agreement with Player Bai Liu and take the (mermaid amulet) from Player Mu Sicheng. Otherwise, as a punishment, your soul will be imprisoned in the Soul Note of Player Bai Liu's old wallet.]

Zhang Gui's face twisted in realization.

"That wallet…" he muttered, looking up at Bai Liu in disbelief. "Your personal skill is trading? What kind of messed up skill is that? Soul debt rights? How do you have something close to system authority? The system wouldn't allow that!"

[System Alert: Soul Debt is a blocked term. A small TV mute has been applied to Player Zhang Gui.]

Bai Liu rubbed his nose, a sly grin spreading across his face. "But I just have it. Sorry."

Zhang Gui's frustration grew, but he didn't have time to argue. The train was about to start, and he had to act quickly.

"Don't worry about Du Sanying!" Zhang Gui barked. "He's Bai Liu's puppet. Focus on Mu Sicheng!"

With a cold look in his eyes, Zhang Gui ordered his puppets to attack Mu Sicheng, "Kill him! Get what's on him and give it to me! He won't last much longer!"

Liu Huai hesitated for a moment but then lunged toward Mu Sicheng. Just as he was about to get close, a burst of flames erupted from the compartment, forcing Liu Huai to stop.

Liu Huai frowned bitterly. "Master, the battle's too intense. We can't get in there. Only Mu Sicheng can withstand the flames."

Zhang Gui's chest heaved as he looked over at Bai Liu, who was lazily leaning against the door. His instincts screamed that something wasn't right.

The entire scene had shifted around Bai Liu.

Zhang Gui's chest heaved violently as he glared at Bai Liu, who was lazily leaning against the door in the corner. He pulled the puppet strings tighter, dragging Bai Liu toward him.

Bai Liu was jerked forward, choking and coughing from the strangulation as he subconsciously tried to pry the strings off his neck.

Zhang Gui grabbed Bai Liu by the neck and lifted him off the ground, his voice seething with rage. "You deliberately let Mu Sicheng go berserk to fight that monster! You knew we couldn't get in there and retrieve anything, didn't you? That was your plan with him, wasn't it? You pushed Mu Sicheng into such a dangerous situation that he'd have no choice but to cooperate with you!"

"We agreed," Bai Liu rasped, his face red, tears falling from his eyes despite the strangulation. He was still smiling. "We agreed that the most dangerous place is the safest place."

Zhang Gui's rage intensified, his grip tightening around Bai Liu's neck. "Aren't you afraid I'll kill you?" His voice trembled with fury, the stranglehold becoming suffocating.

Bai Liu's eyes bulged as he gasped for air, but his tone remained flat. "My personal skills still work even if I die. You useless master."

He choked and coughed, his face turning a deep reddish-purple from the lack of oxygen, but he continued to laugh through the pain. "Killing me would only waste time and cost you another clever puppet. Go ahead, master. Will you kill me?"

He laughed again, even as the life was being squeezed out of him.

Burst last train

Zhang Gui did want to kill the bastard on impulse, but as Bai Liu said, he had nothing to gain by killing Bai Liu now!

Because Bai Liu's personal skill was already activated, it would not be aborted whether Zhang Gui killed him or not, and killing Bai Liu would cost Zhang Gui the clever puppet he had managed to get his hands on.

The first order of business now was to get the mermaid amulet, then suspend Bai Liu's personal skills. Afterward, Zhang Gui could abuse the damned Bai Liu in a hundred different ways to vent his anger at being teased.

But the cost of killing Bai Liu was too high. He had gone to such lengths to capture a golem with such a high intelligence value; it would not be in Zhang Gui's interest to kill it without reaping some benefits.

Zhang Gui barely calmed down as he loosened the puppet wire strangling Bai Liu.

Bai Liu fell limp, covering his bruised neck as he lay on the ground coughing loudly for breath. His eyes were filled with physical tears, but he actually smiled. "Thank you, Master, for sparing my life."

Zhang Gui immediately wanted to recoil and strangle him to death for that unpleasant smile.

He pushed back the anger surging within him, taking a deep breath to clear his mind and focus. The system indicated that the bottom line for a failed transaction was a train start. He glanced at the LED countdown on the carriage, which had a countdown to the start of the train.

There were still forty seconds to go, and he wasn't completely out of it. Killing Bai Liu was only ten seconds away, and it wasn't too late to wait until the countdown reached ten seconds before making his move.

Zhang Gui's mind raced as he gave orders: "It's not a dead end yet. If the players can't get in—Liu Huai, bring the passengers into the carriage where Mu Sicheng is and have them attack him! He should be almost out of mental strength by now! Let the passengers alienate him and kill him!"

Liu Huai responded, "Yes!"

Hooking monsters was Liu Huai's specialty, and both his thief and assassin skills were highly effective.

Back in the day, he and Mu Sicheng were a great partnership—Mu Sicheng stealing, Liu Huai luring and assassinating monsters.

Liu Huai's two sleeved swords moved between the passengers, soon drawing their hatred and leading them toward him. They hung upside down at the entrance of the carriage, which was still on fire, as they searched for Liu Huai and entered the carriage. Once inside, the passengers seemed drawn to something, climbing and rolling toward Mu Sicheng.

The fire from the big boss, the Thief's Brother, could still burn these passengers outright, but after tangling with Mu Sicheng for a while, the Thief's Brother's condition had slipped significantly, and the flames were much smaller. Though the players couldn't resist, the passengers were able to get inside.

The flames inside the carriage were fading, and those in the next carriage could barely make out the scene inside.

A blank-eyed Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth, riding the big monster's neck, unable to shake it off.

The bursting passengers, seemingly attracted by the lenses on the big monster, poured into the carriage in a steady stream. They climbed and hissed, overlapping with flaming, charred corpses. The big monster twisted and threw Mu Sicheng off with a backhand.

Mu Sicheng choked and coughed, as if he had finally run out of steam. He released his monkey paw and fell backward into the pile of bursting passengers, who had piled onto his thief brother, the little giant.

The blackened and charred passengers grabbed Mu Sicheng's limbs with their teeth and claws, their fingers scratching his ghastly white face. The passengers poured in, overwhelming him like a mountain. He leaned back, his head sticking out of the sea of corpses, gasping for breath as if suffocating, but his mouth was soon covered by the charred corpses below.

Mu Sicheng's entire body was pulled into a fiery mountain of corpses, never to be seen again.

The Thief's Brother threw back his head and bellowed, his fists blazing with fire. He raised his fists, ready to strike Mu Sicheng, who was drowning in the pile of passengers.

Mu Sicheng lay on his back, eyes lost in the pile of charred corpses. He seemed oblivious to everything around him, except for the slight heaving of his chest, indicating that he was still alive.

But this survival didn't seem like it would last much longer.

The monster landed a punch.

Du Sanying saw Mu Sicheng's side and cried out with a harsh scream. The sound made Mu Sicheng blink as if with difficulty, and he managed to side-step the huge fist coming down from the Thief's Brother. The wind from the punch made Mu Sicheng vomit a mouthful of blood, and his eyelids drooped helplessly. His body sank deeper into the pile of charred corpses.

[System warning: Please flee quickly, Mu Sicheng! Your spirit level is endangered! You are near the borderline of death!]

Mu Sicheng was clearly not going to last much longer.

"Mu Sicheng is definitely dead." Zhang Gui narrowed his eyes. "This monster could even kill you, Bai Liu. Your attribute panel, when you're berserk, may not be able to block it. Liu Huai, as soon as Mu Sicheng dies, immediately throw me the mermaid amulet from his drop item!"

"I can't even hold up my berserk panel?" Bai Liu's thoughtful voice suddenly rang out. "What if I double my berserk panel attributes?"

"How did you double your berserk panel attributes?" Zhang Gui snorted. "Looks like Mu Sicheng told you about my personal skill, Puppet Enhancement."

"I'll be straight with you, Bai Liu. It's theoretically impossible to double the berserk attribute panel. First, you have to drop below 20 spirit points to enter the berserk attribute panel. Then, my personal skill, Puppet Reinforcement, requires sacrificing fifty of your spirit points to do so. But you can't use [Puppet Reinforcement] with less than 20 spirit points left."

"What if I'm partial to it?" Bai Liu asked softly.

Zhang Gui snickered. "But you won't die. You'll just go into a state worse than death."

Zhang Gui now had the time to talk to Bai Liu. He looked at him with a smirk, a sense of victory and achievement after a battle with a clever man. "The countdown to the start of the train on the LED now has 36 seconds left. Mu Sicheng won't last 36 seconds at all. You will lose this time, and I'll definitely get the mermaid amulet."

[System Alert: The train has started. Player Zhang Gui has broken his trust with Player Bai Liu and failed to complete the transaction with Player Bai Liu regarding the Mermaid Amulet. Player Zhang Gui has been given a reputation penalty and has become a Soul Coin in Player Bai Liu's old wallet.]

Zhang Gui's eyes widened as he subconsciously looked at the LED countdown screen and retorted in shock, "How could the train have started when there were still thirty-six seconds to go—"

The train started to shake and move, and Liu Huai stopped in his tracks, chasing Du Sanying in shock.

Du Sanying, who had been running all over the carriage, finally sank into the corner with a long breath. His arms and legs were weak, and his tear-stained face sobbed as he removed the translucent fabric covering the LED screen. He leaned against the door, exhausted, his tear-streaked face still sobbing, saying, "Bai Liu, next time I won't work with you again. It was so exciting. I thought I was going to die! I thought I was going to die."

The fabric slowly fell to the ground, revealing a real screen that read [Countdown: 0 seconds, train will start soon. Passengers, please get ready].

Zhang Gui threw a scouting prop over the dropped fabric with a dark look on his face.

[Reconnaissance result: Player Du Sanying used a prop (disguised fabric) to tamper with the time on the LED screen.]

"Du Sanying!" Zhang Gui lost his cool and broke down, questioning him. "When did you use this prop? How come I have no memory of—"

He suddenly stopped mid-sentence.

Zhang Gui recalled Du Sanying frantically throwing props out to stall for time while they were chasing him. A piece of fabric was indeed thrown out and hung on the screen.

But Zhang Gui had been so overwhelmed by the joy of his impending victory that he didn't even consider Du Sanying's frightened, sobbing performance was faked!

Du Sanying had been so scared by Bai Liu, almost to the point of tears. Bai Liu had played the villain so well that he and Mu Sicheng were really going to be sold out! Du Sanying was genuinely frightened and called Bai Liu inhuman.

When Zhang Gui realized this, he took two steps back, in a bit of a trance. He looked at Bai Liu incredulously. "How is it possible? Your intelligence value is 89, and mine is 93. How can you be smarter than me and anticipate what I want to do beforehand..."

"Maybe mine's natural?" Bai Liu shrugged casually, his expression calm as he quickly pulled a brand-new coin—Zhang Gui's Soul Coin—from his old wallet and pressed it into his system panel.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has used Player Zhang Gui's Soul Coin to intervene in Zhang Gui's system and is cutting into Zhang Gui's system panel...]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has officially cut into Player Zhang Gui's system panel and is available for action.]

Bai Liu's system panel instantly switched to Zhang Gui's, and Zhang Gui realized that he was completely under control. He grunted impotently and turned his head away, closing his eyes in defeat.

He had controlled so many people, but he had never been controlled by anyone before.

Bai Liu, heh, Bai Liu.

This man must have known that Zhang Gui was trying to capture him to draw on his intelligence, and was only emboldened to think that Zhang Gui would not kill him easily.

As it turned out, Zhang Gui had done exactly the same thing, allowing Bai Liu to take advantage of an opening.

Zhang Gui didn't think he was wrong to be greedy. He just lost when he met someone who was ten times greedier than him.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses Soul Coin to intervene in Player Zhang Gui's System Panel. Player Bai Liu uses Player Zhang Gui's Personal Skill (String Doll). Player Bai Liu manipulates Player Zhang Gui to manipulate Player Liu Huai to attack himself.]

Zhang Gui's fingers suddenly moved uncontrollably as they danced around, pulling Liu Huai's heart tighter, as it clenched.

Liu Huai and Zhang Gui both looked up at the same time in shock at Bai Liu, who calmly gave the order, "Attack me, Liu Huai, in the way that costs you the most mental energy."

Zhang Gui was shocked. "You've already won, Bai Liu. What more do you want to do? The door will be closed soon!"

Yes, the train had started, and both the [Exploding Passenger] and the [Thief's Brother] were ready to leave the train, dragging the trophy in their hands—a struggling, minuscule Mu Sicheng—as they walked out the door.

Mu Sicheng seemed to have lost all consciousness. His eyeless eyes were dreamily open, blood dripping from the corners of his mouth and eyes. The only certainty was that he had never used the mermaid's amulet.

[Bai Liu, I'm not sure I could use the mermaid's amulet with less than 10 spirit. The human desire to survive can make people do a lot of strange things, including breaking cooperation and betraying teammates.]

[But if I really never used the prop from start to finish, it means I maintained my sanity with a mental value of less than 10, as you, the madman, demanded.]

[Mu Sicheng, if you don't use the mermaid's amulet, I promise I will save you as long as I live.]

[I don't want to be controlled by Zhang Gui. I'd rather die, but being controlled by you, up to now, I'm okay with that.]

[You're my most valuable card, Mu Sicheng, and I won't let you die.]

"I want to save Mu Sicheng," Bai Liu repeated in a flat tone. "Liu Huai, attack me with that weapon of yours that can drop your spirit value extremely fast."

Liu Huai's hand jabbed forward uncontrollably, and the two sleeved swords pierced into Bai Liu's chest and stomach. Bai Liu only frowned slightly as Liu Huai let go of his hand with a shudder.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has been attacked by Player Liu Huai's (Dark Sleeve Sword) and has suffered an erosion of his spirit level, dropping -30. Current spirit level 39. Warning! Warning! Warning!]

Bai Liu let out a breath as he slightly covered his bleeding chest, glanced up at Mu Sicheng, who was still barely struggling, and spat out a few words to Liu Huai as if displeased, "Not quite enough, keep stabbing."

Liu Huai gripped the sleeve sword and stabbed into Bai Liu's chest once more, his whole body almost shaking with each thrust.

Bai Liu wiped the blood from the corner of his mouth unconcernedly, then glanced faintly at Liu Huai. "I promised him I would save him."

"It's my deal and my partnership with him, and it's my basic ethics as a Rover to keep the deal."

Burst last train

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has been attacked by Player Liu Huai's (Dark Sleeve Sword). Mental Value has been eroded by -35. Mental Value currently at 4. Warning! Berserk zone has been entered!]

[Player Name: Bai Liu (Berserk Attribute Bonus Panel)]

Strength: 56 → 655
Agility: 249 → 1133
Attack: 37 → 1555
Resistance: 36 → 1776
Combined Defence Attack Power increased. Total Play Panel Attribute Points exceeded 4000. Rated A+ Player. Player Bai Liu's rank increased from F to A+.

"It's okay." Bai Liu finally stopped Liu Huai's relentless assault.

Zhang Gui saw Bai Liu's attribute panel and quickly commented, "Your panel isn't enough to carry [Thief Brothers]. [Thief Brothers] is at least an A+ level monster. It takes a Mu Sicheng-type player, one who has raged to the A++ level, to carry it."

"I know," Bai Liu's attitude remained calm. "You're still here, aren't you? What's the hurry?"

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu manipulates player Zhang Gui to use his personal skill (Puppet Enhancement) on himself.]

[System warning: Player Bai Liu's spirit value is not enough to drop by 50 points! Whether to forcibly strengthen the puppet will cause player Bai Liu's spirit value to collapse!]

[System Warning: Is player Bai Liu forcing the use of his personal skill (Reinforcing Golem)?]

Bai Liu: [Use] without hesitation.

"You're crazy, Bai Liu!!!" Zhang Gui screamed as he was forced to move his fingers to manipulate Bai Liu. Transparent puppet strands invaded the back of Bai Liu's head, piercing the large hole in his occipital bone like a syringe. The rest of the puppet strands twitched his joints, burrowing into Bai Liu's bones in an extremely bloody and painful process. Soon, the pain numbed as his spirit level dropped.

Zhang Gui shouted, frantically tugging at the puppet silk in his hand to stop Bai Liu, the psychopath: "Bai Liu! You only have 4 spirit points! You can't use this [Puppet Enhancement] skill! Forcing a human skill to lower your spirit level won't clear it, but it will collapse your spirit level! You'll go crazy!!!"

Spiritual Avalanche is a state where none of the non-monster alienations in the game lower the spiritual value. It's impossible to clear a player's spirit value to zero.

For example, Zhang Gui can't control a player in a berserker state, and Liu Huai's [Dark Sleeve Sword] attack only briefly reduces mental value. These skills and props can't clear a player's mental value.

Instead, a very strange state occurs. Under constant attack from these [personal skills] and [props], the mental value eventually approaches zero. This state is known as [infinitesimal mental value] or [mental value collapse].

It's said that when a player's mental value reaches this point, their mind becomes trapped between [monster] and [normal human], their brain thinking like a monster but with the shell of a human.

Why describe the collapse of spiritual values as "allegedly"?

Because whether a player goes insane and kills everyone in the game or exits the game and kills themselves, any player who has touched [Mental Break] state has gone mad, one by one.

Moreover, most of these players with [Spiritual Value Avalanche] are boosted with berserk attributes and will kill all players in the game. These players are a nightmare for everyone in the entire copy.

"Bai Liu!!!" Zhang Gui tried desperately to control his hands and stop reinforcing Bai Liu, "Don't go crazy! This state is more dangerous than the last time! Your spirit value is theoretically zero, but it's not! You'll fall into subconscious chaos! You'll go insane, Bai Liu!!!"

Zhang Gui gritted his teeth and pulled at the puppet silk: "Mu Sicheng's death means nothing to you! You could have made it through! You're a smart guy, right? But if your spirit collapses and you go mad, with your high attribute value, we'll all die by your hand! And you can't save Mu Sicheng! You'll only attack him!"

The door closed, and Mu Sicheng was slowly dragged out of the car, his fingers curling and tugging at the door frame as if struggling to survive.

Mu Sicheng’s eyelids fluttered open, and he looked at Bai Liu, his lips moving as if calling his name with great reluctance.

"I know." Bai Liu had already been warned by Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying about mental value collapse, but his eyes were eerily calm. His tone held a faint, indifferent smirk. "But I don’t like breaking deals."

"Zhang Gui, or master," Bai Liu suddenly turned to Zhang Gui with a smile. "If I go mad, that will be the time to test you. I’ll still be your puppet, and you must control me and make me do what I have to do."

"Damn you!!! Bai Liu!!!" Zhang Gui’s face turned blue with the effort as his hands spasmed, trying to control the puppet silk. "No!!! I can’t do it!!!"

"You can do it." Bai Liu smiled idly, turning his head and waving his hand. "I trust you, Great Puppeteer."

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has entered the (Reinforced Puppet) state, but his spirit value has not dropped enough.]

[System Alert: Claim successful. Player Bai Liu's mental value dropped from 4 → 3 → 2 → 0.000000000... 1.]

Zhang Gui screamed hysterically, "Stop it, Bai Liu!!!"

[System warning (for all players): Player Bai Liu’s spirit level has entered a collapse state. Extremely high-risk creature! All players are advised to flee!]

Bai Liu's eyes gradually lost focus, his breathing halted. The world around him stretched and twisted into a disordered blur, as if he were entering another plane.

He was pulled into the carriage for a split second by a tug at his chest. The thief's brother stepped on his chest and swung a fiery fist. The punch landed with a thud, and Bai Liu turned his head to see his brain, bones, and blood crumbling under the impact. The pain was real, vivid, and all-consuming.

A second later, Bai Liu was dragged into a new scene, standing in the carriage that started it all. A steady stream of burst passengers entered, and Mu Sicheng was grimly talking about a chase. Seconds later, Mu Sicheng walked away indifferently, the mermaid's amulet in hand. Bai Liu was trapped, flames engulfing him as a passenger grabbed his limbs, burning him alive into a charred corpse, pain coursing through him.

Bai Liu was in Du Sanying's car, on his knees gasping for breath. Du Sanying said, "I can't, Bai Liu. I can't be with you." Locked in hatred and depleted of strength, Bai Liu was left to fall to the ground, devoured by a group of forlorn passengers.

He saw Mu Sicheng use the mermaid's amulet and become a puppet in Zhang Gui's hands, slowly losing his mind, eventually abandoned to die alone in some copy.

The endless visions of death overwhelmed him, each possibility of his death playing out as if they were real. His subconscious fears and hallucinations consumed him, and even Bai Liu couldn't stop them.

And so, he repeated these visions a thousand times.

"It's boring to assume something that didn't happen in something that already has," Bai Liu muttered, pinned to the ground by Mu Sicheng. He had forgotten which death node this was from. His throat had been brutally sliced open by Mu Sicheng's claws, blood spilling down his windpipe as he spoke, choking and coughing, laughing weakly. "But I'm bored thinking about the ways you betrayed me, Mu Sicheng. There are so many ways, maybe eight hundred."

Burned, throat slit, bitten, strangled…

Mu Sicheng looked strangely at Bai Liu, who was dying yet still laughing.

Bai Liu's face was covered in his own blood. His eyes slowly closed as death approached. His voice had a distinctive airy tone as his windpipe was sliced open.

"Of all the possibilities, you chose the one that didn't betray me," Bai Liu's words trailed off as he closed his eyes. "Then I would have chosen that one too, Mu Sicheng. It was a fair trade."

[Bai Liu, if I was really dragged away by the monster, would you really risk your life to save me?]

[Don't worry, if you don't use the mermaid amulet, I'm a man of my word and will remember to save you even when I'm mad, Mu Sicheng]

After listening to Bai Liu's words, Mu Sicheng lowered his eyes and snorted, saying, "I don't believe you, Bai Liu.

Burst last train

All illusions shattered before Bai Liu like broken lenses, and Bai Liu, who had died in a strange way, crumbled into ashes, much like a burning photograph caught in an illusion.

Bai Liu slowly opened his unfocused eyes.

Everyone held their breath, instinctively stepping back. Du Sanying huddled in the corner, staring at Bai Liu, whose eyes were vacant. He swallowed hard, taking another cautious step away.

A strange premonition swept over Du Sanying, his skin prickling as if something dangerous was near. Yet, there was an undeniable rush of excitement in his chest.

"What now...?" Du Sanying muttered. "Is this just another monster on our side, or...?"

Mu Sicheng's blackened paws scraped lightly against the bars, as if trying to hold himself back from being dragged out. The door slowly closed, revealing only his vacant, snow-white eyes, resigned to his fate.

Then Bai Liu moved.

He moved with incredible speed, stomping across the carriage floor. The steel walls of the carriage dented beneath his footsteps, and in the blink of an eye, he appeared above the door from which Mu Sicheng was being dragged away. Bai Liu’s calm demeanor remained as he stepped forcefully between the doors, just before Mu Sicheng's hand was about to be pulled out completely. With a sudden burst of strength, Bai Liu planted both feet on either side of the doorframe and held it open.

Bai Liu exhaled sharply as he gripped the door with both hands, pulling it outward with such force that his shoulder blades tensed under his shirt. The glass of the door shattered into a million pieces with a loud "clack."

With his bare hands, Bai Liu twisted the heavy door open in a seemingly impossible display of strength.

"Shit..." Du Sanying muttered, dumbfounded. "Bai Liu has evolved into King Kong Barbie!!!"

The two figures, one dragging Mu Sicheng out of the door and the other, the thief's brother, froze at the sight. Bai Liu's raw strength in pulling the door open was a visible threat. The thief's brother growled viciously, raising his flaming fist and swinging it down at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu moved too fast to be seen clearly, dodging to the side before dropping low to grab Mu Sicheng and pull him in. He kicked the thief's brother aside, throwing him off-balance.

Enraged, the thief's brother slammed his fist into the ground, his entire body alight with fire. The carriage, which had begun to move, was once again engulfed in flames, locked in place by the thief's brute strength.

Zhang Gui looked completely lost, his voice unsure as he shouted, "Bai Liu? Are you crazy?"

Bai Liu glanced back at him, answering in a voice that could not be misunderstood. "Don't control me. I'm awake. Let go of the puppet strings and grab Mu Sicheng."

Bai Liu attempted to throw Mu Sicheng into another carriage, but Zhang Gui stepped in front, blocking him. The thief's brother, now furious with Bai Liu, abandoned his pursuit of him and returned to attacking Mu Sicheng. His fists, aflame, aimed for the unconscious Mu Sicheng, who had been thrown into the air by Bai Liu.

As Bai Liu reacted, the thief's brother threw a vicious punch at Mu Sicheng, blood splattering from Bai Liu's mouth as it dripped onto Mu Sicheng's pale face.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's life reduced to 6!]

"Tch." Bai Liu wiped the blood from his mouth and quickly rolled away from another attack. Gasping for breath, he managed to smile faintly, glancing at Mu Sicheng, who lay limp and motionless behind him. "Well done. No wonder the thief's brother had to drag you away. You stole his broken lenses, and now you've got the hate value locked on you."

In Mu Sicheng's clenched right hand was a broken lens the size of a heart. Despite being unconscious for so long, he had still held on to it without the thief's brother taking it.

This, too, was part of Bai Liu's plan to steal the broken lenses, knowing Mu Sicheng would hold onto them.

After struggling with the thief's brother for a while, as he prepared to launch another fiery attack, Bai Liu barked a command to the stunned group: "Help me close the car door. Get the car out of the way!"

Only then did the others scramble to push the door back into place, barely managing to fend off one last punch from the weakened thief's brother, who had lost his heart-shattering lens. The battered train slowly pulled away, creaking and squeaking.

Everyone exhaled in relief.

Zhang Gui and his three companions leaned against the door, gazing in awe at Bai Liu, while Du Sanying sat on a chair, drenched in sweat, catching his breath.

He had bought two bottles of spirit bleach and two bottles of stamina restorer, drinking one of each for himself before giving the other two bottles to Mu Sicheng. Bai Liu had been rough in his handling of the bottles, nearly choking Mu Sicheng in the process, but he eventually woke up. Bai Liu sat next to him, handing him the rest. "Drink it yourself. By the way, these two bottles total 1700 points. I'll charge you a 10% commission for buying them for you. That's 1870 points. Thanks for your patronage."

After saying this, Bai Liu naturally extended his hand to Mu Sicheng, signaling for payment.

Mu Sicheng, still reeling from the near-death experience, stared blankly, then transferred the 1870 points, silently wiping the blood from his face—the blood Bai Liu had spat after being punched to protect him.

Bai Liu said nothing about taking the punch for him, but Mu Sicheng, despite his usual indifference, noticed Bai Liu had held himself in front of him to take the blow. Bai Liu, the heartless man, had done something good without taking credit for it... A strange feeling stirred in Mu Sicheng.

He looked away, pretending to casually hand Bai Liu the broken lens he had been holding. "Here. Take it."

Bai Liu accepted it without hesitation, without asking why Mu Sicheng gave it to him. Everything felt so natural.

Mu Sicheng, unable to hold back, asked, "Bai Liu, back there... you really came to my rescue? I thought you didn't care about me. I didn't think you had any conscience left."

"It's not about conscience," Bai Liu replied casually, wiping blood from his mouth as if it meant nothing. "If we were just using each other, I'd let you die and save myself the trouble. But we're in a partnership. We agreed that if I said I wouldn't let you die, I wouldn't. It's a deal."

Mu Sicheng snorted faintly. "A deal? What kind of deal?"

"A one-point deal," Bai Liu said, lifting his spirit bleach and sipping it. "You gave me one point when we struck the deal. Don't you remember?"

Mu Sicheng fell silent, bowing his head as if recalling something—perhaps everything, perhaps nothing at all.

His dark red eyes flickered, and then, unexpectedly, he laughed softly. "It really was a bargain for one point... Bai Liu, you're a strange person."

"You're not the first person to say that about me," Bai Liu said, tilting his head and taking a swig of spirit bleach. "I don't think you'll be the last either."

Bai Liu closed his eyes and leaned back against the carriage. After a long exhale, he allowed himself a small, rare smile—something akin to triumph. "Everyone survived. Seven stations to go."

Mu Sicheng was quiet for a moment before he smiled back. "Yeah, we all survived... thanks to your madman plan."

Yes, that's right. From the start, Bai Liu's unthinkable plan was always:

—He wanted everyone to live.

Bai Liu, the psychopath, wanted to control everyone and ensure their survival.

It was the most cost-effective strategy in this life-draining game.

Bai Liu wouldn't waste anyone's life value. This extreme greed made Mu Sicheng believe in him and in the fact that Bai Liu wouldn't let him die so easily.

Five minutes ago.

After Bai Liu had just said he was going to work with the Puppeteer, Mu Sicheng became furious. "Who the hell are you going to work with? The Puppeteer?!"

"We have to work together," Bai Liu replied calmly. "Or rather, not cooperate. I must control everyone to ensure maximum efficiency in mobilizing life values."

"Because our total lifesteal is so low, I only have 21, you only have 70 or so, Du Sanying is full, but even then, we only have a little over 100 lifesteal on our side. After this attack, minus the 20 lifesteal points needed to exchange the shard, and the 10 lifesteal points needed to try it out, the Puppeteer's lifesteal tops out at 370. Combined, we only have over 600 life points, which is too low in a game that requires 400 life points to pass."

"It's the equivalent of one of us having died invisibly," Bai Liu said calmly. "We've killed a player without even knowing it."

Mu Sicheng couldn't help but spit out, "You lost most of the life points, didn't you! You've lost over seventy alone!"

"Oh, yeah?" Bai Liu quickly pretended not to hear anything, changing the subject. "And if the total shards are 400 and the collection estimate is now 40, that leaves 360 life points for us to throw away."

Bai Liu's tone turned serious. "But there's another important point: we've already passed two stations, but our Monster Book illustration has only refreshed one page."

Bai Liu opened his system's Monster Book panel and gestured to it. "The Monster Book for Burst Last Train has three pages, meaning there are at least two more monsters we haven't encountered yet."

Mu Sicheng's face sank. "If we count the game progress, we're currently past twenty percent. Usually, new monsters appear around this time."

Bai Liu nodded in agreement. "By the general nature of the game, I think the monsters that appear now will be harder to deal with than the [Burst Passenger]."

"It's bound to be harder for us to get the shattered lenses from these new monsters. With the high probability that we'll lose 360 life points, we'll also have to battle two stronger, unknown monsters. With our current 600 life points minus 360, even if all the deaths are on the Puppeteer's side, that leaves us with only two and a half people."

Bai Liu spread his hands. "Do you think we have a better chance of surviving, or a better chance of total annihilation?"

Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying both gave a united thump.

Mu Sicheng looked first at Bai Liu. "So what do you mean?"

Bai Liu was calm. "I mean to keep everyone alive and strengthen the war effort first."

Du Sanying looked confused. "But didn't you say before that it was impossible for everyone to survive?"

Bai Liu answered, "I was speaking from Zhang Gui's point of view earlier. If he controlled the situation, it would indeed be impossible for everyone to survive. We need their strength to fight the monsters and protect us, so we need them to survive. But they don't need our strength to fight the monsters. We are of limited value to him. If the new monsters are difficult to handle, Zhang Gui could easily throw us out just to get through."

Du Sanying was even more confused. "Then why are we working with the Puppeteer? Isn't that giving him control over us?"

Bai Liu's mouth curved into a slight smile. "Yes, just to make him think he has control over all of us."

Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying both stared in unison.

"If I were Zhang Gui," Bai Liu continued, "I wouldn't confront us head-on, because that would increase the life loss on their side. To reduce the life loss, it would be better to scatter us one by one and take us out individually. For me, who is at a disadvantage for profit, he would bait and cut off my back path, which is obviously you, Mu Sicheng, a player with a strong panel."

"For players with strong panel attributes like you, Mu Sicheng, if I were Zhang Gui, I'd probably play dirty and not confront them directly."

Mu Sicheng's mouth twitched when he heard Bai Liu's flat tone about playing dirty with him.

Mu Sicheng held his chest and raised an eyebrow. "So you're going to ask Zhang Gui for cooperation? How are you going to keep everyone alive after working with him when he's likely to sacrifice us once he takes control?"

"He controls everyone, and I control him through [cooperation]," Bai Liu said, raising his eyes to look directly at Mu Sicheng. "It's that simple."

Mu Sicheng sneered. "How do you control him? What are you going to do to get him to [cooperate] with you?"

Bai Liu's eyes locked onto Mu Sicheng's with intensity. "By you, Mu Sicheng. You will be doing something very risky, with a high probability of death, but I can use this to control Zhang Gui."

Mu Sicheng was stunned.

"But even if you only have a little life left in you, I will still keep you alive," Bai Liu said, his gaze calm yet powerful. "Mu Sicheng, you are one of my most valuable cards, and I promise that as long as you stay within my plan, no matter what happens, I will make sure you survive."

The plan Bai Liu proposed was fraught with uncertainty.

Mu Sicheng didn't even know what Bai Liu's personal skill was, nor did he know if the [Cooperation] skill Bai Liu supposedly had could be stronger than the Puppet Master's [Puppet Silk] judgment, which allowed him to control his opponent.

But in that moment, Mu Sicheng was so intensely stared at by Bai Liu that it was as though he was being uncontrollably persuaded to agree to Bai Liu's crazy, gambling plan.

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu's unwavering reflection in his eyes, remembering Bai Liu's actions—how he'd taken all the hits to draw the monster's hate value, protecting him in the process.

This guy was a madman, never backing down or running away from anything. There were times when Bai Liu had been on the verge of falling off the train, yet never took his eyes off Mu Sicheng. As Bai Liu had said, "I wouldn't hesitate to take every hit to ensure your survival."

Liu Huai, back in the day, had also played such a role, drawing hate for Mu Sicheng.

Liu Huai was a good fit for this job, but Mu Sicheng felt that if Liu Huai had been with him today, he might have failed. He wouldn't have come to his rescue without hesitation, like Bai Liu, the madman.

Bai Liu told Mu Sicheng the key to the plan—the mermaid amulet—and its function. He warned Mu Sicheng that once he used the prop, Bai Liu would become a puppet of [Zhang Gui], and the plan would fail.

Mu Sicheng was silent for a long time before replying, "You just told me that? You're not afraid I'll betray you and actually use it?"

Bai Liu's eyes were dark as he looked at Mu Sicheng quietly. When he raised his head slightly to look at him like this, it felt as though Mu Sicheng was being reflected in Bai Liu's eyes like a mirror, giving the illusion that Bai Liu, a man with an evil heart, was trusting him completely.

Bai Liu asked softly, "Do you know how to use it?"

Mu Sicheng closed his eyes slightly. After a long pause, he replied, "Bai Liu, I'm not sure I could use the mermaid's amulet with a spirit value of less than 10. The human desire to survive can make people do strange things, including breaking cooperation and betraying others."

Bai Liu didn't urge him further but quietly waited for Mu Sicheng's answer, as the train moved in the wind.

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath. "But if I really don't use the prop, the mermaid's amulet, then it means I've maintained my sanity with less than 10 mental value, as you, the madman, requested."

"If you don't use [the mermaid's amulet], Mu Sicheng," Bai Liu said, "then as long as I live, I will save you."

Small TV wall in the central hall.

Except for Bai Liu, who had the misfortune of falling into the Graveyard Bounce Zone, almost all the players on the Last Train to Burst made it to the Central Lobby promotion. Even Li Gou got a Central Lobby Edge promotion, and Zhang Gui, Du Sanying, and Mu Sicheng were already hanging out in the recommended spots.

Zhang Gui's promotion was the best. He was in the [Central Hall Multiplayer Area Hot Promotion], but when Zhang Gui took control of Bai Liu, his small TV point recommendation charge exploded, smoothly pushing him into the [Central Hall Core Promotion].

But Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying didn't fare as well. After they were under Bai Liu's control, viewers found it less enjoyable to watch and started to slowly drift toward Bai Liu's mini-TV, leading to a slight dip in their promotion.

Zhang Gui was the first player to break into the [Core Promotion] of Burst Last Train by controlling Bai Liu and successfully causing a wave of bounties.

Zhang Gui's small TV audience was thrilled:

“Zhang Gui can do it this time! Not bad for a player with 93 IQ points! He’s successfully controlling the game!”

“Look at this! Zhang Gui controls Bai Liu, and Bai Liu controls Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying. Amazing! Does this mean that everyone is under Zhang Gui's control now?”

“Tears for Little Zhang, I’ve waited so long for this day! You’ve been chasing God Mu for so long, and today, you finally took him down with someone else’s help!”

“I was expecting Bai Liu to interfere, but it turns out Bai Liu can't match Zhang Gui. The difference in strength is just too great!”

The viewers of Zhang Gui’s TV show were talking about it with great interest. But suddenly, one viewer seemed to notice something was off: “Wait, something’s wrong. Zhang Gui is doing so well, so the viewers of Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng’s TV shows should be flowing over, right? Why are they all going to Bai Liu’s TV?”

Burst last train

The audience of several players in a multiplayer game is fluid and generally shifts toward whoever is doing best.

It's Zhang Gui who's doing the best, with a high number of viewers rewarding and liking him as if they were on the verge of victory.

But strangely enough, Zhang Gui's audience, which had just made it to the [core multiplayer promotion], hadn't increased. Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying were losing viewers, yet all the traffic was frantically running to Bai Liu's [graveyard bounce area], not coming to see Zhang Gui's little TV.

Bai Liu, who had just been controlled by Zhang Gui, is the worst player, so he shouldn't be able to attract viewers. He should be losing them!

Some members of the audience could not contain their curiosity and whispered in discussion:

"What is Bai Liu up to? Does he have a plan? No way! He's tied up in puppet wire! There's no way he's going to get out of this!"

"… I think so. Why don't we just go and have a look and come back?"

"You guys go over and watch. I don't want to go away. Zhang Gui is brilliant here. I'll wait for you to come back and tell us what Bai Liu is doing."

"Well, we'll go and watch it, and come back to tell you about it. Don't worry. Bai Liu is probably just pulling off some eye-catching, death-defying stunt! I'll go and watch and come back and tell you all about it as a joke!"

Zhang Gui's small audience went to see Bai Liu's antics.

Then the group who said they would come back to tell a joke about Bai Liu never returned.

The rest of the audience scratched their heads even more:

"Shit, Bai Liu, there's not really some backstabbing going on, is there?! It can't be! I haven't heard of a way to disarm the puppet silk!"

"… Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng's audience are flocking to Bai Liu like crazy. Did they discuss some plan? What the hell is going on aaaahhhhh!"

"I can't help it, I'm going over to see it!"

"I'm curious too, but damn it! I'm a huge fan of Zhang Gui… Forget it, I'll just go have a look! I'll be right back here at Zhang Gui!"

In this way, the audience of all the players on the "Last Train to Burst" started to gather, little by little, flowing from the other players' TVs to Bai Liu's. The originally cold and lonely "Graveyard Bounce" area began to get crowded.

Because the graveyard area wasn't very big, this place, which had never been crowded, was now packed due to the traffic Bai Liu had drawn in.

Wang Shun glanced at the new audience crowding in behind him, then turned his attention to Bai Liu on the small TV, his expression mixed with an unprecedented complexity. "… Actually sucked traffic from the other three big players in reverse. Bai Liu…"

By the time the multiplayer game "The Last Train" started, almost all of Bai Liu's original cumulative audience had been siphoned away by the gods, leaving only a few people to watch Bai Liu.

But by this time, Bai Liu had actually sucked back all the lost viewers. Looking at the number of viewers, Bai Liu had drawn in a lot, and the viewers never left once they arrived.

It was the first time Wang Shun had seen someone suck traffic like this from the three big gods of mini-TV. It felt as though Bai Liu was pulling all the viewers of the game "Bursting Last Train" toward himself.

Most of the viewers here couldn't take their eyes off Bai Liu on the small TV, their eyes glued to the screen as if they were watching the climax of an exciting movie. No one could look away for a second. Only some of the viewers, who weren't so good at handling the tension, could look away and whisper nervously:

"Shit, shit, shit, I'm afraid to look at it! Bai Liu can't fool Zhang Gui! Oh my God, that's Zhang Gui! How dare he play Zhang Gui!"

"Steady! Don't panic! I feel Zhang Gui has taken the bait!"

By the time Mu Sicheng's arms were cut off and thrown over, Bai Liu's little TV was wailing, and many people covered their eyes.

"Oh my God, oh my God! God Mu, what a mess!!! Even if I knew it was part of the plan, I couldn't stand it... Bai Liu hit him so hard! He was laughing when he pushed God Mu over!"

"I have a feeling God Mu might be cool this time… I don't think a profit-minded person like Bai Liu will save him."

"Me too..."

"Shit!!! Mu Sicheng, are you stupid!!! How could Bai Liu have saved you?! I'm so mad at you as a fan! You're just giving it away for nothing!!!"

"I think that although Bai Liu says he wants to save everyone, I don't think it's likely."

"In the end, Du Sanying and Bai Liu are probably the only two who will survive. The others will probably be thrown out by Bai Liu and die carrying the monster."

"Mu Sicheng is so pathetic… Totally fooled by Bai Liu…"

After Bai Liu had finally killed Zhang Gui and used his Psycho Break skill to snatch the unconscious Mu Sicheng from the monster's grasp within ten seconds of the car starting, the audience was left speechless for a long time as they watched Bai Liu's group resting in the wrecked carriage.

In a matter of seconds, he turned the tables, manipulated the field, fought off monsters, took people from them, and most importantly—just as Bai Liu had planned—no one died in either Zhang Gui's or his side's camp.

It was a long time before a member of the audience spoke up, still in an incredulous trance.

"Surprisingly, Bai Liu really let the whole crew survive…"

"I was dumbfounded... I thought Mu Sicheng was going to die when he was dragged out, but Bai Liu was so strong that he dragged him in and gave him a punch..."

"Damn, I got tears in my eyes when Bai Liu saved Mu Sicheng. I believe in love again, no more partnership!!!"

"Too strong, Bai Liu. Too strong, dammit! Why can I only give one like!!!"

"I'm so excited I want to rip my clothes off! Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng are so handsome! I'm so impressed by the brotherly love they have for each other!"

"Ooooooo I feel so sweet! When will this sweet brotherhood get my turn ooooooooo Bai Liu! Will you work with me too!!!"

"Bai Liu, you're a god! God!!!"

"Bai Liu, God forever!!!"

Wang Shun slowly, slowly took off his glasses, which had a drop of sweat on them, wiped them clean, then put them back on to look at the small TV screen. His eyes closed, resting, his face covered in blood and black stains. Bai Liu's expression was a smile amidst the screams of ecstasy in the background for him.

Upon hearing this system notification, the cheering Bai Liu crowd paused for a second or two before erupting into an even louder cheer as the excited crowd began to scream in unison:

“Bai Liu, Punch!!! Core promotion!”

Bai Liu rested for a while before opening his eyes.

Mu Sicheng was wrapping some protective bandages around his arms and legs. These bandages reduce speed but increase defense, with a restorative effect to stop bleeding, a common item in the game.

When Mu Sicheng saw that Bai Liu had woken up, he subconsciously handed over a roll of bandages, which Bai Liu took naturally, regardless of what it was. He wrapped it around himself, showing no intention of giving Mu Sicheng any money, feeling fully justified in whoring himself out.

Mu Sicheng was speechless. "Did I say free for you?"

"I assumed you gave it to me for free," Bai Liu shamelessly responded. "Of course, you can take it back, but I only have 6 life points now, and you could kill me with one punch."

Bai Liu opened his bandaged hands and looked at Mu Sicheng innocently, as if to say, "If you're not afraid of killing me, you can come and rob me."

Mu Sicheng sighed in frustration, muttering, "..." He looked away from Bai Liu, who only had 6 life points. Seeing that Bai Liu's hands and feet were still bleeding, he subconsciously handed him another bandage.

But Bai Liu, with his usual entitlement, took the bandage without a hint of payment. He charged Mu Sicheng a handling fee for the things he had just given him. Mu Sicheng had already paid Bai Liu 1870 points for stamina supplements and mental bleach, and Bai Liu had taken 170 of those as a handling fee.

Bai Liu took the items without any sense of guilt.

Mu Sicheng didn’t necessarily expect Bai Liu to pay, but he was irritated by the way Bai Liu seemed so pleased with taking advantage.

There was no point in getting upset. He couldn't very well take advantage of a fragile Bai Liu, who only had 6 life points.

The others in the carriage were also bandaging up. The thief's brother's onslaught had left everyone with some damage, though Du Sanying was still fine. He sat in the corner, slightly embarrassed to watch the others bandage up when Bai Liu suddenly called to him, "Du Sanying."

Du Sanying turned his head reflexively and saw a large mirror diamond tossed idly by Bai Liu, landing in his arms.

Du Sanying held the broken lens that had taken them so long to collect. "Bai Liu, what are you giving me?"

"You're 100% lucky," Bai Liu said casually. "You won't get hurt or drop items easily, so it's safest to leave it with you. If I die, it wouldn't be a good deal if this item exploded and got picked up by monsters."

Bai Liu said it casually, but both Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying's expressions changed slightly when they heard it.

Du Sanying nervously put away the broken lens, stammering, "You're not going to die, are you, Bai Liu? You must have counted your life expectancy and stepped over the line to pass! Just like last time."

Mu Sicheng also gave Bai Liu a sullen look.

Bai Liu answered honestly, "I did count my lives, but there are always more surprises than plans, aren't there?"

"For example, the second monster in this game is a lot tougher than I predicted, and there's still a monster that hasn't even appeared yet, so it's really hard to say what will happen." Bai Liu spoke in a flat tone, as though discussing his own death wasn't worth much thought. "The probability of me dying isn't small, so Du Sanying, it's safest to keep these broken lenses with you. Even if I die, they won't go to waste. Do you understand?"

As he finished, another mouthful of blood choked and coughed out from the corner of his mouth, bits of internal organs mixed in. Bai Liu wiped it away with his palm, unconcerned.

The carriage fell silent as everyone looked at the bloody foam on Bai

Liu's palm.

The impact of having only 6 life points on a player's body was severe. It was rare for someone in such a state to stay awake like Bai Liu, almost as fragile as a terminally ill person. It was incredibly normal for him to die in this condition.

Du Sanying watched Bai Liu, who had saved all of their lives, with a mixture of resignation and a touch of emotion, but he himself...

"Yes!" Du Sanying nodded vigorously, his voice full of emotion. "I'll take good care of it! I'll give it to you when the game is over! Don't worry, I won't give it to anyone but you!"

Du Sanying said this while also casting a wary glance at Zhang Gui, who was sitting next to him silently, as if to ensure this man wouldn't steal his broken lens.

Bai Liu looked at Du Sanying curiously. He was suddenly so highly motivated.

He placed the broken lens with Du Sanying because it was obvious that the monster would target whoever had the lens. Mu Sicheng had been attacked severely because of this.

Du Sanying had the highest life points and the least damage among them, and his luck was still 100%. So, putting the broken lens on him to attract the monster's attacks would ensure the rest of them were safe.

Zhang Gui, watching Du Sanying, sneered with a look of disbelief but didn't speak.

Anyway, now that he was under Bai Liu's control, he didn't have to think about anything else until Bai Liu died. The shattered lens was the safest thing to give Du Sanying, the lucky fool.

The only thing Zhang Gui hadn't figured out was why Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying, the two rising stars of the ranking, seemed to have been completely bewitched and were so obedient to Bai Liu. This was the first time he'd ever seen someone so thoroughly controlled and still counting his money for a game.

But what surprised him even more was that Bai Liu seemed to want to save his "puppet," even if it meant his own death.

Zhang Gui's gaze lingered on Bai Liu's pale face. Bai Liu seemed to notice his stare and gave him a polite nod, as if not seeing him as an enemy, even though they had been at odds just moments ago.

Shit, maybe I've been bewitched too, Zhang Gui thought as he averted his gaze. He didn't want Bai Liu to die either.

But Zhang Gui didn't want him to die out of Du Sanying's foolish touch; it was more practical. With Bai Liu in control, it was clear that this clever guy would regulate everyone's life points, minimizing the overall attrition.

This guy would make sure most players survived with minimal losses.

But if Bai Liu died, Zhang Gui wasn't confident he could control Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng as well as Bai Liu had. Without these two, and his three puppets, Zhang Gui wasn't sure they'd succeed.

This game was hard.

In simple terms, this high-difficulty game required seven players to work together, but no one except Bai Liu could do that.

This guy with only 6 life points was the key to the whole game.

Bai Liu glanced up at the countdown on the platform. "We're about to arrive at the station again. I'll make some general arrangements. Mu Sicheng and Liu Huai will work together to steal the broken lenses from the passengers. Mu Sicheng will be responsible for stealing the fragments, and Liu Huai will be responsible for attracting the monster's attention. My life is too dangerous, so I won't help attract the hate value. Is that okay with you two?"

Liu Huai and Mu Sicheng's faces turned strange as the once-feuding teammates were put together by Bai Liu in such a matter-of-fact way.

Liu Huai turned away from Mu Sicheng's face and murmured, a little sheepishly, "I'm fine with it."

Mu Sicheng remained expressionless and silent. He knew Bai Liu's plan was the best arrangement, but he couldn't help but feel some subconscious aversion to working with Liu Huai, which made him hesitant. Even a second of hesitation could cost him in this high-level game.

When Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu had worked together before, they didn't fall apart because Bai Liu always covered his mistakes.

But Liu Huai was no Bai Liu. He didn't seem like the type to cover for Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng wasn't one to let psychological factors get in the way, so he paused for a moment before being honest: "I'll do my best. I might have some subconscious rejection of working with Liu Huai, but I'll try to control it."

"No." Bai Liu interrupted him, looking directly into Mu Sicheng's eyes. "You're not working with Liu Huai. You're working with me. He's just a puppet I control through Zhang Gui. You're working with one of my puppets. Can I say that to remove your sense of psychological rejection?"

Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu locked eyes for a moment before he snorted, "That'll do."

"Okay." Bai Liu turned his attention to Du Sanying. "Du Sanying, later I'll need you to hang the broken lens outside and not store it in the system backpack. Is that okay?"

Du Sanying, a bit confused, nodded. "Yes, okay."

Bai Liu continued, "Li Gou and Fang Ke will work with Liu Huai and Mu Sicheng to clear some of the passengers who attack them, to reduce their stress and prevent injuries."

Li Gou and Fang Ke responded, "... good."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to the last person. "Zhang Gui, your task is to protect me."

Du Sanying and the others were shocked. Mu Sicheng frowned deeply, clearly disapproving. "Bai Liu, Zhang Gui is very cunning. Even if you have him under control, you can't be 100% sure he won't break free to kill you. Not to mention, you only have 6 life points. It's too dangerous for you to stay with him..."

"It's because I only have 6 life points," Bai Liu interrupted him calmly. He didn't look at the others, instead focusing on Zhang Gui, his eyes filled with certainty. He changed his tone to a polite one, "Master, will you kill me?"

Bai Liu's lips curled into a sly smile, a dangerous gleam in his fragile expression. “I don’t think you will, Master. You missed your only chance to kill me, so you can’t kill me anymore. There’s only one thing left for you to do...”

He whispered softly, “...that is to save me, Master.”

Bai Liu was right to call Zhang Gui his master. Bai Liu was still Zhang Gui’s puppet, but the way Bai Liu said it sent chills down Zhang Gui’s spine.

The title, so clearly subservient, was pronounced slowly and deliberately by Bai Liu’s pale lips. Yet, it felt more like Bai Liu was playing with him.

The only chance Zhang Gui had to kill Bai Liu had passed. He remembered it well.

Eight minutes earlier, when he had strangled Bai Liu and furiously threatened to kill him, Bai Liu had looked at him with the same expression, asking in the same calm voice, “Master, will you kill me?”

At that time, Zhang Gui hadn’t killed Bai Liu.

And now... he couldn’t.

Before the female voice of the underground announcement had finished, the door of the train, which had not yet stopped, was violently blown open by a fist tipped with fire. The burnt, blackened head of the thief’s brother entered, his hands pounding the rickety door. Though the creature couldn’t speak, everyone could feel his rage at having his broken lenses stolen.

“No way!!!” Du Sanying screamed, tugging at his hair as if it was the last straw. “Why are you doing this again, brother!!!”

“Du Sanying, I think you'd better run,” Bai Liu said kindly. “The thief’s brother has stolen the broken lens I placed on you. He’s coming after you now, and I haven’t arranged any protection for you, so you’re on your own.”

Du Sanying stood frozen for a couple of seconds before, with tears in his eyes, he took out his bumpy kart and sped away.

Du Sanying shouted abuse at Bai Liu while rubbing his elbows in frustration, “You did this on purpose, Bai Liu! You put the broken lens on me on purpose! I’m so screwed!!!”

“Yes,” Bai Liu admitted shamelessly. “I’m using you to draw the thief’s brother’s attention. You’ll hang his train to draw him away, then we’ll steal the other passengers’ broken lenses. Don’t forget to make sure you don’t run into us by mistake.”

“I’ll kill you, Bai Liu!!!!” Du Sanying’s features contorted with rage and frustration, his eyes rimmed with tears. “Wooooooooooooo, thanks for me trusting you so much, Bai Liu! You have no heart!!!”

Bai Liu casually waved his fist and cheered Du Sanying on, “Believe in yourself, Du Sanying. You’re the luckiest. You’ll make it.”

“I can’t—!!!” Du Sanying cried, barely holding back tears as he sped off.

The car door slowly opened, and the thief’s brother rushed in, swinging his massive, burning fist. He stopped in his tracks, his mouth opening in fury as he searched for the stolen broken lens.

Bai Liu noticed the blackened skull behind the thief’s brother, where a charred and shriveled brain flower inside seemed to move, suddenly opening an eye before quickly closing again.

Eyes in the brain flower… Bai Liu raised an eyebrow.

Burst last train

The thief's brother scanned the surroundings with his eyeless black eyes, suddenly lifting his head as if sensing the location of the broken lens. He immediately gave chase to Du Sanying, who had already fled.

The whole car rattled and bounced, as if it were about to fall apart under the running pace of the thief's brother.

Liu Huai let out a relieved sigh. He thought he'd have to fight again like before. He bitterly laughed at the thought. He didn't want to slash Mu Sicheng's hand for a third time, forcing him to go berserk. Mu Sicheng, the one being slashed, didn't seem to mind, but Liu Huai, the one doing the slashing, was starting to develop a psychological shadow.

Zhang Gui looked at Bai Liu with a knowing gaze. "Did you have Du Sanying hang the broken lenses outside to lure the thief's brother? You knew there would be one at this stop, so you had Du Sanying draw him away?"

"Exactly," Bai Liu nodded. "I realized at the last station that these monsters aren't new at each stop; they've been following from the previous one."

Zhang Gui asked, "How did you figure that out?"

Bai Liu lifted his eyes. "Because the number of these 'bursting' passengers has been increasing at every station, and we've already attacked some of them."

Zhang Gui paused, realizing that the influx of passengers was indeed larger than at the previous station. The growing number of monsters made it more difficult for the players to steal the broken lenses and escape. It made sense that Bai Liu needed Du Sanying to lure the thief's brother away; otherwise, they wouldn't have been able to handle both the influx of monsters and the threat of the thief's brother.

Zhang Gui's face darkened. No wonder all the previous players had been wiped out. This game was truly insidious. There were still seven stations left, and seven players. If the pattern continued, one player would die at each station, and the final station would mark the end...

But under Bai Liu's command, it was surprising to see that by the fourth station, not a single player had died. Mu Sicheng had been on the verge of falling into danger at the last station but was saved in time. And Du Sanying at this station...

Tsk.

Zhang Gui glanced at Bai Liu, a man who really knew how to use his head and his people.

Du Sanying, who couldn't seem to do anything right but had a low chance of dying and losing his stuff, was the perfect candidate to hang onto the thief's brother. But...

"Aren't you worried about Du Sanying refusing to lure the thief's brother and putting the broken lenses in his system backpack?" Zhang Gui narrowed his eyes. "It's dangerous. How can you be sure he won't run away? If he does, and the thief's brother turns back to attack us, we'll all be in danger."

Bai Liu responded, "He and I have a cooperative relationship."

Zhang Gui understood, though he was slightly shocked. "Du Sanying has a 100% luck value. How is he under your control?"

He'd tried to control Du Sanying countless times, but his puppet strings couldn't even get close. They were somehow always interrupted!

Du Sanying also had a famous item, [Put Control Coat], which prevented any control skills from working on him. That was one of the reasons Zhang Gui had given up trying to control him.

Bai Liu shrugged and smiled. "Maybe for someone like Du Sanying, being under my control is just a stroke of good fortune?"

Zhang Gui looked at Du Sanying, who was being whisked away by the thief's brother, crying and hopping around. "...Fine, I'll call it Du Sanying's little luck."

The overall process of collecting the lenses went smoothly, with the exception of Du Sanying's occasional expletive. The rest of the group managed to find all 40 pieces with ease. However, Liu Huai and Mu Sicheng, who were responsible for finding the pieces, each lost 20 life points because they couldn't avoid the flame damage from the passengers.

"Using bandages and other defensive items didn't reduce the flame damage," Mu Sicheng muttered. His clothes were burnt, revealing his slightly stained pecs and abs. His face was black from wiping sweat with his hands, making him look like a coal miner.

Mu Sicheng gasped and sat on the ground, lifting his bandaged hand to wipe his cheek before resting his wrists on his knees. He looked up at Bai Liu, his eyes tired. "I've only got 40 life left. I can last maybe two more stops."

Liu Huai wiped sweat from his chin with the back of his hand and collapsed to the ground, panting a little. "I've got 70 life left. I can still last through three stations."

Bai Liu thought for a moment. "Let's all reveal our remaining life value. I have 6."

"65," said Li Gou.

"80," Fang Ke added.

"85," Zhang Gui said.

Du Sanying, who had been chased to the ground, was eerily silent for a long time before swallowing. "100."

Even Bai Liu was speechless at this point.

Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying exchanged a glance. "You were chased that badly, and you didn't lose a single life point? The thief's brother has a movement speed of 1400, and you never got caught?"

Du Sanying scratched his face and side-eyed himself. "A few times, I was almost caught... but he tripped over the train seats many times."

Zhang Gui was completely speechless. While it wasn't the first time he'd seen Du Sanying's luck in action, this was outrageous!

Zhang Gui gritted his teeth. "How many times did he trip and fall to not catch you once?!"

"Well... just a few hundred times," Du Sanying replied weakly, staring off into the distance.

Bai Liu, Zhang Gui, and Mu Sicheng were all silent.

Hundreds of times... has the thief's brother ever stood up in front of you, Du Sanying?

At the time of the train's movement at the next platform stop, Bai Liu once again deployed the battlefield.

He tilted his head to look at the countdown on the train's LED light sign and turned to the group of people sitting on the ground behind him, giving a calm and simple order: "Two minutes to the next station. Li Gou and Liu Huai will be the main attackers to steal the fragments. Zhang Gui and Fang Ke will assist and replace Mu Sicheng. Then, at the next station, Li Gou and Fang Ke will be the main attackers, the other two will support. At the following station, Zhang Gui and Fang Ke will take over, and so on in turn. Keep everyone's life value above 20. We still have a monster from the Book of Monsters that hasn't been painted yet, so prepare for the boss battle."

"Du Sanying, you're still in charge of attracting the attention of the thief's brother."

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu, a little confused: "So, what am I supposed to do when I'm replaced?"

Bai Liu looked into Mu Sicheng's eyes calmly. "You are responsible for preparing for the boss battle. You are absolutely needed for the boss battle. You are the main force, so you cannot die easily. Take care to keep your life level from falling below thirty."

Mu Sicheng looked down at his bruised and battered self and raised his eyebrows. "You're going to make me go berserk again to fight a boss, aren't you, Bai Sir? I'll be delirious if my spirit level jumps repeatedly in such a short period of time. Please don't treat everyone like you're a monster who can have his spirit level broken, okay?"

He was right. After his spirit level dropped to single digits and then recovered, Mu Sicheng's eyes had clearly started to show signs of strain. Even though his spirit level was later restored by Bai Liu, the aftereffects of the violent drop and rapid recovery still lingered, affecting his concentration and mental state.

Mu Sicheng had nearly burned to death a few times when he was the main attacker against the Burst Passenger, but at least it took three supporters and a vigilant Bai Liu to bring him back.

Bai Liu's tone was calm. "From your performance just now, you're indeed in bad shape, so I've decided to replace you and let you rest to recover your energy. I need you to maintain high concentration during the boss battle. Take some sleeping pills to get some rest. You can probably sleep for another 20 minutes."

Sleeping pills are available in the system shop, and they are always very effective. One pill, and you're down.

Mu Sicheng looked at Bai Liu with a smirk and a crooked smile. "If I sleep, who will protect me and make sure I'm safe? Everyone else has been arranged by you to rob the shard."

Bai Liu looked at him unperturbed. "Me."

Mu Sicheng was so shocked that he coughed. He wanted to sneer at Bai Liu. "How can you protect me when you only have 6 life points?" But when he met Bai Liu's flat and unwavering eyes, he couldn't say anything sarcastic. He just scratched his hair in annoyance. "You only have 6 life points, are you kidding, Bai Liu?"

Bai Liu explained, without skipping a beat. "Of all the people here, I'm the only one who can guarantee your survival 100%. Do you have any objections to that?"

Mu Sicheng's eyes swept over Zhang Gui's obscure expression, Du Sanying's sobbing eyes, Liu Huai's evasive eyes, and the rest of Zhang Gui's puppets, before finally settling on Bai Liu's unwavering gaze. This guy! The same look—"I know it's risky, but I won't change it"—he had when he forced his way through Zhang Gui's plan.

After a few seconds, Mu Sicheng gave a stifled tsk and finally threw up his hands in compromise and surrender. "Okay, I have no more objections."

"I told you, I won't let you die, Mu Sicheng." Bai Liu walked over and smiled at Mu Sicheng, a smile of soothing comfort, though it looked particularly false on Bai Liu's face. Mu Sicheng still felt somewhat relieved.

Bai Liu patted Mu Sicheng's shoulder and sat down next to him. "Go to sleep."

Mu Sicheng was tapped by Bai Liu. He couldn't help but close his eyes and relax. He had been highly tense, but Bai Liu's whisper of "sleep" was like a mantra. Mu Sicheng couldn't help but relax his muscles and nerves and leaned against the car door. I'll just close my eyes and rest. I'll never fall asleep. Falling asleep in a game is nonsense—definitely not for a person of my vigilance...

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu used a highly effective inhalant sleeping pill on player Mu Sicheng.]

Mu Sicheng frowned at the sound and moved his hand as if ready to struggle awake. But soon, Bai Liu placed his hand against the tip of Mu Sicheng's nose, and Mu Sicheng breathed twice, his body going limp as he fell uncontrollably into a deeper, darker, sweeter sleep.

Bai Liu glanced sideways at Mu Sicheng, whose head was tilted and breathing steadily, and raised his eyebrows at the white powder in his hand. "This inhaled sleeping pill is too good, isn't it?"

Du Sanying looked dumbfounded. "How did you suddenly put Mu Sicheng down?"

"He's too affected by the previous lowering of his spirit level. The best way to restore his state is to sleep deeply." Bai Liu held his breath and patted the sleeping powder on his hand, waiting for it to dissipate before turning to Du Sanying and speaking. "I need Mu Sicheng in good shape for the boss later, so let him fall asleep first."

Du Sanying was a bit confused as he approached Bai Liu, thinking he was whispering in his ear. "But Bai Liu, before you used Mu Sicheng because there were only three of us. Now that you have so many people, you don't have to rely on Mu Sicheng alone. You can fight monsters with the others too!"

Du Sanying said this while looking at Zhang Gui and the others, his eyes making it seem very villainous and gossipy, as if wondering why Bai Liu didn't just have the bad guys protect him.

"These people will experience a certain degree of combat power decrease as they look for the shattered lenses, dropping below 30 life points in the station that awaits them." Although Bai Liu knew full well that at this distance, Zhang Gui and the others could clearly hear them whispering, Bai Liu cooperated by lowering his voice and slightly sidling over to nibble on Du Sanying's ear.

Bai Liu lowered his eyes. "And in this copy of the game, Mu Sicheng is the only one most likely to fight the final boss."

"Only Mu Sicheng is the most likely?" Du Sanying repeated Bai Liu's words with some confusion, turning his head to Mu Sicheng, who had been put into a deep sleep by Bai Liu's sleeping pills. "Why is he the most useful?"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes, looking at Mu Sicheng's unconscious, peacefully sleeping face, and smiled. "Because he is the best thief I've ever seen, and the only one who could steal from me."

"Much better than the pair of brothers who stole the mirror."

Du Sanying didn't understand, and he was used to not understanding Bai Liu's words. He just looked at Bai Liu hesitantly. "Bai Liu, but even so, are you really going to protect the sleeping Mu Sicheng? Why don't you let the others protect you? You two are too dangerous! One is asleep and the other only has 6 life points!"

"No." Bai Liu rejected it. "There are only three people on the fragment capture side, one grabbing and two guarding to avoid life loss. One grabbing and one defending back. Later on, their status will still dip, and they will lose a lot of life due to mistakes. If the total life is below 400, then we'll all be stuck in the game."

Du Sanying wanted to say something else to persuade Bai Liu, but when he saw Bai Liu's emotionless face, he understood that Bai Liu had made up his mind.

Before he left, Du Sanying took a look at Mu Sicheng, who was sleeping heavily, and Bai Liu, who was standing next to him, and sighed with mixed feelings.

It was the first time he had seen a player risk his life to get another player a good night's sleep.

Of course, Bai Liu's intention was to make the best use of Mu Sicheng when he woke up.

I don't know if Mu Sicheng is lucky or unlucky.

Mu Sicheng woke up with a start from a deep sleep.

As the train sped through the dark tunnel, the wind poured in through the opening in the roof that had been opened by the thief's brother, bringing with it a whistling sound that woke him from his dreamless sleep. There were holes everywhere where the wind had come in.

The performance of the others confirmed Mu Sicheng's suspicions.

Zhang Gui and Liu Huai were cowering in the corner. Li Gou and Fang

Ke were bloodied and in a terrible state. Du Sanying was panting like a dog on a stool, his hair wet with sweat and clinging to his forehead like a parrot in water, his eyes glazed over and looking exhausted.

Bai Liu was no better, pale as death, leaning against the door to adjust his breathing, whip in hand, sweat dripping off his soaked shirt, head tilted back as he poured himself a stamina rejuvenator, a pile of bottles at his feet.

Seeing Mu Sicheng awake, Bai Liu slowly rolled his eyes. "Mu Sicheng, you're awake. The sleeping pills worked well. Just over twenty minutes ago. How's your recovery?"

Mu Sicheng rubbed his swollen temples and propped himself up against the door. Now that he knew Bai Liu couldn't even think of losing his temper over his drugging, Mu Sicheng frowned at Bai Liu. "How many stops are we at? How many broken lenses have you collected? How many life points do you have left?"

"Just passed the eighth station, two more to go before we're back at Antique City. We've collected 300 pieces of broken lenses." Bai Liu skimmed over the last question as if he hadn't heard it and said, "I feel your mental state returning. Let me explain what you'll be doing at the ninth station. You'll be working with me later..."

Mu Sicheng raised his eyes, his eyes holding a bit of hostility. He stomped on Bai Liu's whip and repeated his question word for word, interrupting Bai Liu. "I'm asking you, Bai Liu, how much life do you have left now?"

Bai Liu spat blood from the corner of his mouth and licked it away as he lifted his eyes. "Knowing this will only shake your sense of trust in me when you work with me later."

"I don't know that I would have faltered more." Mu Sicheng snorted. "Say, whether I trust you or not, haven't you always forced yourself to work well with me?"

Bai Liu was silent for a moment. "3."

Mu Sicheng couldn't resist. "Fuck!"

Mu Sicheng resisted his urge to swear as he stood up in annoyance. Bai Liu watched impassively as Mu Sicheng lifted a chair and forced himself to calm down.

Mu Sicheng turned around and looked at Bai Liu with gritted teeth. "You have three fucking life points, talk to me about cooperation? One burn and you're dead!"

"It was burned three times." Bai Liu corrected, calmly placating his opponent before Mu Sicheng could break into a tirade. "But Mu Sicheng, you've been missing too much with everyone else, and I had to come up and match you because no one can afford to drop the ball in the next match."

"As long as you don't miss, I won't die." Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng looked at each other. "So you mustn't miss, got it?"

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath and eventually could only grumpily yell at Bai Liu. "No faux pas! Tell me, madman, what do you want me to do for you? What do we have to do with each other? I've been under the fire for you all my fucking life!"

Bai Liu smiled. "It doesn't need to be that serious. I just need you to steal one thing for me."

"What's that?" Mu Sicheng asked suspiciously.

Bai Liu had just opened his mouth when the female voice of the train announcement came on. "Two more stops to go. The train is approaching its final destination. Next stop, Lu Family Lane entrance. Please line up by the door if you want to get off. First on, then off..."

Gradually, the car door was filled with a dense pile of charred corpses. Their twisted heads turned and cackled, the thief's brother standing at the forefront, covered in flames, his eyes crackling with burning fire. His bones were red with heat, and a pair of glowing red eyes burned reluctantly beneath the thief's eyes. The thief roared and pounded on the car door, his anger at the lost loot—the shards taken from the heart.

"These monsters are coming up later! Bai Liu, what exactly do you want me to steal?" Mu Sicheng asked Bai Liu as he pulled him back cautiously.

Bai Liu propped his chin up and braced himself. "I'm not sure what I want you to steal either."

Mu Sicheng sprayed. "????? Fuck, you're not sure! You have to give me a target sometime!"

Bai Liu gripped the fishbone in his hand, exhaled a long breath through the doorway of the car that opened with a snap, his gaze stoic but with a little smile at the corners of his mouth. "If I'm right, what I want you to steal back could be all we have: 300 broken lenses. Or it could just be 20 broken lenses, depending on whether Du Sanying can hold it steady."

"? ? 300 broken lenses, but isn't that Du Sanying's body?" Mu Sicheng turned his head to Du Sanying, a little puzzled.

This one is still at 100% life, which makes Mu Sicheng slightly speechless. "Steal it back? You mean the thief's brother will steal it from Du Sanying? That can't be right, that big idiot has been chasing Du Sanying for six stops and hasn't even touched Du Sanying's clothes. How could he steal the pieces from him?"

"Did you know that bosses in design horror games have a guarded secondary jump principle?" Bai Liu suddenly brought up the matter.

Mu Sicheng squinted over. "I don't know, what's this?"

Bai Liu smiled. "That is the boss that guards the level. Before the player passes the level, it will certainly go berserk—combat power berserk, hit rate berserk. This boss will certainly get a great performance boost, performance level two jump, and bring the player a great hindrance in passing the level. Usually speaking, before the level, there will be a point that leads to a large number of player deaths."

"But it's strange that—" Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes. "This thief brother has followed us for six stations. He is obviously the main boss of this game, but he hasn't shown any signs of going berserk. Even though we've slipped him through six stations, the later we get, the smoother it gets, and we're about to pass the level, but his combat power hasn't improved at all. This doesn't make sense."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. "And then what?"

"So I think he's a different kind of secondary jump." Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes. "If there's no mass value enhancement, then there's a new monster. Do you remember the name on the second page of the monster book? The Thief Brothers, but we only see one brother. What about his brother?"

Burst last train

Mu Sicheng's face sank after a moment of shock. "You mean there are two monsters on this page?"

Bai Liu nodded and continued his analysis. "If the younger brother is this dumb, silly, strong type, then the older brother—if I were designing it—would be a small monster with high stealing skills and very fast movement, waiting for the player to accumulate a certain number of pieces. Then, it would trigger before the level and steal the player's pieces to make the game more difficult before they can pass."

"But it's Du Sanying. Is it really possible for something to get stolen?" Mu Sicheng was skeptical. "This guy has never had anything stolen from him when his luck was 100%."

Bai Liu was light-hearted. "That's if he can keep his luck at 100% all the time."

"I've taken advantage of Du Sanying's luck too much by hanging six stops on the thief's brother. The balance of this game has been broken by me, and I think the system will adjust Du Sanying's luck downwards to maintain balance at a critical time like the pass."

Mu Sicheng was stunned as he remembered that at the end of Siren Town, the system had also said Bai Liu upset the balance of the game and forced his value down to limit him, increasing the value of monsters...

Not 100% lucky Du Sanying... Mu Sicheng watched in a bit of a trance as Du Sanying, who was clumsily making his way up his runabout kart to draw the thief's brother away from them, felt a slow coolness crawl up his spine.

The less fortunate Du Sanying, a C-rank player with a C-rank attribute panel, could withstand monster attacks about as well as Bai Liu. If his luck wasn't 100%, Du Sanying would be dead.

"Du Sanying can hang if he's forced." Bai Liu continued. "But even if his luck drops from 100 to 99, if he trips Du Sanying once—"

Mu Sicheng looked straight at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu's eyes were unmoving. "And he'll die. But even then, Du Sanying has to hang the thief brothers because the rest of us are pressed to below 30 health. The thief brothers can punch a little kid at us. Du Sanying has no way of collecting the pieces on the passengers without tuning out."

The door jams several times before it finally opens, and all the passengers pour in.

While the others cleared the passenger of debris as Bai Liu had previously arranged, Du Sanying once again took out his scrapped go-kart and prepared to escape to distract the thief's brother. Everyone then saw the thief's brother's charred and blackened chest squirm twice.

The thief's brother's mind let out two sharp, dry giggles, and a pair of dark, sharp-nailed hands jerked out of his chest and struck at Du Sanying, who was just sitting down and lucky enough to escape, but...

Du Sanying froze and touched his face, which had been cut with a bruise that dripped a drop of blood.

He was injured.

This was the first time he had been injured in this game.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying was attacked by his thief brother, -2 life, -2 spirit.]

[System Alert (for all): As all players have survived and no one has died, in order to maintain the game balance, the luck value of player Du Sanying will be adjusted downwards from now on. Player Du Sanying's luck value will gradually decrease. Please give up relying on him and pass the game on your own strength.]

[Player Du Sanying Current Lucky Value: 98]

The thief's brother's robust chest was peeled open from the inside. His cheek split down the middle, and eyes sprouted from his black cerebrum into a baby-like, pitch-black head, with a ring around the eyes burned and coal-painted. His white eyes still turned in his sockets as the thing's dental bed was burned and exposed, revealing a mouthful of large, white teeth with a triumphant grin.

Its two feet hooked onto the thief's brother's burned and exposed ribs, its body swinging outward. Its two hands, only black with bone, dry as coal, but incredibly long and nimble, darted like the long legs of a spider. They darted over Du Sanying's head again in a sideways hang, so fast it was almost invisible to the naked eye.

Du Sanying was lucky enough to dodge on the back foot again but was hurt once more.

[Explosive Last Train Monster Book Refresh - Brotherhood of Thieves (2/3)]

[Monster Name: Brother Thief]

[Characteristics: The thief brother moves very fast (3400 points of movement speed, flame has a bonus effect), good at stealing.]

[Weakness: ????? (to be explored)]

[Attack: Scratching, Stealing]

Du Sanying gritted his teeth and ignored the blood dripping down his face as he rolled over in his car and tried to run as Bai Liu said. Even if he wasn't at 100% luck now, his 96 luck was enough to help hang his thief brother for a while. However, if he was unlucky and his luck failed, Du Sanying would face the consequences of facing off alone against a pair of powerful thief brothers and would most likely... die.

But Du Sanying also knew now, deep in his heart, that...

There was no one in the room, except for him, who had almost full life expectancy, who could have lasted a single round against the thieving brothers.

No one could help him. His luck had put him in this position, so he had to take responsibility for everyone. Even if he was not so lucky, Du Sanying could not just run away and watch Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng die.

Du Sanying stepped on the throttle of his little Ma Baoli's bumper car with a face of bitterness and great hatred, clearly in a death-defying task. But instead of being sad, he became... strangely resolute as he did it.

He had always been the player who was disliked and loathed by everyone as a last-minute scrounger. For the first time, he had taken on such an important task of attracting the hatred of monsters. Bai Liu had never doubted that he would not be able to complete it since he had been entrusted with the task from the very beginning.

Even though Du Sanying was a very clumsy and awkward guy, he was known as a flamboyant player.

It was a strange feeling to be trusted wholeheartedly by Bai Liu, and although Du Sanying was reluctant at first, he developed a very unspoken sense of trust and obedience towards Bai Liu.

He had a hunch— even if his luck dropped to zero, Bai Liu had a way out and would not let him die so easily, because he had said he wouldn't let Du Sanying die, just as he had done with Mu Sicheng.

And Du Sanying had always trusted his instincts.

Du Sanying was slammed on the butt of the car by his brother, who was in hot pursuit behind him. Although the front of the car was thrown off and stuck in a chair, Du Sanying was lucky not to be thrown out, but he was hurt again by the thief's brother's coordinated attack. The fire from the thief's brother's fist spread all the way up from the back of the car and burned Du Sanying's eyes. He gritted his teeth and wiped away the blood that had just been spat out of his mouth by the thief's brother's punch.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying was attacked by Thief Brothers, Life -20, Spirit -20.]

"Du Sanying, hold on. Just hold on and drag the thief brothers away to our side to collect the broken lenses. Can you hold on?" Bai Liu asked in a raised voice, seemingly noticing the situation.

Du Sanying choked and coughed twice, his face quiet, his hands on the steering wheel of the kart, his foot on the accelerator to the max, and replied loudly to Bai Liu: "I'll try!!!"

Bai Liu smiled. "I'll leave the rear to you then, Du Sanying."

Mu Sicheng, while helping to collect the broken lenses, looked at Bai Liu, who was calm and collected. "Du Sanying's panel attribute is only C. The only good thing about this guy is that he has 100% luck, but now you know that he doesn't have 100% luck. So, you're really going to let him hang a pair of thief brothers? Do you think he can hold up? If he drops the ball on his side, we'll have a hard time getting back on defense here!"

Bai Liu was honest. "I'm not sure he's going to make it."

"But surprisingly, he promised me, so I'll start with the assumption that he can do it." Bai Liu said very calmly. "Just like your original plan, you said you weren't sure if you could stay awake with a mental value of only 10, so I'll start by assuming you can."

Mu Sicheng paused for a moment. "What if Du Sanying doesn't hold up?"

Bai Liu's tone was calm. "Then there's you and me."

Du Sanying slumped over the steering wheel, dizzy and vomiting a mouthful of blood. He had just lost his luck and had to take a hard hit from the thief's brother to protect the broken lens after the thief's interference. Although Du Sanying blocked the blow with a prop, the damage was still fatal.

His bloodline and spirit both collapsed down to the safety line.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying was attacked by the thief's brother, life -20, spirit -20]

Du Sanying tilted his head back and drank a can of Spiritual Bleach to restore his Spiritual Strength. He was still a little dizzy. The Spiritual Strength only stabilized his position in the Spiritual World, but the exhaustion caused by the drop in his Strength and Spirit couldn't be restored by Spiritual Bleach. Du Sanying was already at the end of his rope due to the various drains.

These thieving brothers were really too tough!

Du Sanying could still escape if he moved fast, but the thief's brother was faster—over 3,000 points!

Du Sanying used all his props but couldn't shake him off. And the two monsters were working together!

The thief's brother giggled and was thrown into the front of Du Sanying's car with a bang. He reached out with his black claws to steal the broken lenses. Du Sanying had no choice but to use a prop to bounce the thief's brother off the front of the car.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying uses (Sunny Umbrella) to shock the thief's brother]

A translucent umbrella with a sun on top suddenly opened on the front of Du Sanying's car, emitting blinding light. The thief's brother, with a sharp whistle, jumped back from the car, clawing at it wildly.

[System Alert: (Sunny Umbrella) has been scrapped by thieves and can no longer be used]

"Eeny!" Even Du Sanying, with all his props, exploded several times in heartache.

He had already scrapped seven or eight protective items, all of which had been scratched by the thief's brother. The problem was, he was running out of resistance items.

But—two... Du Sanying blushed. There wasn't enough time to drag this out!

As he was thinking, the thief's brother was thrown at him again and landed on Du Sanying's head like a bat across the carriage. He started to hang the broken lens around his neck but realized it was too dangerous and moved it...

—Du Sanying felt that, apart from being a bit of a pain, it was the safest place on his body.

The thief's brother hesitated, his eyes scanning Du Sanying's body suspiciously. He seemed to be sensing something was wrong for not finding the broken lens. He turned the hood of the car a few times and chirped, as if questioning Du Sanying about the missing lens.

Du Sanying braced himself to meet its gaze: "You won't find it, give up."

Du Sanying saw disgust and devastation in its eyes. The thief's two rows of straight teeth clenched shut, and with great determination, it reached out with a trembling hand to pull out Du Sanying's gear.

This move had a very Chinese name: [Monkey Steals Peach].

"Rascal you!!! Don't tug!!! Don't tug on my [beep beep beep]!"

Mu Sicheng and the group were eerily silent for a moment.

"Shit!!! Go away!!!" Du Sanying yelled, pulling at his trousers. He had never seen such a monster with no boundaries. "You don't mind getting dirty! Get your hands out of my trousers! What are you, a trolley boy?!"

The thief's brother's eyes bulged, his teeth chattered. His long, thin wrists thrust into Du Sanying's trousers. His face fluttered and brushed down with the cinders of burning flesh, revealing the bloody remnants of burned skin. The corners of his mouth turned upwards in a vicious, frantic grin, as if cursing Du Sanying's shame for hiding the broken lens in his trousers.

Seeing the thief's brother about to reach the lens in Du Sanying's trousers, Du Sanying cursed under his breath and was forced to use another prop.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying uses (Joker Spring) on Thief Brother]

The thief's brother was violently bounced off the head of a clown that emerged from the front of the car. A huge bouncy spring was attached underneath the clown, which swayed as the clown laughed. The spring helped Du Sanying hold off several scratching attacks from the thief's brother.

Before Du Sanying could breathe a sigh of relief, the thief's brother, coming up behind him, roared and raised his fist. His whole body erupted in flames with a bang, and the hot wind filled the carriage, shattering the glass. The thief's brother roared, raised his fiery fist, and jumped up to smash Du Sanying, who was trapped in the car.

Du Sanying suddenly felt a choking sensation. His instincts told him something dangerous was about to happen.

Flaming Blast plus Frenzied Hammer—two big moves and stamina—the thief's brother's punch would set the whole carriage on fire.

Du Sanying knew he would die for sure.

[System Alert: Player Du Sanying uses (Clown Spring) on Thief's brother]

The thief's brother slammed down the punch mercilessly, shaking the whole car for a few seconds.

Mu Sicheng, who was on his way, looked at the wreckage of the car, torn apart by the thief's brother's fist, and shouted: "Du Sanying!!!"

There was no answer, only the smoke trail and the quiet burning of Du Sanying's little Ma Baoli kart, burnt to a crisp. The burnt head of a clown, still grinning comically, lay beside the tires, and a tattered golden bell lay next to it, all burnt beyond recognition.

"Du Sanying should have used a Joker Spring and a Golden Bell Shield to block, but the combined effects of these props weren't enough to block that punch from the thief's brother," Zhang Gui said, his face grim. "Du Sanying is most likely dead. The damage from that punch would have cleared an A-rank player with full health, nine times out of ten."

"Not to mention Du Sanying is not at 100% luck, and his panel is only C. He couldn't have survived that punch," Zhang Gui continued, his tone low.

"Du Sanying's luck may not be 100%, but it should be above 90%. I'm leaning toward him not dying." Bai Liu calmly retorted. "Mu Sicheng, I'll draw the thief's brother away. He has a one-minute cooldown after using his move. You draw the high-movement-speed thief brother away to give Du Sanying room to escape."

Zhang Gui couldn't resist speaking up: "You don't have to do this for Du Sanying. He's probably dead..."

Before Zhang Gui could say anything else, Bai Liu interrupted, whipping the back of the thief's brother without hesitation.

The thief's brother hissed at Bai Liu's whip and turned to face him. Mu Sicheng grabbed him with a monkey claw, ready to stab it into his heart. The thief's brother spotted it and dodged, but this enraged him. He swung his long, bone-like arms, trying to dig into Mu Sicheng's heart with his backhand.

With both the thief's brother and the thief brothers now lured away, Du Sanying, dying and covered in soot, crawled out from under the car. Choking and coughing, he rolled over and collapsed, his eyes half-open on the ground like a bald parrot, half-roasted to death. "...I thought I was going to die... Luckily, I have personal skills..."

As soon as Du Sanying crawled out, the thieves, sensing the location of the broken lens, immediately turned around to find Du Sanying. Barely catching his breath, Du Sanying scrambled back up, pissing his pants and crying out, "Bai Liu—! I can't hold on! I can't hold on!!!"

"That's enough." Bai Liu smiled. "I'll take care of the rest. Just give me the broken lenses."

Du Sanying ran frantically toward Bai Liu but fell halfway. The thief's brother behind him nearly crushed Du Sanying's spine with a kick.

Before the thief's brother could reach him again, Du Sanying panicked and threw the broken lens into the air, shouting, "Bai Liu! Catch it!"

As the broken lens flew, the thief brothers, heading toward Du Sanying, immediately changed direction to reach for it.

Du Sanying, in tears, crumpled to the floor, barely able to get up. He could only gasp for air, when Bai Liu patted him on the shoulder: "Well done."

Du Sanying slowed down and looked at Bai Liu with concern: "But you only have 3 life points. Why don't you just let me...?"

"Three points will be enough." Bai Liu flicked his whip as he faced the two monsters rushing toward him. "Mu Sicheng, let's start working together."

Mu Sicheng, who had fallen onto the hoop, swung diagonally and picked Bai Liu up by the back of his collar. Mu Sicheng snorted. "OK, sit tight and hold on, Bai Liu. I'm moving at full speed—10,000."

With those words, Mu Sicheng held Bai Liu in one hand while the other darted around his neck to put the headset on.

Burst last train

The moment Mu Sicheng turned back, Bai Liu felt a slight tug on the back of his collar, but Mu Sicheng moved so fast that his hand was barely visible.

Bai Liu hovered in the air for a moment before being yanked backward, bouncing across the ground as if he were bungee jumping in reverse. The wind whipped against his face, rubbing his skin raw, while Mu Sicheng held him by the collar. To an outsider, Bai Liu must have looked like a kite flailing in the wind.

“Coooooool.” Bai Liu couldn’t resist whistling, but Mu Sicheng was moving so fast that the sound came out in fragmented, shaky bursts. Only Mu Sicheng, matching his speed, could make out what he was trying to say.

Bai Liu was tossed around like a ragdoll, but even then, he managed to give Mu Sicheng a thumbs-up. “Mu Sicheng, your skills are like racing a car. No wonder everyone says you’re the fastest man in this game. The thief brothers don’t stand a chance.”

“…You’re not worried about wrecking your throat talking at this speed?” Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. “And why do I feel like you’re cursing me even when you’re complimenting me?”

“I move fast with this skill, but it’s exhausting. With you in tow, I can keep it up for a minute at most.” Mu Sicheng ignored Bai Liu’s smooth talk and cut straight to the point. “If we don’t win within that time, my speed will drop, and we’ll both be totally screwed. Got it?”

“Got it.” Bai Liu made an OK gesture, gripping his fishbone whip as he lowered his eyes with a sly smile. “Let’s begin, then.”

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng’s movement speed has dropped to 3400. He is about to be overtaken by his thief brother.]

Mu Sicheng braced himself against the car wall, his monkey paws gripping the metal as his feet slid down, carving deep claw marks with sparks flying against the stainless steel.

In a breath, the thief brother’s blackened hands and outstretched fingers appeared in their field of vision.

If Du Sanying were here, he would be stunned to see both Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng's eyes—calm, mechanical, almost inhuman in their precision.

The thief brother leapt sideways along the car walls, shrieking and grimacing as he lunged for Bai Liu, claws outstretched.

"The rest—"

"—is up to me, right?" Mu Sicheng interrupted with a grunt. "No need to repeat it. I've heard it enough times."

Bai Liu's plan was simple but brutal. The thief brothers were a duo of speed and attack—one with high movement speed but weak attacks, the other slower but far more lethal. The fast-moving brother could catch up to players and interfere with their movements, making them easy targets for the stronger one.

For most players, this combination was impossible to counter.

But Bai Liu didn't care how impossible something seemed—it just had to be solved.

He estimated that the thief's brother was carrying 20 broken lenses. That many pieces were practically unattainable for their team under normal circumstances.

Unless they countered the thief brothers with an even faster and stronger combination.

Mu Sicheng had the speed, but he couldn't take them on alone. He'd have to steal the broken lenses mid-fight—an impossible task if he had to evade both brothers at once. The thief brothers would rip him apart before he even got close.

To make it work, someone had to hold off the attacking thief brother, creating an opening for Mu Sicheng to steal. And that person had to be perfect—one mistake, and they were both dead.

That person, Bai Liu realized, could only be himself.

Everyone else's health was too low to coordinate precisely with Mu Sicheng's movements. Bai Liu's health was at 3—one slip, and he was finished. Neither he nor Mu Sicheng could afford to miss.

Bai Liu had already forced the thief brother to burn his strongest move on Du Sanying earlier, putting it on cooldown. This made the theft plan somewhat feasible, though still risky. And there was no guarantee Mu Sicheng's skills could even steal from a monster thief.

Mu Sicheng thought it was reckless.

But—whatever. Bai Liu said he could do anything Mu Sicheng couldn't, so they were going with it.

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath, then hurled Bai Liu straight into the path of the thief's brother. At the same time, he twisted in midair to intercept the other thief brother.

Two sets of black claws locked in a split-second clash. In a blur of movement, Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng swapped positions—Bai Liu launched toward one thief brother while Mu Sicheng faced the other.

Bai Liu cracked his whip without hesitation. Mu Sicheng, eyes locked onto his target, slashed out at the thief brother, intercepting the incoming attack meant for Bai Liu. The flames engulfing the thief brother still singed him, leaving a faint burn.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng suffers Flame Burn damage. -1 Life, -1 Spirit.]

The thief brother fell back, landing on his slower counterpart before springboarding forward again.

Mu Sicheng immediately flung Bai Liu back into the fray.

Bai Liu flipped in the air like he was in slow motion. With a flick of his wrist, he lashed the thief brother viciously across the back.

Then he started to fall.

Right toward the blazing-hot thief's brother below him.

His eyes flickered, calculating. Then, in a steady voice, he called out, "Mu Sicheng."

Mu Sicheng reacted instantly, swinging sideways and hooking his tail around Bai Liu's waist. He yanked him up just in time to avoid the flames.

Hanging one-handed from the hoop, Mu Sicheng's gaze locked onto the thief brother Bai Liu had struck. He extended his monkey paw.

The thief brother screamed in fury, its black claws swiping at Mu

Sicheng in a flurry too fast to follow. The two thieves' hands met midair in a blur of stealing motions—clawing, snatching, deflecting.

Bai Liu, still dangling from Mu Sicheng's tail, gulped down a stamina restorer.

Before he could finish, the thief's brother lunged again. Bai Liu barely had time to react before Mu Sicheng's tail flicked, launching him skyward.

Drinking his stamina restorer mid-air to avoid wasting it, Bai Liu glanced down. Seeing the thief brothers refocus on Mu Sicheng, he flicked his whip, disrupting their movements and knocking them off balance.

The whip didn't deal any damage, but it was a powerful interference tool.

Mu Sicheng was stunned.

This guy really didn't miss. Not once. Not even with just three life points left. If Mu Sicheng failed to catch him, Bai Liu was dead. But Bai Liu wasn't scared—he was completely calm, even playful.

"One minute left," Bai Liu said lazily. "You still haven't stolen the broken lenses? We're about to be screwed."

He sounded so casual, like he didn't grasp the danger—or maybe he just didn't care.

"Wrong target." Mu Sicheng's voice was tense. "The other monsters had their broken lenses near the heart, but this thief brother doesn't. I checked."

Bai Liu's gaze sharpened. "Not in the heart…"

The broken lenses were weaknesses. All the other monsters had them in vital areas. But this thief brother was different. He was fast. He was skilled. He was—

Like Mu Sicheng.

"There are only a few seconds left before the thief brother's big move charges. I'm running out of stamina…" Mu Sicheng panted. "Bai Liu, if we can't find the lens in time, we're dead."

Bai Liu suddenly looked up. "Mu Sicheng, what's the most important part of a thief's body? The weakest point?"

Mu Sicheng didn't have time to answer.

"Bai Liu! The thief's brother is behind you! Turn and use the whip!"

But Bai Liu didn't turn. He didn't react at all.

The thief's brother grinned wide, sharp fingers curling into claws—

Then, without hesitation, it plunged its hand straight through Bai Liu's chest.

Blood gushed from Bai Liu's mouth, staining his white shirt.

Mu Sicheng's pupils shrank.

"Bai Liu—!!!!"

Bai Liu wiped the blood from the corner of his mouth carelessly and looked up at Mu Sicheng, whose face was white with fear. He said nonchalantly, "What are you yelling about? I'm not dead."

Mu Sicheng snapped back to reality and took in the sight of Bai Liu, covered in blood. He felt fucking dizzy—this was even more shocking than being stabbed through the heart himself.

With a diagonal dash, Mu Sicheng dodged the thief's brother behind him. When he turned back, he saw that Bai Liu had actually strangled the thief's brother with his whip, the thin cords digging into the creature’s hands, keeping it trapped. The thief’s brother screamed in impotent rage behind Bai Liu.

Bai Liu glanced up at Mu Sicheng, his tone weak from blood loss but still calm and clear. "The hand, in the hand."

Mu Sicheng was stunned before realization hit. "You think the broken lenses are hidden in the bones of the thief’s brother’s hands?"

"Yes. Come on, I can't hold him for much longer, and we don't have much time." Bai Liu smiled faintly. "For a thief, the most important part would be the hands. That’s why Liu Huaicai cut off your hands in the first place—because they were your strongest weapon."

"Then for this thief brother, I think the most important part would also be the hands."

Mu Sicheng froze for a second before laughing, harder than he ever had before. Tears welled in his eyes as he finally said, "Yeah, I had forgotten that the most important thing for a thief is their hands. Guess I’ve been cut too many times to remember."

"But you do have a point." Mu Sicheng lowered his gaze, his dark eyes narrowing as a sharp grin curled his lips. His beastialized form made his mouth appear unnervingly large. Slowly, he leaned in. His glowing red eyes flickered as he opened his mouth wide—too wide—and bit down viciously on the thief brother’s hands. He tore them away from Bai Liu’s body with a violent yank, ripping them apart.

The moment his hands were torn off, Bai Liu hissed and arched backward. Blood splattered across Mu Sicheng's face as he tore into the thief brother's hands with a feral, ruthless energy. His voice was muffled, almost distorted, as he spoke through clenched teeth. "The most important thing about a thief is, indeed, his hands."

The moment the withered hands were severed, the thief's brother let out a wretched scream, writhing frantically—only to freeze as Mu Sicheng's sharp gaze cut through him like a blade.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng used the skill (Thief's Monkey Paw) to steal twenty broken lenses from the thief's brother.]

A second after losing its hands, the thief's brother withered further, shriveling into itself. Its bleeding eyes burned with hatred as it whistled long and viciously, glaring at the severed hands in Mu Sicheng's grasp. The thief's fingers—encased in dark lacquer—glinted under the dim train lights. Embedded in each fingertip were two broken lenses, ten fingers in total, twenty shattered lenses gleaming in the dim carriage.

Mu Sicheng and his brother, the thief, finally collapsed. Flames erupted around them, engulfing the train cars in an inferno. Mu Sicheng let out a grunt as the fire licked at him.

Bai Liu was thrown to the ground, rolling across the floor. He lay there, his chest heaving violently as he gasped for breath. He was so exhausted that he couldn't even lift a finger. Blood stained his white shirt, the crimson stark against pale fabric. And yet—he grinned. Just like Mu Sicheng.

For they were a pair of successful thieves.

For they had survived, even as their lives teetered on the edge of emptiness.

"Wow, it feels great to succeed in something bad." Bai Liu raised a trembling hand to wipe the blood from the corner of his mouth, smiling contentedly. "Especially when what you steal is valuable."

Mu Sicheng sat back in his seat, breathing heavily, head lowered. After a long moment, he kicked Bai Liu lightly, a half-smile tugging at his lips. "Bai Liu, what the hell do you do in the real world? You're way too good at stealing from people, manipulating them, and using that damn whip. You're not in some kind of high-IQ criminal league, are you?"

"Just a laid-off worker who's short on cash," Bai Liu answered lazily.

Mu Sicheng snorted. "A laid-off worker? Yeah, right. Like hell I'd believe that."

The train's radio finally crackled back to life.

"The train is about to start. Passengers, please line up to disembark. Do not remain in the carriages—"

Having lost all their shattered lenses, the resentful thief brothers left the carriage along with the pile of charred corpse passengers. They stood outside the slowly closing doors, staring at Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng with venomous spite. Bai Liu, still lying motionless on the ground, his blood-soaked chest rising and falling weakly, was actually in the mood to turn his face sideways and grin at them.

"Bye-bye," he said cheerfully.

The thief brothers roared at him in rage.

[Weakness: Broken Lens (1/3).]

[Attack: Scratching, Stealing.]

Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu emerged from the game drenched to the bone, coughing and choking as they collapsed at the boarding gate. The stench of mermaid fish clung to them.

The two ordinary people, experiencing a horror game for the first time, were pale as death, their limbs shaking as they braced themselves on the ground. If it hadn't been for the guidance given to them by the young backwoodsman—and their burning determination to avenge Guoguo—they never would have made it to the end.

At Guoguo's tombstone, the young man had told them, "There are many things I can't tell you. And even if I did, you wouldn't remember them."

Bai Liu had smiled. "So when you go in, just listen."

Burst last train

Because of the [ban] mechanism, Bai Liu could not tell Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu directly about the existence of the game. He could only warn them that they would encounter unexpected situations but should not panic—he would help them and bring them back to life. However, they had to find a way to inform him about their situation and location by purchasing props through their panel.

So after entering the game, Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu followed Bai Liu's instructions. After completing their first task, they used their limited points to buy the four cheapest items—[Wooden Plug], [Blade], [Small Torch], and [Paperweight]—while Liu Fu purchased [Vibranium]. These props were combined to form the [Siren].

Despite their fear and uncertainty, they could only hope that Bai Liu would receive their message. The four cheap props, rarely purchased by others, had cost them almost all their points. Many viewers ridiculed them for wasting their resources, pushing themselves into an obscure division where hardly anyone paid attention.

Fortunately, their system soon began to lag, as if someone had taken control. Their panel occasionally acted on its own, automatically purchasing items for them. They used these props—torches, 3D projectors, alcohol—with trepidation, feeling as if another person was playing the game with them. Although Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu were not skilled gamers, their strong will to survive pushed them forward. Even when Bai Liu bought them props they didn’t understand, they gritted their teeth and persevered.

After the chase, their gameplay became smoother, and in the end, they successfully cleared the game.

Yes, Bai Liu himself had died in the second level, yet somehow, in between his own near-death experiences, he still found the time to help Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu survive. This was commonly known as the "three openings" strategy.

However, despite Bai Liu’s assistance, most of their struggle was their own.

Bai Liu was trapped in a dangerous game himself, and his unreliable system would occasionally disconnect. He had no way of tracking their progress exactly, so Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu had to rely on themselves, crawling and stumbling their way forward. When they finally emerged from the game, they were trembling from the lingering fear, helping each other to stand with tears in their eyes.

It would be reasonable to expect that after experiencing something so bizarre and terrifying, a normal person would want to run away, refuse to believe it, and try to escape.

But Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu, two ordinary adults who had never truly believed in gods or the supernatural, did not react like normal people.

They did not scream, flee, or collapse in despair.

Instead, at the boarding exit, they broke down and held each other, sobbing in joy.

"What that young man said was true." Xiang Chunhua's hand trembled as she leaned against Liu Fu. It felt as though she had aged decades in the few short days since losing Guoguo. Tears spilled from the deep wrinkles on her face as she hunched over, her voice breaking with emotion. "Do you think Guoguo can be saved? That that beast will really be punished?"

Liu Fu wiped his tears with rough hands, his broad shoulders shaking as he wept. "Yes, it's possible. He said he would help us."

Before entering the game, Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu had sat in silence on a humid June evening, facing each other across the table.

On the table were three sets of chopsticks and a large bowl of roasted pork. Beside an empty seat was Liu Guoguo’s exam admission slip. In the photo, a girl in a school uniform looked at the camera with a restrained, expectant smile, nervous but hopeful for the important test ahead.

Outside, the voices of children who had finished their exams drifted through the streets—some cheerful, some frustrated as they discussed their answers.

Among the laughter and disappointment, there should have been the voice of a seventeen-year-old girl.

But that voice had been lost forever in a dark alley.

It had been reduced to a black-and-white image on a distant gravestone.

Her hand, which should have been holding a pen and answering questions, had been chopped into pieces of meat—minced into pig's feet and scraps, sold off as cheap pork for a dozen dollars per pound by Li Gou.

Liu Fu had crawled through the sewers, desperate to find Guoguo's right hand, but he never did.

When they buried her, that hand—mangled beyond recognition—had already been swallowed up by the earth.

"Physics was hard this year," Xiang Chunhua murmured absently. "I heard from Zhang family's sister-in-law." Her voice was hollow. "But Guoguo was best at physics. This year's exam... might have been right up her alley."

"Yes... Maybe she would have made it into the teacher training college she liked..." Liu Fu trailed off. He clenched his fists, then suddenly covered his face and bent over, as if his world had shattered. His voice broke in a hoarse, slurred whisper before he slammed his fist into the table. "Bastard! She was only seventeen! It's my fault! I never should have let her go down there!"

"It's my fault too... If I hadn't made roast pork for Guoguo, she wouldn't have..." Xiang Chunhua's eyes were ringed with dried tears. More welled up and spilled over as she numbly patted Liu Fu's shoulder, her voice distant, as if she were soothing herself. "Go to sleep. It'll be fine once you sleep."

But when they woke up, they were in the game.

Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu clung to each other, eyes wary as they took in the strange world before them. They had the instincts of small, frightened creatures but the composure of adults hardened by life. The only person they trusted was Bai Liu—the young man who had supposedly bought their souls and helped them survive.

When they saw a passerby, Xiang Chunhua cautiously approached. "Young man, do you know someone named Bai Liu?"

The man gave them an odd look. "You're Bai Liu fans? He just had a surge of likes and charges, and the crowd is going crazy. Looks like he's about to hit the Nightmare Rising Star list. If you're looking for him, head to the central hall—people are gathering there."

Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu exchanged glances, thanked the man, and hurried toward the hall he had pointed out.

Central Hall Core Screen

Wang Shun stood at the front row of Bai Liu's small TV, his face grim. Despite the surge in likes and charges Bai Liu had just received for his performance, none of the audience looked pleased.

Bai Liu had only one life. A single attack would be enough to wipe him out.

"Hold on! Bai Liu absolutely cannot take another hit—not even for a second!"

"Help! I need oxygen again! The last Bai Liu video nearly suffocated me, and now it's happening again!"

Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu arrived to find the crowd watching the small TV screen with bated breath. Instinctively, they followed their gazes. The moment they saw Bai Liu's familiar face on the screen, a wave of relief washed over them—only to be shattered a second later.

A figure flashed across the corner of Bai Liu's small TV.

Their eyes widened in disbelief.

"Li Gou!!! You beast!!!"

Li Gou sat cowering on the ground, panting with exhaustion. Bai Liu, barely clinging to life, was protected at the center by Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng. His lips were pale, but his eyes remained sharp.

"I'll handle the arrangements for the next station," Bai Liu said. "We've collected 360 shards, but we're still 40 short. I don't think the game will let us gather them all at the next station."

Zhang Gui frowned. "Then what do we do? If we don't assemble at the next station, we'll have to go back to the departure station—Antique City. But the explosion is supposed to happen between Antique City and the penultimate station. If we don't gather the pieces before then, we'll have to face the explosion head-on! That means we'll all die!"

Bai Liu's tone was calm but laced with exhaustion. "The reason I say we won't be able to collect the shards at the next station is simple—there's still one monster left in The Book of Monsters. So far, every monster—the Burst Passenger, the Thief Brothers—has carried shards. That means this last one probably does too."

Zhang Gui quickly connected the dots and rubbed his chin. "That's true. But what if we fight this monster at the next station? Then we can still clear the game, right?"

Bai Liu tilted his head. "Do you remember the minimum death rate for this game?"

Silence fell.

Bai Liu lowered his gaze. "For Tier 2 games, the mortality rate is between fifty and eighty percent. That means that, even at the lowest rate, out of the seven of us, at least three and a half should be dead by now. But no one has died yet. That's why the system is adjusting things—like forcibly lowering Du Sanying's luck."

His tone sharpened as he turned to Du Sanying. "What's your current luck value?"

Caught off guard, Du Sanying pointed at himself before quickly opening his panel. He checked, then hesitantly reported, "80."

Bai Liu immediately analyzed the situation. "That means the system only dropped your luck by 20 points. That's far too little if its goal was to ensure three and a half deaths."

His voice remained steady as he continued, "Siren Town went to great lengths to balance the mortality rate. But in Burst Last Train, all the system did was reduce Du Sanying's luck and stop there. A small adjustment like that can only mean one thing—the system already considers the death rate balanced."

Zhang Gui felt a chill run down his spine as realization dawned. His face paled, and he turned to Bai Liu. "You mean this game has a mandatory death event to ensure the mortality rate? That no matter what we do, up to three and a half of us have to die?!"

In single-player games, such mechanics didn't exist. But in multiplayer horror games, it was a common way to maintain difficulty and tension. Simply put, it was the classic "teammates sacrifice to advance" trope.

But in this horror game, that design wasn't just for fun—it was cruel and brutal.

Bai Liu's voice was measured. "Think about it. What kind of mandatory death event would a game called Burst Last Train have?"

Zhang Gui leaned back in his chair, dazed, staring at the flickering fluorescent lights above. He muttered, "…An explosion. The game wants us to go through an explosion. That means we won't be able to collect all the shards before the countdown ends."

"We'll have to survive the explosion before we can reach the last station and assemble the pieces."

A hoarse voice suddenly interrupted. Li Gou, still slumped on the ground, crawled toward the group, his dirty hands clutching Bai Liu's ankle. Desperation shone in his eyes. "If three and a half of us must die, then three and a half can live, right? Bai Liu, you must have a plan! Let me be one of the survivors—I'll do anything!"

Mu Sicheng immediately stepped in, kicking Li Gou away and baring his teeth in warning. Li Gou reluctantly retreated to the corner, but his eyes never left Bai Liu.

"I do have a way to survive the explosion," Bai Liu admitted, his gaze lingering meaningfully on Li Gou. "But the plan requires two sacrifices."

Everyone tensed. Even Mu Sicheng held his breath as he stared at Bai Liu.

"This is why I made sure to keep everyone alive in the early stages," Bai Liu continued. "Because I knew there would come a point where sacrifices were inevitable."

He exhaled slowly. "I checked earlier—the system has banned all water-based items and explosive props. That means we can't even buy a bottle of mineral water. The reason is obvious: the Burst Corpses have a major weakness—water. High-temperature burst remains dissolve upon contact with water, which makes it an effective weapon against them."

Bai Liu sighed. "Unfortunately, there's no water on the train or in the system shop. And we can't use Du Sanying to lure the monsters again, or the system will continue lowering his luck value. That means we need a massive amount of water."

He continued, "The explosion itself can also be mitigated with water. The main causes of death in explosions are shock waves, extreme heat, and flying debris. If we flood the underground tunnel with water, it'll absorb some of the blast, increasing our survival chances."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "That's great, but where are we supposed to get that much water? Even if the system sold bottled water, we'd need thousands of bottles to flood an entire metro tunnel!"

Bai Liu smiled. "We don't need bottles. The next station has exactly what we need."

Mu Sicheng's breath caught.

"The reservoir!" Zhang Gui's eyes widened. "I memorized the train map before we boarded! The penultimate station is Reservoir! That means—"

Bai Liu nodded. "If it's a medium-sized reservoir, it'll hold enough water to flood the underground tracks."

Zhang Gui's excitement dimmed. "But how do we get the water into the tunnel? The system banned explosives—"

Bai Liu smirked and pulled out an oval mirror, its surface fractured but missing only one triangular shard. "We don't need system-bought explosives. We already have them."

Zhang Gui blinked. "…A mirror?"

Bai Liu's fingers brushed the surface. Ripples spread outward, turning the mirror into a shimmering mercury lake.

Everyone froze as Bai Liu reached inside and pulled out a bomb, letting it drop to the floor with a heavy thud. The scent of gunpowder filled the air.

Zhang Gui's jaw tightened. "You ripped the explosives out of the mirror? Then—does that mean we can prevent the train from exploding?"

Bai Liu reached into the mirror again, retrieving another bomb before shaking his head. "No. I suspect the explosives are infinite. That means the train and this mirror are destined to explode."

Zhang Gui's expression darkened.

"That's why two players must be sacrificed," Bai Liu continued. "One has to deliver the explosives to the reservoir—but they won't make it back in time." He lifted one finger. "That's the first sacrifice."

Zhang Gui clenched his jaw. "And the second?"

Bai Liu's lips curled. "The second player must use Du Sanying's item, False Fabric, to wrap the mirror and hold it in place. The fabric prevents the shards from scattering after the explosion, so we won't have to hunt them down again. But…" His smile turned sharp. "That person will be too close to the blast. They won't survive."

Bai Liu's eyes swept over them all.

"Now, the only question is… which of you is going to die?"

Bai Liu considered using the [Old Wallet] skill to trade and control the three men under Zhang Gui, but he felt the chances of success were slim. First, they were all highly wary of him and knew he had a control skill. The trade skill also required the active consent of both parties. Bai Liu doubted he could successfully persuade them to enter into a dirty money relationship with him within just a few minutes.

Second, even if he succeeded, he wouldn't be able to manipulate anyone in the extreme chaos underwater.

Because the soul note was a type of paper money, it shared Bai Liu's greatest weakness—it was afraid of water. Underwater, his skill would effectively be banned. If anyone discovered this flaw, his situation would become extremely dangerous.

And Bai Liu was certain that before clearing the level, he would secure the shattered lens for himself to ensure the highest possible reward. If the group realized he couldn't use the Soul Coin skill underwater, he would be at risk of being overpowered and robbed of the shard.

Unfortunately, Bai Liu suspected Zhang Gui had already figured out that he couldn't control others underwater.

After all, Zhang Gui had seen Bai Liu use the soul coin to save Mu Sicheng in an emergency, meaning he understood that Bai Liu's method of control relied on a paper prop—a key reason why Bai Liu wanted Zhang Gui dead.

If he let Zhang Gui go this time, he would lose the advantage of keeping his personal skills a secret.

Zhang Gui was backed by a major guild and had access to many resources Bai Liu didn't know about. If Zhang Gui managed to escape Bai Liu's control and later hunted him down the way he did Mu Sicheng, Bai Liu couldn't be certain he would survive.

Moreover, Zhang Gui might expose Bai Liu's personal skills. While Bai Liu's abilities were already widely known, they were also highly restrictive, requiring money for any transaction. If Zhang Gui made them public, Bai Liu's movements would become much harder.

Bai Liu's eyes twitched slightly as his calm gaze met Zhang Gui's obscure one.

Zhang Gui looked tense and aggressive, like a predator waiting for the right moment to strike—waiting for Bai Liu, who had only a sliver of health left, to drop his guard.

And Zhang Gui was waiting for the perfect opportunity.

"Zhang Gui holds the exploding mirror," Bai Liu ordered without hesitation.

Zhang Gui looked startled, as if he hadn't expected Bai Liu to choose him. He quickly composed himself and retorted sternly, "If I die, the other three puppets will be out of control! Bai Liu, you can't choose me!"

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes, locking onto Zhang Gui, his smile shallow and floating on the surface. "But I think that if I don't pick you, you'll try to kill me when I'm not prepared. After all, I barely have any health left, and you're the biggest threat to me."

Zhang Gui hesitated before speaking again. "Bai Liu, we've worked together until now. I really don't want to betray you. I even tried my best to protect you before, right?"

He inhaled deeply, then slowly raised his hands in a gesture of surrender, looking at Bai Liu with what seemed to be sincerity. "I know you still suspect me. I'll give you everything I have on me—I just want to clear the level. I'm a player ranked around two hundred in strength. You already have me under control. Keeping me alive is more valuable to you than killing me, isn't it?"

His throat bobbed slightly as he bent forward in a submissive bow, exposing the back of his neck and spine. His voice was low and muffled. "Bai Liu... master, I swear I won't kill you. You can even have Mu Sicheng use [The Judge's Scales] to verify my honesty. You don't have to trust me, but you can trust the prop, right?"

It was a deeply submissive gesture.

Bai Liu chuckled, tilting his head as he bent down to look at Zhang Gui's expression. His smile was amused. "Zhang Gui, gestures and psychological tricks like that are useless against me. I've already played this game with you."

His eyes gleamed lazily. "Zhang Gui, do you know why I never tried to negotiate with you from the beginning? Why I just took control of you outright?"

Zhang Gui, lying on the ground, froze at Bai Liu's quiet, meaningful laugh.

Bai Liu's smile didn't waver, but for a moment, his gaze was so calm it could pierce through Zhang Gui. His tone was almost approving. "Because you're a lot like me. Or rather, people like us—people who want to maximize our interests—think the same way. We're both greedy. From the start, I wanted the most out of you, just like you wanted the most out of me."

"There are only two ways to get the most out of something: trading and looting. You weren't interested in trading with me, and what you wanted was inside me. No matter how much you pretend to want to work together, the only way you could truly get what you wanted was by killing me to take it, wasn't it?"

Bai Liu smiled. "So from the beginning, I never considered working with you. Cooperation is too weak a bond for people like you and me. It's something that can be broken at any moment. Didn't you betray me halfway through? And that's exactly what allowed me to take control of you. I've come this far in control, so what makes you think I'd let you go?"

Trusting another equally ambitious and intelligent person to be completely loyal would be foolish. Bai Liu fully understood this, which was why he always used people—then eliminated them.

Even back when he and Lu Yizhan played competitive games together, Bai Liu had never hesitated to kill Lu Yizhan at the critical moment before winning. He knew Lu Yizhan—who was just as sharp—would have done the same to him.

"And using [The Judge's Scales] to verify your honesty?" Bai Liu let out a quiet, amused tsk, lowering his eyes. "Let me correct a small mistake in your statement."

His lips curled slightly as he leaned down, whispering close to Zhang Gui's stunned face. "[The Judge's Scales] isn't Mu Sicheng's prop—it used to be yours, and Mu Sicheng stole it from you, didn't he? And you want me to trust a prop you've tampered with?" Bai Liu smirked. "I'm not that stupid, master."

Zhang Gui and Bai Liu locked eyes, and Zhang Gui's breath hitched. Instinctively, he glanced at Mu Sicheng, assuming Mu Sicheng had told Bai Liu. But then he realized—Mu Sicheng would never reveal the origins of his stolen goods. It was a professional habit. There was no way Mu Sicheng would have told Bai Liu.

Yet Mu Sicheng was equally shocked. "How do you know I stole that prop from Zhang Gui?" he asked incredulously.

"Because he's already pulled this trick once before," Bai Liu replied, leaning back against the wall. He closed his eyes, one arm draped lazily over the chair. "He did the same thing to Liu Huai."

"People only have a strong sense of trust in things they're familiar with. Zhang Gui, instead of thinking about using your own prop in a life-or-death situation, you instinctively tried to make me trust it—despite being enemies with Mu Sicheng. Doesn't that seem suspicious? Considering your skills, this was the most likely answer."

Zhang Gui's pulse pounded. Sweat dripped from his jaw as he looked at Bai Liu with fear.

Bai Liu... had planned this from the start. From the moment he took control, Zhang Gui's death had already been decided.

Was this guy really a newcomer?

How could someone in just their second dungeon have no hesitation about killing?

What the hell did Bai Liu do in real life?

"Good, then it's up to one of the three of you to deliver the bomb." Bai Liu rolled his eyes toward the three men huddled in the corner, silent and tense. The fatigue from blood loss made his mind foggy for a moment, and he swayed slightly before Mu Sicheng caught him.

Mu Sicheng gave Bai Liu a strange look. "Are you really choosing Zhang Gui to take the mirror? You've got him under control—he's useful to you, right? You're not keeping him alive?"

"The value is there, but since you're too exhausted to guard me, I have to get rid of him." Bai Liu shrugged as he wiped the back of his hand across his mouth, smearing crimson—probably blood again.

He flicked the beads of blood from his fingers and continued without much concern. "I chose Zhang Gui because once I fall into the water, my current half-dead state won't be enough to keep everyone in check. If Zhang Gui fights back, you won't be able to handle him, but you can deal with the others. So it's fine if I lose control."

"At the next station, I'll manipulate them to gather all the broken lenses as fast as possible. Then we take the shards and run. They aren't as fast as you, and we have Du Sanying's eighty luck points on our side—that's more than enough for the three of us to clear this level."

Burst last train

Mu Sicheng understood Bai Liu's point. He, Bai Liu, Du Sanying, and the others had a significant advantage and should be the first to get through. When the explosion started, everyone was too busy focusing on surviving to worry about anything else. Bai Liu's control skills didn't matter at that point; as long as they survived the explosion, it would be impossible to sneak up on him.

Mu Sicheng paused for a moment. "With three people left, who are you going to choose to deliver the bomb?"

"What?" Bai Liu shifted his eyes. "Do you have a recommendation?"

Mu Sicheng hesitated. "Liu Huai. I suggest you pick him."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow in slight surprise. "Reason?"

He didn’t think Mu Sicheng would suggest something out of personal spite.

"I'm not suggesting it out of animosity," Mu Sicheng said, avoiding Bai Liu's gaze. "Liu Huai has a personal skill called Assassin's Flash, which has a range far enough to exceed the length of this carriage." His tone grew more complicated as he continued, "You only have a little bit of life left. If Liu Huai dies after Zhang Gui is dead, he can break free from the puppet silk and flash to assassinate you. My strength is recovering slowly, and my personal skills are only at a very low level... Against Liu Huai's skills, I might not be able to protect you."

Liu Huai, who had been listening, laughed bitterly. He knew the moment Mu Sicheng opened his mouth that this would be the suggestion. It was the skill that nearly killed Mu Sicheng—lethal and defensive. Bai Liu, with only one life, wasn’t likely to let a player with such a skill out of his control.

"Oh, I see." Bai Liu fiddled with the coin on his chest for a brief moment before speaking abruptly, "You make a valid point, but I’ve traded with someone before."

When Bai Liu acquired the souls of Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu’s parents, he promised to help them execute Li Gou. Although there was no time limit on this deal, the energy required to kill Li Gou after this moment would be significantly higher.

If Bai Liu let Li Gou go this time and let him pass the game to get the points, Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu could be killed by Li Gou after he was released from prison and sought revenge. Bai Liu wasn't willing to take such a risk.

He always made choices that gave him the most gain and were cost-effective, with risk not being a consideration.

Without risk, there would be no reward.

Bai Liu looked up calmly and said, "So my choice is for Li Gou to deliver the bomb."

Everyone froze.

Liu Huai stared in disbelief, unable to believe he had been passed over yet again.

Li Gou struggled, his eyes wild with madness as he tried to grab Bai Liu with his sword, but he was soon restrained by Bai Liu and Zhang Gui's puppet silk.

Li Gou was losing control, his limbs bleeding from the puppet silk, yet he still writhed and screamed, "Bai Liu! Why the hell are you choosing me? Didn't you hear what Mu Sicheng said? Liu Huai is the one who can kill you! Who the hell are you to make me carry the bomb to my death?!"

"I'm getting out of prison!" Li Gou shouted hysterically, his veins popping with rage. "You can't let me die here!"

Li Gou stared at Bai Liu, whose expression remained unmoving, and slowly dropped to his knees, defeated. His gaze became empty, and he slumped to the ground like a heap of rotten flesh.

After a few seconds, Li Gou seemed to understand something, and suddenly began sobbing, kneeling and begging, "Bai Liu! Please, don't let me go! Brother Bai! I've done everything honestly from the beginning, just like you said. I didn't cut any corners. Don't choose me! Brother Bai, you're going to choose Liu Huai, the big threat, over me? Are you kidding me?"

Mu Sicheng also looked at Bai Liu with disapproval. "Why Li Gou? He's much less threatening than Liu Huai, and if Liu Huai attacks you later, you'll be in trouble!"

Wang Shun, watching from the small TV, frowned in confusion. "What's going on? Bai Liu isn't the kind of person to let someone off the hook at the last minute. Why would he choose Li Gou?"

The rest of the audience murmured in concern.

"Liu Huai can backstab even a high-speed attacker like Mu Sicheng! Bai Liu can't even block Liu Huai's attack, even with Mu Sicheng!"

"I don't get why Bai Liu chose Li Gou. It makes no sense!"

None of the audience understood Bai Liu's choice. They were confused, worried, and disappointed. Only a couple standing behind the crowd covered their mouths, struggling to hold back tears, barely keeping themselves from collapsing.

In their teary eyes, they saw Bai Liu's pale, quiet face on the small TV.

They knew why Bai Liu made this risky choice.

Xiang Chunhua's head hung low, her sobs hoarse as tears rolled down her fingers, which she had pressed over her mouth. Liu Fu wiped them away with his large, rough hands, though his own tears stained his hair, now turning white at the temples.

"Thank you, Bai Liu. Thank you."

They had lived each day as the walking dead, condemning themselves in silence, receiving hollow sympathy from strangers who would soon move on, offering empty words. They were left to carry their grief, no one willing to remember Guoguo.

Why had Guoguo been chosen? Why had Li Gou singled her out? And why not the others?

Li Gou knelt before Bai Liu, trembling in fear. Mu Sicheng kicked him away, sending him sprawling to the ground, blood spilling from the corner of his mouth.

Li Gou, terrified, looked up at Bai Liu, his lips trembling. "Brother Bai, why choose me? You could have chosen Fang Ke, why me?"

Bai Liu met his gaze calmly. "To put it bluntly, I chose you because you were unlucky."

Unlucky enough to follow Zhang Gui into the game. Unlucky enough to become Zhang Gui's puppet. Unlucky enough to be completely under Bai Liu's control.

"But if you need a reason before you die, I can give you one." Bai Liu crouched down, looking at Li Gou, who seemed to have no idea why he was being chosen.

"Do you remember Liu Guoguo?" Bai Liu asked quietly.

At the mention of her name, Li Gou's body froze. He stared at Bai Liu in shock.

Bai Liu's tone was as calm as ever. "If you need a logical reason, it's simple—because you chose Liu Guoguo first, I've chosen you now."

Li Gou's mind went blank. He sat down hard, staring at Bai Liu with vacant eyes, muttering, "How could it be because of Liu Guoguo? She's dead."

Although Li Gou had been imprisoned because of Liu Guoguo, he had long forgotten about the girl who had made him feel good for a single night. To him, she had never been a person.

But when Bai Liu spoke her name so lightly, it brought back the memory of the night that landed him in jail—the horror, the pain, the desperation of the real girl he had tortured. The helplessness in her eyes, the begging for mercy.

The same questions Li Gou had asked Bai Liu now echoed from the past.

Li Gou's twisted smile faded as the memory of his crime crashed down on him.

The female voice of the train's announcement came on, "We are about to arrive at the next stop—Reservoir. Please hold on to your seats. Passengers wanting to board, please line up outside the door."

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed. "We're arriving at the station. Li Gou, take the bomb. Zhang Gui, get the mirror. Mu Sicheng, guard me. The rest, clear the broken lenses."

The announcement continued, "The train has arrived at the station. Reservoir, please prepare to board and alight."

Bai Liu spoke coldly, "Go."

The moment the passengers flooded into the train, Li Gou, his limbs shaking uncontrollably, ran out of the carriage, a massive black bomb strapped to his back. His eyes flooded with tears, fear overwhelming him as he stumbled through the burning station, paper flames floating around him, scalding his face. But he was being driven toward the fire.

With the bomb on his back, Li Gou dodged the charred bodies stumbling across the platform, but soon, he couldn't avoid the flames any longer. His cheeks burned, and his screams echoed through the station. "Bai Liu! I know I was wrong! I don't dare do it again! I'm sorry, Liu Guoguo! Please let me go!"

He screamed, tears streaming down his face. "I shouldn't have done it to her! Please, Bai Liu! Let me go! I don't want to die! I swear, I won't hurt her again! I'll die a thousand deaths if I do!"

[System Alert: Player Li Gou has been burned by flames, Life -15, Spirit -15, Spirit continues to decrease due to a violent shock to his Spirit... Spirit below 40.]

[System warning: Player Li Gou is about to see a lot of subliminal horror visions! Please restore your mental energy in time!]

Li Gou, who was screaming in the flames, could not hear the system warning, and even if he did, there was nothing he could do. All his points had been taken by Bai Liu, and Li Gou no longer had any points left to buy bleach.

But soon, Li Gou suddenly felt the bomb on his back become wet and fleshy. A drop of blood dripped down from his neck, hot against his skin. The flames around him were scorching, but Li Gou couldn't help but shiver.

His back was quickly stained with a warm, rusty liquid. A girl's long, wet black hair stained with blood slid down Li Gou's shoulders, bobbing and swaying. Drops of bright red blood hit the back of Li Gou's feet. A pair of white hands wrapped around his neck, gently encircling him. One of the hands had something written on it in black grease pencil: [Countdown to the (blurred) days of the entrance exams! Go Guoguo! Teacher training awaits you! Teacher training awaits you!]

The little girl hummed a song out of tune, her feet swaying on Li Gou's back. "Where is the world full of flowers? If it really existed, I would go there~"

The song was "Chasing Dreams, Red Son's Heart," the chorus of Liu Guoguo's senior pledge meeting. Every day, Li Gou saw this girl humming the song with her headphones as she passed by his alley—such an innocent, beautiful sight. He'd only peeked at her with greasy eyes, coveting the beauty that did not belong to him, and eventually destroyed it with a butcher's knife a thousand times.

Li Gou swallowed stiffly, not daring to turn around. He could only whisper repeatedly, "It's an illusion. It's an illusion..."

"I want to stand on the highest mountain there—" The girl's sweet voice interrupted, giggling and singing with an eerie air. Cold, icy hands slowly curled around Li Gou's neck. "Don't care if it's a cliffhanger—"

A face chopped to pieces with a machete and a sunken nose peeked over Li Gou's neck. Liu Guoguo smiled at him, her mutilated face twisted in a grin. "Uncle Li, long time no see."

He fought to shake off Liu Guoguo behind him and ran.

He was running through the flaming station, but it suddenly transformed into the alleyway where he used to work. No matter which way he ran, he saw Liu Guoguo's bloodied face smiling next to his bloody slaughterhouse, singing to him as she closed in.

Li Gou ran in a panic, but Liu Guoguo suddenly grew as big as him. Grinning, she grabbed his arms and legs, and with a sweet smile on her face, held him down on a slab of pork. As she looked down, she hummed the same song, plunging a sharp knife into his abdomen, one by one, picking out his bones and entrails.

Just like Li Gou had done to her.

"Ouch! STOP! Stop cutting!" Li Gou screamed, his eyes bulging. But with his next scream, Liu Guoguo seemed to find him annoying. She plunged the tip of a sharp knife into his throat, twisting it as she hummed her lilting song.

"That's the sign of a coward~" she sang pleasantly.

Blood gushed out, and Li Gou gagged a few times in excruciating pain. He couldn't hold on any longer. He had just been incontinent, his calves still trembling from the pain.

But even so, Li Gou was dragged along by the puppet strings, spitting blood as he was pulled closer to the reservoir.

Li Gou's limbs had been hacked to pieces by Liu Guoguo. Though it was all a hallucination, Li Gou was completely unconscious under the constant attack. His subconscious projections of pain left him crawling through the station, dragging his mangled limbs through the flaming ashes.

Liu Guoguo was on top of him, cutting his scalp with the knife, one by one. Li Gou couldn't utter a single word, but he could only open his eyes helplessly, tears streaming down his face, blood gushing from his throat.

In the illusion, Li Gou's clothes and chin were wet with blood, but in reality, the man was twitching on the ground like a dead dog, his eyes rolling back.

Nothing really happened. Li Gou was tormented by a horrific hallucination of his own making.

Li Gou never thought of Liu Guoguo as a human being when he killed her. Killing her had been as easy as killing a pig, and he felt no guilt.

He knew he could easily decide the fate of this little girl, like deciding the fate of a helpless kitten.

But when Bai Liu turned Liu Guoguo from a defenseless cat into someone who could send him over the edge, his subconscious fears awakened, and he realized what he had really done.

He had killed a person.

Liu Guoguo had been alone, and it turned out she had been in so much pain.

Li Gou carried Liu Guoguo on his back, propping himself up with his elbows, and eventually crawled step by step, gasping for breath. Liu Guoguo was pressed against his back, blood mingling with his own. Her long black hair hung in folded curls at the nape of his neck. The bomb, Li Gou knew, was a bomb—but now, that bomb was Liu Guoguo, the girl he had killed, hacked to death by him. The raped Liu Guoguo.

Like a happy bird, she sang on Li Gou's shoulder, a song only he could hear: "I'm not going to be able to hear you."

"Maybe I don't have the talent, but I have the naivety to dream. I will prove it with my whole life. Maybe I'm clumsy on my hands and knees, but I'm willing to keep exploring..."

"Even if blood is spilled on my arms and I continue to run, I will do so with the pride of a red son."

Liu Guoguo was a beautiful, pretty, hard-working, understanding, pork-loving seventeen-year-old girl who was about to sit for her university entrance exams. She was going to be a teacher at a very good teacher training school, and loved singing “Chasing Dreams with a Red Heart,” ruffling her long hair around her ears when she smiled. Even if she had been raped, she might have cried, cursed hysterically, or curled up in her house.

But she had a chance to start over. It wasn’t her fault, and she didn’t have to live her life for something like that.

She had a chance to turn this into a scar.

But only originally.

Li Gou closed his eyes, leaving muddy tears behind. Choking, he opened his mouth. He seemed to want to say something, but nothing came out. Blood gushed from his throat. Li Gou’s eyes widened reluctantly. Liu Guoguo hugged his neck from behind, singing softly and laughing as she took him down into the reservoir.

Countless bubbles tumbled over the water.

With a bang, the bomb exploded.

Li Gou was blown into countless tiny bones and fragments in the reservoir, just like Liu Guoguo.

The reservoir slowly collapsed, and water gushed out from the gap.

The girl’s clear, crisp laugh rang out, seemingly unnoticed at the edge of the reservoir. It sounded like cold mockery, but it soon disappeared, leaving no trace.

[System Alert (for all players): Player Li Gou has zero life, confirmed dead, exit the game.]

Inside the carriage.

Chased by the thieves, the group ran as hard as they could, Mu Sicheng leading with Bai Liu in tow, followed by Zhang Gui, who was collecting the pieces.

But soon, the group was about to collapse. Without Du Sanying to help distract the thief brothers, everyone’s props and values were drained to the last. But the thief brothers, a pair of monster siblings, were especially aggressive this time because their pieces had been stolen.

If they were chased for much longer, the thief brothers’ big move would probably wipe them out!

Mu Sicheng ducked and dangled from the hoop, breathing unevenly, his face pale. “Bai Liu, I can’t hold on!”

Bai Liu looked out of the car, exhaling a foul breath and smiling. “No need to hold on, the water’s coming.”

Water rolled down the steps of the underground. The sound of flames being doused and the water clattering down intertwined. The rising vapor filled the entire station in seconds. The train was instantly enveloped in a translucent mist. The fires on the bursting passengers chasing them were extinguished as soon as the water soaked them.

The backs of the scorched corpses’ feet seemed to melt from the water, immobilized by the vapor as they threw their heads back and wailed, but they could not advance an inch.

The thief brother chasing Bai Liu was drenched and fell onto his feet. His massive body flopped into the water on the ground, instantly shrinking into a pile of black charred corpses, wailing and screaming. The other thief brother stopped chasing them and instead gibbered anxiously, turning to help his sibling, but his brother was too big for him, even when he shrank.

These two brothers shouted at each other pathetically, holding each other up as if cheering, shivering in a huddle, drenched in water.

Mu Sicheng dropped Bai Liu and rested beside him. With the two thief brothers' attacks and speed greatly reduced, it was almost impossible for them to catch up. He tsked with mixed feelings.

Who would have thought that the bandit brothers, who nearly wiped them out at first, would now be fixed like this by Bai Liu, a guy who was barely hanging on for dear life...?

“Put on the snorkel.” Bai Liu reminded Mu Sicheng. He’d put a diving mask on, breathing in the dense mist that sprayed over it, revealing only a pair of still, dark, pale eyes. “Wait for the drive. This section of track might collapse, and the water will follow it all in.”

“The train is about to start. Please get off the train in time for the next stop, the final stop – Antique City.”

Chapter End Notes

Li Gou finally got what he deserves

Burst last train

Mu Sicheng had equipped himself with a diving device, which he bought for three points—an item they had already purchased.

Mu Sicheng gave Bai Liu a glance. "Come on, go meet them."

Du Sanying and Zhang Gui were in the same compartment. He threw his head back, wiping the water off his face, panting heavily. Next to Zhang Gui were Liu Huai and Fang Ke, who were in a similar state. Bai Liu, without hesitation, placed his shattered 360 lenses in Du Sanying's hypocritical fabric. Ignoring Zhang Gui's resentful gaze, he shoved the lenses into Zhang Gui's arms. "There should be 20 shards on your side too. They'll explode in a few dozen seconds, so take them."

[System Alert: Player Zhang Gui has obtained 380 broken lenses, collection progress (380/400)]

"As for you two..." Bai Liu turned his head toward Liu Huai and Fang Ke. Both shivered under Bai Liu's unwavering gaze. "Now that the broken lenses are collected, you're useless and a danger. So, how about...?"

Liu Huai was the first to grit his teeth. "We won't attack you. It would be a waste of time for you to kill me now. We're almost out of life, and attacking you wouldn't benefit us. We'll hide."

"If you really don't believe me..." Liu Huai looked into Bai Liu's emotionless eyes, desperation creeping into his voice. "I just want to survive. I'll do anything to prove I won't sneak up on you."

Bai Liu was blunt. "Then cut off your own hands."

Liu Huai stared in astonishment. Mu Sicheng's expression faltered for a moment as they both exchanged synchronized looks.

Bai Liu didn't think his request was cold. His tone remained casual. "I'm not interested in killing anyone, but your presence is a risk. You use a dagger with your hands, right? If you cut off your hands, you'll fall to about the same life as me, which lowers your chances of attacking me."

"And with your hands gone..." Bai Liu turned to Mu Sicheng. "You can beat Liu Huai like that, right?"

Mu Sicheng stared at Bai Liu, confused for a few seconds. Then, he tsked and snorted. "If Liu Huai cuts off his hands, I'll take them."

Bai Liu turned to Liu Huai, who hesitated, then said quietly, "Okay, do it. We don't have much time."

Liu Huai's face twisted with mixed emotions as he gritted his teeth and turned to Fang Ke, asking for help to cut off his hands.

The moment Liu Huai's arm fell to the ground, Mu Sicheng blinked in stunned silence. After a beat, he returned to his usual expression, his eyes a little red. He turned away and stood beside Bai Liu, his hands hanging loosely by his sides.

"As for Fang Ke..." Bai Liu started, but before he could finish, Fang Ke screamed in desperation and broke off one of his hands. "I'll do it! Is that alright?"

Bai Liu blinked, slightly surprised. "I just wanted you and Liu Huai to hand over your props and points, not break your hands."

Fang Ke: "...!" He whimpered in distress.

Liu Huai and Fang Ke exchanged a long look before reluctantly handing over their points and props. Bai Liu's gaze shifted to Zhang Gui. "And you. Hand over your points and props too, or you'll die for nothing."

Zhang Gui, on the verge of exploding from Bai Liu's demands, was caught between a mix of resentment and helplessness. Bai Liu had casually robbed three high-ranking players, leaving him no room to resist.

Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng, who had witnessed the entire ordeal, exchanged glances, both speechless. As they watched Bai Liu—so skilled at robbing, killing, and gathering wealth—they couldn't help but wonder: which prison had released Bai Liu, this disaster of a man?

Bai Liu, like a laid-off employee, inspected his loot and waved cheerfully at Fang Ke and Liu Huai. "Bye! Next time we play together, you guys really made my gaming experience great!"

Liu Huai and Fang Ke: "..."

Still no. They had a horrible gaming experience.

Fang Ke and Liu Huai fled like dogs under Bai Liu's delighted gaze. Mu Sicheng, speechless, stammered, "Bai... Bai Liu, I really don't have any more props! I've used a lot! Don't rob me!"

Bai Liu feigned surprise. "How could I rob you? We're partners." Then, with a slight regretful pause, he added, "You don't have anything left? I thought with your luck value of 100, you'd have plenty of props."

Mu Sicheng: "... Please stop looking at me like I'm a fat sheep, Bai Liu."

Du Sanying nodded with tears in his eyes, pleading, "I really don't have anything left!"

Bai Liu had no intention of taking anything from Mu Sicheng—he was counting on him for help. As Bai Liu looted Fang Ke and Liu Huai, Mu Sicheng looked at him with disgust, as if regarding a trash collector.

But Bai Liu rubbed his nose. He was already a [poor bum].

As soon as the train began, tunnels on either side started to collapse, and furious streams of water flooded the train. Through the broken windows and gaps in the train, the water reached Bai Liu's waist in seconds.

Bai Liu, floating in the waves, was quickly grabbed by Mu Sicheng. Du Sanying, holding onto a chair, shouted over the roaring water, "Bai Liu! Zhang Gui exploded in this carriage! Stay on opposite sides of the carriage! Mu Sicheng and I have enough life left and some defensive items, we can hold it! Stay away from us!"

Bai Liu, signaling an OK with his diving mask, swam away clumsily. He still couldn't swim.

Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng stood on either side of the carriage, using protection, while Zhang Gui, caught in the middle of the carriage, wore a diving mask. His face was pale and his teeth clenched. The props Bai Liu had raided left him with only the diving mask, and he held onto a fabric with a mirror in it, waiting for the explosion.

The front and rear doors of the carriage were blocked. Zhang Gui, clever as he was, had no props, no time, and was helpless. There was nothing he could do.

It was impossible for him to escape this time.

Mu Sicheng and Du Sanying exchanged a moment of stillness—an eerie sense of déjà vu hung in the air.

Mu Sicheng had been trapped by Zhang Gui in this same way countless times. Each time, he'd crawled out battered and bruised, narrowly escaping death. He had been trapped in a carriage by Zhang Gui just a few stops earlier.

Thinking about it, Mu Sicheng suddenly wanted to laugh. Bai Liu might be a man with zero luck, but after meeting him, it didn't always seem like a bad thing?

It seemed like Bai Liu had returned all the suffering he had gone through in such a natural way, even though Mu Sicheng knew Bai Liu hadn't done it for him.

... But how could he say it? He couldn't help but feel a strange sense of pleasure.

Zhang Gui, holding the fabric with the mirror, felt it heating up. He trembled, his eyes darting in panic. He seemed to shout something underwater, gesturing desperately, but no one could hear him anymore.

Mu Sicheng squinted, trying to read Zhang Gui's lips through the diving mask. "The mirror... is... There's..."

Before Mu Sicheng could finish, the mirror in Zhang Gui's hand exploded in a violent burst of red light. Zhang Gui screamed, his grimace twisting as bubbles erupted from him, sending a shockwave through the water. Mu Sicheng instinctively shielded his eyes with his hand.

The mirror exploded.

The shockwave rocked the entire train, sending turbulent bubbles to the surface and causing waves to crash through the water. Bai Liu, cautious, had hidden behind a defensive prop he had looted, waiting until the explosion was over.

[System Alert (for all players): Player Zhang Gui has confirmed his alienation due to a zero spirit value and has exited the game.]

Mu Sicheng stood in front of a bag that had fallen to the floor. Inside was a mirror, polished as new, with only a triangle missing from the middle—the same as it was before the explosion.

It lay silently in the water. No trace of Zhang Gui's body could be found nearby. Most likely, it had been swept away by the current after the explosion.

Mu Sicheng stared at the mirror. His reflection looked strange, with the missing piece by his eye.

With only 20 pieces left, Mu Sicheng felt a strange sense of foreboding.

It was like the first time he'd met Bai Liu in this game—the feeling that bad luck was about to find him.

Burst last train

If Du Sanying had been here, he would have screamed at the top of his lungs and told everyone to run because he could feel very strongly that something was wrong with the mirror. Unfortunately, Du Sanying was still dizzy from the headbutt and hadn't arrived yet. It was probably lucky for him that he escaped unscathed.

"What was in the mirror...?" Mu Sicheng muttered. "What did Zhang Gui see in the mirror before it exploded?"

Bai Liu felt equally unlucky. He obviously didn’t know how to swim, yet every time he found himself in a water-based game, he was suddenly a water expert. He hated water and couldn’t swim, but here he was, paddling awkwardly on all fours like a dog and making his way to the carriage where Mu Sicheng was.

Mu Sicheng explained what he knew and then reminded him, "But whatever Zhang Gui wanted to say, our priority is to find the remaining twenty broken lenses. Where do you think they are?"

"It’s not likely to be on the passengers," Mu Sicheng reasoned. "Antique City is the terminal. Only passengers should be getting off, not getting on." He rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "Could it be in the station? But we came up from Antique City, so it’s not likely to be there. I didn’t see any broken lenses when I searched around."

"We've searched the train several times. It's unlikely to be on board," Mu Sicheng continued analyzing. "Could it be that another group of passengers will be boarding at Antique City later?"

Bai Liu interrupted, looking sideways at Mu Sicheng. "Do you know what Zhang Gui wanted to say to you?"

Mu Sicheng was stunned for a moment. "What did he say? What did he say about what was in the mirror?"

Bai Liu turned his head toward the mirror, his eyes darkening slightly. "There's one last monster in the mirror."

"All the broken lenses we encountered were on the monsters—the bursting passengers and the thieving brothers. The lenses were on them. We’re still missing the last monster in our book, which means we’re short of the last monster. The 20 broken lenses we’re missing are most likely on the last monster."

Mu Sicheng frowned. "Then what is the last monster? Generally speaking, monsters in games are either dead people or animals. And I remember that the dead people in the news about the bombing were either the passengers or the thief brothers. So only those two are suitable to be monsters in the game, right? Could it be the ghost in the mirror? But before, the game didn't give any clues suggesting we triggered a story mission related to the ghost in the mirror."

"No, you're missing the point. There doesn't need to be a ghost in the mirror," Bai Liu's eyes twitched slightly. "There's something else that's dead in this case—the broken mirror itself."

Mu Sicheng was stunned and snapped his head back toward the mirror. "You mean the mirror was the last monster?!"

"Right," Bai Liu bent his body and tsked at the mirror. "What Zhang Gui should be trying to tell you is that the last monster is the mirror."

"I thought something was off because the system notice for Zhang Gui quitting the game said it was due to a spirit-level clearance, which was strange. He was at the center of the explosion and only had a dozen life points, yet died because of a spirit-level clearance. I thought at the time that you had tortured him with props."

Mu Sicheng was speechless. "I'm not that free."

"But now it seems you didn't," Bai Liu looked thoughtfully at the mirror. "Then what tortured Zhang Gui to the point where his spirit value cleared was something else... like this monster mirror."

"I always thought before that the mirror had an enhancing effect on those monsters, which is why they became weaker after we took the broken lenses," Bai Liu bobbed his body in the water, his head close to the mirror to observe it more closely. "But you reminded me of the Mirror City bombing, and now I realize that this is most likely not the case. The real-life Bombing brothers were afraid of the mirror, and if the blueprint of this game is a reference to the real-life case, the lenses shouldn't have had an effect on the thief brothers, as illogical as it sounds."

Mu Sicheng clutched the hoop to prevent himself from floating away in the water. He looked at Bai Liu, confused. "Then how do you explain the fact that every time we removed the lenses, these monsters weakened against us?"

"For us..." Bai Liu's eyes grew focused as he remained silent for a minute before suddenly speaking. "Let's think of it another way. This mirror exploded into four hundred pieces inside the car, and all four hundred of those pieces happened to be in the passengers and thieves. It's strange that every single piece of the mirror ended up inside the passengers and thieves, and that it also happened to land in the key parts of their bodies that they were deliberately protecting."

"...It is indeed a bit strange," Mu Sicheng's brow furrowed further as he listened. "Why is that?"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes. "The only logical explanation is this: the debris distribution wasn't the result of an explosive ejection. These monsters are collecting broken lenses on their own—collecting them and hiding them in the most important parts of their bodies."

"Collecting them themselves?!" Mu Sicheng was a little surprised. "I thought you said they were afraid of the mirror?"

"Yes, that's why they're collecting," Bai Liu's gaze gradually sank. "There are two teams collecting broken lenses in this game: us and the passengers. We collect because we want to gather the mirror, and they collect to stop us. They are afraid of this mirror, so they don't want us to collect all the broken lenses. They try to stop us by hiding their collected broken lenses on different bodies, in the most important parts, and we're the ones who go to grab them."

"Their weakness after we took the broken lenses wasn't because the lenses gave them strength—it was because the lenses they were afraid of were now in our hands. They weakened because they were afraid of us."

Mu Sicheng was a bit shocked. "But why are these passengers and monsters doing this?"

"There's only one reason..." Bai Liu's gaze fell on the mirror. "I suspect the mirror is the reason they're in this state."

The moment he said this, the mirror under the water lit up, and a blazing flame flared up inside. Zhang Gui, who had disappeared, appeared within the mirror.

Where Zhang Gui's eyes should have been was the triangular shard gap in the mirror, making it seem like he couldn't see. He mumbled suspiciously, walking around and tapping on the mirror. "Where is this place?"

But soon, Zhang Gui had no more time to wonder, as a blaze suddenly appeared behind him and began to burn him. Zhang Gui screamed and fled, flapping at the mirror as if trying to escape, but the flames relentlessly pursued him.

— Exactly the same as the passengers.

"I was wondering before why there were so many violently burned bodies in the explosion. Explosions usually cause impact wounds, not direct burns, but all the monsters we saw—the burst passengers and the thief brothers—were in pretty typical charred corpse form," Bai Liu looked at Zhang Gui in the mirror, who was burned to a crisp, and raised an eyebrow. "Now I think I know why."

Eventually, the flames in the mirror slowly extinguished, and Zhang Gui's charred corpse disappeared. The mirror's clean, polished surface clearly reflected the contents of the train. The only difference was—a broken lens appeared on the train in the mirror.

"Looks like we've found the last broken lens," Bai Liu pondered. "Sure enough, it was on the last monster."

"Wow." Bai Liu looked at his panel, a bit surprised. He didn't panic at all when he encountered this situation. "Isn't this god-level NPC supposed to be hard to encounter? How come I've met it again?"

But Mu Sicheng's mind had completely collapsed. After checking his panel, he turned blue and white. He looked at Bai Liu with an expression twisted into a grimace and gritted his teeth, feeling as if he could not wait to darken Bai Liu. "How worthy of you with a luck value of 0."

"God ordained me to be this lucky to meet him every time," Bai Liu shrugged. "There's nothing I can do about it."

Burst last train

"Shit!" Mu Sicheng cursed as he looked at the broken lens lying on the floor, reflecting in the mirror. "How do we get this broken lens out of the mirror? Zhang Gui was burned to death in there! Do we have to go in?"

"Calm down, Mu Sicheng. Zhang Gui was burned because his alienation value was cleared by the mirror," Bai Liu responded calmly, his voice steady. "According to the rules of the game, he needs to be turned into a monster in this copy before the mirror burns him to a crisp. From this point of view, as long as we keep our spirit value from dropping to zero, we should be safe in the mirror."

As he spoke, Bai Liu removed his diving mask and took a swig of psycho-bleach. He motioned for Mu Sicheng to do the same, signaling that they should finish the drink and enter the mirror.

Bai Liu had no sense of self-preservation, but Mu Sicheng couldn't help but think, You've only got one life!

Mu Sicheng was devastated and speechless, but it was a death sentence if they didn’t pass the game. He gritted his teeth and reluctantly drank the psycho-bleach.

Bai Liu’s calmness was unshaken, but the audience in front of the small TV was falling apart.

"Holy shit, no?! Another god-level NPC and a freaking mirror to enter? This is Nightmare difficulty, right?!"

"I saw Bai Liu go into the mirror with his hands and feet cold... he only has one life left..."

"Damn, I'm not happy about this!!! Go, Willow!!! I'm charging you up! It’s the last prologue! Hold on, we can win!!!"

"Willow, hold on!!!"

Wang Shun’s face was tense, sweat dripping down. Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu had transferred all their points from the game to Bai Liu. They were so scared they closed their eyes, too afraid to look at the TV. Their expressions were filled with fear and helplessness as they whispered with their hands folded, "God bless, God bless Bai Liu! He’s fine! Nothing must happen! Good people live in peace!"

Meanwhile, Bai Liu, in the mirror, remained unaware of the anxious onlookers. He was calm, with a life progress bar that had bottomed out.

The train rumbled on, filled with chattering high school students who had just finished their evening studies and social workers swiping their phones, their heads lowered from the night shift, some snorting in tiredness.

The noise of people and the crowd getting on and off the train was familiar to Bai Liu, the mundane routine of social life. No scorched corpses, no fires, no strange symbols. If Bai Liu didn't know he was in the game, he might've thought he'd returned to reality.

He glanced at the time on the LED screen in the train carriage: Z, Y, 20XX, 10:57 PM—the last train. If this were the real scenario, the train would explode after the next stop.

The sweet voice of a female announcer came through the speakers: "Next stop, LuJiaZui, direction of the final stop—Antique City. Please sit firmly and hold on, line up by the door in turn, get off first and then get on..."

Bai Liu stood in the carriage, remembering that he and Lu Yizhan had gotten off at the LuJiaZui stop. If this was a projection of the actual scene from the train's explosion, then... Bai Liu turned his head and walked through a couple of carriages, scanning the people. Finally, he spotted himself in the middle of one of the carriages, sitting with Lu Yizhan.

Like the other social animals on the train, Bai Liu's eyes were squinting at his mobile phone, occasionally lazily yawning. He had been laid off around that time and often worked late. Bai Liu didn't quite understand why Lu Yizhan insisted on waiting for him. It seemed like a schoolboy gesture, holding hands in the toilet together —something Bai Liu had found subtly irritating back then.

Lu Yizhan and Bai Liu had grown up together, and Lu Yizhan had gotten used to taking care of him. Bai Liu, now leaning against the seat, had his head in his arms, slowly drifting to sleep.

Lu Yizhan shook his head, helpless, as he took off his trench coat and draped it over Bai Liu's shoulders. His instincts as a police officer kicked in, and after covering Bai Liu, he stood next to him, his eyes sweeping the carriage. He looked at Bai Liu, met his eyes, and then casually looked away, as though nothing had happened.

Bai Liu looked away too. His figure seemed almost projected in a ghostly, translucent form, as if he had become a non-existent copy of the real Bai Liu, who was being covered by Lu Yizhan's trench coat.

Lu Yizhan couldn’t see him.

The train soon arrived at LuJiaZui station, and the doors opened. Bai Liu remembered they had gotten off there because Lu Yizhan had received an emergency call, even though Bai Liu was supposed to transfer to the final stop, Antique City. Lu Yizhan had insisted on taking him off the train, and Bai Liu had ended up taking a detour.

But this time, "Bai Liu" didn’t get off.

Lu Yizhan received the phone call and needed to get off, but "Bai Liu" was pretending to sleep, so Lu Yizhan tried waking him, but couldn’t. Finally, Lu Yizhan left his trench coat with "Bai Liu," who pretended not to want to go with him.

"Bai Liu" stood quietly, eyes closed, while the crowd and Lu Yizhan exited. As the minutes ticked by, "Bai Liu" still hadn’t gotten off.

Erratic patches began to flicker on Bai Liu’s face, as though the data was loading incorrectly.

The sweet voice of the announcement sounded again: "The train is about to start and arrive at its final destination..."

[System player information data loading error... Checking that player Bai Liu has died... Died in an explosion, cannot enter the game... Starting player Bai Liu data deletion... Player Bai Liu game data being deleted...]

Flickering, erratic panels began to appear on Bai Liu’s body, glitching and pixelating. But Bai Liu didn’t feel any tension. Instead, he raised an eyebrow and muttered, "I can’t believe this is actually reality."

This game had generated a highly recreated scene from his memory. Bai Liu thought it was likely constructed from the player's memories, but this game was beyond anything the real world could offer. As he watched the train, exactly as he remembered it, he began to suspect another possibility.

What if this wasn’t his memory at all, but reality? The game had transported him to the scene of the original bombing, back to the train that was about to explode. There was a clear discrepancy between the scene here and his memory—Bai Liu remembered being too sleepy that day to train because of the cold.

This wasn't a scene derived from his memory. This was the last train he had been on before the explosion, and only something real could deviate so sharply from his memory.

He had been waiting for the train to start. If it had started, "Bai Liu" should have died in the explosion, and there would have been no game afterward. His appearance here was a paradox. The system had flagged it as a data error.

"Bai Liu" leaned his head against the seat, half asleep. He was really tired, but he wasn't going to stand by and watch himself die in his sleep on the last train before it exploded, even if he was just a projected data form.

Bai Liu clicked on the system panel to purchase a phone. Even though he was now in a virtual data mode, data could still influence reality through transmission.

He entered his phone number and dialed it. The call was answered immediately, and Bai Liu saw himself on the other end picking up the phone. He smirked slightly and adjusted his voice. "Hello, is this Mr. Bai Liu?"

"Yes, this is," the "Bai Liu" on the other end answered lazily. "Who's this?"

"I found Mr. Lu Yizhan's mobile phone and wallet with his ID and driver's license at the LuJiaZui underground station exit," Bai Liu lied smoothly. "Can you come pick it up?"

Lu Yizhan had just changed his phone, and it was a bit expensive. He used it with great care, but, as always, people tend to be careless and drop things, even the most treasured possessions.

A wallet and a new phone were more than enough to prompt action from Bai Liu.

"Bai Liu" paused for a moment, then stood up and walked towards the car door, stepping out just before it closed. He said softly, "Okay, stay at the exit gate, I'll come get it."

The glitchy patches on Bai Liu's face smoothed out as "Bai Liu" stepped out the door. He looked at Bai Liu on the platform through the closed door, smiling with his head down. "Thank you. I won’t move."

Burst last train

Shortly after "Bai Liu" gets off the bus, Bai Liu's body materializes from a translucent data virtualization. He squeezes his palm thoughtfully; he can now touch the passengers around him.

I don't know if the virtualization of his existence is due to the fact that two Bai Liu's are in the same time and space, or if the fact that Bai Liu is not getting off the train and is about to die has caused his body to virtualize, but none of this matters.

The next stop was Antique City, and he was still on the train, which was about to explode in three minutes at the most.

"Bai Liu--!" Mu Sicheng's voice came from the crowded other carriage as he struggled to squeeze in next to Bai Liu, his face hard as hell. "How can we find the broken lens when there are so many people here? We're almost at the station! This last train is going to explode before we get there!"

"And I just tried, I wanted to get off at that platform." Mu Sicheng's tone was strained. "But I couldn't get off, it was like I was stopped by something on this train."

Instead of closing the conversation with Mu Sicheng, Bai Liu said to him, "This is the reality, because the real [you] is not on this train, so you can't do the action of [getting off], and [the real me] has just gotten off, so there is no way for me to get off again on a train that [I] have already gotten off. I can't get off again on a train that [I] have already gotten off of, the causality is not valid, it would cause the game logic to go haywire."

"What reality?!" Mu Sicheng said alertly. "Bai Liu, this is not reality, this is in a game! You're not down, are you? Are you hallucinating? What's this nonsense about getting out of the car?"

"That's not what I meant." Bai Liu nudged Mu Sicheng's shoulder with his finger, then pointed to the underground route map on the carriage. "Look at this route map. The last stop on Antique City is LuJiaZui, not the reservoir. And pay attention, this underground route is not circular either, it's a linear underground route. This is the underground map in our real world."

Mu Sicheng followed Bai Liu's hand and noticed this too. He frowned. "But we can't go back to reality, we are indeed in a game."

Bai Liu continued, seemingly enlightened. "When I say this is [reality], I don't mean we're back in real reality, this is [reality] as opposed to the train full of charred corpses we were in before. That place isn't really a game world, that place is just a constant loop mirror world."

"And this train we're standing on now," Bai Liu nudged his toes under his feet, his eyes leveling, "is the real game relative to reality, or you could say the parallel time and space resulting from the possibilities derived from a reality that has already happened. The prototype for this game is [the Mirror City bombing], and generally, the reference prototype for our games is that we have done well enough by highly reverting the events in the game. And this game, it has the ability to do much more than recreate events."

"It recreates the event scenario." Bai Liu looked to Mu Sicheng. "It takes us back to that point in time when the explosion occurred, and then at that point, it's up to us, the players, to manipulate it. It plays out the possible scenarios based on our manipulation, which leads to different consequences."

For example, Bai Liu's first reaction to the train was to find himself and Lu Yizhan. When Bai Liu entered the Mirror World, the 380 shattered lenses automatically entered his system backpack.

Bai Liu is virtual, but the mirror is real, and Bai Liu's proximity allows the residual heat on this mirror to warm the tired "Bai Liu," thus causing him to get really sleepy and keeping him from following Lu Yizhan off the train, as Bai Liu remembers.

But Mu Sicheng wasn't concerned with any of that. He just needed to know that Bai Liu knew that this place was still in the game, and with three minutes to go before the train exploded, Mu Sicheng was so desperate that he was focused on getting through the level and grabbing the key information from Bai Liu's words.

"A world of mirrors in a constant loop?" Mu Sicheng asked eagerly but rhetorically. "What does constantly cycling mean?"

"Don't you think there's a big logical flaw in our previous mission to collect broken lenses?" Bai Liu said lazily. "We were to collect broken lenses on a last train that was about to explode, right?"

Mu Sicheng nodded. "Yes."

"But -" Bai Liu lifted his eyes and looked at Mu Sicheng with a smirk. "- if this last train hadn't exploded, where did the broken lenses from the explosion come from?"

"Unless it has exploded, we have the shattered lenses to collect after the explosion."

Mu Sicheng stalled completely for a second or two before coming back to his senses, muttering in a trance, "It's a constantly cycling last train that explodes over and over again... There's no use us collecting good shattered lenses in there, and when we're done collecting, we'll probably trap ourselves completely in that constant cycle of exploding last trains, so those passengers are thinking of ways to stop us. Grass – they're saving us silly players."

"Yes, I noticed before I got to the underground station that the lifts in the station were running in the opposite direction. And then the order of the passengers was also reversed, and even our mission was somehow 'reversed.'" Bai Liu explained clearly. "Our task was to collect the broken lenses, but in fact, the broken lenses had already been collected by [the passengers], and what we did instead was to scatter and grab the collected broken lenses again. It looked like we were doing the villain's job, and the passengers were right, which I guess is one of the properties of mirrors -- [reversing the nature of the object itself]."

"So I think the main quest in the mirror and the real main quest in this reality we're in should be reversed." Bai Liu's eyes were calm and lazy, his hand picking at the coin on his chest with a single movement. "In this reality we are in, the train hasn't exploded yet, that means the mirror is not broken at all. And the task in the mirror is to collect and piece together the mirror, so the reverse would be--"

Mu Sicheng realized something with a jolt. "We have to break the mirror!"

Bai Liu hooked his lips in a smile and snapped his fingers. "Bingo."

[System Alert: Congratulations to Player Bai Liu and Player Mu Sicheng for triggering the ultimate main quest – Break the Sinister Ghost Mirror and end the ever-looping Mirror Burst Last Train.]

[System Alert: Bai Liu has 380 broken lenses on his body. Please find the real mirror quickly and break it to clear the level.]

Mu Sicheng let out a long, fearful breath as he looked at Bai Liu, unable to resist a tsk. "You guys, even with all this brain fog?"

Three-minute countdown to explosion, one point of life, and this guy is actually in the mood to think about real-world missions. Isn't he burnt?!

"But where's the mirror?" Bai Liu is not anxious, but Mu Sicheng is. "There are six carriages on this train, and with two minutes to go, there's no way we can find every single one."

"No need to look." Bai Liu leaned unhurriedly against the door as he pointed. "I've been on this train before, and before I got off, I remembered that the pair of thieves were in this section, so I came straight over. And sure enough, they were in this section, noooo, standing in the center."

Mu Sicheng's eyes moved over to see two small and large thieving passengers standing in the crowd, pushing a huge suitcase in their hands, just big enough to put down a mirror. It should be in there, and a few people in suits standing next to them, probably museum staff. Mu Sicheng immediately realized that they were the thieving brothers. Bai Liu, a bit bemused: "Why didn't you go over there when you saw it already? Why are you standing here?"

Bai Liu spread his hands and laughed. "It's not waiting for you to steal the mirror, big thief. How do I have the skills to snatch something from another pair of thieves, which of course you have to do."

Mu Sicheng was stunned for a moment, then slowly curled his lips and snorted. "You're saving yourself a lot of trouble."

With those words, Mu Sicheng's eyes changed to a cold, frozen look as he adjusted the position of his headphones, donned his hood hat down over his eyes, and threw his right hand diagonally backward into a sharp, drawn-together monkey's paw as his form ghostly swung past the surrounding passengers.

Bai Liu didn't even see what Mu Sicheng had done before he heard the thieving brothers scream, "The mirror is gone! There are thieves!!!"

The crowd in the carriage stirred, and Bai Liu turned his head, feeling himself being lifted from the back of his collar.

Mu Sicheng flashed his knife expressionlessly and said the word "get out," and immediately the crowd shrieked and panicked as they moved out of the way and ran to the other carriages.

"Cool, Mu Sicheng, you're really not bad at doing bad things." Looking at the instantly empty carriage, Bai Liu praised sincerely.

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. "Each to his own."

Bai Liu crouched down and opened the case. Inside was the mirror, and it was intact. The moment Bai Liu put it up, he heard the system's piercing warning.

[System Warning: The moment the mirror is broken, God-level NPC will break the mirror, and all players in front of the mirror will be attacked indiscriminately. Please be careful of the broken mirror!]

The smile on Mu Sicheng's lips soon dissipated, and the only sound in the empty carriage was the wind being poured into the train and the small whimpers of passengers who were scared and crying by Mu Sicheng coming from the other carriage.

The sweet, feminine radio voice duly rang out.

"Coming to the end of the line–"

Burst last train

"You have a mermaid amulet, Mu Sicheng." Bai Liu turned his head sideways, looking at Mu Sicheng with no change in expression. "Did you bind this prop?"

Mu Sicheng blushed. "..... I bound it the first time I got it." He took out the mermaid amulet.

The face of the little white mermaid sculpture no longer resembled its previous model, but instead had the features of Mu Sicheng.

At that moment, Mu Sicheng realized what Bai Liu was trying to do—Bai Liu wanted to use the [Mermaid Amulet] prop, which would allow the player to escape instantly after breaking the mirror. However, the prop had already been bound by Mu Sicheng, so the only outcome now was clear.

"I'll break the mirror," Mu Sicheng said, taking the sculpture and taking a deep breath.

But it wasn't exactly safe. No one knew how fast the gods could kill, what their attack skills were, or whether there would be enough time for Mu Sicheng to use his prop.

"Bai Liu, you didn’t let me steal the mermaid amulet from the start just for this moment, did you?" Mu Sicheng looked both confused and bitter. "When exactly did you know the world we were in on the train was fake?"

"Well, I had an inkling when I saw that lift at the underground station running in the opposite direction and the circular underground track," Bai Liu responded honestly. "If I were to design a track in the game, I’d make it circular, probably just to loop."

Fuck, that was from the very beginning of the game! It wasn’t even on the bus yet!

Mu Sicheng felt like his mind had just snapped. That was when he realized—Bai Liu was practically a godlike NPC, a bug in the game!

Mu Sicheng closed his eyes. No matter how high the risk of death, he had no choice but to break the mirror and use the mermaid amulet to escape.

It was impossible for Bai Liu, who had only one point of life, to break the mirror himself, right?

Bai Liu clapped his hands and stood up as if nothing had happened. "I'll use the whip to break the mirror later. If the god-level NPC breaks the mirror and goes berserk, you need to use the mermaid amulet to escape."

Mu Sicheng went silent for a few seconds, then shook Bai Liu by the shoulders incoherently. "Who did you just say is going to break the mirror?!"

"Me." Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng as if he were strange. "I still need to collect the last page of the monster book, just short of the Ghost Mirror attack. I'm waiting for him to attack me."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

Mu Sicheng: "?????????"

Mu Sicheng: "?!?!?!?!?!?!?!?"

"Shit!!!" Mu Sicheng was completely stunned. All his usual methods of reasoning seemed to fail with Bai Liu, the psychopath. He looked at Bai Liu, who was now drawing the whip. "Hey, you're not really going to break the mirror yourself, are you?!"

Bai Liu gave him a sidelong glance. "Or do you want to come too?"

"Of course I don't want to come!!! But at least I have the mermaid amulet!!! How dare you be so reckless with what you have!" Mu Sicheng was furious, shaking Bai Liu in frustration. "What's wrong with you?! You only have one point of life left!"

Mu Sicheng said this as he drew a small sculpture of a pure white mermaid and flashed his "monkey claws" straight at the mirror. He chided coldly, "Alright, I'll break the mirror. You can log out as soon as it explodes and the game is over. Get the hell out of my way and find a place to hide, don't die at the end."

"Mu Sicheng, actually, for you to break the mirror is a very low-cost approach," Bai Liu's calm voice came from behind Mu Sicheng. "It's obvious that a god-level NPC will use a group attack when the mirror is broken. If I were to break it, you could still use the props to escape. But if you break it, the group attack will sweep me, and I'd probably die immediately, wasting the prop."

"It’s not cost-effective." Bai Liu judged calmly.

Mu Sicheng was becoming more and more speechless. "What the fuck is the point of talking about a good deal or a bad deal—"

"And," Bai Liu continued in his usual calm, clear voice, "Mu Sicheng, I said you were my most valuable card right now. It’s too bad if you die here. It’s just too little value for me."

Mu Sicheng fell silent as he realized... Bai Liu was serious.

He really thought it would be a waste.

Mu Sicheng turned to look at Bai Liu, his eyes filled with disbelief. Bai Liu stared back with no emotion. "Do you really want to break the mirror yourself and watch me die? Are you really a psycho?"

Bai Liu, pale and weak, smirked. "Mu Sicheng, didn’t you reject being controlled by me? So now you’re willing to die for me? Which one of us is the psycho?"

Mu Sicheng stood eerily silent—shit! That’s right! Wasn’t he being controlled? How did things get to this point?!

Oh yes, it was Bai Liu, the crazy bastard, who didn’t follow any rules at all. What kind of person controls another person to die for them?

"For the money." Bai Liu snapped his fingers, and a one-point coin suddenly appeared in his hand. He smiled abruptly. "For your residual value to me, Mu Sicheng I’m surprised you’re willing to stand in my way and help me break the mirror. That’s basically like you’re willing to die for me. But it’s a waste for you to die here."

Bai Liu lifted his eyes. "How about selling your soul to me? At least I won’t let you die for me so worthlessly. It’s the first time I’ve spent so many points on a soul. A thousand a point, eh, you’re worth at least a hundred thousand..."

Bai Liu sighed, "A hundred thousand... Should I reconsider?"

Mu Sicheng: "....."

What’s with this tone of regret after buying a luxury item on impulse? I’m not even worth $100,000 to you!

"Bai Liu," Mu Sicheng threatened expressionlessly, "If you keep fucking around, I’ll break the mirror and kill myself in front of you, costing you a hundred thousand points."

Bai Liu quickly shut his mouth.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

Mu Sicheng took the Mermaid's Amulet and moved to the front compartment, the one furthest from the mirror, as Bai Liu had instructed. Bai Liu.

A player with one point of life left and a god-level NPC about to appear—if it had been anyone else, Mu Sicheng would have assumed they were doomed.

But if it was Bai Liu...

Mu Sicheng took a deep breath, shaking off the thought. He must have been overthinking it. He had been misled by Bai Liu's strange personality—he actually thought Bai Liu would survive.

The guy who hoards his props and keeps his life under wraps? He would definitely survive.

After all, Mu Sicheng had only spent 100,000 on himself, and if Bai Liu hadn't come back to use it on him, Mu Sicheng would never have made it, even if Bai Liu, being so stingy, had become a ghost.

Shaking his head in amusement, Mu Sicheng gripped the mermaid amulet tightly, took a deep breath, and turned away.

Once Mu Sicheng was out of sight, Bai Liu, who had sold his soul to Mu Sicheng without props and pretended to be his brother, didn't hesitate to open the system panel.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu is logged into Player Muke's system panel...]

Bai Liu's face remained calm as he brought up the prop (mermaid's amulet).

A white mermaid stone sculpture fell into his hands, and Muke's mermaid amulet was unbound—just in time for Bai Liu to use it.

Bai Liu held the white fish bone whip in one hand and the sculpture in the other. He took a deep breath, exhaled slowly, and stared into the mirror, murmuring to himself, "Tawil, I hope you are as I suspect—a self-aware, intelligent wandering NPC. I hope you have more than seven seconds of memory when you're a mirror and can remember what you promised me when you were a mermaid."

Yes, Bai Liu had already investigated this god-like NPC before—Siren King, the god-like NPC of Siren Town, had told him the NPC's name was Tawil. But the original Siren Banshee's name had been Mede. Siren King had given Bai Liu a completely unrelated name. Furthermore, the previous Siren Banshee had said nothing about granting wishes to players.

This data had overwritten the original, and after learning about Tawil's self-aware behaviors, Bai Liu had come to define him as a [wandering NPC with intelligence]—an NPC with its own name, ideas, and memory, like an alternative player, moving between different games.

Bai Liu believed Tawil had his own memories, which was why he dared risk breaking the mirror.

First, Bai Liu had the mermaid amulet himself, and in essence, Mu Sicheng's broken mirror wasn't much different from his own situation.

Second, Tawil, the god-level NPC, had promised to grant him a wish. Judging from the other party's repeated emphasis on this point last time, this [wish] clearly had some weight to it.

Provided, of course, that Tawil hadn't forgotten.

Bai Liu closed his eyes, slowly adjusted his breathing, then opened them again. Gripping the bone whip tightly, he looked straight into the mirror and brought the whip down with a sharp crack.

The moment it landed, the train exploded, flames rushing like a tidal wave from the back.

The reflection of Bai Liu in the mirror shattered into a million pieces as the train whistled past, emitting a long, vibrating sound. The lenses scattered and vibrated, piecing together into a broken mirror.

In the mirror appeared a naked male figure, pale and gloomy, with a flawless torso and defined muscles. His face was adorned with fine lenses, resembling broken diamonds dotted beneath his eyes and on his smooth, perfect body.

Long, curly hair cascaded to his waist, silver and shining like mercury.

It presented itself in the shattered mirror like an artistic masterpiece.

As if awakening, he slowly opened his eyes, long eyelashes brushing the air. His pupils reflected the flames from the explosion, like flowing mirrors, emotionless.

The moment his eyes fully opened, all the windows of the train shattered, and the crowd screamed in panic. The shards of glass sliced through their throats in seconds, and blood sprayed everywhere. Mu Sicheng, at the rear of the carriage, was struck by a pile of flying lenses. As his life level hit zero, he glanced ahead, crushed his amulet with his teeth, and left the game.

[System Alert: The mirror has been broken. Player Mu Sicheng has cleared the level. Reward calculation in progress…]

Du Sanying climbed up from the flooded carriage in a daze. He looked at the train, which had come to an abrupt halt. Before he could react, everything before him shattered into pieces, crackling and scattering like a broken mirror.

[System Alert: The ghost mirror has been broken. The train in the mirror has been aborted. Players Du Sanying, Fang Ke, and Liu Huai have cleared the level. Reward calculation in progress…]

Tawil reached out, pressing his cold, bony fingers against the mirror. He looked down, slightly bored, as if awakening from a deep sleep had made him uncomfortable. He muttered, “It’s so noisy.”

The explosion paused for a moment.

Iron splashes and panicked crowds froze in midair.

Behind Bai Liu, flames surged towards him. He was surrounded by hovering, trembling shards of glass, almost enveloping him entirely. Yet, the sharp edges of the shards pointed at him, trembling slightly but not attacking. They slipped from his fingers like white sand.

Bai Liu looked at Tawil in the mirror and released a long, steady breath. He smiled, genuine warmth in his expression, “It’s been a long time, Tawil.”

Since Tawil hadn’t attacked him yet, Bai Liu grinned, “So you remember me?”

Tawil in the mirror gazed at him, long hair flowing like silvery waves.

He spoke, faintly, “It hasn’t been that long, Bai Liu. You were the last person I saw when I woke up, and it’s hard to forget you after such a short time.”

“Really?” Bai Liu chuckled softly. “Do you remember the last time you promised to grant my wish?”

Tawil paused, then spoke calmly, “Have you thought about what you want to wish for?”

“Yes,” Bai Liu smiled. “Attack me. Attack me in a way that won’t kill me, Tawil. That’s what I want.”

Tawil fell silent for a moment, then said, “I rarely see a human like you. Do you… enjoy it when I attack you?”

If Bai Liu had known that his response here would deepen Tawil’s misunderstanding, he might have taken the questions more seriously. But now, on the verge of completing the game and facing Tawil—an NPC he admired—Bai Liu relaxed and, with a smirk, couldn’t resist teasing his opponent: “Maybe I like it because you play with me? Maybe we have a special bond, and that’s why I’m like this?”

A small, confused expression appeared on Tawil’s face, but it quickly faded. He scanned Bai Liu from head to toe with an emotionless gaze. “You only have one life left. You’ll die from any of my attacks.”

Bai Liu shrugged. “That’s what you think. But that’s what I wish for.”

Tawil stared at him for a long moment, then slowly, tentatively, poked his head out of the mirror. He lowered his long, light-colored eyelashes and, with surprising gentleness, gave Bai Liu a soft bite on the lips.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has been attacked by the God-level NPC Lord of the Ghost Mirror!]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has -0.5 life value. Only 0.5 life value left. Please exit the game as soon as possible!]

“Is this okay?” Tawil asked, his voice almost a whisper, his eyelashes fluttering gently.

Bai Liu, slightly uncomfortable, turned his head, wiping the spot where Tawil had left a tooth mark. Not sure what to say, he simply nodded. “... That’ll do. Thank you.”

Last time... Tawil seemed to have kissed him in the same spot. This NPC seemed to like his lips a bit? It must have been a mistake...

Bai Liu vanished in front of Tawil like a shattered lens of light. He waved goodbye with a smile, “Thanks, Tawil. See you next time.”

Tawil lowered his eyes, caressing his lips where he had bitten Bai Liu. He whispered, “... It’s still hot.”

A warmth entirely different from the cold mirrors and frigid mermaids. Unlike the others, Bai Liu hadn’t turned into a lifeless corpse in fear and resentment, nor had he become a monster like Tawil. Instead, Bai Liu remained warm, smiling, and saying, “See you next time, Tawil!”

So strange.

So warm.

Next time they meet... what will Bai Liu think of him? Would he still speak so casually if he knew Tawil’s true nature?

“See you next time, Bai Liu,” Tawil murmured, closing his eyes where Bai Liu had disappeared.

In an instant, the mirror shattered completely. The train was engulfed in a violent explosion. The crowd screamed in panic, but Tawil remained unmoved, closing his eyes and sleeping in the shattered lenses that had been lightly kissed, waiting for the next meeting.

A lingering warmth from the lips that did not belong to him.

Chapter End Notes

This is the end of the second arc!!!

Lobby

From the moment Bai Liu enters the mirror, pointing out that this is a game reality and that the mirror is meant to be broken, the audience in front of the small TV holds its breath in silence.

When Bai Liu proposes to break the mirror himself and God Mu refuses, the audience stirs with sadness and discomfort.

"Bai Liu is really nice to God Mu; these two should be good friends, but this is a game. I still want Bai Liu to let God Mu break the mirror..."

"...I'm a God Mu fan, eh, I was annoyed with people comparing Bai Liu to God Mu. Now I just have mixed feelings... I don't want Bai Liu to die at all, but I don't want God Mu to die either..."

"I can't look at them both. I love them both, I can't accept either of them dying. Bai Liu is so good, he must have a solution, right?"

"Bai Liu has only a little bit of life left, what else can you do? Do you think he's a god? I think Mu Sicheng should go!"

When Bai Liu finally persuades Mu Sicheng to go first, Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu, who are at the back, panic. Not knowing Mu Sicheng well at all, they hope that Bai Liu can make it through. They anxiously watch as Bai Liu volunteers to die.

Some members of the audience disapprove of Bai Liu's actions, but more admire his loyalty to his friends. Bai Liu said he would not let Mu Sicheng die, so he protected him from start to finish.

"Eh, I want to cry. It's a shame. If God Mu and Bai Liu had survived, they would have been no less than the fifth or sixth best players in the overall standings."

"In fact, Mu Sicheng is very strong, just short of a helper. Otherwise, he would have climbed higher than Zhang Gui. His personal skills are very promising. He is the only player in the Rising Stars list who survived stealing against Spades. If Mu Sicheng is willing to be the knife in Bai Liu's hand, the two of them would rise in the rankings quickly."

"Stop it, actually Bai Liu and Du Sanying have a good compatibility..."

As soon as the mirror shatters and the godly NPCs emerge, it causes the audience to lose mental value, just like what happened in Siren Small Town. By the time the group of audience members dizzily comes back to their senses after being overwhelmed with mental value bleach by the system, Bai Liu's small TV goes black.

There are only two things that can happen when the screen goes black —the player has either died or passed the level.

Wang Shun bows his head somberly, and the other players follow suit, offering a silent gesture of respect for the departure of the player they liked and respected the most.

Bai Liu is unlikely to be alive.

Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu stumble and push the other players forward. The Bai Liu who had helped them take revenge was like a child to them. Still in a daze, they try to grab Bai Liu's little TV, their eyes hazy with tears.

Liu Fu barely manages to stay calm as he helps Xiang Chunhua to her feet, his own face covered in grief. Yet, he keeps his wits about him. "If Bai Liu is really in trouble like Guoguo, let's go earn points in the game and bring them back!"

The next second, the small TV lights up and the emotionless mechanical voice of the system announces:

"Congratulations to Bai Liu for unlocking all the main quests and the monster book to clear 'Last Train to Explosion'."

Since the explosion, the dead passengers have been trapped here day after day by the horrible mirror, repeating the same pain they felt for an hour before they died, screaming, wailing, hiding, and secretly hiding pieces of the mirror. But unfortunately, one day, someone stopped the last train of the mirror, which had been burned by fire, and the passengers walked out of the train smiling. Even though they were dead, they could finally arrive at the station...

Wang Shun looks up in amazement as Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu fall to their knees in shock, then cover their mouths in tears of joy.

"Alive!!! He made it through!" Xiang Chunhua shouts, her voice hoarse, breaking the overly silent atmosphere.

After a few seconds of confused and unbelievable stagnation, the audience bursts into tears and laughter.

"Shit, shit, shit!!! How did this guy survive? One point of life!!! That's a god-tier NPC! How did he pull it off?"

"Don't even think about it!!! He's alive!!! Give credit for the charge collection!!! Charge the last promotional spot!!! Hurry!!!"

"Yes, yes, yes!!! We're at the bottom of the promotion! Go Bai Liu! Comrades, we can't let this kind of player get buried! Let's go! Let's see if we can help him reach the Nightmare Rising Star promotion spot!"

"Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng are both third and fourth on the Nightmare Nova list. I looked at the other positions, and they are all filled. So, I guess it's a long shot. Bai Liu, this player's luck is really bad."

"So many Rising Star players are rushing for promotion spots now. Bai Liu is having a bit of trouble getting on Nightmare Rising Star. I don't think it's going to happen. The core audience is still too small to be noticed. It's too bad, it's clearly such a great gameplay video."

"So are we still rushing? It feels hopeless..."

The system beeped abruptly: [Player Du Sanying and player Mu Sicheng have highly recommended player Bai Liu's small TV!]

The audience is stunned, and many of them quickly react, immediately going onto the forum to see what's going on and exclaiming.

"Shit! Mu Sicheng put his recommendation screen on Bai Liu's little TV as soon as he got out of the game! Mu Sicheng went straight to the forums and said he'd give three people a free level 1 game to the player who liked Bai Liu!!!"

"Over here Du Sanying also hung up Bai Liu's little TV! Du Sanying also said in the forum that ten players who give Bai Liu a like and a favorite recommendation will get a free system prop worth 600 points!"

"Fuck!!! These two guys in the promotion are pushing hard to help Bai Liu get in position! They put Bai Liu's little TV right in the middle of the screen! They don't care if they get the promotion spot or not!"

"I'm tearing up! Is this what friendship between men is all about? Bai Liu, give me a charge!!! I won't give up on you either!!!"

"Charge!!! Bai Liu!!! You are the nightmare and the rising star!!!"

A steady stream of viewers, curious or unaware of anything, perhaps only from Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng's little TVs, made the group cry and scream with excitement at what kind of player was on that small TV screen.

But they were all aware that without this man's presence in that terrible nightmare of a game, there would have been no player to pass.

In a way, Bai Liu is a worse nightmare than a nightmare for the players who died, but also a shining star for those who survived.

"Almost there! Ahhhhhh just a little more!"

[System Alert: Player Fang Ke and player Liu Huai have highly recommended player Bai Liu's TV!]

Wang Shun let out a long breath as he looked up at Bai Liu's tiny TV, which he had initially found from the edge of the central hall, and now had to look up at the small TV that had been placed among millions of people to be admired and watched.

No player has ever made it to the Nightmare Rising Star list in two games—except for that legendary player, the number one player in the overall standings in this game, [Spades].

But Wang Shun has a feeling that this record will soon be broken by Bai Liu.

[System Alert: All data for player Bai Liu's small TV goes into final accounting...]

The audience stops charging and tapping their hands, watching Bai Liu's small TV with some trepidation, whispering.

"Aaaahhhhhh, I'm so nervous, can I rush up there!"

"We all tried our best. If we can't rush up... ooooooooooooo I'll cry a big cry next time, then I'll rush for my 6 brothers!"

"I'm not asking for much, really, just 10th on the Nightmare Rising Stars list, although I know that's asking a lot already..."

[100,007 people liked Bai Liu's TV, 126,700 people favorited Bai Liu's TV, 41,190 people charged Bai Liu's TV, player Bai Liu got 67,100 points.]

[Player Bai Liu got over 100,000 likes in one minute and gained over 60,000 points for charging! You are loved by the audience!]

[Congratulations to player Bai Liu for gaining the final promotion spot and entering second position in the Central Screen Nightmare Rising Star Chart. The views are rising rapidly...]

There was a long, frozen silence in front of the small TV as all the audience slowly, as if they couldn't believe what they had done, grew their mouths wide and then exploded into a frenzy of laughter, cheers, and screams that would have tipped the small TV section of Bai Liu over.

"ohhhhhh-!!!"

"Bai Liu is just the dopest!!!!"

"Holy crap!!! Nightmare Nova II!!!!!!"

Lobby

Central Hall Nightmare Nova screen.

It was a black TV room, designed in an inky modern-industrial style. Black curtains covered the walls, dotted with small fragments of bright silver and gold, resembling a dreamy summer night sky. But upon closer inspection, the illusion shattered—bloody handprints stained the curtains, and those delicate silver and gold fragments were not decorative at all. They were pieces of metal dentures, glued onto the fabric like grim trophies.

In this world, a Rookie was defined as a player who had played less than 52 games. A player who played once a week for a year could still be called a Rookie, and those at the top of the Nightmare Rookie rankings were the best among them.

The Nightmare Nova hall had ten screens, reserved for the day's top ten newcomers based on overall points. The competition was always fierce—players would ascend to the rankings only to be quickly pushed out again. But today, something strange was happening.

On the second, third, and fourth screens, the same small TV was displayed.

Bai Liu's.

Wang Shun rushed over, eyes widening. Bai Liu was in second place. Yet, Du Sanying in third and Mu Sicheng in fourth had also placed Bai Liu's small TV at the center of their screens. It looked as though Bai Liu alone had taken up three of the Nightmare Rising Star promotion spots. More and more viewers, drawn by the anomaly, gathered around, murmuring in confusion.

"Who's this new guy?! Taking up three screens—insane."

"It's that Bai Liu! The one who was causing a stir on the forums. You don't follow drama? A whole group of people were saying that if you ran into Zhang Gui, you'd either end up dead or become his puppet."

"I remember people cursing him back then. His first solo game earned a ridiculous number of charge points, and a lot of low-ranked players were jealous, saying he was just showing off and would get struck by lightning sooner or later. Now he's on the Nightmare Rising Star list. If this guy really is ruthless, catches a few of those haters, and kills them in-game… Well, we'll see who gets struck by lightning."

A list of Bai Liu's achievements flashed across the screens:

[Explosive Last Train – TRUE END LINE PASS] – 30,000 Bonus Points

When Bai Liu emerged from the boarding exit, he was greeted by a familiar sight—Mu Sicheng, arms crossed, leaning against the wall.

Mu Sicheng eyed him up and down, disbelief written all over his face. "I figured you had a backup plan, but seriously—how the hell did you get out of there? That was a god-tier NPC…"

Bai Liu smiled enigmatically. "Want to know?"

Mu Sicheng hesitated, then gave a small nod.

Bai Liu held out a hand. "Buy the information with points."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

"You just made over 100,000 charge points, and you're trying to scam me for money?" Mu Sicheng scowled. "You're obsessed with profit."

Bai Liu's smile grew warmer. "You only have one Black Thief's Finger, right? It's a rare thief item, very useful. Wouldn't you like to complete the set?"

"I have one, too." Bai Liu looked at him innocently.

Mu Sicheng: "....."

"How much do you want?" he asked, resigned.

Bai Liu's smile was all too pleasant. "The remaining 320 mirror pieces."

"...I only have 80 shattered lenses," Mu Sicheng pointed out. Then, realization dawned. His eyes widened. “Wait. Shit, you’re planning to make me collect the rest for you?! Why the hell would I do that?!”

Bai Liu replied smoothly, “You were going to collect your Black Thief’s Fingers anyway. Why not pick up my pieces while you’re at it?”

Mu Sicheng let out a humorless laugh. “You do realize that Fang Ke and Liu Huai are guild players, right? They have to hand over rare items to the King’s Guild. Thief’s Black Finger is a strong personal item, so they might be allowed to keep it. But those shattered lenses? Those are different. They have god-tier NPC attributes. The system can’t even calculate their effects. The last item with similar properties —your whip—was ridiculously overpowered. And now you want the lenses, too?”

He crossed his arms. “The King’s Guild is definitely going to try to collect all the shattered lenses.”

Bai Liu mused, “And how exactly do they plan to take ours?”

Mu Sicheng raised three fingers.

“Three ways: 1. Buy them—like they did with Du Sanying. He sold his for 60,000 points.”

Bai Liu sighed. “Sounds about right. He avoids anything that brings bad luck.”

“2. Steal them—which, let’s be honest, only you have ever tried on me.”

“3.” Mu Sicheng’s smirk widened. “The simplest, most effective method—kill you in-game and take them.”

Bai Liu chuckled. “And yet, you didn’t sell yours to them. Seems like you’re ready to be hunted down with me.”

Mu Sicheng huffed, looking away before punching Bai Liu lightly in the arm.

[System Alert: Player Mu Sicheng gave Player Bai Liu 80 shattered lenses.]

“Alright,” Mu Sicheng muttered, a strange glint in his eye. “What should we name our group?”

Bai Liu tilted his head. “Rangers and Monkeys.”

Mu Sicheng sputtered. “What the hell?! Are you calling me a monkey?!”

Little did he know, that name would soon strike terror into countless players.

Reality

Not long after Bai Liu left the game, he was walking and talking with Mu Sicheng.

"What's this panel attribute point?" Bai Liu asked, pointing at the reward in his Bursting Last Train bonus. "Does this mean I can distribute it freely to boost my panel attributes?"

"Yes and no," Mu Sicheng replied simply. "A player's rating in this game is based on four attributes: Strength, Agility—also called Speed—Attack, and Resistance. The attribute points you gain can only be allocated to these four."

Bai Liu pondered this. "I didn't get any attribute points in my last game."

Mu Sicheng rolled his eyes. "That's because it's an extra reward from the system. Last time, you already got a [Personal Skill] as your extra reward for the newbie single-player game. Now you want an attribute point, too? You're really greedy. These points are rare—even a level two game only rewards 100 points. The system is stingy. And it's not like you can keep stacking them indefinitely. Once you reach your potential limit, your panel attributes won't increase no matter how many points you have."

"But," Mu Sicheng hesitated slightly before continuing, "most people don't live long enough to reach their potential limit. For players who aren't backed by a large guild or aren't extremely skilled, even surviving long enough to accumulate attribute points is difficult. There is a faster way to gain them, but very few people use it."

Bai Liu glanced at him. "What way?"

"Competing in the leagues," Mu Sicheng whispered. "That's how Spades became an S-rank and beyond. The leagues award high attribute points to winning players."

Before Mu Sicheng could say more, several colorful virtual fireworks suddenly exploded in the game lobby. They formed glowing words that immediately attracted the attention of passing players.

[Breaking news! Breaking news! The annual Horror Game League is here! Don't miss out—it's the biggest event of the year for all gamers!]

Players murmured among themselves at the sight.

"Wow, which guild is rich enough to start buying system fireworks for advertisements this early?"

"The support season officially starts this week. All the major guilds are going to start pushing their players like crazy. Last time, the King's Guild spent 10 million points on advertising and nearly bankrupted themselves..."

As the virtual fireworks landed on players, their system panels automatically popped up, displaying a grand promotional screen for the tournament.

[System Event – Horror Game League is about to begin!]

[Players can choose their participation status: League Player or Spectator.]

[As a League Player, you must battle against others in the field, regardless of life or death. As a Spectator, you can enjoy thrilling matches, support your favorite teams and players, and send in cheers.]

[This is a game of life and desire. Have you chosen your place? Will you be a reckless participant chasing victory, or a calm spectator watching from above?]

[Entry Requirements: Players must form a team of 5, with each member having played at least 52 games.]

[Format: Each matchup consists of a Team Match, a Pairs Match, and a Singles Match. The team with the highest combined score advances to the next round.]

(Note: If a player dies during the tournament, they can be replaced by a new member.)

There were also various other details, such as the system shop being disabled for tournament participants.

Fireworks fell on Bai Liu as well, triggering the same system notification on his screen. He skimmed through the information—it felt a lot like a real-life e-sports competition.

Bai Liu wasn't particularly interested. After all, this was a horror game, not a competitive fighting game.

What did surprise him was that such a league even existed. Mu Sicheng, however, seemed completely unsurprised. He clicked his tongue, closed the system notification, and grumbled, "Ugh, here we go again. The guilds and the system are going to start spamming ads everywhere. Support season is really starting."

"Support season?" Bai Liu turned to him. "What does that mean? Is this the league you were talking about, the one with high panel attribute point rewards?"

Mu Sicheng nodded impatiently. "Yeah. Just scroll down, and you'll see—it's all promotional spam. Viral marketing everywhere."

Bai Liu scrolled further down the system page and, as Mu Sicheng said, it was filled with various guild and player promotions. Team posters, individual player posters—each accompanied by a "like" and "charge" button. The rankings were determined by the total number of likes and charges received.

The top-ranking solo player's poster featured a man in profile, with long bangs covering his eyes.

His lips were pale, his jawline sharp. A long black whip coiled around his cold, slender wrist, its handle gripped lightly in his hand. His head was slightly tilted upward, his slanted eyes half-lidded, exuding a chilling arrogance.

Even though Bai Liu wasn't particularly perceptive about human beauty, he could tell that this man's features were striking—artistic, even.

If Tawil was like the ethereal glow of the moon, then Spades was an unsheathed blade—sharp, dangerous. Looking at him for too long would leave you cut.

Bai Liu clicked on his profile.

[Player: Spades]

[Current combined support value: 1.3 million – Ranked #1 among all participants. Unlocking reward: Death-Free Gold Medal.]

(Note: Players with high system popularity are granted a one-time death exemption during matches. When in a near-death state, they will be forcibly removed from the game and placed under system protection.)

[Total Points Ranking: #1]
[Affiliated Guild: Killer Sequence]

Bai Liu scrolled down to the second-ranked player. Compared to Spades' casual street-shot poster, this one was highly stylized—clearly retouched by a professional team.

It featured a woman in a dazzling red cheongsam, with snow-white skin and cascading black curls. Her almond-shaped eyes and red lips exuded sultry charm. A small heart symbol was tattooed under her right eye. She sat with her legs crossed, wearing satin black high heels and sheer stockings, lazily shuffling a deck of cards.

Her expression was languid, seductive, radiating a magnetic allure. Even through the screen, she gave off an intoxicatingly decadent aura.

Bai Liu recognized the name beneath her image.

[Player: Hearts Queen]

[Current combined support value: 970,000 – Ranked #2 among all participants. Unlocking reward: Death-Free Gold Medal.]

[Total Points Ranking: #2]
[Affiliated Guild: King's Crown]

.....

As Bai Liu watched, Mu Sicheng explained, "In this game, every year after August, there's a gaming league. Players can form their own teams to participate. Of course, for ordinary players, it's just a death sentence. The league belongs to the big guilds. They have deep resources, and in order to promote their participating players, they set off fireworks in the game and pull all kinds of stunts. We call it the 'support season.'"

"The guilds also raid the game to stock up on props, preparing and boosting the attributes of their competing players."

"All this scavenging and promotion is annoying. For players like me, who don’t care about the league, it makes it harder to even get the props I actually need," Mu Sicheng complained. "This year, I heard the Puppet Master was supposed to be a reserve for the King's Guild team. That's why they invested so much in training him. He himself was raiding like crazy for new puppets. I didn't expect him to die at your hands. Now they'll have to replace him."

"The King's Guild has big ambitions this year. They also recruited a newcomer called 'Little Witch'—her personal skill restores HP, which is extremely rare in the game. All the major guilds were fighting over her, but the King's Guild managed to snatch her up. She was even ranked first on the Rising Star list."

"I heard they were planning to use the Puppet Master's control skill alongside Little Witch's healing ability to form a rather strange tactic, and they were already practicing it. But now that Zhang Gui got eliminated by you, they'll have to change their strategy."

At this, Mu Sicheng let out a gloating snort.

Bai Liu glanced at the promotional panel showcasing different teams and players. After pondering for a moment, he asked, "I've always found it odd—why is the audience's bounty in a life-or-death game like this so insanely high? Just the first-tier charge alone adds up to 1.5 million. And there's even an esports-style competitive event?"

"The audience members are just regular players too. Isn't it strange for them to be so entertained by something where real lives are at stake?"

Mu Sicheng swiped at his system panel and handed it to Bai Liu. "Because what they're doing isn't just charging points—it's betting. The players only receive 10% of it, the system takes 5%, and the rest goes into the gambling pool."

[System Reminder: 85% of the charge points wagered on a player before a match will enter the gambling system. If that player wins, the spectators who bet on them will receive the loser's charge points.]

[A little gambling is good for the soul, but excessive gambling is harmful to the body. Please charge responsibly and bet in moderation.]

"1.5 million is nothing," Mu Sicheng said. "You didn't see last year's finals—both sides charged up to a hundred million in points. And this is just the start of the support season. The numbers will keep going up."

"Most of the time, spectators only throw pocket change at players like us to train and develop newcomers."

"One hundred million charge points…" Bai Liu's mind veered off track. He did some quick calculations. Even if the winning player only got 10%, that was still ten million points…

Ten million points. Ten million points. Ten million points… Bai Liu's gaze deepened.

Mu Sicheng continued cluelessly, "The champion's prize is 100 million points—both for solo and team divisions. There's also an attribute point reward for first place in the group tournament, but it varies from year to year. Between the prize money and the charge draw profits, the total earnings are astronomical. That's why guilds fight tooth and nail to prepare for the season."

Bai Liu's fingers hovered over his system panel for five seconds. His eyes froze on the words [100 million points each] for a long moment before he took a deep, steady breath and swiftly flipped to the registration screen he had skimmed earlier.

Screw the story game experience. He wanted in. He had to get in.

At that moment, Bai Liu's mind was filled with nothing but that 100 million points. It was no exaggeration to say that his eyes had transformed into gleaming coins at the thought. He scrolled quickly to the registration screen:

[Registration Deadline: 2 months : 1 day : 7 hours : 34 minutes]

[Entry requirements not met: 50 game copies, 4 teammates]

Not even close.

Bai Liu cooled down slightly and thought rationally. He had only 61 days left and needed to clear 50 game copies. That meant completing at least one game per day—faster than real-world time. Even if time inside the game flowed differently, playing one game per day was a massive strain. Honestly, the game already took a significant toll on him; otherwise, he wouldn't need so much sleep after every session.

But then his eyes flicked back to the 100 million point reward.

Mu Sicheng was still rambling, "But this has nothing to do with us newcomers this year. You need to clear 52 copies to qualify. I usually finish one per week, and even now, I've only done 26. With just two months left, there's no way to hit that number…"

As he spoke, Mu Sicheng met Bai Liu's gaze.

He shuddered and instinctively took two steps back. "Bai Liu… why are you looking at me like that?"

Bai Liu smiled. "Pulling all-nighters to grind games, my friend? Fifty games in two months?"

Mu Sicheng: "?????"

Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu logged out together—from Bai Liu's place.

Mu Sicheng had wanted to contact Bai Liu offline, but the game didn't allow direct conversations about personal real-world information, like addresses or phone numbers. Just as it blocked in-game discussions outside the game, any attempt to mention things like WeChat or QQ numbers would be censored. The fastest way to meet up was simply to log out from the same player's logout point.

Each player's logout was a 12-digit code, similar to a password. Entering it upon logout would transport the player to the corresponding location.

By default, the logout code was set to the player's initial login location. Since Bai Liu had first logged in from his rented apartment, the game generated a logout code linked to his home.

Mu Sicheng, still a university student, had logged in from his dormitory. If Bai Liu had logged out there, he'd have been arrested on the spot. So they chose Bai Liu's small, rented room instead.

As soon as they logged out, Mu Sicheng groaned, "Bai Liu, listen to me—don't do it. You don't have enough entries. How are we supposed to compete with just the two of us—"

He abruptly stopped mid-sentence, eyes widening in shock at the sight of the delicate boy sleeping on Bai Liu's bed.

Tear-streaked and exhausted, Muke lay curled up, his face marked by dried tears. Red welts were visible on his wrists and ankles, like he'd been bound or whipped.

Mu Sicheng stiffened. "...What the hell?"

Bai Liu didn't even spare Muke a second glance. He walked past the bed indifferently and casually remarked, "We have three. He's competing too."

"?????" Mu Sicheng's expression was full of question marks. "Wait, Bai Liu, are you serious? Who even is this guy?"

It wasn't that Mu Sicheng didn't recognize Muke. He just never expected the rookie from Bai Liu's last game to show up like this—in Bai Liu's bed.

Bai Liu turned his head and answered calmly, "Muke. The new player I brought out last time. I'll be taking him along to grind."

Mu Sicheng gaped at him. "Bai Liu, you're a lunatic! You might be able to grind 50 copies, but Muke's a newbie! Do you even know what it means for a player to exit a game with physical injuries? You and I came out unscathed."

Bai Liu adjusted his tie, his gaze shifting toward the marks on Muke's wrists before settling back on Mu Sicheng. "Under what conditions does a player retain injuries upon exiting?"

Mu Sicheng leaned back lazily in his chair. "Only when a player is under extreme fear—like when their mental value drops below 10. At that point, they can no longer distinguish the game from reality. They genuinely believe they're injured, so the game lets them carry the wounds out."

He gestured toward Muke and raised an eyebrow. "And you want to take him into the competition?"

Mu Sicheng looked at the fragile boy lying on the bed—Muke—with clear disapproval before turning his sharp gaze to Bai Liu, who, despite his composed demeanor, also appeared physically delicate.

"A player coming out of a game with injuries only means their mental state is weak and their panel potential is low," Mu Sicheng said, raising an eyebrow. "If I remember correctly, Muke doesn't even have a personal skill, right? Are you seriously taking him to the tournament? That's no different from feeding him to the competition."

Bai Liu didn't miss a beat. He looked up at Mu Sicheng and replied evenly, "In a way, I only got through Burst Last Train because of him."

In the end, Bai Liu had relied on Muke's [Mermaid's Amulet] as a trump card to face the god-ranked NPCs. It was also because of that same amulet that Mu Sicheng had been drawn into the game.

By Mu Sicheng's own words, for Muke to leave the game with injuries, he must have reached a state of extreme fear and desperation in his own copy.

And yet, he hadn't used the Mermaid's Amulet to save himself.

Despite being so terrified that he could no longer distinguish reality from the game, Muke had held onto his most precious survival item and instead made the effort to escape with it intact—simply because Bai Liu had mentioned before entering the game that he might need it.

It was the same choice Mu Sicheng had made in Burst Last Train.

"You and he hold the same value in my heart, Mu Sicheng." Bai Liu's voice was calm, his gaze unwavering. "Because in your most desperate moments, you both kept your word to me. I respect that—and for that very reason, I cannot break my word to you either. I told him that if he could make it out on his own this time, I would train him and make sure he survives."

Bai Liu's eyes lowered briefly to Muke's bruised form on the bed. "Just as I wouldn't abandon you, I won't abandon him either."

His voice was quiet, but firm. "Because you've both proven your worth to me."

Bai Liu turned around and continued knotting his tie, but Mu Sicheng was stunned.

While the two men were talking, Muke woke up with a cry, sweating and twitching. His arms and legs jerked as he sat up, shaking uncontrollably, clutching Bai Liu's white shirt in his hands. His eyes were unfocused, his breath came in gasps, and tears streamed down his face—he had yet to fully escape the nightmare.

Bai Liu whispered his name. "Muke, you're alive. Calm down."

Muke's unfocused eyes slowly regained clarity as he stared at Bai Liu. Tears pooled in his reddened eyes before he finally released the white shirt he had been clutching.

"Bai Liu—oooh, Bai Liu!" Muke bawled, his voice raw with overwhelming fear. Only the sight of Bai Liu grounded him. His hand clutched at the corner of Bai Liu’s suit hem, his gaze filled with disbelief as fresh tears poured from his eyes.

His voice was hoarse. "I thought I was going to die in that school! They were going to strangle me!"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and said quietly, "But you didn’t. You did well, and you survived. It’s all over now, Muke."

Muke couldn't stop crying. His chest heaved with sobs, hiccups breaking through as he lifted his tear-streaked face toward Bai Liu. His voice was small, cautious. "I passed the game on my own like you said. That means I’m qualified, right? You’ll let me survive as long as I can in the game, right?"

"I will do my best to train you so you can grow strong enough to survive on your own," Bai Liu replied readily. Then, his tone turned much colder. "But if you only think of relying on me and become more and more worthless, I will cut my losses very quickly. Do you understand, Muke? I don’t waste energy on things that don’t pay off."

Muke nodded frantically, still sniffling, his pretty eyes shimmering with tears—like a child desperate for approval. "I will! I promise I will, Bai Liu!"

"I want to start the next game by having you follow me." Bai Liu stood up, handing Muke a piece of toilet paper as he squinted at him. "If you follow me, we'll have to clear fifty copies in sixty days. I want to take you to the league, but at the same time, I need you to grow up quickly."

Muke looked up in shock as he took the toilet paper.

Bai Liu gazed down at him, his expression unreadable. "Can you do that? If you can't, I'll arrange another route for your training. You don't have to follow me."

Before Bai Liu could finish his sentence, Muke bit his lower lip, gripping the toilet paper tightly. His voice wavered, his thin shoulders trembling. "You need me to do this, don't you? Then… I can do it."

"Are you sure?" Bai Liu's voice was flat. "Muke, I expect the person I'm speaking with to look at me. Keep your head up."

Slowly, shakily, Muke raised his head. Bai Liu saw the expression he had been trying to hide.

The young master with a heart condition sat on Bai Liu's bed, his eyes red-rimmed, his hands clenched into fists on his knees. His whole body trembled as he gazed up at Bai Liu with something pitiful in his posture.

To a casual observer, the crying boy would appear delicate and vulnerable—someone who could soften anyone's heart.

Bai Liu, however, remained unmoved. "Answer me once you've thought it through."

"Follow me to the league, or become a strong front-line player with my help. Either path will let you survive. Which do you choose?"

His gaze sharpened as he studied Muke. "You'll grow faster with me. From both my personal needs and your ability development, my advice is to follow me first—build up your stats and aim for the league. If you can't keep up, you can support me in other ways. The league is full of strong players, and you're just a backup option for me. Simply put, you're here to make up the numbers."

Bai Liu extended his hand toward Muke. He waited quietly for his answer.

Muke knew about the league—he had seen the fireworks and system notifications after leaving the game. But he had logged out immediately, too shaken to linger.

Any newcomer would want to escape as soon as possible. Only someone as insane as Bai Liu would stay behind to gather information.

Muke wasn't mentally strong enough to remain calm after a near-death experience. That overwhelming sense of helplessness reminded him of drowning in Siren Town—except this time, there had been no Bai Liu reaching out to save him.

The world without Bai Liu was terrifying.

Bai Liu had saved him before, crossing the system's barriers to do so. The impact of that moment was strong. Now, after another brush with death, Muke's subconscious sought safety—leading him to Bai Liu's house in a trance-like state.

The league was a nightmare waiting to happen. A new player like him would be in for a rough time.

Muke blinked, heart pounding, his breath quickening. His tear-streaked lashes lowered as he stared at Bai Liu's outstretched hand.

He knew Bai Liu wasn't a kind person.

The first time Bai Liu had saved him, it had been for the mermaid's amulet—an object Bai Liu had already used.

Bai Liu wasn't good, but he always kept his word.

Muke tilted his head, eyes wary, like a small animal testing its surroundings. "If I follow you, will you promise to try to keep me alive?"

Bai Liu's voice was steady. "I promise."

Muke exhaled shakily. That was enough.

No matter how desperate the situation, Bai Liu never broke a promise.

Even if joining the league sounded like a death sentence, he knew Bai Liu would not abandon him.

"Then… I'll go with you." Muke placed his hand in Bai Liu's. His voice was small, nasal, still thick with tears. "I don't want to play the game alone."

Bai Liu gave his hand a brief shake before letting go. His tone softened. "Okay. I understand."

But soon, the false gentleness—used to coax cooperation—disappeared. Bai Liu got straight to business.

"When will you be ready?" he asked. "The next time we go in, we likely won't be coming out for a while."

Muke hesitated.

"You look like you need a good rest," Bai Liu continued. "We'll probably be gone for two months or more. You should also talk to the people around you."

He paused, then added, "But we don't have much time. The most I can give you is a day to prepare. Can you manage that?"

Muke's lips trembled. The intensity of the schedule overwhelmed him. But under Bai Liu's calm gaze, he forced himself to respond.

"…Okay."

"Then go home, Muke." Bai Liu picked up his phone, calling Muke's supervisor. He glanced at Muke as he spoke. "I'll have him pick you up. You have my address and number. Call me tomorrow when you're ready. Will you come over yourself, or do you need me to pick you up?"

Muke hesitated, then asked carefully, "Can I… just come to you?"

"That's fine," Bai Liu said indifferently.

Bai Liu called his boss, who arrived soon afterward. This was the second time he had come to pick up Muke from Bai Liu's small rented house, so he was familiar with the place. But when he stepped inside and saw Muke sitting on the bed with red eyes, he couldn't help but twist his face a little.

The poor young master still had bruises on his hands and feet, as if he had been bound by something—scars from the game.

But that wasn't what stunned his boss the most. What shocked him was the sight of a tired yet oddly superior-looking male student sleeping on Bai Liu's desk. Mu Sicheng had dozed off while waiting for Bai Liu to finish negotiating with Muke, still wearing a shirt with their university logo on it. To make matters even stranger, Mu Sicheng had Bai Liu's jacket draped over his shoulders. He was sleeping soundly, exhaustion evident in his posture, and had a black eye.

The supervisor's gaze darted to Bai Liu, whose face remained calm despite the faint bruise under his own eye. His expression twisted further—how many men had this bastard played with in one night?!

Bai Liu turned his head, meeting his boss's look of absolute information overload. But since Bai Liu had never been one to concern himself with reading his boss's mind, he simply led Muke away as if he hadn't noticed a thing.

Muke followed his boss three steps behind, his mind utterly distracted. What he had just witnessed was too overwhelming. He couldn't suppress his gossipy curiosity.

After leaving Bai Liu's small rented house, the supervisor coughed twice before casually asking, "Muke, that guy in Bai Liu's room just now—he looks like a university student. What's his relationship with Bai Liu?"

"Oh, that guy." Muke's tone turned a little mixed, a little sour.

Muke knew Mu Sicheng—he was ranked fourth in the Rising Star Rankings, a powerful player. More importantly, Mu Sicheng was obviously more useful than him. Bai Liu clearly regarded him differently, treating him with a familiarity and ease that Muke had never experienced.

Even earlier, after Mu Sicheng had fallen asleep, Bai Liu had carefully placed his jacket over him and even lowered his voice, as if afraid to disturb him.

…That was a consideration Bai Liu had never shown to Muke.

As a young master, Muke was always given special treatment by others. Bai Liu's initially indifferent and somewhat dismissive attitude had already been noticeable, but seeing the stark difference in how Bai Liu treated Mu Sicheng made Muke feel bitter.

He huffed indignantly. "Him? He's just a playmate of Bai Liu's, like me! One day, I'll surpass him as Bai Liu's sidekick! I'll make Bai Liu enjoy playing games with me even more! Starting tomorrow, I'm going to play games with Bai Liu every single day! There's no way he can beat me!"

"……"

The supervisor listened in silence, his expression wooden. Internally, he was in shock.

Is it really this competitive between you M's? Even 'playing games' is a contest?!

And young master, you really don't have to work so hard! Can your body even handle 'playing games' with Bai Liu every day?!

"…Take care of your health too. Don't overdo it," the supervisor coughed awkwardly, his expression complicated. "Playing that… whatever… it hurts. You should rest more."

"No," Muke said sulkily, still a little dazed. "Bai Liu gave me a task for the next two months—I have to play with him fifty times in two months. And we have to play with five people. I don't think I can handle it physically, and I haven't even played with the others yet… Bai Liu only gave me half a day off before we start…"

The supervisor was completely stunned.

"……"

Bai Liu, this mission of yours is absolutely outrageous! Fifty 'games' in two months?! And it's a multiplayer sport, my ass!

He doesn't even let Muke take a proper break from work, but now he expects him to work overtime for multiplayer sessions?!

A sobering realization struck the supervisor—Bai Liu was running a full 996 system.

Chapter End Notes

> The 996 working hour system is a work schedule practiced illegally by some companies in China. It derives its name from its requirement that employees work from 9:00 am to 9:00 pm, 6 days per week; i.e. 72 hours per week, 12 hours per day.

Reality

Mu Sicheng was already awake by the time Muke's boss picked him up.

He leaned lazily against the back of Bai Liu's chair, the jacket Bai Liu had given him draped over his shoulder. He quickly realized that Bai Liu's determination to take part in the game was unwavering. Considering Bai Liu's style of play, Mu Sicheng knew his heart couldn't be easily shaken.

Mu Sicheng watched from the sidelines as Bai Liu lured Muke onto the boat of thieves, but he didn't bother sleeping. Once he understood that Bai Liu wouldn't be swayed, all Mu Sicheng could do was tell him—seriously—that he wasn't going to mess around and participate in this extremely dangerous league.

But the jacket Bai Liu had given him softened his tone. "What, did you get that little beauty to come aboard?"

"You're calling Muke 'little beauty.' Are you gay?" Bai Liu glanced at him. "Is Muke your type?"

Mu Sicheng choked instantly. "I'm straight!!! Can't you recognize a joke?!"

Bai Liu nodded casually. "Got it. Judging by your face, you have something to say to me?"

Before Mu Sicheng could open his mouth, Bai Liu found a bench and sat down opposite him.

Bai Liu's posture was relaxed, but he still managed to exude an oppressive presence that made Mu Sicheng go from slouching in Bai Liu's reclining chair to sitting up straight.

Bai Liu looked at him blandly. "Let me guess. You want to tell me that you're definitely not going to be part of this gaming thing with us."

He leaned back on his desk, tapping his fingers lightly. "Can you give me a reason that'll convince me? Why don't you want to join the league?"

"High death rate, high risk, not enough people, not enough copies," Bai Liu listed off effortlessly before looking up at him. "I can take care of all that. You just have to participate. Do you have any other concerns?"

Mu Sicheng nearly laughed at Bai Liu's calm, relaxed demeanor.

If this had been before their last game, he might have been fooled by Bai Liu's illusion of having everything under control. But now, Mu Sicheng knew better. After one game, he had become more aware of Bai Liu's true nature—he was a gambler.

Even if the odds of success were low, Bai Liu was the kind of person who would still take the risk as long as the potential return was high enough.

"Those are my main concerns." Mu Sicheng's tone was uncharacteristically serious. "Bai Liu, the league is no joke. The mortality rate is insanely high. You don't have to throw away your real life for this game. Sure, it gives you a lot, but with your skill, you could totally earn points slowly. It's safer that way. Besides, in the real world, you need some kind of backup plan—"

"The real world?" Bai Liu repeated the phrase, as if savoring the words. He waited patiently for Mu Sicheng to finish his heartfelt persuasion before suddenly asking, "What did you think of Muke's last solo game clearance?"

Mu Sicheng was caught off guard. He hadn't expected Bai Liu to bring that up. But Bai Liu had just talked to Muke about it, and Mu Sicheng —too sleepy at the time—had overheard part of it.

Muke's last clearance was Day of Leaving School, a single-player horror game set in a Japanese high school.

The game itself wasn't what caught Mu Sicheng's attention—it was something else.

Muke had mentioned that the school in the game was based on the private high school he had attended in Japan, which was infamous for being haunted. A girl had jumped to her death there, and afterward, students kept dying under mysterious circumstances.

Everyone in Muke's dormitory had died in bizarre ways—except for him. That was why he had confused the game with reality and emerged injured. The game's high school was an exact replica of the one he had once attended.

It was eerily similar to something Bai Liu and his team had experienced—The Exploding Last Train was based on a real exploding last train that Bai Liu had mistakenly boarded.

Mu Sicheng was silent for two seconds. "...I don't think it's just a coincidence that two games in a row have real-life counterparts."

"That's right. I feel the same way."

"So, I think there are three possible explanations." Bai Liu pulled out a piece of paper.

He had always recorded his thoughts as they came to him—especially now, since he was certain their memories could be tampered with at will.

Since writing detailed information would result in [banned] text disappearing, Bai Liu simply wrote down a few key words. He turned the paper toward Mu Sicheng and explained in a smooth, unhurried tone.

"I believe many of the games in this system are based on real events. Some people recognize the references, while others don't. For example, you and I both know about the Mirror City bombing because we were there, but Zhang Gui doesn't. Similarly, Muke knows about his haunted Japanese high school, but you and I didn't."

"But the question is—how were these real-life events chosen as game prototypes?"

Bai Liu wrote [Scene Selection] on the paper.

"The first possibility is that the game randomly selects real-life events as horror game templates. But considering the Mirror City bombing and that haunted school, the game clearly has a tendency to pick tragic and terrifying cases. So, random selection is unlikely. Pass."

He wrote [Inspiration] and continued.

"The second possibility is that the game selects tragic and supernatural locations that the player has experienced. We already know that the game can erase people's memories. If it can read memories too, then it could take inspiration from a player's experiences and design games based on them."

"This would make it easier for players to immerse themselves in the horror setting. For example, in The Exploding Last Train, the train's layout matched my memories exactly. That level of realism is difficult to achieve unless the game is pulling from actual memories."

Mu Sicheng, deep in thought, tapped his index finger against his arm. "That sounds plausible. I think I lean toward that explanation. What about the third one?"

"There's a huge flaw in that theory—the timeline doesn't match up." Bai Liu's gaze locked onto Mu Sicheng. "Do you remember when The Exploding Last Train existed?"

Mu Sicheng frowned, thinking back. "...A while ago, right? It was there when I first entered."

Bai Liu calmly reminded him, "But the Mirror City bombing happened this year. Meaning, The Exploding Last Train was released before the bombing even occurred. Mu Sicheng, do you understand what that means?"

Mu Sicheng's face slowly changed as he grasped the implication. He turned to Bai Liu, who continued in the same smooth tone.

"It means we got the reference backward. The Exploding Last Train didn't take inspiration from the Mirror City bombing. Instead—" Bai Liu tapped the paper. "—the Mirror City bombing took inspiration from The Exploding Last Train."

He wrote [Test Phase] on the page.

Mu Sicheng felt as if ice water had been poured over his head. Stiffly, he stared at the words Bai Liu had written, the chill creeping up his spine. He understood, but he still retorted in disbelief, "That's impossible—!"

To put it in in-game terms, Mu Sicheng's sanity level had dropped below the safety line.

Bai Liu remained unbothered. "At the end of a game's development, a public beta is released—a limited test phase before full release. Only when the test phase is deemed successful is the game made official and released to everyone."

"The third possibility is that our world and this game are in a public beta and full release stage, respectively."

Bai Liu looked at Mu Sicheng, his gaze devoid of emotion.

"If that's the case, then Mu Sicheng—the 'real life' you're clinging to is no different from surviving in the game."

"So tell me—why refuse to compete for a life that is, in the end, just another game?"

Reality

After Bai Liu finished his three guesses, he set his pen down and rolled it across the table. It spun twice before landing in Mu Sicheng's expressionless hands.

Bai Liu remained unbothered, as if he hadn't just said something extraordinary. Finally, he looked at Mu Sicheng's numb expression and added sincerely, "Of course, this is just my personal opinion. I could be wrong."

A long silence settled over the small rented room. The only movement was the occasional breeze slipping through Bai Liu's fingertips, rustling the paper where he had written the world's truth.

It was the height of summer. Sunlight poured through the window behind Bai Liu, drenching the room in midday brilliance. Outside, the sounds of cicadas and honking cars formed a chaotic symphony of life.

Yet, in an instant, all those vivid sights and sounds faded to black and white in Mu Sicheng's world. Just like Bai Liu, who sat at his desk, watching him intently against the light—his figure receding into curling, data-driven lines, vanishing between the gaps of Mu Sicheng's blinking eyes.

The moment Bai Liu put down his pen, Mu Sicheng's ears rang. For a few seconds, it felt as if he wasn't even breathing.

Reality... is a game?

The promised land he had struggled to protect from his own corrupt desires—was nothing more than a game?

Mu Sicheng slumped back in his chair, resting one hand over his eyes while the other hung limp at his side. He stayed like that for a long time, silent.

Bai Liu didn't interrupt him.

Eventually, Mu Sicheng let out a short, sarcastic snort. "Bai Liu, are you just making up this horrifying story to get me to join your league? It's a lie, right? It's not true, is it?"

"Most real things in this world are horrifying," Bai Liu replied, picking up the paper and folding it neatly before slipping it into a book. He turned to Mu Sicheng. "Where else would we get material for our games?"

Mu Sicheng shot him a wary look.

Bai Liu only shrugged. "But since you don't seem ready to accept it, I should be considerate enough to give you an emotional buffer. So sure, let's say this isn't the case. Maybe it's the first or second scenario after all."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

Damn you. That's no different from just telling me it's the third case!

He sat there for a long time before finally looking up at Bai Liu, confusion flickering in his gaze. "...Bai Liu, if our reality is just a game, then where is the real world? Is there one? What actually matters? Why aren't you afraid of this game-like existence?"

Bai Liu wasn't thrown off by the barrage of questions. He took a moment to consider them.

"I've been asking myself what reality is and what holds the most meaning since I was a teenager," Bai Liu said, spreading his hands. "Most of my peers couldn't understand me—except for one close friend. Eventually, I realized they probably never would, and they'd still get by just fine in this false reality."

"Whether the world is a game or not doesn't really affect most people," Bai Liu continued. "From an objective idealist perspective, a person's perception of existence and the world forms the foundation of human values. As long as I am real and the things I desire are real, then my world is real to me."

He said calmly, "So to me, it doesn't matter if the world is a game or not."

"As long as human currency exists, my desire for money will never be extinguished. That is my truth and my meaning."

Bai Liu picked up the key hanging behind the door and looked back at Mu Sicheng, who still seemed dazed. "If you can't find your own meaning for now, why not try mine?" His lips curled slightly. "Try chasing something tangible—like the five hundred million points for winning the league competition?"

"With that much money, you might be able to buy as much reality as you want." Bai Liu pushed open the door. "For five hundred million points, you could probably buy an entire Earth to create whatever real world you desire."

Mu Sicheng was silent for a moment, his expression twisting.

"...Bai Liu, you're really an eloquent salesman, aren't you?"

Once again, he'd been swayed by this lunatic's insane logic!

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "So your answer?"

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth. "...I'm in!" Then, as if realizing something, he quickly asked, "But don't we need at least five players? How else are we supposed to participate?"

"Don't worry about that. I'll handle it. Just wait for my notice," Bai Liu said, turning to leave. Then, as if it were the most natural thing in the world, he added, "I'm going out for hotpot with some friends. Wanna come?"

Mu Sicheng: "..."

It's the middle of the night—why the hell are you in the mood for hotpot?

Maybe his expression gave away his thoughts, because Bai Liu casually pulled two discount coupons out of his pocket and waved them. "They expire today," he explained.

Mu Sicheng: "..."

He knew he couldn't win against Bai Liu's mental fortitude. So after declining the invitation, Mu Sicheng exchanged contact information and school addresses with Bai Liu before heading back to his dorm alone—to think about life.

Meanwhile, Bai Liu walked off with the discount coupons in his pocket, looking oddly content, as if he hadn't just come from a life-and-death game or casually revealed the world's twisted truth.

Mu Sicheng sighed, half disbelieving. "...You're actually in a good mood?"

"Of course." Bai Liu nodded, smiling as his eyes arched slightly. "This is my off time, after all."

Mu Sicheng: "..."

He was once again reminded of Bai Liu's absurd "horror game job" theory.

FUCK!!! This guy seriously thinks he's just off duty?!

What kind of environment do you have to grow up in to become this kind of monster?!

Bai Liu said goodbye to a dazed Mu Sicheng before heading to Lu Yizhan.

When Bai Liu woke up, he found that Lu Yizhan had called him twice. Since he hadn't answered either call in the game, Bai Liu sent him a text asking what was wrong. Lu Yizhan replied that they should talk in person.

Bai Liu figured that with his likely disappearance for the next two months, Lu Yizhan, being a police officer, would probably report him missing. He quickly texted Lu Yizhan to meet him at the hotpot restaurant and prepared for a face-to-face conversation.

When Bai Liu arrived at the restaurant, it was still early, and the place wasn't crowded. He ordered a pot base and some dishes, checked with the owner about the coupons, and waited patiently.

Before the owner left, he turned on the TV for Bai Liu, which was airing the noon news program.

A male presenter in a suit stood at a desk, crossing his arms and speaking in a serious, formal voice.

"Welcome to the Midday News. Recently, key evidence was found in the case of Li Gou, the major suspect in the brutal killing of a senior girl. If convicted, Li Gou could face the death penalty. However, just before the trial, Li Gou was suddenly killed in prison by a fellow inmate, Wang Mou, in a violent attack..."

The presenter paused briefly, flipping through his script before continuing.

"Meanwhile, a small-scale food poisoning incident has erupted in a privately run orphanage in our city. A number of children were rushed to the hospital, and the police are investigating. The orphanage, which was struggling financially, had been buying cheap, spoiled ingredients, leading to severe cases of dehydration and shock among the children. The community is being called on to donate..."

Bai Liu was absorbed in the broadcast when Lu Yizhan walked in, looking tired and covered in dust.

Bai Liu's "social animal" expression indicated that this man had been working late for days.

Lu Yizhan sat down, poured himself a couple of sips of tea, and then began complaining. "I've had it! You have no idea how busy I've been! I'm dying here! I haven't even had time for a sip of tea this morning!"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "Hasn't it only been a few days since we last had dinner together? Is getting ready for a wedding really that awful?"

Lu Yizhan waved his hand dismissively, glancing at the TV before asking the waiter, "Can we get a private room instead?"

The waiter quickly led them to a smaller room, as the restaurant wasn't busy.

The moment they entered, Lu Yizhan pulled out a cigarette and lit it, his face grim.

Bai Liu hadn't seen Lu Yizhan smoke in ages. Since getting a girlfriend—and now a fiancée—he had given up his bad habits, including smoking, playing games, and even drinking Coke, which his fiancée believed was harmful.

Bai Liu couldn't help but smile. "It's a good thing she doesn't know Coke is carbonated. Otherwise, you'd probably have to give up beer too."

Lu Yizhan chuckled bitterly as he took a drag from his cigarette. "I know you're going to tease me about it, but seriously, you should ask what's wrong with me instead of bringing up my middle-aged crisis."

Bai Liu poured him a cup of tea and pushed it toward him. "Go ahead. I've clocked out, so I've got a bit of time to listen to your life troubles."

Lu Yizhan stared at his tea for a few seconds before replying. "It's not just the wedding that's got me stressed. You saw the news about the orphanage, right?"

Bai Liu nodded. "I saw it. What about it?"

Lu Yizhan's expression grew more serious. "One of my colleagues is working on the case. He thinks it might not be a typical food poisoning incident. A lot of the kids are in critical condition, and they haven't found any concrete evidence yet. The thing is, we've both been in orphanages before. Mirror City isn't a mushroom-growing area, and mushrooms are expensive, which means it's rare for orphanages to buy them. But this one—on the verge of closing—could be in a bad situation..."

He paused, furrowing his brow. "I just don't think it adds up. Right now, the authorities are leaning towards keeping the orphanage open, but the children left there aren't safe until the investigation is complete."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "That sounds complicated, but why are you involved? You're a police officer, but this isn't your case, is it?"

Lu Yizhan sighed. "I volunteered to help with the investigation."

Bai Liu studied him quietly, waiting for him to continue.

Lu Yizhan finally spoke again, looking down. "You know I'm getting married soon. My fiancée's health isn't great—the doctor says she might not be able to conceive. We've been thinking about adoption for a while now. I was thinking about adopting a child from this orphanage. After all, one less child in that dangerous situation is better. I came from an orphanage too, so I think it's a way to give back."

Bai Liu paused, then asked calmly, "So, what's your point? You know I'm not likely to approve. What do you want from me?"

Lu Yizhan fiddled with the cigarette in his hand, silent for a moment.

The waiter came in with the hotpot, and the conversation paused as the dish began to bubble.

Then Lu Yizhan spoke again, almost as if to himself, "Bai Liu, I hate involving you in this, but your brain works like no one else's. If it's something criminal, you'll figure out the next move instantly. You're a genius at this."

Bai Liu took a sip of tea, unfazed. "I'll take that as a compliment. This isn't the first time you've come to me for help, so just say what you need."

Lu Yizhan looked up, his voice pleading. "Can you help me with this? My colleague is stuck. Last time, you gave me great advice on how to crack a case. This time, I think you can help too."

Bai Liu raised his hand, breaking his chopsticks with a snap. "I can help you, but I won't do it for free."

Lu Yizhan nodded, already familiar with Bai Liu's terms.

"And I've only got one day to help," Bai Liu added. "I'm leaving for a business trip tomorrow and won't be back for two months."

Lu Yizhan's eyes widened. "Two months? That long? What exactly do you do for a living? If it's acting, like you said last time, that doesn't take two months, does it?"

Bai Liu thought for a moment before responding carefully. "This time, I'm going to be performing with a monkey and a young master in a stage show for two months."

Lu Yizhan looked perplexed for a moment, then slapped his thigh in realization. "Wait, you're in a circus? You're going on tour for two months?"

Bai Liu paused for a second, then nodded. "Yes."

Bai Liu went home and reviewed some of the information Lu Yizhan had given him about the private orphanage.

Most children's homes in their world are public orphanages run by the government, and both Bai Liu and Lu Yizhan had come from such institutions.

Lu Yizhan was raised to be a kind-hearted and grateful young man, who aspired to be a police officer and serve society from a young age.

If Lu Yizhan hadn't kept Bai Liu on a tight leash to ensure he stayed on the path of compliance, it's hard to say what Bai Liu, a psychopath, would have done for money.

But this orphanage was different—it wasn't a public one but a private institution set up by a large group of corporate philanthropists ten years ago.

Many of these entrepreneurs were terminally ill, and in line with the traditional practice of "doing good before death," they donated large sums of money to build this private orphanage. They claimed they wanted to do something good before they passed, which earned them much praise at the time. Even Lu Yizhan praised their efforts.

Coincidentally, shortly after the orphanage was built, the entrepreneurs' illnesses mysteriously improved, as if [good deeds were rewarded].

However, over time, the entrepreneurs became less interested in the orphanage, and it fell into disrepair within ten years.

After reading the information Lu Yizhan provided, Bai Liu understood why something felt off.

The poorly run private orphanage had been the site of numerous accidents, most of which involved various types of mushroom poisoning, with this most recent incident being the largest.

Lu Yizhan noted that these food poisoning accidents, when combined, didn’t seem like mere accidents at first glance. However, after investigation, no trace of foul play could be found—no deliberate poisoning or simple accidental food poisoning, just like in this latest case.

It was as if some higher power had erased all evidence of anything beyond "accidental food poisoning."

Lu Yizhan even speculated that someone within their ranks might have deliberately erased traces of a crime.

From Bai Liu's perspective as an inhumane game designer, this was the perfect material for a horror game: an endangered children’s home, a strange series of food poisoning incidents, and children dying horribly from it.

Bai Liu was more suspicious of the erasure than Lu Yizhan’s suspicion that someone inside had hidden the traces of a crime. If his earlier suspicions were correct, he felt that this orphanage was likely a [copy of a horror game] being dropped into the [real world].

The next morning, Bai Liu was woken by a life-threatening series of calls from Lu Yizhan. When he picked up the phone, Lu Yizhan’s tone was more serious than ever.

"Bai Liu, come to the First People's Hospital in Mirror City. The child brought to the hospital last night... the child brought to the hospital last night—"

"A lot of dead people, huh?" Bai Liu calmly finished the sentence.

Lu Yizhan inhaled sharply, then exhaled slowly before asking, "Did you find out anything?"

"Not yet." Bai Liu replied frankly, "But from the information you've given me, if someone deliberately poisoned the mushrooms, and the other party repeated it so many times, the goal would have been to kill people. This time, the mushrooms consumed by those children would likely have been a lethal amount."

"... Yes, many of them died during resuscitation," Lu Yizhan's voice sounded dry and strained. "But one child is still alive."

"A living child?" Bai Liu immediately sensed something was wrong.

If this orphanage was a [copy of a horror game] that [the system] was dropping into the real world, the children in the background of the game should have been wiped out, just like the passengers in that carriage in Bursting Last Train.

Bai Liu asked softly, "Can I come over?"

Lu Yizhan replied, "Yes, you can. Come over here."

By the time Bai Liu had gotten dressed, the hospital doors were swarming with journalists from all over.

Lu Yizhan picked him up from the operating theater lift. As they passed through the operating theater, Bai Liu could see the corridors lined with tiny bodies, their heads covered in white cloths. So many bodies hadn't been taken away yet, piling up in twisted heaps in the operating theater corridor, turning it into a makeshift morgue.

Every now and then, a numb-faced nurse would push the dead children's bodies down the hall, occasionally bumping into a wall, causing a small, bruised hand with various corpse marks to emerge from beneath the white cloth.

These marks, along with the haematomas bulging on the surface of the child's body, seemed like mushroom patterns spreading across the back of their hands. It looked as though mushrooms would sprout from the skin any moment.

The foul smell of fermented mushrooms filled the operating theater, as if the mushrooms the children had eaten had fermented overnight using their freshly dead bodies as a medium, decaying and teeming with fungal life.

Bai Liu quickly withdrew his gaze and looked sideways at Lu Yizhan, waiting until they passed the operating theater before speaking softly, "Are you sure these children died only last night? The decomposition doesn't look right."

"Yes," Lu Yizhan rubbed his forehead. "The corpse marks appeared too quickly, and the timing of the rigor mortis is all wrong."

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes. "What's wrong with it?"

Lu Yizhan paused, leaning against the wall and lighting a cigarette. He took several deep puffs, filling the corner of the staircase with smoke, indicating his very bad mood.

"The corpse marks appeared within minutes of death and spread rapidly, which is usually seen when death occurred more than 24 hours ago," Lu Yizhan explained, using his thumb to rub his brow in frustration, though it didn't seem to alleviate his stress. "The body also hardened quickly, and by early this morning, it was already in the decay stage—this usually happens more than 24 hours after death."

"It's almost as if..." Lu Yizhan paused, "the group of poisoned children died before they even got to the hospital."

As they continued walking, they reached the stairs of the children's emergency ward. Through the half-open emergency exit door, Bai Liu could see the bodies of children, covered with hoods, lying in the corridor. Nurses were busy placing the bodies into body bags.

The faces of the dead children weren't the usual greenish pallor of the deceased. Instead, they were dotted with colorful raised spots.

Bai Liu knew that some mushroom poisonings could cause a ringworm-like rash, but the spots on these children's faces were so dense that they looked like a colorblindness test, raised on the surface of their skin. Despite the mild discomfort, Bai Liu wasn't afraid to look at them.

It looked like human faces covered in mushrooms that hadn’t sprouted yet beneath the skin.

Reality

Bai Liu looked at Lu Yizhan. "Tell me the details of last night first."

Lu Yizhan closed his eyes, took a deep breath of smoke, and exhaled slowly. "Around 3 AM last night, all 37 children brought in were vomiting uncontrollably..."

"These children were vomiting whole mushrooms, one after another. But these children had been induced to vomit and had their stomachs lavaged when they were admitted to the hospital in an emergency the day before. They had been on a fasting regimen of fluids all day yesterday, so there was nothing in their stomachs. There should have been nothing for them to vomit."

Lu Yizhan paused here, shaking the ashes from his cigarette into a bin in the hallway. "It scared the nurses and doctors, so they immediately called the police and prepared to draw emergency blood from all the children..."

Lu Yizhan slowly exhaled a plume of smoke. "But except for the child who survived, the nurses could only draw a light green translucent fluid from the children who kept vomiting. They couldn't get any blood at all."

Bai Liu wasn't shocked. These events felt like an antique mirror hiding a giant bomb from security—like a [horror game] being loaded into [reality public test mode]. In a horror game, anything unusual was possible, and the extraction of mushroom juice was a common direction that Bai Liu found entirely normal and expected.

Bai Liu pondered for a moment and asked, "What about the living child? Her blood is normal, right? Have the results of her blood tests come back yet?"

"It came back mildly anemic, but generally normal," Lu Yizhan replied.

Bai Liu thought for a moment and then asked, "Did you manage to get any key information from the surviving child to solve the case?"

"No." Lu Yizhan let out a long, bitter laugh. "This little girl is blind. She doesn't recognize our voices and refuses to communicate with us. She only nods or shakes her head occasionally. Because she can't see, she most likely doesn't know anything. She doesn't even know that the mushrooms were what she ate that day."

"This little girl's name is Liu Jiayi. She has a half-brother named Liu Huai. She won't talk until he arrives." Lu Yizhan sighed. "It's mostly because she's reluctant to talk. Otherwise, I would have taken you in to speak with her. You're quite good at tricking children."

Bai Liu's expression paused for a moment before he slowly looked up at Lu Yizhan. "What did you say her brother's name was?"

Lu Yizhan was stunned. "Liu Huai. He's a university student, and he's been working to support her. About six months ago, he suddenly placed her in the orphanage where this incident happened. He comes to see Liu Jiayi almost once a week, but he really has no obligation to support his half-sister. Do you know him?"

"I've met him once," Bai Liu smiled. "We've networked and played games together. He would probably remember me. Maybe he could help me talk to his sister."

Liu Huai sat stiffly in his hospital room, his eyes fixed on the skinny little girl, Liu Jiayi, curled up in a ball on the bed, clutching her knees.

But that wasn't the main reason for his stiffness. It was Bai Liu, who sat opposite him, smiling kindly.

Liu Huai couldn't understand why he was so unlucky to meet Bai Liu, the demon king, who casually hooked his shoulder in a very familiar way, bending his eyes to get closer and saying he wanted to talk to Liu Jiayi.

Liu Huai silently bemoaned his bad luck but brought Bai Liu in anyway.

However, Liu Jiayi couldn't tolerate too many people. She screamed as soon as she heard Bai Liu. Liu Huai wouldn't allow anyone else into the room, so the police were left outside while Liu Huai worked with Liu Jiayi before finally bringing Bai Liu in on behalf of his friend.

The ward now housed Liu Huai, Bai Liu, and Liu Jiayi.

Bai Liu and Liu Huai sat on opposite sides of the bed. Liu Jiayi sat in the middle, clutching her knees, her face buried in the space between them. She wore a hospital gown too large for her, hanging loosely on her thin, fragile frame.

Liu Jiayi, as Lu Yizhan described, was underdeveloped, like a skeleton that hadn't grown properly—far from the over-nourished children Bai Liu was familiar with from fast food restaurants.

Unable to bear the heavy atmosphere, Liu Huai blocked Bai Liu's view of Liu Jiayi with the quilt and stepped in front of her.

Liu Huai stared at Bai Liu warily, like a beast protecting its cub. "Bai Liu, what do you want from me?"

Bai Liu got straight to the point. "I'm not here to see you. I'm here to see your sister."

"My sister?!" Liu Huai fiercely wrapped Liu Jiayi in the blanket and pulled her into his arms, glaring at Bai Liu. "What do you want with her?"

"Liu Huai, how old is the youngest player you've seen in the game?" Bai Liu suddenly changed the subject.

Although the ward was under surveillance, the presence of the system's [gag] mechanism meant there was a high chance anything Bai Liu said would be censored. He asked without fear.

"Why are you asking this?" Liu Huai wondered.

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to Liu Jiayi, who was trembling slightly in Liu Huai's arms. "I was wondering if your sister would turn out to be the youngest."

Liu Jiayi, the only child to survive the mushroom poisoning at the orphanage, reminded Bai Liu of himself, who survived the Mirror City bombing, and Muke, who survived the haunted dormitory at the Japanese school.

Bai Liu knew there were two conditions for someone to be a player in his world. The first was the [presence of players around the player]. The game spread like a virus, from one person to another. Liu Jiayi had Liu Huai, who fit the profile.

The second condition was that the person had to survive at least one copy of the [Horror Game Official]. Liu Jiayi clearly met both criteria.

Bai Liu guessed the young girl who survived death was likely the chosen reserve player for the game.

Liu Huai froze, his gaze slowly moving toward Liu Jiayi in his arms. Shock and disbelief filled his eyes. He trembled uncontrollably as he stared at her, then turned to Bai Liu with shock and uncertainty. "But... she's only eight years old. How can she be a player? I've only seen her once a week; I've controlled how often I affect her. That shouldn't directly influence her access to the game..."

"Why not?" Bai Liu asked calmly. "Does the system ban minors from playing games like parents do?"

Liu Huai choked on his words and subconsciously tightened his hold on Liu Jiayi. Panic clouded his expression. "But she can't even see! If she enters the game, she won't survive in that harsh environment! There's no reason for the system to pick her!"

"So how did she survive this poisonous mushroom incident?" Bai Liu's tone was subdued.

The only child to survive a real-world horror game copy—Bai Liu didn't think Liu Jiayi was an easy target.

Liu Huai, left speechless, tried to defend her. "Jiajia survived the mushroom incident only because she was lucky! She's not like Du Sanying!"

But Liu Jiayi spoke up in a soft whisper, her voice faint. "Brother, that's not true."

Her small hand gently tugged at Liu Huai's jacket. From his outer set, a tiny, fidgety head peeked out. Her eyes were grayish-white, cloudy, but her voice was clear. "Brother, I wasn't poisoned because I was lucky. I secretly poured out the rice the teacher gave me."

Liu Huai was stunned. "Why did you pour out the rice your teacher gave you?"

Liu Jiayi's dry lips pursed as she spoke softly. "Brother, don't blame me for pouring out the food. I didn't think the teacher was right that day. She insisted on feeding me, but she used to just throw me the bowl and let me eat myself. So I poured it out and pretended to eat it while she was serving the others."

Bai Liu smiled, spreading his hands. "Looks like your sister is a lot smarter than you."

"I won't let her into the game, even if she's smart!!!" Liu Huai exploded in anger, his eyes glowing red as he glared at Bai Liu. "Bai Liu, whatever you want to do, my sister will not!"

Liu Jiayi, still tightly held by Liu Huai, wrapped her arms around his neck in confusion. "What are you talking about, brother? What am I going into?"

Liu Jiayi was obviously [blocked] from hearing the conversation between Bai Liu and Liu Huai about [the game], and couldn't understand their words.

"Liu Huao, I just want to work with you," Bai Liu said lightly. "If Liu Jiayi is really chosen by the game, there's nothing you can do to stop her from entering the game."

"And I can help you. I can help Liu Jiayi," Bai Liu added softly, raising his eyes to Liu Huai.

Liu Huai laughed coldly. "What you mean by 'helping' is controlling us, right? Bai Liu, you're just like Zhang Gui. I appreciate your help, but I won't let my sister fall into your hands!"

"I don't know what use she is to you now that you've come to the door, but get out!" Liu Huai growled, staring down Bai Liu like a fierce beast. His posture was threatening, as if ready to choke Bai Liu to death in the next second.

Bai Liu fell silent for a couple of seconds before standing up. He didn't argue much; he did want to save Liu Jiayi, but only because he saw that Lu Yizhan was tempted to adopt the little girl.

If Lu Yizhan wanted to choose her as his adopted daughter, Bai Liu would try to keep her alive.

Lu Yizhan had always been keen to help Liu Jiayi, and Bai Liu knew that Lu Yizhan had a tendency to meddle.

It was like when Lu Yizhan would sneak food to Bai Liu, even when Bai Liu didn't feel he was starving.

Bai Liu never understood Lu Yizhan's logic about helping others, but as a former beneficiary of Lu Yizhan's logic, Bai Liu mostly chose to indulge his self-righteous choices. After all, Lu Yizhan paid him, and Bai Liu didn't work for free. Lu Yizhan understood his logic well.

That's why Bai Liu would remain friends with Lu Yizhan.

Bai Liu tore a piece of paper and wrote his phone number on it, placing it on Liu Jiayi's bedside. "I can help Liu Jiayi survive her first game, but only if her soul is sold to me so I can help her through it."

Only when he had Liu Jiayi's soul could Bai Liu manipulate the panel to help her.

Liu Huai roared and tore the paper, ready to throw it in Bai Liu's face. "I won't allow it!"

"I think you gave up custody of her when you put her in the children's home. You are not her legal guardian, in name or otherwise," Bai Liu looked down at Liu Huai without a ripple of emotion. "So I don't think you have the right to decide for Liu Jiayi."

Liu Huai's eyes glowed red with rage, but he laughed instead of getting angry. "Bai Liu, do you know what I desire most in the game?"

"I want her to see the light," Liu Huai said, taking a deep breath and turning his head away to stop looking at Bai Liu. "Go away, I won't trust her to someone like you. Her future would be very dark with you."

His eyes were a little red as he turned away. "I've had enough of being controlled. Her life can never be controlled by you."

"I was controlled by Zhang Gui... when I lost fourth brother... that instant... I lost my best friend and my most tacit teammate." Liu Huai lowered his head, his voice dry. "Forced to take the blade and become hurt... your heart wouldn't feel any better... so I don't want her to fall into my path."

Bai Liu was silent for a moment. "Controlling a little girl doesn't give me any value. My best friend trying to save your sister is the only reason I'm doing this."

Liu Huai turned to Bai Liu in astonishment.

Liu Jiayi turns her head, a touch of confusion in her misty eyes, her thin, pointy face appearing strangely fragile. She is held by Liu Huai, almost like a pale, grey butterfly with tentacles, gently rubbing the top of her head against Liu Huai's chin, as if trying to soothe his violent mood swings.

Bai Liu, under Liu Huai's suspicious gaze, says nothing. He calmly turns and opens the door to the ward, then leaves.

Lu Yizhan stands waiting at the corner of the stairs, still smoking, a pile of cigarette butts in the bin next to him. It's unclear how many he's smoked by now.

When Bai Liu approaches, Lu Yizhan's eyes brighten. "Well, do you have an idea?" he asks.

But when Lu Yizhan notices Bai Liu's expression, he freezes for a moment.

Bai Liu is a man who typically wears a smile when in a good mood. His face rarely moves, but when his emotions fluctuate, there's no open expression—just a heavy, melancholic look floating in his eyes.

To put it simply, Bai Liu is not in a good mood.

"What's wrong?" Lu Yizhan asks, his voice softening. "Did someone scold you? I heard Liu Huai yelling at you in the ward. But you didn't react on the CCTV, and some victims' families can get very emotional. Don't take it personally."

"I sometimes can't understand human emotions," Bai Liu mutters, his gaze distant, a sign that he's still deep in thought. "It's strange," he continues. "I don't understand Liu Huai's logic. He's supposed to be selfish by nature, but he goes to this extent for his sister, even when the law doesn't require him to."

Bai Liu doesn't suspect that Liu Huai is lying. His subconscious reactions feel genuine.

But he quickly recovers from his thoughts.

He looks at Lu Yizhan. "But this kind of self-devotion is baffling. Let's head to the orphanage."

Bai Liu is admitted to the children's home with Muke.

Muke had come to Bai Liu's house early, but Bai Liu had been called away by Lu Yizhan early in the morning, and only when he returned briefly to gather his things did he find the young Muke waiting outside, crouched by the door, clutching his legs.

The young master hadn't knocked, likely thinking Bai Liu was still asleep, too polite to disturb him.

Muke's father waited respectfully outside the door, staying with his son, aware that Bai Liu was probably still asleep.

When Bai Liu returns home, he sees Muke and his father waiting at his doorstep, speaking in hushed voices so as not to disturb him.

Muke's father had expressed his gratitude profusely for Bai Liu's help in saving his son. Upon learning that Bai Liu was going to the children's home, the wealthy man offered a generous donation, promising to support Muke's medical journey by donating to the orphanage. He even drove them there in a flashy Maybach, worth over $10 million.

At the orphanage, Muke didn't follow his father, instead obediently staying close to Bai Liu. He occasionally peeked at him, fidgeting like a cat wanting to cling to its owner but not yet given permission.

Bai Liu could sense Muke's nervous energy, which wouldn't be helpful in their mission. He gave the young master some space to calm himself.

Bai Liu greeted Lu Yizhan, explaining that he was going to the orphanage with Muke to check on the situation.

Lu Yizhan entered with his colleagues to investigate.

Bai Liu and Muke were respectfully escorted by the orphanage director, a grandmother with a haggard appearance. Her eyes were cloudy, and she smelled faintly of decaying mushrooms, reminding Bai Liu of corpse spots.

Muke's father went off with the director to discuss the donation, and one of the teachers was assigned to show them around.

The orphanage was in poor condition, with crumbling buildings. The outer and inner walls were rotting, revealing moss-covered interiors. The equipment was old and sagging, swaying forlornly in the muddy yard. The seesaw moved in the wind, creaking as the empty seat dipped up and down.

The teacher who led them was pale, head down, walking quickly toward the outermost building. Bai Liu glanced at the award plaque on the wall—it was dated over a decade ago, right after the orphanage was built.

As they passed, the teacher explained in a low voice, "This orphanage is old. It used to cover 25 acres, with nearly 10,000 square meters of space. There were professional classrooms, a nurse's room, and over 200 caregivers for 300 children."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow, "250,000 square feet? 200 caregivers?" He'd seen no sign of caregivers.

The teacher hesitated before continuing, "That was when it was first built. Later, part of the building was rented out, and the orphanage had to downsize due to funding issues. Most of the caregivers were let go."

"We had 46 children left, rehearsing a show for Children's Day. But our long-time sponsor decided not to continue funding us this year, and we haven't found a new sponsor yet."

Bai Liu asked calmly, "You had 46 children, 37 at the hospital, 9 more, but I haven't seen any of them? Can we meet the remaining children?"

The teacher turned pale, wringing her hands but not responding.

Something felt off. Bai Liu's eyes narrowed.

Muke, noticing the tension, cleared his throat theatrically. He stepped forward and lifted his chin. "We're planning to donate 10 million to your orphanage. Can we meet the children who are still here?"

The teacher seemed to hesitate, then spoke quietly. "There aren't nine children available to meet you—only five."

Bai Liu frowned. "What happened to the others?"

A hint of panic flashed in the teacher's eyes. She lowered her voice. "Four children disappeared last night. They snuck out to play on the swings and seesaw, but vanished while they were playing. The equipment kept moving all night..."

A gust of wind blew through the yard, making the playground equipment creak and sway. The temperature dropped sharply, and the swing and seesaw moved faster, the creaking becoming louder, as if someone were on them.

The swing and seesaw came to a sudden halt, hovering unnaturally.

Then, the seesaw tilted slowly to one side, and something rolled off the teeter-totter.

Bai Liu's eyes widened when he saw what had fallen—an eerie, headless doll, its limbs twisted and wearing a white shirt and black trousers. It had a creepy smile, and a cheap necklace hung from its chest.

The doll was dressed exactly like Bai Liu.

Reality

At the same time, Lu Yizhan and his colleagues were investigating the case of the missing children at the orphanage.

"You think this should be handled by Interpol or some special department?" Lu Yizhan's colleague looked grim. "Look at the CCTV footage of the missing child. This isn't something we can handle!"

"Four kids heard a siren in the early hours of the morning, then lined up to go play in the central children's park. The weirdest part? They weren't hypnotized or sleepwalking. They were avoiding surveillance, which means they were lucid—just swinging in that tiny, run-down park. And then, an hour later, they just vanished. Poof. Gone. One second, they were on camera; the next, nothing."

The colleague cursed under his breath. "Damn it. The kids disappeared, but the swings kept moving. I barely slept after watching that footage..." He rubbed his arms, goosebumps rising. "There are only five children left. They were supposed to be transferred to other orphanages, but with what happened at the hospital, everyone's stuck here for the investigation. This whole thing is beyond strange."

Lu Yizhan frowned. "We should talk to the dean first."

"The dean? You think she'll say anything?" His colleague scoffed. "The old woman didn't even report the missing kids! If it weren't for the mushroom poisoning case escalating this, we wouldn't have even realized four children were missing. She never said a word."

"That just means we have to ask her," Lu Yizhan replied evenly. "She knows something."

In the dean's office, Muke's father had finished discussing a donation with the old dean and left to speak with someone else, leaving the elderly woman alone.

She sat in her chair, her eyes drooping as she regarded Lu Yizhan. "You're asking why the children are missing and why I didn't report it?"

Lu Yizhan nodded.

The old dean let out a dry chuckle. She slowly opened a drawer, pulling out a stack of documents, and handed them over. "Young man, you're new, aren't you? I've reported every missing child. But tell me, have you ever brought a single one of them back?" Her voice was calm, almost indifferent. "So this time, I didn't bother. The orphanage is shutting down anyway."

Lu Yizhan frowned as he flipped through the reports.

The oldest documents dated back ten years. Each one recorded a missing child, but the conclusions were all the same—[Child ran away from home]. No further action. No follow-up.

"Every year, our private orphanage holds a June 1st performance for the investors," the old dean continued. "We put on a show to keep them happy, to show them how well the children they fund are doing. And every year, after the performance, some children go missing."

She tapped a wrinkled finger against the reports. "And every year, the police conclude the same thing: that the children ran away." Her voice turned cold. "At one point, your department even suspected us of child abuse. But after an investigation, they found nothing. No human trafficking. No abuse. Nothing illegal."

The old dean met his gaze. "Just ordinary, unremarkable cases of children running away."

"Finding missing children is difficult, isn't it?" she murmured. "They scatter like grains of rice into a sea of people. And when they don't want to be found, it's like searching for a needle in a haystack. So every year, the case gets dropped."

Lu Yizhan's colleague couldn't hold back. "But this time, the surveillance shows the kid disappearing while sitting on a swing! How do you explain that? They didn't run away—they vanished!"

The old dean barely reacted. "That's a strange thing to say. How could such a thing happen?" She sighed. "Our surveillance system is old. It's likely a malfunction."

Lu Yizhan's colleague clenched his jaw, about to snap back, but Lu Yizhan raised a hand to stop him.

Calmly, he asked, "Dean, I understand that we failed to recover the children. But you should have reported them anyway. And yet, I noticed gaps in the records. You claim children go missing every year, but some years, there are no reports. Why?"

The old dean was silent for a long moment. Then, she turned and rummaged through a dusty bookcase, finally pulling out a thick file folder. She blew away the dust, untied the string, and pulled out an old photo album.

The first page displayed a [Group Photo of the 200x Children's Home Cultural Performance]. It was an archival record.

The photograph showed dozens of small children standing stiffly next to a crowd of well-dressed men in suits. The children wore garish red lipstick and a single dot of pigment on their foreheads, their smiles forced and unnatural.

"There were missing children every year," the old dean admitted, flipping through the pages. "But you're right. I didn't report them every time."

She exhaled, her voice growing weary. "This orphanage was barely surviving. If investors pulled out for even a year or two, we'd be forced to shut down. So I'll be honest with you, Officer Lu. Some of these children weren't exactly… well-behaved."

Her gaze turned sharp. "Some of them didn't just run away. They ran away after committing crimes."

She turned a page, revealing a yellowed disciplinary record.

[Orphan Bai Six, Xiao Ke, and five others assaulted an investor after the June 1st performance. They robbed him of his belongings and mobile phone. Punishment: Cleaning the orphanage and fasting for one day. Further punishment pending evaluation.]

The old dean tapped the paper meaningfully. "These children beat up an investor and fled that very night. I didn't report it. Because if I had… those kids wouldn't have survived here."

Lu Yizhan's expression darkened.

"Dean, can I see the group photo?"

The old woman handed him the file, and Lu Yizhan flipped back to the [200x Cultural Performance Group Photo].

His eyes locked onto a particular child.

Even with lipstick and a red dot on his forehead, the child wasn't funny-looking—just unsettlingly mature. His beauty was delicate, but his expression was cold, his gaze carrying a sharp, disdainful edge. While the other children smiled timidly, he looked at them all like they were beneath him.

Lu Yizhan recognized that face immediately.

His hands clenched around the file as he stared at the old dean. "Who is this child? What's his name?"

The old woman squinted at the photo, lost in thought. "Oh, that one? He was the ringleader of the fight. Led the others to attack the investors. I remember him well. When he arrived at the orphanage, he only gave his name as Bai. Bai Six."

Lu Yizhan's hands slammed against the desk. "No. His name is Bai Liu. He used to go by Bai Six, but he changed it when he was fourteen. He grew up in a public orphanage with me. There's no way he could have been in this private orphanage at the same time!"

The old dean blinked at him, confused. "Are you sure? Bai Six was found by an investor shortly after he escaped. He never made it out."

Her voice turned solemn.

"He died not long after."

Lu Yizhan's blood ran cold. "Died? How?"

"A strange death," the old woman said softly. "He swallowed a coin. It had a hole in the middle. It got lodged in his windpipe. He choked to death within minutes."

She sighed. "He… had been through terrible things here. Before and after he tried to escape. So… we all believed it was suicide."

Lu Yizhan's gaze dropped to the black-and-white photograph. Bai Six's expression was empty, his eyelids drooping as if half-asleep. His hair was damp, clinging to his forehead like he had just come offstage.

The weight of the revelation pressed down on Lu Yizhan's chest.

That was Bai Liu.

From ten years ago.

Bai Liu walked over and picked up the doll lying next to the seesaw. It was handmade, and the reference template was clearly him. Despite its age-worn texture, a small trace of ribbon thread remained on its leg, suggesting it had once been a gift doll—typically, such dolls carried a date or a dedication from the giver.

Turning the doll over, Bai Liu searched for any markings. Eventually, he found a handwritten inscription hidden inside the screwed-off head.

It was a ten-year-old doll.

Bai Liu had only been working for two or three years. It wasn’t until he entered the workforce that he adopted the "social animal" attire—the dress shirt and blazer now reflected in the doll's outfit. The coin hanging around his neck had been given to him recently, a tangible representation of the game system.

Yet, the attire on this doll had been left behind ten years ago, its head and limbs torn off.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes.

Reality

While Bai Liu was contemplating the doll in his hands, the teacher had gone to call over the remaining five children.

The five stood in a line, their postures tense and wary. None of them dared to meet Muke's gaze, their eyes fixed downward as if they had grown on their toes. Some limped, others had crooked spines or bent backs—all were physically impaired in one way or another. Huddled together like cubs still confined to their nest, they pushed and shoved lightly among themselves.

They looked like objects on display, scrutinized and silent, their expressions numb with the knowledge that they weren't worth much.

As Bai Liu approached, his frown deepened. The scent of mushrooms clung to these children even more strongly than it had to the bodies in the hospital.

Muke waved a hand in front of his nose, grimacing. "Do you guys eat mushrooms all the time here? What's with the smell?"

The teacher awkwardly pulled the children closer. "It's not really something we eat that often."

Bai Liu's gaze flickered over the teacher and the children. "Did you eat a lot of mushrooms that day?"

The teacher hesitated for a moment before nodding. "Yes, all five of these children ate with us that day. We had quite a lot."

"And were there any poisoned children who had eaten less? Maybe just a mouthful of mushroom soup?" Bai Liu asked.

The teacher thought for a moment, then nodded. "Yes, some children liked the taste and ate a lot, while others didn't and only had a small amount—but they were still poisoned."

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze. Those who had eaten more were not poisoned, while those who had eaten less were. That meant the poisoning wasn't tied to dosage.

But why mushrooms...? Why did every incident at this orphanage seem to revolve around mushrooms?

And what exactly were the conditions for this bizarre poisoning?

Lu Yizhan had mentioned that the children who survived the orphanage showed no significant abnormalities in their bloodwork. Like Liu Jiayi, they only had slight anemia.

The five surviving children, along with Liu Jiayi from the hospital, shared one notable similarity—they all had congenital genetic defects. Liu Jiayi was blind, and these children had various disabilities.

Bai Liu fell into deep thought.

The teacher continued leading him around the orphanage, eventually stopping at a room filled with photos, trophies, and children's drawings.

"This is our orphanage's exhibition hall," the teacher said, sidling up to Bai Liu.

The room, long untouched, was coated in dust. The trophies and certificates inside the cabinets hinted at a past when this orphanage had thrived. Now, only five children remained, trailing behind their teacher with vacant expressions.

The space carried a somber weight—most of what was displayed here belonged to the dead.

Bai Liu glanced around before turning to Mr. Xiang. "Can I take down some of the photos and paintings?"

Originally, such things wouldn't have been disturbed, but given the orphanage's current state, the teacher no longer seemed to mind. He nodded.

Curious, Muke watched as Bai Liu carefully removed several children's drawings from the wall and spread them out on the floor for closer inspection. Leaning in, he whispered, "Bai Liu, did you find something?"

"Hmm." Bai Liu hummed softly, eyes still fixed on the drawings.

Muke followed his gaze. The artwork was surprisingly well-done, clearly the work of a child with skill.

The styles varied—some were sketches of people or still lifes, drawn in colored pencils, crayons, or stark black and white. Many were overwhelmingly bright, colors clashing with almost unpleasant saturation. The compositions felt illogical.

A frail-looking girl sat on a hospital bed, her eyes covered with a white cloth. A beautiful, silvery-blue-scaled fish swam inside a jar. A charred, broken wooden mirror rested atop a melted toy train.

These images felt strangely familiar.

Muke stared at them for a moment before something clicked. His eyes widened slightly. “Wait… were all these done by the same person? They’re all signed with a ‘W.’”

Despite the vast differences in style, every piece bore the same signature—an elegant, swirling “W” that remained consistent across all the paintings.

Bai Liu finally spared Muke a glance. His voice was quiet, almost a whisper. “That’s my signature.”

Muke’s breath caught. “Yours? But why is your signature here?!”

He wanted to press further, but seeing Bai Liu’s unwillingness to explain, he wisely shut his mouth.

That “W” was Bai Liu’s personal signature, a mark he used for his artwork. Even though the techniques in these paintings were younger, rougher, he could tell at a glance that they were his.

The blindfolded girl was unmistakably Liu Jiayi—her hospital gown identical to the one he had seen earlier that morning. The silvery-blue fish in the jar was a direct reference to The Siren King, his first game. The shattered mirror on the melted train was a clear allusion to Bursting Last Train, his second game.

But these paintings were all dated ten years ago.

Bai Liu had not been in this orphanage ten years ago. And there was no way he could have known about these events a decade in advance.

That left only one possibility: a future version of himself had somehow traveled back ten years, left these drawings behind, and they had remained here ever since.

An ordinary person might have panicked at such a paradox. But for Bai Liu, this only confirmed his suspicions—this orphanage must be part of an official game copy of the real world.

The only logical explanation for these timeline inconsistencies was that the game's official plot progression had originally taken place ten years ago. The presence of these paintings meant that Bai Liu himself had left traces within that version of the game.

That wasn't a good sign.

A player's mark remained permanently in a game copy when they failed to clear it—just like Zhang Gui, whose death in Bursting Last Train had left him eternally trapped as a scorched corpse monster. These traces of failure became part of the game's fabric, merging with reality when the game loaded into the real world.

But the inevitability of that outcome didn't faze Bai Liu. He remained calm.

Two things still puzzled him.

His gaze fell on a boy in the corner of an old group photo from 200X.

The boy's face was emotionless, his expression carrying an unmistakable hint of disdain—a silent, "You foolish mortals." His eyes held an air of arrogance, entirely out of place.

Bai Liu, fourteen years old, looked again at the paintings with their sharp, aggressively colorful strokes.

That expression in the photo, that distinct artistic style—both were habits he had abandoned long ago. He had once preferred gaudy, vibrant colors, but after entering the workforce, his boss had criticized his art as mentally polluting and unsuitable for the market.

These paintings and that boy—they belonged to his fourteen-year-old self.

And yet, the information conveyed within the paintings was something only a twenty-four-year-old Bai Liu could have known.

If it was his twenty-four-year-old self in the game, he wouldn't have painted in this style.

If the game forced his mind to regress to fourteen, then he shouldn't have knowledge from the future.

This version of Bai Liu had the memories of his twenty-four-year-old self but the artistic style and mannerisms of his fourteen-year-old self. That shouldn't be possible. Memory was a key factor in shaping a person's style and personality. If he retained his memories from the last ten years, he shouldn't be the same as he was at fourteen.

His existence in the game seemed fragmented—split between his past and present selves.

That was his first point of confusion.

The second was the sketch of the blindfolded girl holding a doll.

Bai Liu had hated sketching at fourteen. He had been obsessed with colors, rejecting the documentary-style blandness of black-and-white sketches.

So why had his fourteen-year-old self drawn a sketch of Liu Jiayi—who hadn't even been born yet?

Did that mean Liu Jiayi would enter this game too?

If so, why was she here at all?

Bai Liu's gaze traveled across the painting, finally settling on the doll in Liu Jiayi's arms.

It wore a white shirt and black trousers, its head twisted unnaturally—turned a full 180 degrees.

His fingers brushed against the coin on his chest.

His eyes darkened slightly.

Lobby

Bai Liu didn’t stay at the orphanage for long. He had to enter the game with Mu Ke soon, and after a quick sweep of the orphanage, he was ready to go.

But before leaving, Bai Liu had a brief explanation to give to Lu Yizhan.

He told Mu Ke to go home and wait for him. The young master looked at Bai Liu with fondness as he left, asking when he would be back.

As soon as Bai Liu stepped outside, he spotted Lu Yizhan waiting for him at the orphanage entrance.

Lu Yizhan couldn’t resist teasing. "What about the young master? Since when did you have that kind of charm?"

Bai Liu, unfazed, teased back. "What’s the point of being charming? I didn’t turn him down for you and even let him go first."

Lu Yizhan smiled but quickly got down to business. "You looked around. What did you find?"

Bai Liu didn’t hesitate. "Besides poisoned children, there are also missing children. I already have a good idea about the poisoned ones, but as for the missing children—I’m guessing this isn’t the first time it's happened here, is it?"

Lu Yizhan was startled. "How do you know?"

"The attitude was off." Bai Liu analyzed calmly. "The teacher gave me the wrong impression. A normal person would avoid the place where a disappearance occurred, but when she showed us around, even though she was scared, she subconsciously led us straight to the site—the children’s amusement park."

"This kind of reaction means it's not the first time. If disappearances were rare, she’d be more alarmed, more hesitant. But instead, she was scared yet familiar with it. That suggests it’s happened multiple times before."

Lu Yizhan let out a frustrated sigh, gripping the cigarette he had put away. "Yeah. We spoke to the dean. It’s been happening almost every year for the past ten years."

Bai Liu frowned. "If there's a record of disappearances happening every year, how come you've never heard of it before?"

"Because they're not considered missing." Lu Yizhan ground his teeth against his cigarette, his expression dark. "Most of them are classified as runaways. Even if reports were filed, they were dismissed as kids running away. The cases were barely mentioned in the records—easy to overlook unless someone was paying close attention."

When a child disappears from a private orphanage, searching for them is an uphill battle. There are no parents or relatives to demand answers or pressure authorities to act.

"After I found out that group of entrepreneurs invested in this orphanage—and that the poisoned children mysteriously got better—I dug into the place." Lu Yizhan exhaled a thin stream of smoke. "But private orphanages aren't as strictly registered as public ones. They operate with more autonomy. There's no clear record of how many children are here at any given time, and even the records we do get might not be accurate."

"For example, if a child went missing and the dean didn't report it for a few years, there's a good chance we'd never even know."

After a brief silence, Lu Yizhan added, "I have my suspicions about those entrepreneurs, but they're powerful. Too much time has passed, and we don't have any solid evidence. We can't investigate further."

Bai Liu's voice was light but sharp. "If they were involved with the missing children, and no one knows the kids' real names or where they came from, then it would've been easy to make them disappear without a trace. There'd be nothing to investigate."

"Exactly." Lu Yizhan took a long drag from his cigarette, then coughed. His voice was rough when he spoke again. "But Bai Liu, these are human lives."

His eyes were red as he looked at Bai Liu. "I can't accept that these children's deaths are written off as accidents. And even if they were accidents, I need to rule out every other possibility."

Bai Liu met his gaze with calm indifference. "You have no evidence. You can't rule anything out. And it's not your job to do so. Even coming here is already overstepping your boundaries."

Lu Yizhan was quiet for a moment. Then, as if nothing had happened, he continued discussing the case, tirelessly going over the details.

Lu Yizhan had a peculiar kind of resilience. Bai Liu wouldn't waste time on a task he knew was impossible, but Lu Yizhan—if he thought something could help people—would throw himself into it, no matter how difficult.

And he would drag Bai Liu along with him.

Lu Yizhan showed Bai Liu the records of the disappearances, using annual group photos from the orphanage's June 1st celebrations.

"You think he looks a lot like me at fourteen, don't you?" Bai Liu pointed at the boy's face and commented dryly, "I think he looks like me too."

"You're nothing alike," Lu Yizhan said, his voice rough. He looked at Bai Liu intently, then refuted his friend with rare stubbornness.

"Because he's dead. And you're still alive."

On his way home, Bai Liu called Mu Sicheng.

"Has this ever happened to you before?" Bai Liu asked. "The future me—as a player—is supposed to have died in a ten-year-old instance, but the present me, the one from ten years ago, is still alive."

Mu Sicheng's voice crackled through the speaker, filled with disbelief. "That sounds like the grandmother paradox. Bai Liu, your luck is ridiculously cursed. I've never even heard of this happening in the game before."

The grandmother paradox was a well-known time-travel paradox. If someone went back in time and killed their grandmother, they wouldn't exist in the future.

Bai Liu was facing a similar dilemma. If he was destined to die in an instance set ten years in the past, how was he still alive now?

"Parallel universe theory?" Mu Sicheng tried. "The usual explanation for the grandmother paradox is that different timelines exist. So maybe the Bai Liu from an alternate timeline—let's call it B—died in that game, and what you saw was his fate playing out in our timeline, A."

"Then you'd better not enter that orphanage game," Mu Sicheng warned, his tone suddenly serious. "If you don't enter, you won't die there, and that might create a new branch of possibilities."

"I don't think it's the parallel universe theory." Bai Liu remained level-headed. "Our reality is already the finalized version of the game. It's the official version, meaning it's the sum of all possibilities, all calculated outcomes. There are no alternate timelines."

Mu Sicheng hesitated. "That makes sense. But—wait. If reality only has one outcome, doesn't that mean you're guaranteed to die in that game?"

"But the fact that I'm still alive proves that I didn't," Bai Liu countered smoothly. "Otherwise, the two statements—'I am alive' and 'I am dead'—would create an impossible paradox in a reality where no alternate versions exist."

"Then… what the hell is going on?" Mu Sicheng sounded thoroughly confused.

Bai Liu didn't bother answering. He had already arrived home and was pulling out his keys.

With his phone propped on his shoulder, he asked, "When are you getting into the game?"

"Why?" Mu Sicheng groaned. "I barely got any sleep last night after promising you I'd go in. What the hell are you planning? I have twenty-six instances left to clear in two months! You should at least help me find more people!"

"That's exactly what I wanted to talk about," Bai Liu said briskly. "Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu. They ranked highest among the last batch of new players. Both have personal skills and C+ panel quality. Take them through a level-one instance to train them. Teach them the basics, but don't protect them too much."

After returning from the hotpot yesterday, Bai Liu spoke with Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu, laying out the dangers of the league and asking if they were willing to join.

The two middle-aged people barely hesitated. They clasped their hands in silent, tearful agreement before they asked Bai Liu only two questions.

The first was, "If we win, we can resurrect Guoguo, right?"

"In theory, yes," Bai Liu replied. "But you could also achieve that gradually by playing normally and saving points. The league is riskier, but it allows you to earn points much faster. Think it over and give me an answer tomorrow."

Xiang Chunhua glanced at Liu Fu with a complicated expression, her hands tightening around her apron. The television behind her blared the news—an old broadcast about Li Gou's impending execution. The volume was turned up high, the male news anchor's voice echoing in the small room: Suspect in senior girl's body dismemberment case to be sentenced to death.

Xiang Chunhua turned back to Bai Liu, her gaze steady.

"This contest—whatever it is—it'll help you, won't it?" That was their second question.

Bai Liu hesitated for a moment before answering. "Yes. But the mortality rate is high. You should think it through—"

"There's nothing to think about." Xiang Chunhua cut him off with a smile, though her eyes were still wet with unshed tears. She wiped them away with the back of her hand. "We trust you, Bai Liu. Besides, how else are we going to save up points? It's just a game, right? And I was on my girls' volleyball team back in the day, wasn't I, Liu Fu?"

Liu Fu smiled nervously. "We used to also play basketball when we were young too—we're not worse than you youngsters."

Bai Liu was silent for a moment before speaking. "You don't have to force yourselves. You can always talk to me before officially signing up in two months. You can drop out if you change your mind. I'll try to find someone else in that time—you're just a backup option."

But despite his words, Bai Liu didn't have much of a choice. There were only two months left, and most of the veteran players who were both interested and qualified had already signed up. As for those who weren't interested, they had no reason to follow Bai Liu—a complete newcomer—into a high-risk competition where survival wasn't guaranteed.

Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu understood the dangers, but they also wanted to repay Bai Liu. He might seem distant, even ruthless at times—extracting souls and playing the role of the villain—but from beginning to end, everything he did was to help them.

It was just a competition. And even if they died for this young man, they had already lived long enough.

Much longer than Guoguo.

Compared to the two middle-aged players, who had experienced life and death, Mu Sicheng was far less composed.

The moment Bai Liu asked him to recruit new players, Mu Sicheng was completely furious.

He was silent for two seconds, then raised his voice in disbelief. "You want me to bring in new people? Are you serious? You're going into the tournament with a brand new team? Are you insane? That's your big solution?"

His voice cracked. "I'm starting to regret that you dragged me into this mess last night while I was out of it." He let out a sharp laugh. "And for the record—I never bring in new people!"

"So, do you want to quit?" Bai Liu asked softly. "I'll allow you to withdraw, but then you'll have to compete alone in this virtual world."

His voice was even, matter-of-fact. "Or would you rather play with me in a league where you can win something real?"

Mu Sicheng choked on his words, as if something had lodged in his throat. His breathing turned uneven.

"Shit," he muttered. "What kind of choice is that? Of course, I'm going with you."

Bai Liu slid his spare key into the lock but didn't turn it just yet. He calmly asked, "So, you're helping me bring in new people?"

Silence. The only sound on the other end of the call was Mu Sicheng's unsteady breathing. Bai Liu waited patiently, making no move to hang up.

"You're really good at this," Mu Sicheng finally burst out, frustration thick in his voice. Bai Liu could almost picture him ruffling his hair in irritation.

In the end, Mu Sicheng let out a resigned sigh. "Fine, I'll try. Just so we're clear—I've never led before, and I'm not some guild veteran who trains newbies. You bring me a recruit, and I don't promise to keep them alive."

Bai Liu smiled. "I always assume you can do it before it happens."

"You're ridiculous, Bai Liu," Mu Sicheng groaned. "You have to be running a pyramid scheme or something."

"I don't do illegal things," Bai Liu said smoothly, finally turning the key in the lock. His expression remained perfectly calm. "And when have I ever coaxed people into joining me?"

Inside the room, Muke turned around in surprise. Bai Liu had given him the spare key earlier, telling him to wait inside.

Muke clenched his fists, taking a deep breath. "When do we start playing? I'm ready to join the team."

Mu Sicheng, still on the phone, immediately scoffed. "Wait, that's Muke, isn't it? And you claim you don't sweet-talk people into joining you? Then how the hell did he end up on your bandwagon—"

Bai Liu crisply hung up.

"See you at the game, Mu Sicheng."

System: [Welcome player Bai Liu to the game, please take care of your safety.]

Bai Liu slowly opened his eyes. He was still dressed in his suit, trousers, and white shirt. Muke had logged in with him, but all players had random entry points. A bright red warning window popped up.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu has received a kill order.]
[System Alert: A friendly reminder to change your appearance to avoid being followed by the killer.]

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow.
[A chase order? Change my face at random, I guess.]

[System: Entering random face modification program – height change (174 → 161), hair color change (short black → long brown curly), lip color (flesh tone → cherry red), pupil distance widening, eye width enlargement…]

His clothes shrank and adjusted to fit his new form. Bai Liu examined himself—an innocent, harmless-looking high school girl. He fell silent.

He couldn't agree with the system's aesthetic choices.

Still, this disguise greatly reduced his chances of being recognized. Unfortunately, Mu Sicheng had an uncanny ability to track him down. The man claimed Bai Liu "smelled like copper" and could be sniffed out from a few hundred meters away. True enough, it didn't take long for Mu Sicheng to find him.

Mu Sicheng, initially serious, ended up staring at Bai Liu's altered form—a petite, flat-chested high school girl with long wavy hair.

"...You actually have this kind of hobby?" he asked.

Bai Liu ignored him, tugging his skirt down to cover where Mu Sicheng's unsettling gaze lingered. "Look again, and I'll kill you," he said flatly. "I've received a chase order. What's going on?"

"Yeah, that's what I came to tell you." Mu Sicheng's expression turned grim. "A guild has issued a direct bounty on you."

A chase order functioned similarly to those flashy advertising fireworks Bai Liu had seen before—a public notice sent to all players. It required points to broadcast, much like the loudspeaker announcements in online games he'd played years ago. The moment it was triggered, every player could see it.

As Bai Liu spoke, another virtual firework exploded above his head. Golden embers rained down, and a system notification popped up.

[System-wide announcement: The Scavenging Zombies Guild has issued a kill order on player Bai Liu.]
[Hunt details: The Scavenging Zombies Guild promises to kill Bai Liu within three days and seize the (Siren's Fishbone) and (Ghost Mirror) from him to prepare for the season! All players are welcome to watch! Please support the Scavenging Zombies Guild in the league!]

"The Scavenging Zombies Guild?" Bai Liu stroked his chin. "Is that a small guild? Never heard of them."

"It's not a small guild," Mu Sicheng said, looking exasperated. "Bai Liu, you should pay attention to something other than points. You're going to the league. Learn about the major teams and guilds."

Bai Liu shrugged. "I didn't see them in the top 10 of the league's guild ranking. If they're not even in the top 10, they're a small guild, right?"

His voice and expression were neutral, a genuine inquiry with no hint of mockery—but Mu Sicheng felt like Bai Liu had just roasted the Scavenging Zombies Guild to death. He stifled a laugh.

Then he sobered up. "They're not small," he repeated, pulling up the system panel. Swiping through the league's rankings, he finally stopped and showed Bai Liu the screen.

"They might not be the most famous, but they have two very well-known players." Mu Sicheng pointed at two profiles. "These guys are the guild's founders and top players."

"They're also just a step away from reaching S-rank." Mu Sicheng met Bai Liu's gaze seriously. "They're on a completely different level than Zhang Gui's type. These two are pro-tier. Killing is second nature to them."

[Player: Miao Feichi]

Total Points Ranking: #134
Guild: Scavenging Zombies
[Player: Miao Gaofu]

Current support ranking: #107 (230,000 support points) – Unlocked the Death-Free Medal
Total Points Ranking: #179
Guild: Scavenging Zombies

Their player profiles included a video thumbnail labeled:

[Highly Popular Support Video] – [Mix: Best Duo of the Year ~ Scavenging Zombie Highlight – A Bloody Father-Son Duo Who Rip and Tear Without Mercy]

The video was free to watch. Bai Liu clicked in without hesitation.

Three minutes later, the video ended, pausing on its final frame. A man with a shackle over his mouth unlatched it with one hand and lunged, teeth sinking into another player's back. The victim screamed, blood splattering everywhere.

Beside the man stood a tall, Qing Dynasty zombie-like figure with greenish-purple skin. The monstrous player casually swatted an opponent away, appearing utterly unbothered by their attacks. His presence was imposing—steady, mature, and deeply unsettling.

"The crazy one biting people is Miao Feichi—he's their main damage dealer," Mu Sicheng explained. "The zombie-looking one is Miao Gaofu. He's the tank, ridiculously high defense in that form. Typical DPS and shield combo. And since they're father and son, their teamwork is insane."

Bai Liu rewound the video, rewatching the clip of Miao Feichi biting someone. Resting his chin on his hand, he asked, "So this Miao Feichi guy attacks by biting people?"

"No, he fights with dual blades. He eats people because—" Mu Sicheng hesitated, his tone complicated. "Miao Feichi has an… cannibal fetish. He enjoys eating corpses. Fresh corpses. He was imprisoned for attempted crimes in real life, but since it was only an attempt, he got out."

Bai Liu looked up. "To put it simply, he likes eating kids and got caught trying to abduct one?"

Mu Sicheng fell silent for a moment. "...Yeah."

But Bai Liu barely reacted. Instead, he tapped his chin in thought before looking at Mu Sicheng with great sincerity. "But I've been so low-profile. Why would they target me?"

Mu Sicheng stared at him blankly. "...Are you serious?"

Bai Liu, still in his short skirt, looked puzzled. "So it's just because I look tastier?"

Mu Sicheng: "……"

Don't actually believe that!!!

A three-day kill order on Bai Liu by the Scavenging Zombies Guild has caused an uproar among players, turning the forums upside down.

[Rational Discussion]: If the Scavenging Zombies get their hands on Bai Liu's weapons, could they break into the top 20 this year?

OP: I'm tempted to bet on them.

1L: Wake up, OP. You're overhyping a newbie weapon. This is the league! The best weapons and props that guilds have gathered all year are on display. Bai Liu's gear isn't on the same level.

2L: The Scavenging Zombies are clearly using this as a publicity stunt. Bai Liu's whip doesn't even have decent output against minions or monsters. How is it supposed to compare to top-tier weapons? Honestly, I think Miao Feichi's twin blades are stronger. At least they can deal real damage.

3L: If we're talking about the duo competition, I could see them making top 20. But in the team competition? No way.

OP: But isn't the data on Bai Liu's two godly NPC weapons still unknown? What if they're bugged? The Scavenging Zombies might have a real shot if they get their hands on them!

5L: OP, you've been completely brainwashed by guild marketing during the support season. Can't you see that the King's Guild is selling the broken Ghost Mirror to the Scavenging Zombies? If it were actually useful, the King's Guild would've kept it and completed the set themselves!

The King's Guild has top-tier appraisers and repair specialists. If they're getting rid of an item, it's because it's worthless.

6L: The Scavenging Zombies are just riding the hype wave. Bai Liu skyrocketed to second place on the New Star Rankings, and a lot of people started hyping him up as the next Spades. But let's be real—his panel stats are way too low. Against two experienced A-rank guild players, he'll be dead in no time.

7L: But isn't Bai Liu partnered with Mu Sicheng now? That makes things trickier. God Mu's movement speed is ridiculous.

8L: That depends on who's coming after them. If the Scavenging Zombies' ace duo is hunting them, Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng are doomed. Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi are both S-rank players. Miao Gaojiang has an S-rank defense stat, which makes him practically unkillable.

Meanwhile, Miao Feichi's "victory ritual"—eating his defeated opponents—sends his mini-TV viewers into a frenzy. The way his audience throws money at him after every kill? Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng can't compete on any front. Bai Liu just doesn't have the firepower, and while Mu Sicheng's speed might let him evade Miao Feichi, it won't be enough against Miao Gaojiang.

9L: Bai Liu isn't a damage dealer; he's a strategist. He even beat the Puppeteer. Don't underestimate him.

10L: Are you new here? First of all, the Puppeteer's panel was only A-rank, and he's never competed in the league. He's nothing compared to Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang.

Zhang Gui's intelligence-based gameplay had serious limitations. His fans kept hyping him up, saying he'd make waves in the league, but now that he's dead, I can finally say it: his playstyle wasn't even close to what you'd expect from someone with a 93 intelligence stat. It was basic.

Miao Gaojiang, on the other hand, is an intelligence-based player. [Link: Top 10 Smartest Counter-Kills in League History]—a video with over 2 million views. One of the featured moments? Miao Gaojiang taking down a King's Guild duo in a two-player match using pure strategy.

By the way, Miao Gaojiang and Bai Liu both have an 89 intelligence stat. The difference? Miao Gaojiang has actual league experience.

That being said, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang are way out of Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng's league. It's unlikely they'd bother hunting down a newcomer. They're already in Level 3 instances.

This whole thing is probably just a publicity stunt. No need to worry. If you're a Scavenging Zombies fan, go ahead and place your bets—I watched a few of Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's practice matches this year, and they're in top form.

...

36L: Well, looks like I get to say I told you so. The Scavenging Zombies just made an official announcement: they are hunting Bai Liu. And not just with any random members—Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang themselves are coming for him. Miao Feichi even said they're going to win and celebrate on his mini-TV stream.

37L: ?!?!! WHAT?! The ace duo is personally coming after him?! Aren't they supposed to be running training instances right now? Why are they in a normal player's game?!

The forum exploded.

Inside the King's Guild.

A solemn-looking man weaved through the bustling crowd, clutching a system panel. He hurried toward an office marked by a striking red heart, its color dripping downward like fresh blood, staining the poisonous symbol of a red skull below.

The sight of the emblem made the man hesitate, swallowing hard before he finally knocked.

"Queen, the results of Wang Shun's comprehensive analysis of Queen of Hearts' mini-TV charge data are in. Would you like to see them now?"

"Come in."

The man stepped inside, his movements cautious.

A woman lounged on a black bench, a long pipe resting in her fingers. She wore a black and red embroidered cheongsam with a one-sided open front, sheer black stockings, and high heels. Her hair was styled into a loose bun, held in place by a long wooden pin. Black tassel earrings brushed against her bare white shoulders, and a shawl had slipped down her back, pooling around her wrists.

Her gaze was slightly rounded in the middle, the corners of her eyes tilting upward. A hazy color filled her irises, and her full, bright red lips parted as she took a slow drag from her pipe. She exhaled, the white smoke curling around her like an intoxicating haze. Despite the air of languid sensuality, the slight downturn of her eyes lent her an aloof, unapproachable presence.

The office was packed. Voices clashed in a chaotic symphony of debate.

"Queen's player charge support has dropped significantly this month..."

"We need to figure out a strategy. I think it's because the team play dynamic is overshadowing the Queen's individual charisma, splitting charge points across the team..."

"I told you we need to emphasize star players! Look at [Spades]! His strong personal style attracted a massive audience..."

"I disagree. The league focuses on team play! The season starts in two months—we can't lose sight of that. Even [Spades] is practicing team coordination now!"

"…Zhang Gui, our spare player, is dead. We're down one team member, and the new strategy still needs refining..."

"…There's also an important new member we need to integrate—[Forbidden Witch], currently number one on the Rising Stars list. Her personal skill allows her to both deal damage and restore HP, which is incredibly rare and valuable. But she hasn't trained with the rest of the team yet. She still needs thirteen more dungeon runs to qualify..."

Queen of Hearts rubbed her brow, then sat up, waving a hand lazily. Her voice carried the husky texture of a habitual smoker.

"Enough. Operations managers, stop talking and listen to the report."

The room fell silent in an instant. Everyone straightened, bowing their heads respectfully.

"Yes, Queen."

The man reporting took a cautious glance at the infamous team behind the Queen of Hearts' operations. He swallowed before speaking.

"This month, Queen's charge total is down 19% compared to last month. Peak viewership has dropped by 21%… Combined small TV figures are down 13.67%…"

"The gap between Queen and third place on the overall rankings, [Reverse Cross Cultists], has shrunk significantly. If this trend continues, we may be overtaken in the second half of the year. However, we still maintain first place in the high-value player ranking..."

Queen of Hearts listened with her eyes lowered before raising a hand, cutting him off.

"Direct the report toward audience loss."

"Oh… alright." The reporter clicked through his system panel, flipping to another page.

"Regarding audience loss, Wang Shun's analysis shows that a third of it comes from high-level players who are in direct competition with you, primarily [Reverse Cross Cultists]. However, that's not the majority of the loss."

He hesitated before continuing with a bitter chuckle.

"The remaining two-thirds… have gone to lower-ranked players. This batch of newcomers is incredibly competent and distinct. Their viewership numbers have surged."

"Whether it's [Little Witch], who tops the Rising Stars list with both healing and high-damage output, [Bai Liu], the control player who recently rose to second place, [Parrot], sitting at third with a 100% luck stat, or [Monkey Thief], who stole from Spades and got away with it in fourth…"

"All of them are significantly outperforming the usual standard for new players on small TV."

"The Witch is one of us. It doesn't matter if her numbers rise," Queen murmured, exhaling smoke. Her gaze sharpened slightly.

"Bai Liu? The one the system dubbed 'Second to Spades'?"

The reporter hesitated before deliberately choosing his words.

"Yes. This newcomer killed Zhang Gui, and his personal skill appears to be control-based as well. However, since we've been preparing for the tournament, we haven't pursued him for Zhang Gui's death… especially since we confirmed Zhang Gui simply wasn't strong enough."

"The broken lens we obtained was appraised and deemed nearly useless before being sold off. As for why he's been labeled 'Second to Spades'…"

"It's because of his weapon, right?" Hearts interjected casually. "A whip, just like Spades'. His is a white siren fishbone whip, while Spades' is a solid black lizard bone whip."

She let out a slow, almost amused exhale.

"A matching pair of whips, almost."

The room collectively held its breath, wary of her reaction.

Everyone knew—Queen of Hearts adored Spades.

How much? Enough to found the King's Guild as a tribute to him. The guild's very name, [King's Crown], symbolized her ambition: to build a vast and wealthy empire worthy of placing atop Spades' head.

But Spades had rejected her.

And not just once—every time he had the chance, he nearly killed her in the league.

Every time the pro players gathered and she approached to greet him, he would only look at her with his usual indifference and ask,

"Who are you?"

It was as if he had never even remembered her.

The Queen of Hearts. The top-ranked beauty in the game's history. The woman who had essentially "married" him with an entire guild.

A heartbreak that shattered the fantasies of every male player who adored her.

Yet none dared to say anything to Spades.

Because Spades was the kind of man who didn't seem capable of falling for anyone.

And to make matters worse, he would continue to kill her in every match, without hesitation.

Queen's expression darkened. For the first time, she looked mildly intrigued. Resting her cheek on one hand, she smiled languidly.

"That whip is interesting. It even carries a layer of god-ranked NPC attributes, with unknown stats."

The reporter hesitated. "The Scavenging Zombies Guild is issuing a hunt to take the whip. Queen, if you're interested—"

"I'm not interested," she said indifferently. Her tone was relaxed, almost dismissive. "A newcomer is just a newcomer. He’s not capable of standing in front of me yet this year."

She sighed, stretching back into her chair, her fingers lazily tracing the pipe. Her voice dropped to a whisper, half-lost in memory.

"I’ve seen Spades' whip up close. Do you think anyone else's could possibly compare?"

Her toes tapped lightly in the air, as if toying with the thought.

"Spades is the best," she murmured.

"Both the whip… and the man."

Game registration portal.

Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu are standing together. Bai Liu is looking around, searching for Muke. He asks Muke to wait for him at the entrance to the boarding area. Mu Sicheng’s appearance is also disguised, more elaborately than Bai Liu’s. He uses props to disguise himself as a bearded man and walks alone, clearly not being followed by anyone.

But soon, Mu Sicheng notices someone following Bai Liu, and he has no choice but to approach and warn him. However, something doesn’t feel right.

Mu Sicheng looks at Bai Liu suspiciously. "What level of appearance conditioning are you using?"

Bai Liu winks. "It’s free."

Mu Sicheng: "....."

Mu Sicheng’s entire body tenses up as he exclaims, "Bai Liu, could you be a little more stingy?! You're being hunted!"

"There's no point in spending money on this." Bai Liu eyes the game wall. "There's a gap after I enter the game where the numbers aren't satisfied, but by the time my little TV prompts me to enter, it's easy for a guild with many eyes on them to find me in a hundred games on the game wall."

Mu Sicheng frowns, realizing Bai Liu has a point.

"And if they want to catch me, I might want to catch them too?" Bai Liu suddenly looks at Mu Sicheng with a playful smile. His innocent expression in female form leaves Mu Sicheng frozen.

But Mu Sicheng quickly regains his composure. "You arrested them? What are you going to do with them?"

Bai Liu's eyes narrow slightly. "They want the fish bones and broken lenses on me, and I want what's on them."

Mu Sicheng furrows his brow. "What do you want from them?"

Bai Liu looks up at Mu Sicheng. "The broken lenses and their guild."

"I found out that all the other players in the competition have guilds, but we don't have one yet." Bai Liu speaks calmly, as if discussing something as trivial as asking for an extra egg with noodles. "I want one too. I haven't figured out how to get a big guild, but this… what's it called? A scavenger guild? It's worth trying."

Mu Sicheng stares at him blankly. "....."

For a moment, he's at a loss for where to even begin.

"It's a scavenger guild, not a herbivore guild." Mu Sicheng rubs his forehead, looking at Bai Liu with a mix of concern and frustration. "Bai Liu, can you stop using that casual roadside-sales tone when talking about taking over a whole guild? How many times do I have to tell you, this scavenger guild is not a small one!"

Mu Sicheng sighs deeply. "It would be much better for us to join a guild with their support, sure. But it's too late for us to start one. We don't have enough resources or players. And the Scavenger Guild isn't something we can just mess with. Their boss is a league veteran who can take down the King's Guild team, father and son. You've seen the video, they're not someone we can easily handle."

"I thought you were ready for a scattered entry." Mu Sicheng rubs his temples. "But now you're talking about robbing a guild? Give it up, Bai Liu. It's just not possible."

"I didn't say I wanted to steal it." Bai Liu gives Mu Sicheng a deadpan look. "I just want to control their boss and call on their guild's resources."

Mu Sicheng hesitates, then quickly counters. "That won't work. Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang are already in the tournament. Even if you control them, they can't join our team again. Players who've already joined a team can't switch. It's the rule."

Mu Sicheng continues, "Unless they forfeit the tournament, they'll use their guild's resources for themselves. Guild support can even be life-saving in a game league. And with your trading model, I don't think you'll be able to cross over and call on their resources, even if you control them."

Bai Liu stops speaking to Mu Sicheng and keeps his focus on the game wall, but Mu Sicheng persists.

"And the broken lenses?" Mu Sicheng frowns. "What's the deal with them?"

Bai Liu explains without missing a beat. "In this game, I can place broken lenses on others, or I can buy imitation broken lenses and pass them off as real ones. There are so many ways to confuse the props. They're after me partly for the gimmick to use for publicity, and partly for the broken lenses and other props I have."

"But to verify that the props I have are real, the broken lenses on me need to be inspected."

Bai Liu looks at Mu Sicheng. "Mu Sicheng, as a professional thief, what's the best way to check the goods without ever being wrong?"

"..... Put them together." Mu Sicheng thinks for a moment. "If it were me, I'd piece together the broken lenses. If I can reassemble it into a prop, it's real. If not, it's fake."

"So, you think they were carrying broken lenses?" Mu Sicheng squints at Bai Liu, who is a head shorter than him. "They could have taken the broken lenses from you and put them back together."

"Yes, they could definitely take the shattered lenses from me and reassemble them, but I don’t think that’s likely." Bai Liu continues scanning the game wall.

Mu Sicheng asks, "Why is that unlikely?"

"Because killing me in person to inspect the goods works best live." Bai Liu leans slightly toward Mu Sicheng, speaking lightly. "Aren’t they planning to use me for publicity? Killing someone to confirm the goods has the best effect, right?"

Mu Sicheng falls silent.

From a live perspective, it's true that the rewarding impact of killing Bai Liu in front of his face and then setting up a ghost mirror is much more satisfying, and the audience buys it, just like Miao Feichi eating his opponent in front of them.

If it's for a support campaign, this is indeed the option that scavenging zombies would choose.

There have been guilds that like to kill promising newcomers to boost their momentum before the league starts, or, more refinedly, the "dark horse killed, guild invincible." This happens every year, often to newcomers with no guild power but a lot of hype. Bai Liu was one of these dark horses.

The first of these was Bai Liu, who was even more high-profile and arrogant than Mu Sicheng, taking out the top-ranked Zhang Gui and stealing Mu Sicheng's place in the pecking order.

Mu Sicheng recalled the guild announcement he'd read about the scavenging zombies.

Miao Feichi, with his mouth in chains, posted a video on the guild's bulletin board, talking about killing Bai Liu to become a broadcaster.

"It's just that I don't really like eating people who are taller; smaller is better," Miao Feichi said jokingly. "It's a regular thing, a dark horse offering. How much you eat depends on how hard you charge it. I can eat more for you."

Miao Feichi licked his lips and sniggered. "It's not a shame to throw his meat away, it's not worth much to sell it."

Bai Liu looked strangely at Mu Sicheng, who had just thought of something, his expression suddenly becoming so fierce it seemed like he wanted to eat someone. "What's wrong with you?"

"Not really, I just thought of something that didn't sit well with me," Mu Sicheng grinded his teeth, but he quickly controlled his facial expression and looked at Bai Liu. "I'll follow you this time. The two of us together is better than you alone, at least, right?"

Mu Sicheng had already pestered Bai Liu for a while to join him in the game, but Bai Liu refused and asked him to handle newcomers.

Mu Sicheng was a bit annoyed. "If something happens to you, it's useless if I bring these two new people out, for fuck's sake."

"Until something happens, you can assume nothing will happen to me." Bai Liu patted Mu Sicheng on the shoulder and gave him a fake business smile to reassure him.

Mu Sicheng suddenly turned his head, his gaze over Bai Liu's shoulder to look behind him. He frowned and whispered to Bai Liu, "They're coming."

Bai Liu followed Mu Sicheng's gaze and saw two players approaching —one tall and one short. The lead player walked arrogantly, and the ordinary players around the boarding entrance quickly distanced themselves, forming a vacuum circle around him.

Players backed away not because these two were a flesh-eating zombie duo—no player in the hall could harm each other—but because of a system prompt:

[System alert for players who have logged in: Red player (Miao Feichi) is on the prowl. This player killed 12 players in a 50-player multiplayer copy yesterday. Please keep your distance from him and do not enter the same game with him easily to protect your personal safety].

Miao Feichi smiled wickedly at the hint, a smile that seemed to come naturally, with the smugness of being in control of someone's life and making them fear it.

Miao Feichi was a handsome young man with high shoulders and long legs, his appearance rather creamy. He looked good, and the feeling of him eating human flesh gave off a mysterious, elegant vibe—like a vampire. He had been in the top 20 of the small TV face area.

Bai Liu briefly scanned Miao Feichi's looks, objectively assessing him. His bone structure and facial proportions were far from Mu Sicheng's. Bai Liu felt that Miao Feichi had overdone his styling, intentionally making himself look oily and flamboyant.

Behind Miao Feichi was a silent middle-aged man—tall and strong, with a dark face, a string of Buddhist beads around his neck, two tusks curving from his mouth like elephant tusks, and a steady gait that made him seem more stable than the more flamboyant Miao Feichi.

It seemed that this was Miao Feichi's father, Miao Gaojiang, who played alongside him.

Miao Feichi strutted up to the game wall at the entrance, followed by a few people looking around for someone, obviously the Scavenging Zombie Guild players helping to find Bai Liu. This group of players seemed to fear Miao Feichi—an uncontrollable, biological fear of higher creatures that came from the lower levels of the food chain.

No one liked the way Miao Feichi looked at people, even his own subordinates. He squinted at them with the same eyes as if they were looking at food, like a piece of human flesh that was delicious.

In Bai Liu's words, it felt like a herd of herbivores trembling behind a carnivore.

This group of herbivores was desperately trying to please Miao Feichi.

"Brother Miao, have you come to see Bai Liu to play and relax? You really don't have to do this, we can handle it."

"It's not because of those forum players' nonsense, they've pissed off Brother Miao. Didn't someone say Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng playing together is definitely one of the attractions of next year's double match? I think even if Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng were to enter this match together, Brother Miao and Father Miao would still beat them easily!"

"Eh." Miao Feichi's eyes narrowed at the praise, and he stopped his followers from going overboard. "You guys talk too much. But I still hope he's not with Mu Sicheng. After all, I can't eat one meal with two adults."

"Fuck." Hearing this, Mu Sicheng, who was hiding in the crowd, cursed under his breath and tried to roll up his sleeves and go forward, but Bai Liu quickly grabbed his wrist and gave him a look that told him to stay put.

"Fuck." Mu Sicheng couldn't help but mutter, "Miao Feichi is the most careful player I've ever seen in the league. Didn't someone say on the forum that we were good together and would have no problem beating them next year? I think that's why Miao Feichi is taking advantage of you. He just can’t stand newcomers who play better than him."

But as hard as these herbivore followers talked, it was basically the main opinion of many players on the forum.

Apart from Bai Liu's fans and Mu Sicheng's fans who still believed in them, the rest of the players were rather pessimistic and felt that Mu Sicheng and Bai Liu would probably lose to Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang.

Zhang Gui was the only one considered a player of the right caliber, while Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang were professional players who were on a different level from Zhang Gui. Many gloomy players were already posting R.I.P for Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng, saying it was a pity the new pair wouldn’t play in next year’s league.

It was actually not surprising. Bai Liu had offended many people before—the support season was crazy with guild players and fans. He killed Zhang Gui, who was said to be a reserve battle player for the King's Guild, and topped a system review Spades second. The wind was in his favor, while arguably offending all the fans of the first and second most powerful guilds in the battle.

This wave of publicity for the Eating Rot Guild to kill Bai Liu wasn't a big deal for these players, but it was worthy of some praise.

Bai Liu lowered his voice. "Go bring in the newcomers. Don’t stay here and watch the fun."

Mu Sicheng gave him a resentful glare. "So you’re determined not to let me follow, are you?"

"Right." Bai Liu readily admitted. "You bring up the newcomers well and take Xiang Chunhua and the others to brush up on the multiplayer copies of the first-level game."

Mu Sicheng was still trying to struggle. "I can take them with you! That's bringing in new people, isn't it!"

"The only new game on this wall is a level 2 copy, and since I have Miao Feichi as a veteran player, I can't go to the old game. Only the new one." Bai Liu's tone was calm. "I don't think you and I are capable of taking three newcomers through a level 2 copy. Are you tired of being buried for me as a group?"

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth and tried to calm himself. "But at least I'm here! At least I can beat that idiot Miao Feichi. My personal skills can beat him! I've found enough black fingers to at least fight Miao Feichi! You're playing with two S-rank players by yourself!"

"What about Liu Fu, Xiang Chunhua, and Muke?" Bai Liu looked straight at Mu Sicheng. "If you force new people to help me in this copy, do you care about their lives? If you don't bring Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu and leave them to practice on their own, how will you practice with them?"

Mu Sicheng pursed his lips grimly, not saying anything, but clearly acquiescing—he just didn't want to cooperate with these three people.

"I'm not only practicing Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu, I'm also practicing you," Bai Liu said lightly. He didn't lecture or retort harshly, just looking up at Mu Sicheng. "I won't die. I didn't die last time alone against the Ghost Mirror, I won't die easily this time either. You should have this basic trust in me."

"I'll come out, and we'll still be in the league together." Bai Liu's tone was calm. "I'll do what I say. I haven't lied to you yet, have I, Mu Sicheng?"

Mu Sicheng gritted his teeth and finally, his voice a little hoarse, he reluctantly replied. Yes, he was indeed more stubborn than Bai Liu.

Bai Liu let Mu Sicheng go.

Bai Liu, being short, searched the crowd quickly and eventually found Muke in a corner of the entrance. Muke was stunned at the sight of Bai Liu, but remembering that the game allowed him to change his appearance, and that Bai Liu's voice was unmistakably his, Muke couldn't mistake it.

For it was this voice that saved him.

Bai Liu briefly explained the current situation and asked, "We'll face a hunt after we get in. Are you sure you're with me? You have one last chance to backtrack. I just saw a guy who doesn't look as good as you make it to the front row of the face section by hunting and eating. With your looks, you should be able to make it better than him."

"... I'm with you." Muke looked at Bai Liu with certainty.

"OK. We can't go into the old games if we're being hunted, because the old games have been played and we don't have an advantage." Bai Liu spoke quickly. "Actually, the safest thing is single-player, but the single-player games are all too low in terms of take-up, and the single-player games on the game wall are all full, so we'll have to pick some new multiplayer copies. I've looked around and only found one."

"We may have seen this copy before," Bai Liu said, looking up at Xiang Muke. "It's called 'The Loving Welfare Home.'"

Before entering the game, Mu Sicheng once asked Bai Liu how the [real world] could be explained if [parallel time] did not exist, and everything had a single and predetermined outcome. It was like Bai Liu's case with the orphanage—if he didn't choose the orphanage game, he wouldn't die there and leave a trace.

But now, it seemed that an invisible hand was at work. The chase, the robbery, the raid by the senior league players, and other events were all linked together, forcing Bai Liu to walk along the only predestined track he saw.

It felt like the only option before him now was the game with the orphanage.

Lu Yizhan was fond of saying that there was a heavenly will, and if the [heavenly] meaning of this game was for him to take part in it, then he couldn't escape in any way—or, rather, he didn't want to escape.

Bai Liu looked up at Xiang Muke. "Let's split up and enter the game separately."

On the wall of games, the icon of a deadly children's orphanage gate suddenly lights up.

[Game Copy Name: "Love Welfare Home"]

[Level: Level 2 (Games with a player mortality rate greater than fifty percent and less than eighty percent are Level 2 games.)]

[Mode: Multiplayer (0/6)]

[Comprehensive Description: This is a horror game that involves deciphering two lines of operation. In this game, the player has two identity lines, and each identity line is equivalent to a part of your body. Protecting the child is protecting yourself, and killing the child is also protecting yourself. How will you choose in the end? Will you choose to be a child or remain a dirty adult?]

[The game "Love Orphanage" has collected two players. Four more players are needed to start.]

[System Alert: Your favorite player Bai Liu has logged in to the game! Please go and watch!]

The sound of the prompt made Miao Feichi's eyes glaze over. He grunted meaningfully, "Think I can't find you if you run away to the game? There are only so many games you can get into."

Miao Gaojiang said succinctly, "Bai Liu would choose a new game. He has no advantage over older games." His eyes scanned the wall before settling on a game icon in the corner that no one seemed to be interested in.

The game's icon was a dark and dreary gate of a children's home, with a few children faintly visible, jumping and playing in the doorway— a new game Miao Gaojiang had never seen before.

"A Loving Orphanage?" Miao Feichi looked at the children on the icon and licked the roots of his teeth, which were beginning to itch. His eyes turned salivating and bloodshot. "That's a name that's right up my alley."

"Brother Miao, make sure all the games on this wall are either logged in or old, except for this 'Love Orphanage' game. Only this one is logged in, and it only has two players."

"Two people?" Miao Feichi snorted. "Looks like Mu Sicheng is with him for a piece. Well, this is a secondary game. I don't want to bring anyone. If I bring you guys, I'll have to distract myself from looking after you. Just me and my dad will be fine; you guys can go back."

With that, Miao Feichi logged into the game, dragging Miao Gaojiang, who had only spoken a few words, along with him.

[The game "Love Home" has collected 4 players. Two more players are needed to start.]

[System Alert: Your favorite players Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang have logged in to the game! Please go and watch!]

Players at the entrance to the game watched as Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, a father and son, followed Bai Liu into the game.

They were all a bit scared, looking at the "Love and Welfare" icon. Not many of these regular players would have had the guts to play a new game in the first place, and the fact that there was a pair of league players who were about to go on a killing spree made them stay away.

However, there were also players who had been staring at the orphanage icon since Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang logged into the game.

Liu Huai looked dead on at the gate on the icon of the "Caring Home."

This gate was identical to the gate of the orphanage where Liu Jiayi lived!

Liu Huai, who also survived the "Last Train to Explosion," knew about the Mirror City bombing, but he hadn't thought about it before. However, he had been verbally baited by Bai Liu, and now he had come across a game that seemed to be designed from reality. A game designed after his sister's orphanage...

Liu Jiayi doesn't know anything about what happened to her at the orphanage because she is blind, but she has some very strange spotted bruises— like mushroom dots— all over her snow-white, thin body. When Liu Jiayi was asked, she also seemed at a loss as to where these marks came from.

In the real world, the investigation turned out to be food poisoning, but Liu Huai wasn't so convinced and unfortunately had no other leads.

But there were no clues in the real world, so he wondered if there might be some in the game, which seemed to be based on his sister’s orphanage.

Liu Huai gritted his teeth, equipped himself with his skills, borrowed some points from other players, and took a deep breath to enter the game as well.

[The game "Love Home" has collected 5 players. One more player is needed to start.]

The next second, Liu Huai entered the game. A little girl in a hospital gown suddenly appeared in a small corner of the boarding entrance.

She seemed to be blind. Her eyes looked around vacantly, as if she had not yet reacted to where she had arrived. She touched her arm, a little puzzled, called out softly to her brother, and then was just sucked into the game in general, instantly disappearing at the game boarding entrance where people came and went.

[The game "Love Welfare Home" has collected all players, and the game has officially started.]

The moment the system's login prompt signaling the start of this six-player game fell, five small televisions in the multiplayer area lit up at the same time.

One of the spectators, who had been prompted by the system to come in quickly, spoke up in confusion: "Isn't this a six-player game? How come I only saw five screens light up, and some high roller turned off the small TV?"

The top 100 players in the game in terms of total points ranking have the opportunity to close the small TV broadcast once a month. The highest total points ranking in this broadcast was Miao Feichi, but also 107, and it wasn't a live-stream access issue. But Miao Feichi, with a ranking so close to 100, could pay a large price to the system to buy the right to turn off his own live stream.

But a player like Miao Feichi, who relied on live streams to promote himself and who had pulled off such a big stunt specifically for the sake of publicity, would never turn off his live stream.

Miao Feichi didn't turn off the live stream, so who did?

But none of the other players were ranked in the top 100, not even close to being qualified to close the live stream...

The answer was soon found on a small player TV. A Bai Liu fan recognized the person on the TV as Liu Huai, who had followed Bai Liu through the previous round.

Liu Huai's face was pale as he looked at Liu Jiayi, who had suddenly appeared in front of him. He almost fell to his knees in a fit of weakness.

Liu Huai looked at Liu Jiayi, who was sitting dazedly on the ground, with uncontrollable fear in his voice: "Jiayi, how did you get in this game?"

Liu Jiayi also seemed confused, clutching her knees in some fear, still wearing her hospital gown. She shook her head gently in bewilderment.

Liu Huai's reaction startled her. Her foggy eyes clouded with tears, and her voice began to tremble with a sobbing tone, "I don't know. It's like I just fell asleep, and before I went to sleep, I wanted to see you so badly, brother. Then a voice said it would satisfy my desire and let me see you."

"I said yes," Liu Jiayi's voice trembled a little. "And then I came in."

"Brother, did I do something wrong? Did I? Did I say yes to something I shouldn't have?"

Chapter End Notes

A new horror game!!!!

Sensing Liu Jiayi's uneasiness, Liu Huai controlled his tone as best as he could. He hugged her and gently patted her back, trying to calm himself down. "No, Jiajia, you did nothing wrong. It's just a game."

"Yes, just a game," Liu Huai muttered, his eyes closing as if trying to hypnotize both himself and Liu Jiayi. When he opened them again, his tone was calmer. "Brother will take you to play games, Jiajia."

Held in Liu Huai's arms, Liu Jiayi clutched his coat and asked softly, "What game is it, brother?"

Liu Huai paused, thinking of Bai Liu, who sought to control Liu Jiayi's soul, and Miao Feichi, who had a dark appetite for children. Finally, Liu Huai hugged her tightly and let out a bitter laugh. "A game where all the bad guys are bad... except for you and me, Jiajia. You must stay close to me and not go anywhere, okay? You need to follow your brother and not wander off, okay?"

"Good," Liu Jiayi nodded obediently, "I won't wander off."

The group watching from the multiplayer area whispered to each other, surprised to see a first-time player skip the newcomer section for single-player and head straight into multiplayer.

If the girl's desire to meet her brother was strong enough, the system could have pulled her directly into the game where Liu Huai's brother was. Her small TV, meant for the [Newcomer Zone], should have placed her there, but she was logged into the multiplayer area, which had never happened before.

Open Door was a second-tier game, and even with Liu Huai's protection, this little girl could still be in danger. Liu Huai was already in a tough position in the game, and the only strong players left were likely Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, who had heard of Bai Liu's abilities and would likely be cautious of him, not easily manipulated.

There seemed to be no other powerful players for Bai Liu to control, leaving him with limited options. Some viewers who had some goodwill toward Bai Liu sighed, "I just hope Mu Sicheng plays well with him this time. Maybe there's still a chance."

Others, who were eager to see Bai Liu fail, scoffed: "Mu Sicheng's support is unreliable, Bai Liu's main output is terrible, and the one doing all the damage is Miao Feichi, the S-tier player. You're comparing an elementary student to a grad student?"

But then, one viewer browsed through all the small TVs in disbelief and asked in confusion, "Wait, of the five small TVs in this game, where's Mu Sicheng?"

"Bai Liu is in the game alone?!"

After confirming that there was no sign of Mu Sicheng, both fans who had rushed to worry about Bai Liu and those merely watching the chaos, along with those impressed by Bai Liu's hacks, were stunned.

A few seconds later, the group of onlookers, regardless of their stance, simultaneously exclaimed, "Fuck!!!"

Bai Liu logged into a dimly lit room on the first floor of the orphanage, which was locked. He smashed the door open and began searching the map, one by one.

He found nothing but couldn't leave, or perhaps the game wanted him to go back to the original room before he could leave the floor.

Bai Liu entered the room he had just logged into.

A small bench sat in the dark, cold room, with the evening light casting long shadows across the floor. Small benches were stacked in a disorderly manner on either side of the room.

At the classroom podium, directly opposite, was an old-fashioned radio, the kind that looked like it had been around for ten years. A cassette tape spun inside, the soft hum of a little girl singing a nursery rhyme coming from the radio.

"Born on Monday, the day of the moon
Baptism on Fire Day (Tuesday)
Wednesdays (Wednesdays) Marriage
Obsidian (Thursday)
Golden Obsidian (Friday) aggravated by illness
Saturday (Saturday) Dead
Sunday (Sunday) buried in the earth
This is the life of Bai Liu—"

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. He had heard this rhyme before. It was a nursery rhyme from the famous dark rhyme "The Rhymes of Mother Goose," called "Seven Days of Solomon." It tells the tragic story of a man's life, ending with the line: "This is the life of Solomon Grundy." But here, the rhyme seemed to have been altered, changing the name to his own.

As he listened to the rhyme, which repeated over and over, the shadow of a chair, refracted by the dull sunlight, slowly transformed. What appeared to be an empty chair in the corner gradually became a figure sitting in it. Bai Liu glanced at it, but from his perspective, there was nothing—just an empty chair.

Suddenly, the shadow leaped from the chair and darted toward Bai Liu. He didn't flinch, thinking it was just an introductory animation, like in the previous game. He watched as his own shadow seemed to dissolve into the fast-approaching one.

Bai Liu's shadow lengthened and stretched in the fading light, twisting and curling, extending into the doorway before abruptly breaking through it.

At that moment, the nursery rhyme cut off abruptly, and there was a knock at the door.

"Hello, are you an investor in this orphanage?" A boy's voice asked politely, though it still carried the rasp of a teenager's voice still changing. "I'm the child who came to report today."

But Bai Liu immediately noticed the coldness and impatience hidden beneath the politeness of the voice.

Bai Liu recognized the voice—not exactly, but it was strangely familiar. So familiar that, the moment the person spoke, he could detect all the emotions buried beneath the calm tone.

After all, ten years ago, Bai Liu spent every day listening to this voice.

Bai Liu stepped on the distorted shadow and slowly opened the door.

"Hello, I'm the new sponsored child." Outside the door stood a small teenager, barely above Bai Liu's chest, with dark, ancient eyes that looked at him with a hint of scrutiny, which he couldn't quite hide. The boy seemed to be sizing Bai Liu up and, after a moment, extended his hand with deliberate courtesy. "Hello, investor. My name is Bai Six, and I am the new child who has been told to come to this private orphanage."

Bai Liu rubbed his chin and scanned the shy teenager up and down. "Let's see... I'd say you're almost fourteen."

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has successfully met and interacted with the secondary identity line, triggering the child identity line. Player Bai Liu has entered dual identity operation mode.]

[System Tip: In "Love Welfare Home," players have two distinct identity lines. One is the adult version of you, and the other is your child version. The adult you is the main identity line, while the child version is the secondary identity line. It is a character that fully complies with the game's world-building and shares many similarities with the player's younger self. Bai Liu raised an eyebrow slightly as he looked at the system screen, where multiple panels had popped up.

His primary identity was that of an investor, and the child in front of him, Bai Six—Bai Liu glanced over slowly.

Fourteen-year-old Bai Liu seemed uncomfortable with being looked at too directly, slightly turning to avoid Bai Liu's gaze.

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze with a faint smile, thinking how much of a nuisance he was at that age—smelly and difficult.

Bai Liu stood in the corridor outside the classroom and looked around at the layout. It was confirmed—this was indeed the same orphanage he'd visited before.

The children's park in the center of the three buildings had large equipment like a slide, and in the distance, there was a separate canteen—something the dilapidated children's home Bai Liu had seen no longer had.

He glanced at the dates of various children's awards hanging on the classroom walls and concluded this must be the orphanage from ten years ago. It seemed, as he had guessed, the main plot of this copy took place back then, when the orphanage had just been completed.

Bai Liu continued looking around, seemingly searching for something, when Bai Six gently reminded him, "It's Sunday, a regular inspection day, and the children and teachers aren't here."

"Sunday is inspection day?" Bai Liu turned to Bai Six. "Is this orphanage inspected every week? What do they check?"

Bai Six shook his head. "I'm not sure. I only just arrived and haven't been checked yet. My admissions code states that every Sunday, all children are to leave the orphanage for a full body check-up. Those who fail the check-up stay for treatment."

"But many children who go there every week just stay for treatment and don't return..." Little Bai Six looked up at Bai Liu. "The empty places are wasted, so every week, new children are brought in. I came this week."

Sunday was check-up day, and many children who failed the exam stayed for treatment and never returned...

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes, recalling the nursery rhyme: "Obsidian Day (Sunday) is buried in the earth."

It seemed that most of the children left there were "buried in the earth."

As Bai Liu continued to think, the system suddenly sent a reminder.

[System Delivery Props: Each investor and their child are equipped with a one-to-one, single-line walkie-talkie.]
[Code of conduct for walkie-talkies: Only one-way communication from the child to the investor is allowed. Players are prohibited from purchasing other communication tools to interact with the child, and dialing from the investor to the child is forbidden.]
[Intercom dialing time: 21:00–24:00, 6:00–9:00. Calls outside these times will be blocked. Each child can dial in these two time slots every day. Please moderate communication to give children space to grow.]

No sooner had the system announcement ended than Bai Liu looked down to find a large, unwieldy "Big Brother" walkie-talkie with an antenna in his hand.

Meanwhile, Bai Six's walkie-talkie was a small child's mobile phone, half the size of his hand, hanging from his neck on a thin pink Hello Kitty strap, looking like a toy.

Bai Liu smiled slightly. "It suits you." He shook the "Big Brother" walkie-talkie. "From nine to twelve every night, and six to nine in the morning—if you need anything, just call me. I'm always on."

"I'm not going to call you," Bai Six replied with a deadpan expression. "It's a waste of my time."

Bai Liu had expected this response. He sighed, forehead twitching, and quickly offered a solution. "I'll pay for it. I'll bill you by the minute if you call me."

Little Bai Six's normally expressionless face wavered visibly. He turned to Bai Liu and hesitated. "How much?"

"How about a hundred dollars a minute? By the minute," Bai Liu said without missing a beat.

Little Bai Six quickly agreed. "Deal."

As soon as Bai Liu spoke, the bell rang outside, and the closed metal doors of the orphanage opened. Children chattered excitedly and rushed in behind their teachers, who scrambled to settle the small, bird-like children back into their nests.

The two Bai Lius—one large, one small—stood in the corridor of the building, looking down at the innocent, carefree children running and jumping downstairs with the same indifference in their eyes.

Little Bai Six suddenly looked sideways at Big Bai Liu and asked, "You don't seem to like children. Why did you sponsor me into this well-maintained orphanage?"

"What kind of investor do I look like to you?" Bai Liu asked, amusement dancing in his eyes. "What makes you think I don't like children?"

Though he did dislike them.

"You look a lot like the Long Thin Ghost," Bai Six said calmly. "With your expensive suit and tie, pale face, and rumors about the Long Thin Ghost—he hates children so much that he kills them, rips out their organs, and eats them."

Little Bai Six calmly described his impression of Bai Liu.

Bai Liu was reminded by this description. He looked down at himself and saw that he'd somehow changed from his high school girl look to a very formal suit with a tall black hat.

He searched for a mirror in the classroom washroom and found that his face had indeed changed.

His face was thin and pale, with large bags under his eyes, and his fingers were long and thin, almost like skin wrapped around bones.

He did resemble the rumored child-killing maniac, the horror creature "Long, Thin Ghostly Shadow."

"All the investors here look exactly like you," Little Bai Six added faintly. "All suited and short-looking, not the type to do good deeds before they die."

"You've got a foul mouth, little friend," Bai Liu said, raising his eyebrows. "Why don't I look like someone who does good deeds before they die? Isn't investing in you one of the good deeds I've done?"

Little Bai Six gave him an unamused glance. "Are you sure that sending me to this orphanage, where children keep disappearing, is a good deed?"

[System Alert: The inspection day is coming to an end. The children and teachers have returned. Please bring your sponsored child to the registration office on the ground floor of the Pok Oi Building to register for admission.]

"Come on, little friend. I'll take you to the ground floor to register," Bai Liu said, preparing to head down from the third floor of the Pok Oi building.

As he did, he saw a [long, thin, ghostly figure] staring at him eerily from across the corridor on the first floor of the opposite building.

The man was holding a little boy with bangs in his hand. The boy seemed cute, though a bit gloomy and autistic, head down, resembling Muke when he grew up.

The investor was Muke.

And on the floor above Muke, an investor with twin knives in his hands also kept an eye on the child. The man dragged his long twin knives through the corridor like a homicidal maniac with a chainsaw, reminiscent of Texas Chainsaw Massacre.

Bai Liu stood in front of little Bai Six, watching the investor across the street with a smile on his face. The [long, thin ghostly figure] across the street observed for a moment and realized Bai Liu had been blocking his child.

The weapons were twin swords. If Bai Liu was correct, this was the infamous Miao Feichi.

This man was obviously looking for who Bai Liu was. After all, all the players logged in shared the same identity, and all had the same appearance as the long, thin, ghostly figure.

How could they determine who Bai Liu was in a pool of investors?

The most straightforward way was to look at the children they carried.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes and glanced behind him at little Bai Six.

Miao Gaojiang was leading his teenage self down the stairs when he noticed an investor waiting at the exit of the building. This made Miao Gaojiang instinctively reach for his weapon, but the man's next words quickly made him lower his guard. The investor across the street was cursing under his breath, "Dad! I see a teenage me! What the hell is going on?"

"Feichi?" Miao Gaojiang looked at the man across the way with uncertainty. He was cautious and suspicious. "Are you really Feichi?"

In a game like this, where everyone's original identity is the same, it's too easy to impersonate someone else. The only real way to confirm someone's identity is by looking at their child.

But Miao Feichi wasn't the type to care for children—he preferred to eat them. Yet, Miao Feichi wasn't a pervert who would consume himself.

As a teenager, Miao Feichi had just awakened to his cannibalistic tendencies. Starved and desperate, he would try to eat anyone he encountered.

"I was shocked when I opened the door and saw a teenage version of me guarding it," Miao Feichi grumbled. "He had to follow me around, and the little pervert kept eyeing me like he wanted to eat me. I told him to get lost."

Miao Gaojiang didn't trust anyone who came to his door too easily. But the details of what Miao Feichi said aligned with his experiences.

Miao Feichi had always been flamboyant and reckless, and with his high strength, he did whatever he pleased in this secondary game. When faced with a teenage version of himself, Miao Feichi's first instinct wouldn't have been to engage in a pleasant conversation to trigger the quest, but rather to chase the other away aggressively.

Miao Gaojiang understood this, yet, knowing that another player like Bai Liu had a high intelligence value, he couldn't dismiss the possibility that someone might try to impersonate others based on their identical appearances. So, Miao Gaojiang hesitated before introducing the game rules and probing for some key information.

After a few questions, Miao Gaojiang's doubts began to clear up, but he still wasn't fully convinced. "I need to be sure you're really Miao Feichi. Tell me something only you would know."

Miao Feichi was impatient. "Like what?"

"Like how we got into the game in the first place..." Miao Gaojiang said, his seemingly innocent expression betraying a deeper intent. "Like after you ate human flesh—who was the first person you ate?"

Miao Feichi licked his teeth, recalling the taste, then narrowed his eyes. "The first person I ate was my mother."

"She had a serious illness, and the family couldn't afford her medical bills. After she was discharged from the hospital, the money kept being spent on her, all the money that should have gone to me. One night, she asked me to bring her water. I gave her a glass of boiling water, and when she drank it, her lips and throat emitted that scalded aroma."

"She died the next day," Miao Feichi clicked his tongue. "Before the burial, I told you I wanted to eat her body, and it freaked you out. But I know you didn't mind her dying sooner, you always wanted her gone. She was just someone to sleep with, and I couldn't understand why you kept wasting money on her. After she died, I went on a hunger strike for a few days, and you cut up parts of her for me to eat."

"But honestly? It wasn't that good." Miao Feichi grimaced. "She was too old—the meat was dry, stringy, and smelled like medicine."

"As for getting into the game..." Miao Feichi continued irritably, "It's because of that kid. You took me to dig up a mass grave for a while, and I ate rotten, dead flesh. It was terrible. I wanted fresh meat, and that kid—he was just some homeless runaway, crying about bad things happening at his orphanage and begging me to call the police."

"I figured no one would know if I ate him, but you let him go. When you did, the police found him. Suddenly, I was under surveillance, and my hunger grew unbearable. So, I entered the game, and I ate a finger of that kid raw. He cried so much, and you... you..."

"Alright, you're definitely Feichi." Miao Gaojiang sighed deeply, cutting off Miao Feichi's unfinished sentence. "Everyone in this game looks the same, so we have a code word to identify each other."

"Just the finger," Miao Feichi emphasized, as if the detail wasn't as significant as the act of eating itself. "That was the last piece of human flesh I ate before entering the game."

Miao Gaojiang didn't like this code word, but in their partnership, he generally gave way to Miao Feichi—his son—on trivial matters. He didn't dominate him, and he was extremely indulgent, otherwise, Miao Feichi wouldn't be so impatient with him.

So, Miao Gaojiang shut his mouth, pausing for a moment before asking, "Where is the child you invested in? Where did you get rid of him?"

"The little brat kept following me after I chased him away," Miao Feichi said with a wicked glint in his eyes. "But there are too many kids in this place, all of them looking tender and fresh. I reckon he's hung up somewhere. He hasn't had a taste of meat yet, and all these kids are basically walking human flesh. It should have appealed to him."

Before Miao Gaojiang could respond, Miao Feichi waved his hand dismissively. "Enough. Can't I just eat the kids and the opponents in this game? I can't even touch the game data? I think you're trying to starve your son. You're my father, but you can't even control my food and drink—always getting in the way. It's too much."

Miao Gaojiang looked at the children, so alive that they almost seemed real, and for a moment, he questioned whether they were just NPCs in the game or if they were real people, indistinguishable from those in the outside world.

"Go find your child first, and then head down to the ground floor to register," Miao Gaojiang said.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang hadn't yet arrived when Bai Liu reached the location, which wasn't unusual. The two of them needed time to find each other and confirm their identities first.

Miao Feichi gauged the situation and figured the man probably hadn't even noticed the little cub that had suddenly appeared.

Upstairs, Bai Liu saw Miao Feichi's little cub wandering around the orphanage alone, following various children with green eyes, looking like a wolf starving for raw meat.

Bai Liu entered the registration room with Little Bai Six and found two people already registered ahead of him. One was Muke, and the other —Bai Liu's eyes darkened as he read the names on the form.

[Due to blood ties, Player Liu Huai and Player Liu Jiayi activate the (Brother-Sister Identity Line), registering as brother and sister, doppelgangers with another identity line, activating a special two-line operation mode.]

[Player Liu Huai (Brother Identity Line): terminally ill investor at a children's home.]

[Identity features: Enjoys 50% of life value, but due to terminal illness, life value decreases over time. Find a way to renew life quickly!]

[Player Liu Jiayi (Sisterhood Line): Child sponsored by the investor to enter a loving orphanage.]

[Identity features: Enjoys 50% of life value, a pure and innocent sister, will enter the crisis-ridden orphanage. Players must protect her!]

[Note: For each player in the Brother and Sister status line, 50% of the life value is cleared to zero, resulting in death.]

The last time Bai Liu met Liu Jiayi, he had said she would soon enter the game, but he hadn't expected to see her so soon.

But how could Liu Jiayi, a newcomer, jump straight into a multiplayer game? Shouldn't newcomers start with a single-player game?

Is there a special connection between Liu Jiayi and Liu Huai? Could the system have pulled Liu Jiayi, the newcomer, directly into a game with Liu Huai? Bai Liu pondered. The pattern for these two clearly differed from his own and the others', no longer involving a younger version of himself, but an older brother with a younger sister.

Bai Liu saw Liu Huai's entry marked [Blood Brother and Sister], while Muke's was labeled [Investor and Sponsored Child].

However, Bai Liu noticed that despite it being a two-player mode, the life bars above Liu Huai and Liu Jiayi were still at fifty percent, meaning that clearing that fifty percent would kill the player outright. Bai Liu's group was slashing life points, but their total life value was still one hundred.

Liu Huai and Liu Jiayi, however, had their life values directly halved, making them much more vulnerable.

Bai Liu didn't think this was fair enough for the game. The system has often created mind-numbing ways to nerf players for the sake of fairness, and having been systematically nerfed twice, Bai Liu didn't believe the system would present players with an excessively cruel game.

This suggests that halving Liu Huai and Liu Jiayi's life value was a balanced trade-off within the game, fair to all players involved.

But for Liu Huai and Liu Jiayi, the two unlucky siblings who triggered this special mode, the unfairness was obvious. Liu Jiayi was a blind child, a newcomer to the game, and having their life value halved seemed particularly harsh.

While Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang didn't trigger any father-son identity line, as Bai Liu observed Little Miao Feichi, their pairing didn't evoke this bloodline identity. This was presumably related to Liu Jiayi.

Liu Jiayi, a blind child, entered the game for the first time in a multiplayer game. Bai Liu wondered what desires this child might have. He felt that Liu Jiayi's wish to regain her sight wasn't as strong as Liu Huai's. Intuitively, Liu Jiayi seemed to accept her blindness, perhaps being more attached to her brother. Given that the game ties everything to the player's desires, this could be the case.

However, Liu Jiayi was such a special child in every way that Bai Liu didn't feel he could make any definitive conclusions.

Bai Liu took note of this odd feeling of unease.

After registering, Little Bai Six was led away by the director.

Before leaving, Little Bai Six looked back at Bai Liu, expressionless, and raised his thumb and forefinger, rubbing them together in a polite gesture. It made Bai Liu want to laugh—it was the "money gesture."

Since Bai Liu had told him to call and pay, the child had remembered it ever since.

The children were taken into the orphanage, and Bai Liu, the investor, was led by the director to a building near the orphanage that resembled a ward, with nurses and a nurse's office. But there was no registration desk, and no doctors' offices for patient visits, just endless floors of inpatient wards.

The director explained that most of the investors were in poor health and lived there, visiting the children only on open days at the orphanage.

Bai Liu surveyed the place and deduced it was a private hospital building, not open to the public.

It seemed like the type of rehabilitation building he had seen before, designed for wealthy retired people, with minimal staff and doctors on-call.

But this wasn't a place for healthy retired people. It was a hospital full of terminally ill patients who were in desperate need of treatment. The lack of doctors seemed odd.

Who would treat these patients without doctors?

The private hospital was filled with patients who looked like ghostly, long, thin figures—some lying on beds, others shuffling slowly down the hallways, faces tightly bandaged. It was unclear how they could see through the bandages.

The air moved slightly as these patients breathed, causing the bandages to puff out, proving they were living people and not some urban legend of monsters.

In the intensive care unit, Bai Liu visually estimated that one patient must have been more than two meters tall, their feet dangling helplessly outside the bed. Their complexion was bruised, resembling the sickly, poisonous mushroom-like skin of the children Bai Liu had seen die before.

These stiff, sluggish, dying investors moved slowly through the corridors and wards. As Bai Liu crossed the hallway, their faces seemed to turn toward him, their long, thin arms and legs dangling like spiders. One of the patients grabbed his foot, then his neck, teasing him before quickly letting go with a weird, nervous cackle.

The Loving Welfare Home

The dean took them to the 9th floor, which was much less crowded than the floors below and seemed to have fewer severely ill patients. Bai Liu felt that the patients on this floor were about as sick as he was, intuitively because they were all roughly the same height.

From Bai Liu's observation, the sicker the patients in this hospital were, the more their bodies became elongated, resembling the "Long and Thin Ghost" phenomenon.

The little Bai Six's description of him was actually quite accurate. The boy's ability to perceive scary things made Bai Liu realize that he might have been consciously aware of this since he was fourteen.

There were twenty-one wards on the floor. The director gave Bai Liu a room, then said she had to go back to pick up the other investors.

Bai Liu was assigned room 906, located to the left side of the corridor. After observing the entire ward, Bai Liu found this private hospital quite strange.

The hospital was well-decorated and sophisticated, but the lighting was extremely poor. All the wards were hidden from natural light, so much so that Bai Liu had to turn on the lights during the day. Even with the lights on, the brightness was so low that nothing could be clearly seen. There were high-powered humidifiers scattered throughout the hospital, constantly spraying mist and making the whole place feel as humid as a southern summer day, filled with hazy water vapor.

A normal hospital would never have been built like this. It felt as though it were a place designed to prevent patients from dying.

The poor lighting and thick fog made visibility in the hospital very limited. If it weren't for the director, Bai Liu would have had trouble navigating the various passageways. The walls were slippery from the water vapor, and since Bai Liu was tall with long arms and legs, he could easily slip on the wet floors. This gave Bai Liu an uneasy feeling —if a chase occurred in the hospital, he would probably have trouble escaping.

Bai Liu scanned the entire ward and noticed three humidifiers, but only one dim light.

The more peculiar part was the hospital beds. Despite the hospital's upscale decorations, such as gilt lion-shaped bathroom taps, the beds were—strange.

Bai Liu lifted the white sheet on his bed and raised an eyebrow at the pile of straw beneath it.

It was a straw bed.

Bai Liu had only slept on such beds during his childhood in a relatively poor orphanage. They were uncomfortable and cumbersome, but cheaper than other types of beds. Straw needs to be dry to sleep comfortably, but when it's wet, it can rot and attract insects, leaving behind red bite marks. In very damp conditions, the straw can even grow mushrooms.

For example, in the corner of Bai Liu's bed, after lifting the sheet, he saw a dense cluster of gray mushrooms growing all the way to the wooden bookcase next to the bed.

A straw bed in a room with three humidifiers like this would be like a fungal petri dish. The straw would soon rot, become covered in worms, maggots, mushrooms, and all sorts of decomposers, crawling all over the bodies of those who slept on it.

In short, during Bai Liu's childhood, he would have rather slept on the ground than on a straw bed during the rainy season.

[System Alert: Please ask player Bai Liu (as investor) for the main quest—find a cure for his terminal illness.]

A remedy for renewed life...

Where would he find a cure? If this were a private hospital with a doctor, Bai Liu would have raided the doctor's office for prescriptions and medication by now.

But there were no doctors here, only a group of nurses pushing trolleys around the corridors. When Bai Liu entered the nurses' office, he glanced inside. There were no bottles, no pills, not even syringes or IV tubes. Just a few waist-high stainless steel trolleys that looked like the food trolleys in Bai Liu's company canteen, presumably used to deliver meals to the patients.

How could a hospital with no doctors, no drugs, and nothing but patients find a life-sustaining remedy for a terminally ill patient?

Wait, there's nothing but patients...

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed as he began searching the ward's bookcase.

There was a bookcase behind the door of the ward, behind the bed. Bai Liu hadn't paid it much attention at first because it was full of old books. There were so many that Bai Liu didn't initially think of them as clues.

If Bai Liu had designed the game himself, he wouldn't have hidden clues in such overwhelming, unorganized information. It would have been boring for the player to search through a two-meter-high bookcase full of books with no hints.

But there was one exception: there wasn't just one piece of information that the player needed to discover.

Rather, except for a small number, the majority of the information in the bookcase was something the player should discover.

[System Prompt: Congratulations to the player for triggering the side quest—Searching in Medical Books (Life-Sustaining Remedies).]

Sure enough.

Bai Liu categorized the books in the bookcase. Some of the books were clearly irrelevant, like yellow women's magazines, so he discarded them. The rest were medical magazines and books, which had piled up heavily on the floor.

There were medical books in both Chinese and Western medicine, covering internal and external practices, women and children's health, and even some all-English medical journals.

As Bai Liu squinted, he noticed a slight sense of dissonance in the pile of medical books that had never been touched before.

There were no doctors in this private hospital, and these books couldn't have been read by doctors. But it was clear that the people who had read these books were patients with some general medical knowledge.

And these books were for the patients, or rather, for the investors, who were the residents of this ward.

So it wasn't that there were no doctors in this private hospital—it was that the patients living here were the doctors.

They were reading and healing themselves—strange sick people.

These investors were clearly worth a lot of money, so why didn't they trust doctors and instead self-medicate? Was it because doctors couldn't treat them? But if doctors couldn't cure them, what was the point of reading these books? After all, these were the same books that doctors would have read.

Bai Liu thought for a moment—it was clear that all the investors here had some form of terminal illness. So, aside from Bai Liu, someone must have started treating them—using the renewal formula. But the new patients, like him, couldn't get this formula for free. They had to find it themselves from this pile of books.

But for someone who wasn't particularly disciplined as a student and wasn't good at studying, Bai Liu's reading comprehension of these materials was inefficient. His grades in many subjects had been average. So, Bai Liu quickly and shamelessly decided to copy someone else's "homework" instead of reading through the books himself.

Now, the question was—whose "homework" could he copy?

Who in this hospital could solve the "answer" to the pile of books the fastest and most accurately?

Muke, who had also been brought to the private hospital by the director, had triggered the quest to find the cure by searching the bookcase and was now sitting on the bedside, staring at the pile of medical books.

He hadn't read a book since he graduated, and the books were so large that he couldn't even see if someone was walking a meter away from him, let alone read them.

The props could be sold to him, but they couldn't be used in the ward.

Muke was going to try taking the book outside, as it would be better than the dim light in this room.

But as soon as he stepped out of the ward with the book, he was startled when he opened it. A nurse patrolling the corridor with a stainless steel trolley noticed Muke about to leave with the book. The nurse gave a warning, saying, “Please don’t walk around with the contents of the ward. On the first day of admission, patients are not allowed to leave the ward and should stay inside.”

It seemed impossible to take the book out, so Muke retreated with a frown.

He had no choice but to try reading the book under the dim light.

After a short while, Muke felt overwhelmed. He was a fast reader, but reading in this light was so inefficient and disorganized that it was hard to come up with an effective treatment, or, as the system described it, a "remedy for life."

Muke realized it would be difficult to find the right answer on his own, but he couldn’t think of any other ideas at the moment.

The game’s hints were so obvious that it was clear the player was meant to look at the pile of books in the bookcase for the answer, which was Muke’s specialty.

He sighed anxiously as he looked at the book he was holding. It had been a long time since he felt unable to find an answer while reading. Muke had been a schoolmaster since he was a child, skipping several levels since junior high school. His intelligence score was also quite high when he entered the game, with 85 points.

His reading and memory comprehension skills were excellent, and if he had a relatively bright environment, it wouldn’t be difficult for him to read through the books and consolidate the clues to come up with an answer in three days. He was desperate to find a quick remedy for Bai Liu, but the dim reality was making him more and more irritable.

It took him an hour to finish a book. This was far below his usual speed!

Muke was considering how to proceed when his system panel suddenly vibrated. He saw an item added to his prop bar.

Muke wasn’t buying props right now, and it was clear that Bai Liu had just bought this prop. Bai Liu could manipulate his panel to buy props from space, which was one of their ways of communicating.

Since they were both in the ward, using this method of buying props was discreet and out of sight.

Muke clicked on his system panel to check the prop warehouse. The audience could see the system shop, but the warehouse interface was hidden. The warehouse would be encrypted to protect the player's property, so Muke and Bai Liu's private communication would go unnoticed by the audience watching on the small TV. It was a secretive method.

The only way their communication could be exposed was if Muke was suddenly killed, and the prop used for communication was dropped by his body. If another player found the prop and noticed something unusual, it could be revealed. For instance, if Bai Liu and Muke used a notepad or phone recorder for communication, the prop would fall in front of the player who killed Muke.

If Muke was killed during the exchange, or before he could erase the communication, the prop left behind might expose the exchange to others.

Of course, it was possible to encrypt the communication with a password to prevent easy deciphering, but how could they be sure the password wouldn't be cracked by someone else? How could they ensure it could be understood quickly by Muke?

Bai Liu didn't want to expose himself to the opponent, so he chose a less conventional prop.

Bai Liu bought Muke a black keyboard.

The keyboard was a familiar tool to both Muke and Bai Liu. Compared to notebooks, paper, or recorders—props that would leave visible traces of communication—snapping off the keycaps and putting them back on the keyboard was relatively unmarked and left no traces afterward.

The "code" on the keyboard was one that Muke and Bai Liu could quickly understand.

Even if Muke dropped the keyboard, the enemy wouldn't immediately associate it with communication, let alone with the information it contained.

Of course, another reason Bai Liu chose the keyboard was that, while browsing the system's discount sale, he saw this keyboard for less than ten points. Bai Liu thought it would work and bought it.

Muke froze when he saw the keyboard.

The [ctrl] and [c] keycaps were missing, a common shortcut combination: [ctrl] + [c] meant "copy."

Copy? What were they supposed to copy now? Shouldn't the priority be finding the cure?

Wait a minute! Muke quickly understood Bai Liu's meaning—Bai Liu was trying to copy (and renew) the cure!

Was Bai Liu trying to copy it? Could it even be copied? Where would they copy it? There were so many wards here. Did Bai Liu know which one had the remedy for life?

Muke thought deeply about it, then hesitantly snapped off the [?] and [numlock] keycaps and placed them in his storage, hoping Bai Liu would understand. He was a little worried that the other might not get what he meant.

The [numlock] key was a number lock key on a keyboard, but its literal meaning could be interpreted as "lock numbers." Combined with the [?] keycap, Muke was trying to ask: "Bai Liu, what number are we locking?"

The ward room numbers were all numerical. All Bai Liu needed to do was tell him the number to lock, and Muke would know which ward Bai Liu was referring to.

Soon, the keyboard Muke had stored disappeared and reappeared a short while later. The [ctrl] + [c] keycaps were back on, but three more keycaps were missing.

"One, seven, zero."

Muke was confused. The number zero couldn't be the first digit of a ward number, so the number before it could only be one or seven.

There were only three permutations of these three numbers: [701], [710], and [107].

The seventh floor was the operating theater, so there were no wards there.

This was a "space ward," and there was no ward [107] in this building. It was likely vacated for storage or something, but there was no such ward. There were only wards [106] and [108].

Muke felt uneasy. He couldn't understand what Bai Liu meant. He scanned the three numbers and considered all six permutations in his mind, then slowly sat up straight.

It was true that this private hospital didn't have ward numbers with letters, but it did have special monitoring rooms without numbers—like the ICU wards.

The ICU ward on the ground floor wasn't marked with a number, and the rest of the ground floor was made up of wards, except for this one. This ICU ward was most likely the same "space ward" that took the [107] number!

Bai Liu didn't use "ICU" directly because there were multiple ICU wards in the hospital, and not specifying the ward number could cause confusion. Since Muke had directly asked what the number was, Bai Liu simply used a clearer reference—he hadn't realized that Muke might not be able to make the leap and equate ward 107 with the ICU ward on the ground floor.

But Muke, with his sharp memory and ability to gather information, managed to understand what Bai Liu was trying to convey.

Bai Liu was trying to get to the ICU to copy the life-sustaining remedy!

"Fuck," Muke couldn't hold back a curse. The ICU was occupied by the hospital's original investor, a patient over two meters tall who looked like a ghost! This could be the monster in their copy!

The nurses had said that the patients in the ICU didn't leave the room all day. How were they supposed to get in to copy the remedy for life?

And how could they even be sure that there was a so-called "cure" inside?

Bai Liu was quite certain that the ICU had what the system called a [life-sustaining remedy].

If all the patients in the hospital were doctors, the older, sicker doctors would likely be the ones whose treatments could be copied.

Bai Liu believed that the ICU most likely contained the [life-sustaining remedy].

But whether they could access it was another matter.

The patients in the ICU weren't very human and didn't leave the ward. Bai Liu didn't have access and wasn't sure if going in would trigger a rampage from the patients—or monsters—inside. After all, Bai Liu wasn't there for any good reason; he was there to take things, which was risky.

But the potential rewards were high. If it worked, Bai Liu would be the first to get a copy of the [Renewal Remedy], giving him considerable leverage to trade with other players. However, breaking into the ICU posed significant challenges.
Point 1: How do I break in?

There are roving nurses in the corridors of this hospital. Patients who do something slightly against the rules and regulations of the hospital will be caught and corrected, not to mention trying to force their way into the ICU. If the player attempts to break in, they will need to exploit the nurses' patrols. The nurses are very fast, and at least in Bai Liu's estimation, he couldn't outrun them on the slippery ground.

Point 2: How do you turn things over after breaking in?

The patient in this ward is very wrong, mostly a monster, so it would probably be difficult enough to break in and find something in front of the other person.

Before Bai Liu could come up with a concrete solution, nightfall arrived.

At 9 pm, the nurse informed the ward that there was a curfew, and all patients were forbidden to go out.

The only sound in the corridors is the sound of nurses pushing trolleys back and forth. These nurses patrol the halls during their shifts, and when they see the dim light coming from the doors of the wards, they knock to tell you to turn off the lights and get some rest, much like the hostesses at Bai Liu's high school.

But the nurses were far less friendly than the aunts. Bai Liu opened the door to take a look at them. The way they patrolled the corridors at night in their high heels, their faces frozen in the mist from the humidifiers, reminded Bai Liu for a moment of the nurse monsters in Silent Hill.

The nurses' eyes glowed with a cat-like fluorescent green in the night, watching Bai Liu from afar. Trolleys darted towards him, and high heels thumped closer. Bai Liu quickly shut the door and locked it as fast as he could.

Soon, the trolley creaked to a stop in front of Bai Liu's door, and the nurse knocked twice, her tone low: "Patient in room 906, did you just open the door? Have you not read the hospital rules and regulations? It is strictly forbidden to go out after 9 pm, and the door to the ward can only be opened after 9 am."

The nurse questioned Bai Liu sternly while banging on the door, which was slammed against the frame in the dead of night.

Bai Liu, of course, would not open the door.

The nurse slammed the door once more and trailed off in a slightly creepy tone, "If you open the door at these times, the hospital is not responsible for your personal safety if something gets into your ward."

With that, the nurse moved away from Bai Liu's room.

Bai Liu furrowed his brow when he heard the nurse's words. It seemed like there was something out there at night.

This time period—9 pm to 9 am—seems like a restriction against opening the ward door, but it happens to coincide with the children's call times (6 am - 9 am and 9 pm - 12 am).

The child calls the investor exactly when the investor can't go out, and if the "something" the nurse mentioned earlier is a monster, then the monster roams around at the same time the child calls out.

It looks like Bai Liu took a big risk by calling him.

At 9:30, just as Bai Liu thought he wouldn't receive a call from little Bai Liu tonight, his walkie-talkie rang.

Bai Liu picked it up and heard a sound like bad contact, followed by the sound of someone running at breakneck speed, panting. It sounded like someone was running with the walkie-talkie, darting up and down.

Bai Liu remained silent, waiting until the panting subsided. On the other side, the voice said, "Hold on, something's chasing me."

After little Bai Liu said this, the system screen on Bai Liu's side popped up.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu for triggering the Monster Book with his secondary identity line]

[The Monster Book of Love Orphanage Refresh - Deformed Children (1/3)]

[Monster Name: Deformed Child]
[Features: Faster movement speed (350-600)]
[Weakness: ????? (to be explored)]
[Attack: Likes to play with the player's secondary identity line, and will make the player's secondary identity line disappear into the orphanage while playing]

After about five minutes, the sound of clothes swishing came from across the room. Little Bai Liu, who seemed to be hiding, lowered his voice and said, "Alright, it's not catching up for now, so you can talk."

Little Bai Liu's voice was a little shaky, but there was no obvious fear. He wasn't afraid of whatever was chasing him.

Bai Liu asked, "What's chasing you?"

"A kid," little Bai Liu said, still breathing unevenly. "Crouched on the ground, coming after me on all fours like a monkey. Very skinny, drooling and smiling all the time. Strange looking, like one of those congenital idiots who can't think straight."

He had been in an orphanage before, where people with Down's syndrome had a distinctive look: squinting eyes, flat noses, long mouths, fat and bulging cheeks, short necks, wide eye spacing, and eyes that always ran upward. People used to call them "frogs" because they looked like them.

Such a frog-like child was on all fours on the ground, drooling and giggling, chasing little Bai Liu... Thanks to little Bai Liu's obsession with money, he was willing to make the call. Otherwise, a normal child would have been scared to tears and probably would have hung up.

"So, has he gone?" Bai Liu asked.

"No." As soon as little Bai Liu answered, Bai Liu heard the child's small voice on the other end of the line and the sound of fabric scraping against dirt and gravel. The child chasing little Bai Liu was moving very quickly.

Little Bai Liu's voice trailed off as he went silent again.

All Bai Liu could hear was the sound of his rapid breathing, footsteps, the innocent laughter of the child chasing him, and the swishing sound of the trousers scraping the ground.

The noise grew louder. It seemed like the kid chasing little Bai Liu was dragging their lower body and would soon catch up with him.

Bai Liu stayed quiet, not disturbing little Bai Liu as he fought for his life.

After waiting for almost five minutes, little Bai Liu panted and spoke, "It's ready."

"Did you avoid him?" Bai Liu asked.

"No, he went after the others." Little Bai Liu's tone lacked any sympathy. "Some other kid came out to call. As soon as he did, he got chased. Now he's running while crying, and the kid isn't chasing me."

Bai Liu understood that there was probably only one creepy kid wandering around the orphanage. Since it had shifted its focus, little Bai Liu was safe for now.

He asked, "What happened after you were taken in by the dean?"

"Once we were brought in, it was the usual process. The orphanage people assigned rooms. Me and three other new boys were in one room. A little blind girl was in another building opposite us. We all stayed on the ground floor," little Bai Liu explained in an organized manner, providing the details Bai Liu would care about.

Little Bai Liu continued, "That child's phone was supposed to be confiscated. The teachers at the orphanage had forbidden us from carrying communication devices. But then they said we were new and needed time to acclimate, so they allowed us to keep them for a week with a time limit on calls, just like you said, and also forbade us from making calls in the room so we wouldn't disturb others."

"As for all the teachers and carers I met at the orphanage, they warned me not to follow the sound of the flute at night and not to go out if I heard it, because the flute-player would abduct children." Little Bai Liu's tone was calm. "I ended up hearing someone whistling a strange nursery rhyme on a harp outside at 9:30 pm."

"I didn't really want to go out, but the piper guy was too eager to save his spot. It was just a little after nine, but I couldn't help it. You said you'd pay me for every minute I called you, so I went out anyway."

Bai Liu thought of a fairy tale that fit this situation.

"Don't follow the sound of the flute..." Bai Liu said thoughtfully. "What comes to mind when you hear that?"

There was a moment of silence from little Bai Liu. "You mentioned this, so you should be thinking of the same thing I am, 'The Piper in Hamelin's Flower Cloth,' right?"

"That's the one." Bai Liu confirmed. "It's an English children's poem."

The story goes that in Hamelin, a town tormented by a plague, the townspeople were overrun by rats. They hired a piper to get rid of the rats. The piper played his flute, and the rats followed him into a river where they drowned.

The townspeople were grateful but refused to pay the piper. So, he played his flute again, this time to summon the children, who followed him, never to be seen again.

"Did you see who was playing the flute?" Bai Liu asked.

"I didn't see it," little Bai Liu replied. "The flute sounded in all directions. I felt like there was more than one person. But the flute player wasn't very skilled—he played wrong notes and kept repeating the same nursery rhymes for over half an hour. He sounded like a beginner."

"Did any children come out after hearing the flute?" Bai Liu asked.

"No," little Bai Liu answered quickly this time. "All the rooms have teachers or carers, except for us new ones. We're the only ones who could come out and call."

The cries of the child on the other end echoed with the eerie laughter of the child chasing him. Little Bai Liu seemed to remember something. "By the way, the one being chased is little Miao Feichi, another investor's child."

"Little Miao Feichi?" Bai Liu asked with amusement. "Why is he out on the phone? Oh, right, this kid has a bad habit. Stay away from him."

Little Bai Liu asked, "What's his problem?"

Bai Liu replied, "He likes to eat human flesh."

There was silence on the other end of the line. Then little Bai Liu spoke calmly, "I understand now. He didn't came out at night to make a phone call. He probably saw the child crawling on the floor and tried to come out. I thought he was coming out to call, but after you mentioned this, I think maybe he was using the phone call as a cover to feed."

Bai Liu chuckled. "He's a tough one to meet."

"I have a grudge against this kid's investor," Bai Liu said. "So, don't get too close to him."

Little Bai Liu asked in a somewhat odd tone, "You're going to save those two kids too? What's your relationship with them? Paying me to save them?"

"They're children a friend of mine wants to adopt." Bai Liu instantly picked up on little Bai Liu's implication and added, "I'm not as bad as you think I am, I'm not interested in kids."

Bai Liu then added, "But if you help them, remember your safety comes first. You're the most important to me."

There was a brief silence on the other end of the line before little Bai Liu emotionlessly stated, "Seventeen minutes and three seconds of talk time. That's $1,070. I'll send you the bill. Have a good night."

The call ended abruptly with a crisp "pop."

Bai Liu muttered to himself, "Was I this obnoxious when I was fourteen?"

The Loving Welfare Home

The following morning, Monday at 6:30 AM.

Bai Liu didn't want to sleep on the mushroom straw bed, so he spent the night on the floor with his books. The next day, he woke up and found that the pages on the floor were stuck together. The humidity in the room had been so high that the pages were soaked through and adhered to the floor, with a lot of dew on the walls. The humidifiers had been working non-stop, creating a humidity level worse than the rainy season.

But the three humidifiers in the ward had been ordered by the nurses to never be switched off, just as one of the rules of this hospital was not to use high-intensity lighting in the ward.

He sat quietly on the floor, waiting for a call from little Bai Six—the kid would surely call him in the morning for the money too, after all, it was charged by the minute.

By 6:45 AM, Bai Liu's walkie-talkie went off. This time, little Bai Six wasn't running, but breathing softly, his footsteps light, as if he had sneaked out on tiptoe.

"Good morning, Mr. Investor," little Bai Six whispered in an almost airy voice. "The kid who chased us yesterday is gone, and when I came out, I saw the teacher in the hallway talking about taking us to church today for a testimony to symbolize that we children, who have suffered, are officially in a place of refuge and that we are born again."

The children had been admitted to the orphanage yesterday, and today being Monday, little Bai Six's phrase immediately reminded Bai Liu of the nursery rhyme Born on Monday.

So, according to the nursery rhyme—Baptism on Tuesday—the procedure was that they should be baptized tomorrow.

"And then we're going to be baptized on Tuesday, tomorrow, to wash away all the suffering we've had out there." Little Bai Six said softly, "Parents have to be present when the children are baptized, but we don't have any parents except Liu Jiayi, so it's an open day for parents, so you can come in."

Bai Liu asked, "Did anything happen on your end last night?"

"The kids who went out to call last night, the room I was in had little Miao Feichi in it apart from me, but we both managed to get back to our rooms. Little Miao Feichi had been crying all night and looked like he should be okay. He ran quite fast. He was crying the whole time, but he didn't get caught," little Bai Six spoke in a flat tone. "But something rather strange happened in the early hours of the morning. I heard the footsteps of a child crossing the corridor and following the sound of a flute."

"These children were humming the nursery rhyme played by the flute. I got up to look at them, and felt that they should be awake, not sleepwalking. They were talking and laughing, and they were like the children described in that fairy tale, jumping in line and following the direction of the flute. But by the time it was almost dawn, I hadn't seen them return."

This was also consistent with what Bai Liu knew—that a group of children had followed the flute in the early hours of the morning and disappeared into a closed children's home, where they could not be found.

"Do you think the sound of that flute has a hypnotic or disorienting effect?" Bai Liu inquired thoughtfully. "Would you have wanted to follow it when you heard it?"

Little Bai Six didn't think twice: "No, it blew so badly that I wanted to go to the toilet."

"....." Considering that little Bai Six seemed to be very resistant to this kind of hypnotic suggestion, and Bai Liu was rarely guided during his real-world visits to the psychiatrist, he asked one more question: "Were any of the other children in your room affected by this flute?"

There was a moment of silence, as if remembering, and then little Bai Six spoke up. "I don't think so, except for little Miao Feichi, who cried all night. All the other children in the room were sound asleep."

Why did the children follow the flute of their own accord when it had no hypnotic or disorienting effect?

Bai Liu was lost in thought. Could it be that there was really a Piper set monster in this copy? But if it was such a set monster, why did it only lure away a few children each time? After all, the Piper's flute in the story was an indiscriminate attack that took all the children away at once, but this children's home version of the Piper only took a few children each time. How is this possible?

Little Bai Six's voice suddenly lowered. "The teacher is coming over to check us out. This time, the call time is 12 minutes and 37 seconds, rounded up to thirteen. That's a thousand and three, plus the thousand and seven from last night, making three thousand. Thanks for your patronage. See you next time, Mr. Investor."

When he finished, he hung up the phone very coldly.

Bai Liu was sure this time—little Bai Six had been timing the call with a stopwatch.

At 9:00 AM, announcements were made in the wards and corridors:

"Good morning, patients. After nine o'clock, you can open your doors and move around. For those who have searched for their medication, the nurses will bring it to your ward for administration in five minutes. For those who have not searched for their medication, please go to the hospital dining room on the ground floor for a meal. After that, speed up your search for your medication. You are already critically ill..."

Bai Liu opened the door and saw that other patients on this floor had also opened theirs.

After the night, it seemed that all the patients came out much more refreshed and less parched, as if they had been given enough moisture by the humidifiers.

In the corridor, there was a nurse pushing a trolley and running fast on her high heels to deliver medicine to some patients in the ward.

So, it looks like the medicine is a liquid, Bai Liu pondered and wrote it down.

Muke and Bai Liu had a code word before they moved in; these two were on the same floor, both on the ninth floor. Muke came out, the dark circles under his eyes heavier than before, like two students who had stayed up all night preparing for their final exams, both were playing hachems, and it looked like they had stayed up all night reading.

As soon as Bai Liu came out, Muke stared at him with such eagerness and concentration that it made people's skin tingle, like a cat still in high spirits after a long night's sleep, with the words "Come and fuck me" written all over its face.

This one looks like it’s time to wag its tail and ask for a reward.

Bai Liu obediently asked Muke: "Have you found anything?"

"This game wants us to look for prescriptions in medical books. I've read a lot of literature on the subject because I'm sick, and I know quite a bit about these. Last night, I wanted to split the work with you and read half of them each, but it turned out that the patient couldn't leave the room on the first day, so I just went ahead and read them. I read twenty-one last night."

Muke said, slapping his mouth again and snorting, his eyes watering from sleep. He couldn’t help but complain, "This game is set up so badly. The room is dark and wet, and no lights are allowed. I'm going blind. I'm lucky I have a pen to position my vision; otherwise, I’d be seeing astigmatism."

Bai Liu was eerily silent for a while when he heard the twenty-one books.

The books in this game were extraordinarily thick, so thick that Bai Liu didn't even bother to read them. Muke, the guy, actually managed to read 21 books in one night...

"Can you remember everything after you read it?" Bai Liu asked.

Muke gave Bai Liu a strange look. "You can remember it if you read it. Why can't you remember it?"

Bai Liu: "....." He just can't remember it.

Bai Liu felt the disdain of the academic bully for the academic slacker.

"How many books have you read?" Muke asked Bai Liu.

Bai Liu, the schoolboy, was silent for a moment and answered honestly, "0.01 book." He then turned the page twice and closed it.

Muke's reflexes were severely diminished by the late night and the overuse of his brain. He pondered Bai Liu's words for a moment before repeating with a wooden face, "0.01 book?"

This is about as good as not watching it!

Then Muke quickly reacted and approached Bai Liu with some urgency, looked around to make sure no one else was there, and asked Bai Liu in a lowered voice, "You're not really going to the ICU to steal that life-sustaining prescription, are you? Bai Liu, if you don't want to read it, you can let me read it all. I can read books quickly. I can finish the bookcase in three days at most!"

"But even if you've read it, do you know what you're looking for in terms of a recipe for renewal?" Bai Liu turned to Muke and questioned him.

Muke was stunned.

Indeed, he did not know.

But even though Muke had read 21 books in one night and could remember every word in them, Muke really didn't know what they were looking for, because the definition of what the system was looking for was so vague. It was difficult to determine what they were looking for without a clear point of reference—whether it was a specific drug, a treatment plan, or something else.

"Without precise instructions, it's hard to know exactly what we're looking for in the cure for life," Bai Liu looked at Muke for a moment and prompted patiently, "And the system's task prompt is to find the cure for life renewal in the bookcase within the hospital, not necessarily specifically in our ward."

"But the bookcases in all the wards are the same." Muke looked at Bai Liu a little uneasily. "When I came up here, I deliberately peeked at the bookcases in the wards when the other patients were still closed. All the wards here have bookcases. I have a good memory. I can clearly remember the bookcases in the wards I've looked at all have the same kind of books. If the system wants us to look at books to find a cure for life, then breaking into the ICU and going in, we can see the same books. Not much point, Bai Liu."

"But what is the difference between other people's books and our books?" Bai Liu looked at Muke. "What's the difference between a book you read last night and a book you haven't read?"

Muke was stunned for a moment as he processed what Bai Liu was trying to convey.

"It's notes!" Muke murmured, sounding dazed. "Reading in the ward's light, the book must have notes in it. Without a pen to help orient your vision, it's impossible to quickly find where you left off."

Bai Liu explained without haste, "Imagine that in this hospital, where there are no doctors, everyone must treat themselves. They come in, just like we did, and start reading books to find a cure. Since carrying any strong light source is prohibited and the lighting here is poor, they would have to read by the dim light available in the ward. That's why there are so many pens in the drawers."

Bai Liu continued, his voice calm, "In this low light, it's impossible to read without a pen. With a pen, the books leave marks—handwritten notes or circled information that makes it easier to find important details next time."

He glanced at Muke. "According to the rhyme, 'Sick on Thursday, seriously ill on Friday, dead on Saturday,' this illness worsens over time. The ICU patients are the most ill and have been here the longest. They've obviously been receiving treatment, so the handwriting in their books is most likely where we'll find the system's so-called [renewal remedy]."

Muke frowned. "But even so, we can't break into the ICU."

With so many nurses watching and Miao Feichi standing by, trying to enter the ICU would definitely draw attention, especially with that... thing in there, which was no longer human and most likely a monster.

Bai Liu glanced at Muke. "I was worried I wouldn't be able to finish reading and remembering all the notes, but I'm relieved you're here."

"I can help you remember!" Muke nodded, but hesitated. "But Bai Liu, how are we going to get into the ICU?"

Bai Liu stroked Muke's head, his eyes lowering as his tone softened. "You'd do anything for me, wouldn't you, Muke?"

Muke hesitated before meeting Bai Liu's gaze. There was something in those deep, dark eyes—a chilling, well-like depth—that unsettled him. But he bit his lower lip and said, "I would, Bai Liu."

"Then, will you kill me?" Bai Liu asked, his voice gentle as he pulled out a snow-white bone whip and placed it in Muke's trembling hand. "Would you use my fishbone whip to strangle me until I bleed, Muke?"

Muke froze.

Ten minutes later, the emergency bell rang throughout the private hospital.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang were having dinner on the ground floor. They weren't in any hurry to find Bai Liu and kill him, but they were waiting for the first clue to the level. Liu Huai, who was eating out of concern for his sister, reflexively drew his sword or shadow dagger from his sleeve.

A bloodied patient stumbled down the emergency stairs, a snow-white bone whip in his hand. He rushed out of the room, and the distinctive prop immediately caught Miao Feichi's attention.

Miao Feichi quickly crossed several tables in the cafeteria, twin swords in hand, moving swiftly to intercept the player. The moment his swords were released, they smashed to the ground with a loud clang, startling the player.

The bloodied patient, crying and running, slipped on the wet floor and fell on his backside. "It was that monster that killed you! I just gave you a filler to pick up the slack!" he cried.

The player, drenched in blood, breathing heavily, seemed terrified by the scene he had just witnessed. His hands shook, and his pupils were wide with fear. He collapsed to his knees, holding his head and whimpering in shock.

"Wimp," Miao Feichi muttered, kicking the player and sending him flying onto a pillar. "Stand up and repeat what you said."

The player bounced off the pillar, letting out a loud cry of pain.

Muke's eyes filled with tears, his mind overwhelmed with fear, guilt, and the horror of hurting Bai Liu. The unease of having harmed his protector nearly caused him to lose control, and his mental state began to fluctuate.

Muke shook his head frantically as Bai Liu took his hand, wrapping the sharp bone whip around his slender neck. Almost begging Bai Liu to stop torturing him, Muke cried, "Please, Bai Liu… kill me. If you do, I'll be the injured one. I can go to the ICU then, right?"

Bai Liu smiled softly and shook his head. "It's not good, Muke. I have a bad memory and can't remember all the notes. I'm the one who got hurt, but you need to stay alert. You need to grow, Muke. The first step is to do things on your own without always relying on me."

Bai Liu tightened the bone whip around Muke's neck, the fish spikes sinking into his skin. Blood poured from the puncture wounds, soaking the straw bed and staining the white sheets.

Muke broke down, screaming as if he were a fledgling forced out of its nest. Bai Liu, indifferent, smiled softly. Blood spilled from the corners of his mouth, choking him as it bubbled in his windpipe. He coughed, still stroking Muke's head as if he were explaining his student's last wishes.

"Muke, whether in this game or the next, we must win. We must win to the end," Bai Liu said softly. "And it's all up to you."

"You have to fool Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang and win their trust. If you don't, we're all dead."

Muke gritted his teeth to suppress the bone-crushing pain from Miao Feichi's kick. His heart was tight with the violent emotional swings, and he felt nauseous, but he dutifully held his head down, pretending to be an ordinary player who knew nothing about scavenging.

All the nurses were rushing upstairs, pushing emergency beds and exchanging words as they went.

"Which patient is in trouble? What's their name?"

"The patient's name is Bai Liu! The nurse confirmed there's a laceration in his neck. He's lost a lot of blood and needs urgent resuscitation!"

"What's with the laceration? Didn't he open the door last night?"

"We checked with the nurse on that floor last night. He probably opened the door and put something in his ward..."

"Get him to the operating room for blood transfusion and suturing! Do we have any nurses or patients who can stitch him up?"

"Yes! ICU bed ready. He'll go straight there once he's out of the operating room!"

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang exchanged glances, both incredulous. Miao Gaojiang frowned. "Bai Liu opened the door last night and was attacked? Is this really Bai Liu?"

"I think so. NPCs don't mistake players." Miao Feichi chuckled, watching the nurses rush upstairs in a frenzy. "It looks like Bai Liu is going to give us a blood sample for free."

He sighed dramatically. "What should I do? I was planning on taking him alive. If he dies, it won't work." With that, Miao Feichi picked up Muke, who was trembling on the ground, by his toe and slapped Muke's bloodstained face with his twin swords.

"Get up. We're going to ask you some questions. Answer honestly," Miao Feichi sneered. "Or you'll regret it."

Miao Feichi pulled out a balance prop from nowhere.

This prop, Muke recognized from Bai Liu's VIP video for The Last Train. It was called [The Judge's Scales], a common tool for lie detection, used by Mu Sicheng on Liu Huai.

It was a well-known item among professional league players. Zhang Gui had one, too, before Mu Sicheng stole it. Many players carried it to counter opponents who liked to play tricks, like Bai Liu, an intelligence-based player.

Miao Feichi had brought this prop to counter Bai Liu.

Muke's pupils contracted at the sight of the scales, but he quickly slowed his breathing. Calm down, calm down. The prop only answered yes or no, and he remembered it could be manipulated through emotional responses, as Mu Sicheng had been tricked by Liu Huai's answer.

"Don't even think about lying. I'm not as stupid as Mu Sicheng to be fooled. But if you are Mu Sicheng, I apologize in advance." Miao Feichi smirked, crouching down and putting the scimitar around Muke's neck. "You'd better not play tricks. The scale might falter with complicated questions, but with simple ones, it'll never fail. Lie, and I'll kill you. It won't take me a second."

Miao Feichi's gaze hardened as the knife hovered near Muke's neck. "First question—did you really cut Bai Liu, as you said?"

"Yes, yes," Muke stammered, lifting his head as the knife drew closer. His voice trembled. "I cut his neck with my own hands, with the fishbone in his hand."

Muke held up the bloodstained fishbone for Miao Feichi to see.

The scales shifted slightly, favoring [Truth].

"Good. Even if you knifed him, Bai Liu likes to play dirty tricks. He's not the type to not have a self-strangulation counter-strategy. Next question—are you Bai Liu's accomplice?"

Muke's heart pounded in his chest. He could hardly breathe, his hand clutching the bone whip as his fingers trembled.

Then Miao Feichi coldly asked the next three words: "Mu Sicheng?"

The Loving Welfare Home

I don’t blame Miao Feichi for only thinking about Mu Sicheng. One reason is that Bai Liu is just two games into his journey, and he's not affiliated with any guilds. Even if he is a control player, he has no one to control.

Since the control skill is ineffective in the game lobby, Bai Liu can only recruit underlings, not true associates. But this man has only played two games in total—one as a solo player and another in multiplayer where Bai Liu controls Du Sanying and Mu Sicheng.

However, Du Sanying makes it clear that he's beyond Bai Liu’s control. He's too lucky, always managing to find a way out of his predicaments. It's no surprise that Bai Liu won’t be able to control him for long.

Liu Huai and Fang Ke were under Bai Liu’s control through Zhang Gui, but with Zhang Gui’s death, the two of them were free. That left only Mu Sicheng, who remains directly under Bai Liu’s control.

Mu Sicheng is the first person who comes to mind when Miao Feichi thinks about Bai Liu’s potential partner.

The other thing Miao Feichi cares about is Mu Sicheng's potential. Mu Sicheng is strong-willed, and while he won’t be able to beat Miao Feichi, he will be tough to defeat.

Mu Sicheng’s sharp judgment and speed make him a formidable opponent for high-speed attackers like Miao Feichi, as evidenced when he stole from Spades, the top attacker in the game. His sharp judgment allowed him to outmaneuver Spades, and this would cause problems for Miao Feichi if Mu Sicheng were to team up with Bai Liu.

No speedster would like Mu Sicheng, least of all Miao Feichi.

When they registered at the orphanage, Miao Feichi checked to see if Mu Sicheng's name was on the list, but it wasn’t.

However, Miao Feichi doesn’t fully trust written records from his own players and prefers to confirm things with his own eyes.

Liu Huai and Liu Jiayi’s identities were directly confirmed by Miao Feichi in the cafeteria. Liu Huai is a member of the King’s Guild, so Miao Feichi wouldn’t make things difficult for him unless there was a clear conflict of interest. Liu Huai wouldn't defy a player of Miao Feichi's rank, which is even higher than Zhang Gui's.

The quickest way to confirm a player's identity is to check their system panel.

Liu Huai showed Miao Feichi his system panel, which listed his secondary identity, his sister Liu Jiayi. But this method isn't always reliable, especially for players like Bai Liu who have control skills. So, Miao Feichi and his team confirmed Liu Huai's identity further, having him use his personal skills and checking information from within the King's Guild.

There are six players in The Orphanage—Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang take up two spots, Liu Huai and his sister take two, and Bai Liu occupies one, leaving one more. Miao Feichi's eyes narrowed.

"Are you sure you're not Bai Liu's accomplice, Mu Sicheng?"

Muke, a little confused by this sudden question, shook his head. "I'm not. I'm just a regular player."

The scales tipped in favor of [Makoto].

Miao Feichi said, "Open your system panel for me."

Muke reluctantly showed Miao Feichi his panel, revealing his attributes and inventory.

His attributes weren't low—C+—but they paled in comparison to Miao Feichi's. His inventory was a mess, filled with odd items like a flaming torch with ten minutes left of use, school notes, tied ropes, a keyboard missing a keycap, and a mermaid sculpture.

"Seems like an average player," Miao Gaojiang, who had been watching, concluded after several checks.

Miao Feichi clicked his tongue. "I thought Mu Sicheng was under Bai Liu's control? Why isn't he here?"

"Mu Sicheng is a thief," Miao Gaojiang said. "He has plenty of ways to sell stolen goods, so it's not surprising that he might have found a way to break free from Bai Liu's control."

Muke listened to their conversation, his hands clenched in frustration. Mu Sicheng is far stronger than him—so much so that Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang were cautious around him. If Mu Sicheng were here with Bai Liu, Bai Liu wouldn't have taken such a risk.

Muke knew deep down that he could never match Mu Sicheng. Without the personal skills Mu Sicheng had, he would always fall behind. Yet, he wasn't willing to accept it.

He was grateful that Bai Liu trusted him so much, but he couldn't grow to the point where he could help Bai Liu the way Mu Sicheng could.

No one had ever placed so much hope in him before. Being a patient, he could do nothing but burden others with expectations.

Yet Bai Liu would say, "You have to do it. I believe in you. I'm sure you can."

Miao Feichi was about to ask another question, but Miao Gaojiang stopped him. Kneeling down, Miao Gaojiang placed the balance in front of Muke, his smile kind but his gaze sharp. "One last question. Are you a player controlled by Bai Liu?"

Without hesitation, Miao Gaojiang hit the nail on the head—the veteran was wary of the possibility that Muke, a regular player, might be under Bai Liu's control.

Muke fought the urge to look away. His hand trembled as the sensation of cutting Bai Liu's flesh echoed in his mind, his breathing quick and labored.

He couldn't lie about this. The scales could tell simple truths, and if he lied, both he and Bai Liu would be exposed.

Taking a deep breath, Muke finally spoke, his voice shaking, "I am a player under his control."

The scales swayed twice and then settled on [Makoto].

Miao Feichi's eyes narrowed as he raised his twin swords, preparing to finish off the Bai Liu-controlled player.

Tears flashed in Muke's eyes. "But I broke free! I escaped when he was attacked by a monster. I came out to ask for help. After he lost consciousness from the monster, he couldn't control the other players anymore, and I was injured."

Muke then opened his personal panel, tearfully showing it to Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang. "You can see for yourselves. There's no control skill anymore. I'm free."

Normally, if a player were under someone else's control, their panel would show it—something like [Player X is under Player Y's control]. But Muke's panel was clear of such a status.

After inspecting Muke's panel, Miao Feichi hesitated before reluctantly sheathing his weapon, but Miao Gaojiang remained distrustful.

Miao Gaojiang, standing beside Muke, narrowed his eyes. "But how did an ordinary player like you defy Bai Liu and steal from him? He was the second new star in the last round."

Muke bit his lip, his eyes filling with tears again as he choked out, "Because I hate Bai Liu. I don't want to be controlled by him."

Miao Feichi's attention sharpened as he noticed Muke's reaction—there was something off, something performative in his words.

Bai Liu, a player who had climbed to second place in the Rising Stars in his second game, had a huge following. His fame and popularity rivaled even some of the smaller guild's star players, like Miao Feichi. This annoyed Miao Feichi; Bai Liu was pushing too hard, and if he made it to the league next year with Mu Sicheng, he would become a real problem.

One of the reasons Miao Feichi was interested in Muke was because of Bai Liu's cynicism, especially for a player on the fringes of the league.

Bai Liu's charging points last round were enough to make even seasoned pros like Miao Feichi feel self-conscious.

This sort of situation felt like the way professionals in real life resent the growing influence of internet celebrities—especially when they know these rising stars might soon challenge them.

Pro players like Hearts and Spades didn't bother competing with newcomers. They focused on group match practice. It was only players like Miao Feichi, with limited chances, who resorted to gimmicks to make a name.

Muke, a player with a history with Bai Liu, was now exposing the truth, threatening to affect Bai Liu's popularity. Miao Feichi could sense this would irritate the audience and damage Bai Liu's image.

"You hate him. Why?" Miao Feichi asked, curious about this personal vendetta.

The bitterness in Muke's eyes was hidden beneath his tears, but his voice trembled as he said, "He almost made me kill the most important person in my life with my own hands. That's why I hate him!"

His words, laced with sorrow and vulnerability, made even Miao Feichi pause.

"You and him... a real-world feud?" Miao Feichi raised an eyebrow.

After Muke answered, the balance tipped, and Miao Feichi moved to focus on the game, though his curiosity still lingered.

"Enough with the chatter," Miao Feichi muttered, uninterested. "It's just a tier 2 game. We've faced tougher opponents before."

Muke, realizing the situation was shifting, stood up, holding out Siren's bone whip in a gesture of submission. "I know you're going to kill Bai Liu. I'll give you everything I have if you take me with you."

Miao Feichi took the bone whip without much interest, swinging it casually. The whip snapped on the ground with a crisp thud, but no damage was done.

"This whip is hard to use," Miao Feichi noted, inspecting it. "The attack judgment is stronger than Mu Sicheng's, but it does no damage at all."

Miao Feichi threw a scouting prop to check it further, then tossed the whip aside dismissively. "It's pretty average. Let's see how the ghost mirror handles it."

Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi didn't take Muke seriously at all, even after accepting the whip.

Muke, knowing what was at stake, finally spoke up. "You can kill Bai Liu in the hospital, but there's still Bai Liu in the orphanage—Bai Liu Six."

"If that child doesn't die, Bai Liu will be fine," Muke continued. "But we investors can't just go into the orphanage. Do you know how to kill this child?"

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang were silent, recognizing the gravity of the situation.

This was a real problem. They were strong, but their children were not.

But these children carry another fifty percent of their life value, yet they remain unaware of the fate of these little cubs who share half of their own life essence.

Miao Gaojiang didn't receive a call from his children last night, but Miao Feichi did hear from his young counterpart. However, little Miao Feichi was running around frantically like a chicken. No matter how much Miao Feichi insulted him, the little one on the other end of the line quickly hung up, wailing and crying, leaving no useful information behind.

Not only had they failed to get Bai Liu killed, but Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang hadn't even explained the main task to the children's pass, let alone managed to make these little brats follow their instructions.

"My children called me last night and this morning…" Muke said with careful deliberation, "I was bolder as a child, and he always listened to me."

In truth, it wasn't his own children—Muke had little courage as a child. It was Bai Liu's children who were much bolder.

The only player who had received two calls from his children, with each lasting up to 30 minutes, was Bai Liu. The rest of the players, based on what little Bai Liu had described the previous night, should have only received a call from Miao Feichi, though that conversation likely hadn't gone well either.

Not long after, little Miao Feichi returned crying from his phone call.

When the rest of the group hadn't received any calls, Muke lied without hesitation: "I have crucial information that could help us understand what's going on inside the orphanage. Even if it means taking down little Bai Liu under my instructions."

Miao Gaojiang stared at Muke for a few seconds, while Muke controlled his breathing and met his gaze unflinchingly.

"Fine, I'll take you," Miao Feichi finally relented, sheathing his twin blades. "You stay in line and follow us—don't cause any trouble."

Miao Feichi licked his teeth and flashed a strange smile. "Any Bai Liu, we won't let slip through our fingers. That includes the little one in the orphanage. Of course, the good stuff should be saved for last."

"Now, let's deal with the older one in the hospital first." Miao Feichi's eyes narrowed with a smile. "My audience gave me tens of thousands of points before I entered, just to watch me take at least three pounds off him."

Muke's heart lurched as he saw Miao Feichi heading toward the ICU, clearly intending to find Bai Liu.

Recalling the plan Bai Liu had discussed with him earlier, Muke forced his mind to calm and followed Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang.

The hospital elevator dinged, descending from the seventh floor operating room to the ground floor. As the doors slowly opened, a nurse pushed an emergency bed out, a white cloth draped over it. The person underneath appeared deathly pale, eyes tightly shut, and hands folded in repose.

As soon as Muke saw the blood-soaked white cloth, his legs wobbled, and his face drained of color.

The cloth covering Bai Liu was drenched in blood. The nurses continued to hold down the areas where Bai Liu was bleeding, their faces tense with anxiety.

"Clear the way!" one nurse shouted. "Urgent bleeding! ICU ready!"

"The bleeding's stopped for now, but the patient has lost a lot of blood. Did anyone find his medication?" another nurse asked.

"No! He's a new patient admitted yesterday!"

Muke's panic surged, and instinctively, his eyes followed the emergency bed, only to see Bai Liu's long, spider-like fingers slipping out from under the cloth, subtly shifting. He was holding a strange object between them.

At the sight of the item, Muke's breath caught in his throat as he snapped back to his senses, halting in place.

He quickly accessed his system repository for confirmation.

Sure enough, his keyboard had been tampered with.

The missing [1], [0], and [7] keycaps from the previous time had reappeared, but now, it was the enter key that was missing. The [enter] key was being held between Bai Liu's fingers under the cloth, swaying gently.

This key signified the [execute command] function in computer language, literally meaning [enter]. It was Bai Liu's silent instruction to Muke: [Continue with my plan to enter room 107].

Miao Gaojiang, more observant than Miao Feichi, noticed Muke's intense focus on his system panel and followed his gaze, realizing Muke was taking stock of his props.

Muke's items were mostly useless—just a mermaid sculpture with some minor utility and a keyboard with a broken keycap.

Had this keyboard only been missing one key before? Miao Gaojiang wondered, before something else caught his attention.

Miao Feichi, frustrated after attempting to attack Bai Liu with his twin blades, was stopped by a nurse, and Bai Liu was swiftly taken to the ICU, where he lay next to another patient covered by a white cloth, both with impossibly long limbs.

Muke also noticed the old bookcases in the ICU, much like those in his own ward, though these were worn and torn, with visible handwriting —a sign that patients had been carefully recording information, just as Bai Liu had said.

Miao Feichi tried to enter the ICU twice but was blocked each time by the nurse. Annoyed, he clicked his tongue, glancing at Bai Liu, still on a ventilator in the ICU. "Nurses are blocking my way. I can't get in."

"Let's wait for the shift change," Miao Gaojiang suggested calmly. "I checked the nurses' duty roster while searching the map. The changeover is between 8:45 and 9:00 PM—this is when the guard will be lax."

"Wait until the evening, then." Miao Feichi sheathed his swords. "I was planning to take him down for lunch, but looks like it's going to be a late-night snack."

The two spoke of breaking into the ICU as if it were a regular ward, showing little concern for the monstrous patient inside. However, this confidence was understandable—both Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang had incredibly high attributes.

Miao Gaojiang offered a word of caution to Miao Feichi: "We'll be fighting monsters at night. Make sure to top up your spirit and stamina. We're only at half our life now, so be careful."

After checking his personal panel, Miao Gaojiang took out his Advanced Mental Bleach and Stamina Restorer, drinking them quickly.

"Got it," Miao Feichi replied, not overly concerned. "It's just a level 2 dungeon. No need to overthink it. The monsters here are at best A+, and even at half life, we'll still be fine."

Miao Feichi absentmindedly checked his personal panel too, knowing that most high-tier players showed off their stats to the audience. Muke, a regular player, had no trouble catching a glimpse of their stats.

[Player Miao Feichi has over 8,000 combined panel attributes and is rated as an S-rated player]

Muke's heart was beating a little faster than usual, and he quickly withdrew his gaze as though nothing had happened.

These two players were both S-ranked. No wonder they didn't take the patients in the ICU seriously at all. Even the thief brothers who had caused trouble for Bai Liu and the others last time were only A+ ranked monsters—already a top-tier challenge in a level 2 copy. But these two were S-ranked. Not only could they kill quickly, but they were also on a completely different level than the monsters in a level 2 copy.

It made sense now. These two had been relaxed ever since they entered the game. The monsters in this copy posed no real threat to S-rank players like them. Killing Bai Liu and reversing the quest would take time, but it wasn't life-threatening for them.

But the reverse wasn't true.

For Bai Liu, this meant that not only did he have life-threatening monsters to deal with in this level 2 copy, but he also had to contend with two S-rank players who were even more terrifying than the monsters hunting him. What made this even worse was how well these two complemented each other in terms of their panel attributes.

At least the monsters had weaknesses. But Muke knew that the combination of Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang was arguably free of weaknesses when it came to their panels and skills.

Miao Feichi's defense might be a little weaker, but his output was incredibly high. With his personal skill enchantment, he could deal nearly 3,000 damage with a single flat A. He was also fast. A-ranked monsters could barely keep up with his double slashes, which usually took only two or three attempts to finish them off.

Even if Miao Gaojiang was standing still with his defensive skills fully activated, it would take five to ten hits before his life value hit rock bottom. Meanwhile, Miao Feichi would keep dealing damage after his spirit level dropped. He was known as the league's number one "daddy Tank" for a reason.

In simple terms, either of them could easily kill Bai Liu. If this was a non-plot instance with an open map for confrontation, Bai Liu would be boxed in and it would be over for him as soon as he entered the game.

But The Caring Orphanage was clearly not that kind of copy.

The NPCs here were restrictive for players. And the presence of split-life [child versions of the player] made attacking players like Miao Feichi, who had spent months in confrontation-type copies, somewhat uncomfortable. They'd gotten used to the game's rhythm, but the pace here was different. Nevertheless, they were veteran players and quickly adapted to the various rule sets.

During the day, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang had searched the entire hospital for the [Life-Saving Remedy]. As experienced players, their thought processes were similar to Bai Liu's. They, too, believed that the patients' wards should contain the "life-sustaining remedy" the system mentioned.

Unfortunately, after rummaging through almost an entire floor of wards, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang were reported by other patients for disturbing their rest and were forcibly confined to their wards until dinner.

This was because disobeying NPCs created an attitude trend, and that attitude would result in these NPCs restricting the players' actions.

[System Alert: Nurse NPC is very angry with player Miao Feichi and player Miao Gaojiang for their repeated disruptive behavior and warns players that if they continue, they will be banned from leaving the ward tomorrow.]

So, Miao Feichi had to return to the ward. But this wasn't the first time he'd angered an NPC. What veteran player hadn't annoyed an NPC before? Instead of panicking, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang used the spare time to chat on their way back.

Muke followed behind them. The two men raided the ward without concern for him—though they weren't exactly ignoring him either. It felt as though Miao Feichi treated Muke like a cat or dog following them around, so they didn't avoid him when speaking.

Miao Gaojiang paused, thinking for a moment. "21 wards on this floor. We searched them all before the nurses caught us. The books in the bookcases in the older patients' wards are much older than the ones in the new patients' wards. The sicker the patient, the older the books, and the more notes on them. I think the [Life-Saving Remedy] is more likely to be found there. But now the problem is the nurse NPCs."

"Right." Miao Feichi nodded, his voice tinged with annoyance. "But there's no way we can take the books out of these wards. We also can't stay long enough for the nurses to ignore us."

"A bookcase full of books, even if there were notes pointing to the [Life-Sustaining Remedy], we wouldn't be able to read through them fast enough before the nurse finds us..." Miao Gaojiang's brow furrowed as he reached the same dead end Bai Liu had before.

"A bookcase that big would take more than a day to go through, even if I skimmed it. And the nurse NPCs will be back in ten minutes..." Miao Gaojiang narrowed his eyes. "I need an empty ward where I can stay longer than a day, with those old bookcases, and not be kicked out for disturbing other patients."

For Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, the answer was clear.

They exchanged a glance, and Miao Gaojiang made a quick decision. "Let's kill a patient monster to vacate the ward. New patients come in every afternoon. It's already afternoon now, so we'll have just enough time before the next round of patients arrives. That should give us enough time to go through the books."

Muke, trailing behind Miao Feichi, paused when he heard Miao Gaojiang's casual mention of killing a patient to clear a ward.

But soon, Muke regained his composure. His face, still pale, hid the turbulent emotions beneath. His hands trembled slightly as he tried to steady his breathing, but fear and unease gnawed at him.

The overwhelming power of Bai Liu and the monstrous patients he could not face were terrifying. He couldn't help but feel small in comparison to Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, whose casual words made it seem like they could kill without consequence.

And yet, it made him resentful—not only of himself but of Bai Liu. For putting him in this situation, relying on an unreliable, powerful self who had yet to fully adapt to the game's pressure.

Muke had been close to killing Bai Liu, to breaking down under the pressure. He had reached a breaking point, his heart hollow as he sat amidst the bloodshed, unable to even shed a tear. But he hadn't lost control, not in the way he expected. He had stabilized—just as Bai Liu had hoped, after pushing him to the edge.

Now, with Bai Liu gone, Muke couldn't afford to lose control. His survival—and even Bai Liu's—depended on him staying calm, focused. He could not, under any circumstances, break down now.

Even with two S-rank players before him, he had to win, just like Bai

Liu had insisted.

Taking a deep breath, Muke finally spoke, his voice steady despite the strain. "The sicker a patient is in the ward, the more likely it is to find the [Life-Sustaining Remedy]. Then, killing the patient in the ICU seems like the most likely way to find it, right?"

Miao Feichi glanced at him with a smirk, dismissing his words with a snort. "Professional players tend to ignore the chatter of regular players. They don’t engage unless it's worth their time."

Miao Gaojiang, who appeared more courteous, explained with a touch of carelessness in his eyes. "We won’t kill the ICU patients. Bai Liu is there today, and there are more nurses than usual. We don’t know how killing a patient will affect the nurse NPCs. This is too risky."

"It's not just that," Miao Feichi added lazily, "The ICU is the most likely place for the [Life-Sustaining Remedy], but even if we killed the patient, we couldn’t stay there long enough to search through the books. The nurses will catch us after about fifteen minutes during their shift change."

"Fifteen minutes? Even with a camera, I couldn’t capture everything." Miao Feichi raised an eyebrow at Muke, sarcastically holding up the Big Brother device. "Do you think this thing can take pictures?"

Muke stepped forward, undeterred. "I can shorthand through the bookcase of books in fifteen minutes, if I have the notes."

He looked Miao Feichi in the eye, his voice calm but with an underlying conviction. "I have a photographic memory."

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang paused, exchanging a look. Miao Gaojiang raised an eyebrow. "I remember, you don’t have any personal skills."

Muke smiled, unfazed. "That’s not a personal skill of mine. I was born with it. I remember things pretty solidly."

He took a step closer, his voice earnest, compelling. "If you take me with you, I can help you find the clues to the main quest in fifteen minutes."

The Loving Welfare Home

Muke's memory isn't quite as extraordinary as he wishes it were. Reading a bookshelf full of books in fifteen minutes and transcribing them flawlessly? Impossible. Even with his photographic memory, Muke can't read that quickly, let alone retain everything in such a short span.

To comb through the notes and clues in so many books, even with Muke's already impressive memory—at least by ordinary standards—he told Bai Liu it would take him at least a whole night.

But how could Muke stay safely in the ICU overnight?

Thinking of the plan Bai Liu had outlined, Muke turned to Miao Feichi with a look of sincere pleading. "I can't break into the ICU on my own, but I can memorize everything inside in no time. You guys could break in, and I'll be your eyes—how's that for a team? You bring the muscle, I bring the memory. Perfect combo, right?"

Miao Feichi glanced at him, humor flickering in his eyes, before grinning. "You didn't come to us just for this, did you?"

Muke lowered his head, silence falling between them. He fiddled with his fingers, scowling in reluctant acknowledgment.

"You expect us to believe you can really do this?" Miao Feichi's tone held a hint of mockery as he exchanged a glance with Miao Gaojiang. "An ordinary player like you thinking you can use us... Forget it, father, test his memory. If he can really remember all that, we'll take him with us when we break into the ICU at nine."

Miao Gaojiang looked Muke over and gave a slight nod. "Come with me."

Muke took a deep breath, nodded in agreement, and followed.

8:30 p.m., First floor of the hospital.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang had only been confined until 6 p.m. before the nurses allowed them to leave.

Muke passed Miao Gaojiang's memory test, impressing him by recalling the page numbers and footnotes for every book he read. Miao Gaojiang, who had never encountered someone like Muke before, was genuinely stunned. After all, Miao Feichi, who hadn't even made it into high school without paying for his admission, had no idea there were people out there with Muke's kind of natural genius.

By 7:30, the two had sat down for dinner, discussing their plan for the ICU break-in. Their conversation was simple but effective.

Miao Feichi: "I'll go in first."

Miao Gaojiang: "You'll take the lead?"

Miao Feichi: "Same as usual. How many sections will you handle?"

Miao Gaojiang: "Same as you. With Bai Liu and that ICU monster, we should be out in under three minutes if all goes smoothly."

Their long history of working together meant they didn't need to spell everything out. They knew each other's roles perfectly. Neither of them knew how many monsters they'd encounter in this level-2 instance, so a few words were all they needed to plan their positions.

Muke tried his best to keep up, his frustration growing as he couldn't understand what they were saying. He grit his teeth, cursing them under his breath for speaking in a language that made no sense to him.

He thought about how Bai Liu had to keep his sanity intact, using keycaps to communicate instructions while injured. A pang of envy hit Muke—how he wished he and Bai Liu had that kind of understanding, the same father-son bond that Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang seemed to share.

8:55 p.m.

The nurses began filtering out of the wards and corridors, heading to the nurse's office for their fifteen-minute shift briefing. After taking the last round of temperatures, including Bai Liu's, the final nurse left the ICU, closing the door behind her.

8:57 p.m.

As the door to the nurse's office clicked shut, Miao Feichi sprang into action. With a quick flick, he unsheathed his twin blades and, in a low tone, said, "I'll unlock the door. You follow me."

Miao Feichi's twin blades were long and curved, shaped almost like crescent moons. They had an elegant name, but Bai Liu—who'd spent his childhood in an orphanage and had sometimes done farm work—had never associated them with anything other than a "hogweed knife." He hadn't had much contact with such weapons, after all.

When Muke heard Bai Liu casually mention the name, he assumed that was what the knife was really called. So, when he saw Miao Feichi using the blade to carefully pick the lock, he asked in confusion, "Why are you using a hogweed knife to pick the lock? Can't you just use a lockpick from the system?"

Miao Feichi was furious at the idea. "Who told you these are hogweed knives?!" he snapped. "These aren't just any knives!"

Muke blinked in surprise. "This knife can actually kill pigs?"

Miao Feichi was so enraged he could hardly speak. "What do you think this is? A pig-slaying tool? This is my 'Wind-Up Twin Blades'—my personal skill weapon. It's rated A+ and can hit S- level at full power! It's way faster than any lockpicking tool!"

Muke was taken aback by the fiery outburst, but Miao Feichi quickly composed himself, sneering, "Do you think you're the only one with useful skills? There aren't many who can resist this weapon, and even Mu Sicheng's skill is useless against it."

With a growl, Miao Feichi unlocked the ICU door, and as he opened it, he gave Muke a mocking middle finger. "If your brain isn't as useful as you say it is, I'll make sure you regret it later."

Muke wisely stayed silent, not wanting to provoke Miao Feichi further.

The ICU door creaked open, revealing a misty interior, shrouded in dense fog. The humidifiers were working overtime, filling the room with a thick mist, limiting visibility to barely a meter. The two beds were obscured by the fog, with only the slight rise and fall of the figures beneath the white cloths marking their presence. Their withered limbs hung limply beside the beds, barely noticeable.

Two identical men lay in the beds, their faces gaunt and drooping, lifeless, with pale skin marred by the dark marks of death. They looked eerily like corpses, their features twisted in silent agony.

The ICU was soundproof, and Miao Feichi closed the door to prevent any sound from escaping. He kicked Muke lightly with his foot, ordering, “Go check the books on the shelf.”

Muke nodded, a bitter taste in his mouth. He walked toward the bookcase, flipping through the pages rapidly, his heart pounding with anticipation.

The plan was about to begin.

As Muke hurriedly skimmed through the books, his eyes flicked toward the hanging hands of the two patients. One of them appeared to be holding something.

Then it hit him—Bai Liu had been in this ICU bed when he’d been brought in. What had he done while left alone in here?

Miao Gaojiang moved cautiously to examine the two patients, frowning. “The monsters haven’t triggered. We don’t need to fight them.”

“Bai Liu still needs to be killed,” Miao Feichi muttered, his gaze wandering over the two patients. He frowned again. “Wait, who’s Bai Liu? They look identical. I remember Bai Liu was shorter than the one in the other bed when he was brought in.”

“And Bai Liu didn’t have those spots before,” Miao Gaojiang added after a moment. But soon, his veteran instincts kicked in. “Bai Liu must have been alienated—probably from spending too long with this seriously ill monster. His life value dropped, his mental resistance weakened... he was probably alienated by the patient monster.”

“Are you planning to eat Bai Liu’s flesh in this state?” Miao Gaojiang asked, pointing to the skeletal figures on the beds.

Miao Feichi shuddered in disgust. “Forget it. I’ll eat the smaller one. Bai Liu’s looks too much like my mother when she was sick... it’s awful.”

Miao Gaojiang was quiet for a moment before asking, “Which one do you want to kill?”

Miao Feichi’s expression darkened. “Kill them both,” he said, his eyes narrowing. “It won’t take much effort to kill one more. I’d rather make a mistake than let them live.”

[System Alert: Player Miao Feichi uses his personal skill weapon

(Wind-Up Twin Blades)]

[Rating: A+ rank potential, S rank skill weapon, flat attack 3100, one hit can kill players below B rank]

Miao Feichi's twin swords were held in his backhanded grip, their edges reflecting against the wall like the raised arms of a praying mantis preparing for an attack. He sneered twice, eyes fixed on the patient in the bed, and without hesitation, swung his sword at the player on the outer bed.

The sharp tip of his blade cut through the white mist, drawing a sleek, lethal arc, and in an instant, it hovered mere centimeters from Bai Liu's nose, who kept his eyes closed.

Muke nearly screamed, desperate to stop Miao Feichi at any cost.

Bai Liu's panel was at F rank, and his life was already dangerously low. A single strike from Miao Feichi's weapon would surely kill him!

And Bai Liu had nothing to defend himself with—Miao Feichi was armed with an S-rank potential weapon!

Muke's eyes burned with frustration and self-loathing. Why wasn't he Mu Sicheng? Mu Sicheng could have blocked this attack! But all Muke could do was watch helplessly.

Bai Liu's eyes finally fluttered open just as the tip of the blade neared him, plummeting at breakneck speed. The blade, now nothing but a shimmering dot in the darkness, was almost at the center of his forehead when the system alert finally rang in his head.

Bai Liu's hand fell beside the bed, now transformed into the strange texture of a burnt monkey's paw. He swiped his fingers a few times to adjust before looking up at the tip of the knife, which had descended within inches of his face. It stopped just shy of piercing his forehead.

Without a moment's hesitation, Bai Liu tilted his head slightly to the side and, with swift precision, squeezed the tip of Miao Feichi's blade between his fingers.

"Damn it, this patient is blocking my knife!" Miao Feichi snapped, narrowing his eyes in disbelief. "He's not Bai Liu! Bai Liu doesn't have the A+ skill to block my blade. This is another patient! It's the monster patient!"

He whipped his head to the inner bed. "That's Bai Liu in that bed!"

Bai Liu's mouth slightly curved. Miao Feichi's hands moved upward in a diagonal manner and the sharp and cold blade swept across Bai Liu's cheek. It was obvious that even thought Miao Feichi thought this wasn't Bai Liu, it didn't prevent him from trying to harvest the patient's life. Bai Liu used the tip of the monkey hand to block it very quickly. The blade and nails made a sharp collision sound and even created small sparks in the dark ward.

Had the room been better lit, Miao Feichi might have noticed the unmistakable black monkey's paw, resembling Mu Sicheng's, sprouting from Bai Liu's hand. But in the obscurity of the ward, Miao Feichi had to squint to see clearly, and since Mu Sicheng's Monkey Claw skill was only subtly distinct from the dry, thin fingers of the patients, he remained deceived.

Miao Feichi's expression darkened when his attacks failed to land. "Something's wrong. This monster's rank is high. It can block me twice—at least A+."

He quickly drove his twin blades into the wall, spinning them twice before lunging toward the patient on the inner bed. "If I can't kill the one outside, I'll take care of the one inside first. Bai Liu!"

The monster patient inside might not be able to endure Miao Feichi's attacks. If the patient inside couldn't endure it the Bai Liu's plan would be completely destroyed!

Muke's heart raced as his eyes darted to the large bookcase behind Miao Feichi.

Without warning, the bookcase came crashing down.

Muke's foot hooked onto a high shelf, pulling the entire bookcase forward. It fell directly between Miao Feichi and the patient who had been motionless in bed.

From his hidden corner, Muke screamed, "This patient just attacked me!"

As the bookcase struck the inner bed, Bai Liu swiftly slid across the floor, swapping places with the other patient in the blink of an eye. With uncanny precision, he kicked the patient out of the bed and sent them to the outer one. The long-limbed, ghostly patient finally stirred, its sharp teeth dripping with mucus and its long, bulging tongue flicking out, letting out a shrill, high-pitched hiss and releasing the rancid stench of decay.

At that moment, everyone's system panels flickered with the Monster Book screen:

[System Alert: Congratulations, Player Muke, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, for triggering the Monster Book.]

[The Monster Book of Love and Welfare has been updated - Plant Patients (2/3)]

"What the hell, is that really the patient out there?" Miao Feichi muttered, confused by the extreme darkness. He soon realized something was off, unable to kill the patient in front of him.

"What the hell is going on?! Why can't I kill one of these two patients?!" Miao Feichi cursed, his frustration mounting.

Miao Gaojiang, who was facing the now-awakened patient, responded, "Bai Liu was probably pushed to the maximum by this patient. His spirit value dropped, and his skill escalated to block you. He's no different than the monster patient in this ward now."

"The drastic decrease in life value, coupled with being surrounded by this spiritually tainted monster…" Miao Gaojiang's tone turned grim. "I suspect he's either dead or turned into a monster. We're now facing two A+ level monsters that we can't beat in fifteen minutes."

"Feichi, we have only a few minutes left. If both are this high-level, we can only kill one. Which one should we kill? I'm leaning towards the outer bed, which should be Bai Liu, but they're moving and swapping so fast that I'm not sure which is the real Bai Liu. Can you feel it when you attack?"

Miao Feichi fell silent, his face darkening.

The twin blades and monkey claws clashed in the dim ward, the sounds of metal against nail ringing through the air. Miao Feichi held back deliberately to avoid alarming the nurses, but his strikes still rang out in rapid succession.

After dodging another black hand reaching for his neck, Miao Feichi, now enraged, let go of his restraint. He swung both swords at full strength, slicing through the air with a silver flash aimed at Bai Liu, determined to finish him off.

Bai Liu's breath quickened as the twin blades sliced lazily through his hair, which fell damp to the ground.

"Damn it, Muke, what are you doing?!" Miao Feichi roared, spinning around to glare at Muke, who was crouched on the floor, wasting his stamina. His hair stood on end, ready to explode in anger.

Muke, head tilted back with a book in hand, stammered, "I was looking for a book to read, and the bookcase fell over... the books scattered under the bed!"

In a fit of rage, Miao Feichi kicked Muke in the chest. "Get out of the way!"

Muke's face flushed purple from the force of the kick. He instinctively closed his eyes, bracing for another painful hit, but instead, he felt himself lifted lightly and slid under the bed, unharmed. Blinking in confusion, Muke realized the hand that had lifted him was a dried monkey's paw.

It was Bai Liu's hand.

Muke gritted his teeth, hiding under the bed, counting the minutes in his mind—just eight more minutes.

Bai Liu had to deal with these two S-panel players, father and son, for eight long minutes while Muke could only watch helplessly, unable to do anything.

"Feichi." Miao Gaojiang's voice was slightly subdued, his upper body half-zombified. His teeth had curved into grotesque ivory tusks, making his face look disturbingly terrifying in the dim light of the night.

Miao Gaojiang sidestepped a monster's attempt to bite him, his face now a ghastly, purple-blue shade. "Time's half up. We can only kill one monster. You're the head-to-head player, can you tell who Bai Liu is?"

"Fuck!" Miao Feichi grumbled, "How am I supposed to tell if you can't? They all look the same—like they came from the same mold!"

With that, Miao Feichi slashed across the table with a powerful strike. This time, without Muke's interference, his twin blades cut off two of Bai Liu's fingers—Bai Liu's equipped Thief's Black Fingers fell to the ground.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's item (Thief's Black Finger) has dropped two fingers. (Monkey Thief) personal skill enhancement reduced to three-fifths.]

"Hey, I feel like I don't have to choose. The monster on my side can't stand it. I should be able to kill it in five minutes," Miao Feichi said with a slight grin, his voice dripping with smug satisfaction.

"If you can finish your side quickly and come help me, I'll wrap up fast too," Miao Gaojiang replied, his tone slightly more relaxed.

Muke clenched his fists under the bed, his lips pale and trembling. The pain from the earlier kick from Miao Feichi still throbbed in his chest. He prayed fervently—five minutes to go, come on, come on!

Five more minutes to survive.

Miao Feichi's twin blades were like the arms of a mantis, derived from a personal skill that suited his playstyle far better than any prop weapons dropped by the game's dungeon.

After the initial confusion caused by the narrow, dimly lit space and multiple players, Miao Feichi quickly found his rhythm. He began attacking Bai Liu with frenzied precision, slashing, uppercutting, his movements so fast they left only a faint whistling sound in the air.

There was no noise when a quick strike severed something—only the sound of the severed object hitting the floor.

Muke watched, his heart sinking, as Bai Liu's black fingers dropped one after another in front of him. His teeth ground together so hard his palm started bleeding.

Three minutes to go.

Bai Liu dodged diagonally and tried to block with his monkey paws. Miao Feichi scoffed, twirling his blades with expert precision. He shifted the grip of his weapon from an upward slash to a horizontal cut, aiming for a decisive blow.

In the midst of his attack, Miao Feichi appeared to anticipate his victory. As he swung his blades, he glanced over at Miao Gaojiang with a smug smile. "My side's done..."

Before he could finish his sentence, the hospital bed behind him suddenly jolted forward, slamming into his waist. Miao Feichi staggered as the bed struck him from behind.

Muke, panting and wide-eyed, stood behind the bed, watching in disbelief as Bai Liu narrowly avoided a fatal blow from Miao Feichi.

One minute left.

Bai Liu smiled.

Miao Feichi's temper flared. Frustrated by Muke's interference, he shouted, "Are you fucking insane?"

He kicked the bed aside, pulling Muke out from under it, and slapped him backhandedly, his teeth grinding in anger. "Every time I'm about to finish off a monster, you come out and mess things up, you little..."

Miao Feichi's eyes glowed with rage, and his twin blades rose, ready to strike down Muke.

Muke wiped the blood from the corner of his mouth and shrank back into the corner, fear flashing across his face. "I-I was just looking for a book under the bed... and found something important! The system said I found the [Life-Sustaining Remedy]!"

Miao Feichi froze, his expression shifting from anger to a mix of suspicion and curiosity. "You found it that quickly?" He narrowed his eyes, a cut of impatience in his voice. "It better be the life-saving remedy, or I swear..."

Miao Gaojiang, momentarily distracted from the monster patient he was fighting, punched the creature away and moved closer to Miao Feichi. "Feichi, stop hitting him! Let's see what he's got!"

Miao Feichi, swallowing his curses, hesitated before pulling Muke up. But Muke, trembling from the earlier strikes, appeared too scared to move.

Just as Miao Feichi was about to help him, Muke scrambled away in panic, heading straight for Bai Liu.

"Stupid!" Miao Feichi snapped, infuriated. "That's a monster over there! Get your ass back here!"

Pretending to be terrified, Muke lowered his gaze, silently gripping Bai Liu's wrist. His voice trembled as he whispered to himself, "Stay awake, Muke. Stay awake, no matter how low your spirit level drops..."

He squeezed Bai Liu's hand tighter.

Bai Liu leaned in slightly, glancing down at Muke, whose hand was shaking from the nervous grip. "Got a good hold on me?" he whispered.

Muke nodded quickly, swallowing hard.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu confirms use. Movement speed +4900. Stamina in extreme decline...]

Miao Feichi watched, dumbfounded, as Bai Liu, now fully possessed by the speed-enhancing skill, dragged Muke across the floor at an unbelievable pace. The two glided between the hospital beds, moving faster than Miao Feichi could track.

Muke squealed in fear, but between Bai Liu's blinding speed and the dim light, Miao Feichi couldn't tell who was who.

Frustrated beyond measure, Miao Feichi growled, "Shut up! I can't even tell who's who with all this goddamn running!"

He threw his twin swords, trying to strike at anyone, but Miao Gaojiang shouted sharply, "Muke's in there too! He has the life-saving remedy! Don't just swing blindly! Look carefully!"

"Look carefully, my ass!" Miao Feichi barked, his brain fogged with rage. "They all look the same! And with them running around like that, I can't tell who's who!"

Miao Gaojiang's voice was calm but insistent. "Muke's less alienated. He's shorter than the monster and doesn't have spots on him. Look carefully, you'll spot the difference!"

No sooner had Miao Gaojiang spoken than two dark figures erupted from beneath the bed. One of them was Muke.

Miao Gaojiang, realizing one of the figures was Muke, quickly withdrew his fist from the monster's skull, stepping back to avoid accidental injury.

Bai Liu, holding Muke tightly, stepped in front of the real monster, the plant patient, who seemed to smell blood and immediately lunged with sharp teeth and saliva dripping from its mouth.

It could sense the players' blood, and it desperately needed to feed. It reached out with its long, sharp fingers to grab Bai Liu, its prey.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu thrust Muke's trembling body toward the monster's waiting mouth.

The plant patient latched onto Muke's exposed neck with an agonizing grip, its sharp teeth sinking in with eerie satisfaction.

Muke shuddered from the pain, blood draining from his face as the monster feasted on him. He gasped, his hands clutching at the creature as his spirit level plummeted.

"The monster's biting me! It's sucking my blood! My spirit's dropping fast!" Muke cried out.

[System Alert: Player Muke's spirit value has dropped to 67, and his life value to 31. Please escape the monster's attack range immediately, or your life and spirit value will continue to drop.]

Muke's limbs began to stiffen, his breathing slowed, and his body twisted unnaturally, almost as if it were growing like a plant.

Miao Gaojiang's expression darkened as he saw Muke's condition. "Muke's been alienated too. Now, we can't tell who's who anymore—Bai Liu, the monster, or Muke."

Bai Liu, holding Muke and the real plant monster, moved around the ward. All three were of similar size, their bodies marked with spots, making it nearly impossible to tell them apart.

Miao Feichi, unable to distinguish between the three at such high speeds, grew more frustrated.

"Did these monsters eat Mu Sicheng? Running this fast!" Miao Feichi cursed, eyes flashing red with fury. "If we can't split them, let's just kill them all together. We'll figure out the life renewal later. First, we take down Bai Liu."

"Only a minute left, Feichi," Miao Gaojiang warned. "If we attack all three, we won't be able to kill them..."

Miao Feichi sneered, a bloodthirsty grin spreading across his face. "It won't be too late. I'll be on S-grade for ten seconds. Let's end this."

"S-grade used in this kind of place is a bit of a waste of your stamina slot..." Seeing Miao Feichi motionless in the room, looking straight at him, Miao Feichi was clearly so defeated it turned to anger. He couldn't bring himself to kill these three monsters but couldn't get rid of the rage either.

Miao Gaojiang paused and finally sighed helplessly, "... Well, it's a level-2 game only. Open it if you want."

[System Alert: Player Miao Feichi has confirmed use. Double Blade is possessed by the grievious spirit it killed, attack +8001. Player Miao Feichi's stamina is dropping extremely fast...]

Miao Feichi nudged the ground with his twin swords, emotionless. The ground instantly cracked under his hand, and an eerie white mist slowly rose from the surface of his twin swords, bringing with it a strong blood smell. Long, human-like shapes began to appear, floating in mid-air like ghosts, their tails still haunting the twin swords. They opened their billowing lips and hissed soundlessly.

The spirits wrapped themselves reluctantly around the murderer who had sacrificed himself to the sword—resentful and fierce, but useless. The spite and fury made the blade's surface shinier and sharper.

Perhaps they still had some use. They could help their killers strike down more spirits that came to keep them company.

Miao Feichi swung his twin swords, and the spirits roared with rage.

In almost a second, Miao Feichi pierced through the white mist, one knife thrusting into the wall to hold his body in place. His foot was on the wall, the other knife slashing across the room, just grazing the tip of Bai Liu's nose.

Bai Liu could feel the wind from the slash rustling the white mist.

The previous strike had been fast but lacked aggression.

Miao Feichi's gaze darkened, and the knife seemed about to slice through Bai Liu's neck, sending his head to the ground.

Bai Liu dodged with high speed. The wind from the knife cut a mark on his face, and the blade grazed him for just a second. Miao Feichi's eyes were cold as he pulled back the curved knife. The tip of the blade was about to pierce the back of Bai Liu's neck. Bai Liu couldn't turn around fast enough to dodge, so he directly turned his hand into a monkey claw to block it.

But the blade wasn't as easily blocked as before, and Bai Liu failed to stop the tip of the blade. The scimitar passed through his palm and stabbed him in the back of the neck.

Blood spilled from the corner of Bai Liu's mouth.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu uses the skill (Thief Monkey Claw) to reduce judgment by 50% and block 50% of damage.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's prop (Siren's Fish Scale) blocked 49.7% of the damage value. The prop is slightly broken (10% damage). Please repair it promptly.]

[System warning: Player Bai Liu's life value has dropped to 7!]

In theory, even if Miao Feichi's slash had been blocked by 99%, the remaining 1% of the damage would have been enough to kill Bai Liu. However, after the double slash pierced the back of Bai Liu's neck, the tip only penetrated a shallow millimeter and was blocked.

His fish-scale-covered coin had somehow turned on his back, just in time to block the tip of Miao Feichi's blade.

Bai Liu quickly glanced at Muke, who had been sucked to unconsciousness.

Muke's eyes opened slightly with difficulty, his hands dropping slowly and feebly.

Bai Liu's whole body lurched forward with the force of Miao Feichi's slash. The moment Miao Feichi picked him up with his scimitar, ready to kill him, Bai Liu suddenly said in a pitiful tone, "I am... ahem, Muke."

Miao Feichi froze, withdrawing his hand and abandoning his machete, cursing that he had made a mistake in opening the door.

Bai Liu was kicked into a corner by Miao Feichi, weakly leaning against the wall. He calmly watched as Miao Feichi attacked the delirious Muke with his twin swords. His hand, hidden in the shadows, drew a soul note and pressed it quickly against his panel.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu is using Player Muke's soul note to Muke staggered and dodged, but he didn't quite make it. He was grazed by Miao Feichi's twin swords and fell to the ground.

[System Warning: Player Muke's Life Rating has dropped to 6! Mental value has dropped to 26!]

Miao Feichi seemed to sense that something was wrong. Instead of landing a deadly blow on Muke, he slammed his knife into Muke's back. Muke curled into a ball from the impact. Miao Feichi stepped on Muke's neck and looked down at Muke's face with narrowed eyes: "This reaction... the lack of strength to fight back... is completely different from the monster and Bai Liu I fought before. Why do I think you are Muke?"

Miao Feichi slapped Muke's face twice with his twin blades, his eyes darting dangerously between Bai Liu and Muke: "Hey, are you conscious? If you are, answer me—who are you?"

Muke suddenly opened his mouth wide and bit down on Miao Feichi's ankle, his eyes bloodshot. He mimicked the way he had just been drained by the monster, straining and madly sucking Miao Feichi's blood, a desperate whimper escaping his throat as his teeth sank deep into Miao Feichi's skin.

He was impersonating a monster. Muke didn't want to give away Bai Liu, who was pretending to be him, so he followed Bai Liu's instructions and played the role of a monster.

Bai Liu had told Muke to be whatever the monster in the ward was, so that Bai Liu would be safe and out of danger.

Muke bit into Miao Feichi's ankle like a mad dog, but he was too weak to do any real damage. Miao Feichi's S-rank defense was more than he could handle as a dying player.

Miao Feichi cursed and said, "You must be the monster that my father almost took care of," before raising his twin swords to kill Muke.

Muke didn't even duck, blood gushing from his mouth. His mind was focused only on the plan Bai Liu had given him—to bite this man and not let him go!

Bai Liu's life expectancy was already too low for Miao Feichi to reach him. This thought repeatedly planted itself in Muke's mind, as if hypnotized by fear, watching Bai Liu fall in a pool of blood.

Muke's hands were glued to Miao Feichi's legs, his eyes glazed over as his jaws clamped around his opponent, despite the fact that he could no longer bite, oblivious to the twin blades cursing and slashing at him from above.

[System Alert: Does player Bai Liu want to use the item (Mermaid's Sculpture) to enhance player Muke's resistance properties?]

Bai Liu, with cold eyes: [No, for plant patients (sculpture of a mermaid).]

[System Alert: Calculation in progress... As the plant patient has absorbed 35% of player Muke's blood, it is attached to player Muke's attributes and can use player Muke's props directly on him. Does player Bai Liu confirm to use this item on the monster plant patient instead of the endangered player Muke to increase defense?]

Miao Feichi's twin swords, with countless spirits attached, fell toward Muke's limp, hollow-eyed form.

Bai Liu lifted his eyes for a faint glance, then dropped them nonchalantly: [Confirmed]

A snow-white, heavy sculpture suddenly emerged from the monster standing nearby.

The weight of the sculpture was so excessive that it could have brought Bai Liu to his knees in The Last Train. Now, hanging on the overly thin and tall vegetative patient, it led to one inevitable outcome—the patient slipped on the ground as if crushed under the sudden burden. Staggering unsteadily, the patient collapsed forward, landing directly on top of Muke.

Everything seemed to move in slow motion as Miao Feichi's descending twin blades sliced into the snow-white armor of the plant patient. The tips trembled twice, accompanied by the fluttering sound of shifting iron, before the sculpture shattered into a million plastery shards that rained down on Muke's dying body.

Miao Feichi's knives, having cut through the standard-grade prop, continued their downward arc. They nearly cleaved through half of the monster patient's upper body before narrowly stopping in front of Muke's eyes, effectively redirecting Miao Feichi's powerful strike.

Bai Liu's pale gaze steadied as he let out a faint gasp—his plan had worked.

Even if Bai Liu had simply placed a sculpture prop on Muke, it wouldn't have been enough to stop Miao Feichi from cutting him in half.

So he played a small trick—using the sheer weight of the sculpture by attaching it to the body of a slender, tall plant patient, an A+ ranked monster.

The patient's collapse onto Muke created a [Sculpture + Patient] barrier, absorbing the force of Miao Feichi's staggering attack.

Pinned under the monster patient, Muke's dimming eyes suddenly lit up with understanding. With difficulty, he turned his head toward Bai Liu in the corner and mouthed his name in a hoarse, silent whisper.

For no logical reason, Muke was convinced—just as he had been from the start—that Bai Liu was someone who wouldn't let him die so easily.

And Bai Liu had proven him right.

Countdown: Eight seconds.

Miao Feichi's eyes widened, his bloody grin stretching as he finally found his prey. His twin swords slashed through the floating debris, slicing down without hesitation at the patient in sculpted armor, still pressed against Muke's body.

"Bai Liu! You couldn't resist using props! You've finally exposed yourself!"

Muke stumbled to his feet, knowing he had to play the monster for just a little longer. Gritting his teeth, he lunged at Miao Feichi's wrist in a mock attack. Bai Liu was faster—he kicked a hospital bed into the path of Miao Gaojiang's attack, blocking his assault on Muke while also preventing Muke from reaching Miao Feichi.

Miao Gaojiang's gaze flickered toward Bai Liu, an odd sense of familiarity settling over him.

This maneuver… it felt familiar.

Bai Liu smiled weakly, coughing twice in a way that was unmistakably deliberate. "I was just trying to stop him from sucking Miao Feichi's blood."

Countdown: Six seconds.

Miao Feichi hacked away at the wall, forcing the plant patient into a corner. He had already mistaken the creature for Bai Liu.

In truth, he didn't need to be on guard—getting bitten by a monster here wouldn't kill him outright. But the system would flag the attack, confirming that the creature was indeed a real monster, not Bai Liu in disguise.

Bai Liu got up, stepping onto the hospital bed he had knocked over earlier.

Muke, still playing the monster, pretended to lunge at Bai Liu. A wary Miao Gaojiang instinctively raised his fist to smash the 'monster.'

Bai Liu, calm to the core, hooked his foot under a fallen bookcase and flipped it onto the bed, blocking Muke's 'attack.' The bookcase landed in the perfect position to also stop Miao Gaojiang's advance.

Miao Gaojiang frowned.

Twice now, this supposed ‘monster’ had been conveniently interrupted.

…This feeling. This familiar, blocked attack pattern…

He had seen Muke do something like this before—pushing obstacles in the way of attacks.

But where was this strange sense of dissonance coming from?

Miao Gaojiang pushed the thought aside as Bai Liu—who, in his eyes, was still [Muke]—ran toward Miao Feichi.

At that moment, the real patient lunged for Miao Feichi’s exposed neck, mouth wide open.

Miao Feichi didn’t dodge, merely swinging his twin swords in a ruthless dance, slicing away at the monster’s life points as spirits wailed in the background.

Bai Liu’s gaze flickered slightly.

Now that he and Muke were nearly identical in terms of health, mental state, and physical appearance, only one difference remained.

His wound.

Bai Liu’s fingers brushed his neck.

His injury—cut by a whip—was different from Muke’s, which bore the bite marks of a monster.

The final step of the identity switch was simple: matching wounds.

Countdown: Four seconds.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has switched to Player Mu Sicheng’s system template and is using Mu Sicheng’s personal skill.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu’s personal skill (Thief Stalking) will be unavailable soon due to stamina depletion. Ten seconds remaining to use the skill: 10, 9…]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has forced (Thief Stalking) to full speed. Stamina critically low—skill usable for one second. Speed +7000.]

As Miao Feichi hooked his knife back, the monster roared, about to sink its fangs into him.

In that brief gap between Miao Feichi and the creature, Bai Liu moved.

Taking a step forward at extreme speed, it looked as though he had vanished from his original position. In the blink of an eye, he was between Miao Feichi and the monster. Bai Liu adjusted his stance so that when the monster's jaws clamped down, they bit into the wound on his neck.

As the fangs sank into his flesh, both Bai Liu's throat and the monster's jaw twitched—one from drawing blood, the other from the numbing exhaustion flooding his system.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's stamina is empty! Replenish immediately!]

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu is being drained by a plant patient monster! Life and mental states dropping rapidly—evacuate immediately!]

"Miao… Feichi…" Bai Liu's voice was weak, his gaze unfocused, a thin layer of moisture gathering in his eyes. He lifted his head slightly, whispering, "Bai Liu… he pulled me over. He's controlling me. You have to kill him."

"Fuck, he's still messing with you at a time like this?" Miao Feichi snarled, his twin blades poised. His breath reeked of blood as he grinned. "Bai Liu, struggling for your life is pointless. You're still going to die by my hands."

Bai Liu's lips curled into a faint, weak smile. "Thank you, Miao Da Shen."

Countdown: Three seconds.

Miao Feichi's knives closed inward. The monster's fangs dug deeper. Bai Liu exhaled slightly as blood dripped down his neck, staining his hospital gown.

The moment Miao Feichi's twin knives pierced the monster's head, the creature's jaw clenched with double the force before finally releasing its grip.

The monster staggered back, teeth still stained with blood. Miao Feichi's final strike ended it for good, its head splitting open as it fell to the floor—dead.

Bai Liu collapsed, gasping for breath. Blood still seeped from the wound on his neck, but his eyes were once again calm as they landed on the monster's severed head.

[System Prompt: Does Player Bai Liu wish to empty all system storage and points, discarding them on the ground? Confirm?]

Bai Liu: [Yes.]

Countdown: Two seconds.

A large pile of props and points scattered beside the dead monster, mimicking the aftermath of a player's death.

And amid the debris, a few broken lenses glowed faintly in the dim ward.

"Is that a broken lens?" Miao Gaojiang crouched down to pick it up, inspecting it briefly before glancing at the other dropped props. His gaze then shifted to the severed head of the monster they had just killed, his expression complex. "Bai Liu's props and the total points he accumulated from these two replicas... they're all here."

"Because of the way this game splits lifespans, when fifty percent of the main identity dies, no death panel pops up. But this should be Bai Liu now."

"What do you mean 'should'?" Miao Feichi crouched down, licking his lips. "That's Bai Liu. Don't you think so, Muke? Oh, and by the way, you didn't have to block that one for me just now. The monsters here are A+ at best—they can't bite through me. But thanks anyway." He tossed him a bottle. "Here, have a stamina restorer."

Bai Liu lowered his eyes and let out a soft murmur as he took the bottle from Miao Feichi's hand.

After that, Miao Feichi sliced a piece of skin from the monster's face with his knife, lifted it to his tongue, and chewed twice before spitting it out in disgust. "Tsk. Rotten flesh. It tastes awful. So alienated... Bai Liu, this guy."

Miao Gaojiang collected the props and points. His ears twitched as he pushed open the ICU door with a frown. The nurse's office outside was already open, and a group of nurses was heading toward the ICU.

It was 9 PM. The night shift nurses were about to start their patrol.

Miao Gaojiang turned to Miao Feichi, who was still toying with "Bai Liu's" corpse, and reminded him, "Feichi, stop playing. It's nine o'clock. The nurses are coming out. Let's go."

"Okay." Miao Feichi sheathed his twin swords and stood up, scanning the room. "What about that other monster? Let's kill it too. Might count toward the final overall rating and give us more points. Won't take more than a few seconds—it's weak, just a sweeper."

He didn't actually need the extra points. He was just addicted to the thrill of killing and still within his maximum skill time, so there was no reason not to.

Under the bed, Muke held his breath, biting his fist in sheer terror. His entire body was pressed against the cold floor, trying to suppress his breathing so he wouldn't be discovered.

One last step, just one last step! Muke prayed frantically. Let me be okay!

Bai Liu, meanwhile, let out a choked cough, clutching his neck. Blood smeared the sides of his mouth and neck, making him look like he was on the verge of death.

"No, it's too late." Miao Gaojiang glanced at [Muke]—actually Bai Liu—who was still sitting on the ground. His voice dropped. "We still have to run with Muke, and your strength is running out. Don't make more trouble. We've already achieved our two goals: [Renewing Life] and killing Bai Liu. Let's go first. The hospital is crawling with these monsters. You can start your killing spree again once you've recovered."

Miao Feichi paced around the ward, his eyes landing on [Muke]. He indeed looked like he was dying. Bai Liu clutched his neck, coughing faintly, blood trickling from the corner of his mouth and staining his pale lips.

The rhythmic click of high heels echoed outside the door. The nurses were approaching the ICU ward.

"Tsk." Miao Feichi finally withdrew his twin swords. "Fine. It's just an ordinary monster, anyway—not worth many points."

Under the bed, Muke felt sick at the casual way they spoke about his life.

Miao Gaojiang, still retaining some strength, bent down and lifted [Muke] with one arm, slinging him over his shoulder like a sack.

Miao Feichi was the first to slip out of the ward, followed by Miao Gaojiang carrying Bai Liu. The two moved quickly, disappearing into the safe passage before the nurses arrived.

Miao Gaojiang's voice was steady. "The nurses will patrol from the ground floor, using the elevator. They won't take this passage. Miao Feichi and I are on the fifth floor, and Muke, you're on the ninth. There's still some time before they check our ward."

"It looks like we've got time to settle the total score," Miao Gaojiang continued, but his tone suddenly turned sharp, dropping steeply.

His eyes darkened as he abruptly threw Bai Liu off his shoulder, slamming him onto the ground. He crouched down, extending a large, rough hand to wrap around Bai Liu's slender neck. His fingers pressed in, effortlessly finding the dip of his throat.

"Muke? Or Bai Liu pretending to be Muke?"

Miao Feichi froze. "What are you talking about, Dad? Isn't he Muke?"

Bai Liu's voice was hoarse as he lowered his eyes. "…What are you talking about?"

"Bai Liu is a player with control skills. Before we entered the ICU, we confirmed that Muke was free of Bai Liu's control. But once inside, in all the chaos, Feichi and I were S-panel players—there was no way Bai Liu could have easily controlled us." Miao Gaojiang's eyes darkened further, an eerie glint forming. He tightened his grip around Bai Liu's throat, pressing down on his larynx. "But controlling Muke again? That would be easy for Bai Liu."

"I suspect that shortly after we entered the ICU, Bai Liu regained control over Muke. That's why Muke kept interfering with our attacks. And in the end, he was probably just a convenient scapegoat for Bai Liu to push forward and have us kill instead."

Miao Gaojiang sneered. "I pretended to believe you were Muke to get you out of the ward. The nurses were coming, and if we lingered too long in the ICU, they would have caught me and Feichi. But did you really think you could backstab me?"

With that, Miao Gaojiang pinched Bai Liu's jaw with two fingers and pressed firmly.

Bai Liu felt the suffocating grip tightening. He struggled to breathe, but every attempt to cough was stifled by the crushing force on his throat. His limbs trembled from oxygen deprivation, his pale cheeks flushing with the telltale red of asphyxiation.

Miao Gaojiang's gaze sharpened. "That last monster we killed used a prop. Only a player can use props. But the prop that monster used was [Sculpture of a Mermaid]—a reward given for unlocking the 'Sculpture of a Mermaid' monster book pass in Siren Small Town."

"This prop is wrong," Miao Gaojiang said coldly. "Bai Liu did have this prop—but he already used it during 'Explosive Last Train.' He used it against Mu Sicheng. I've watched your little TV video many times. I remember it very well."

Miao Gaojiang's tone was calm, yet his gaze was ruthless. "Of course, we can't rule out the possibility that you yourself went to the market and bought another one of these," he said, referring to the mermaid sculpture. "But there's no need for a newcomer like you to buy such a low-level prop. It just so happens that Muke's warehouse, which we checked earlier, has the Sculpture of a Mermaid, and the monster we killed is very likely one that Muke subconsciously used to survive. The ones that exploded were the ones you deliberately threw on the ground."

"You wanted us to think you're Bai Liu, right? But unfortunately, the prop Muke used—the Sculpture of a Mermaid—is the only flaw in your entire plan. Bai Liu doesn't have that prop."

Bai Liu struggled to breathe, his windpipe constricted. He subconsciously tried to break free from Miao Gaojiang's grip, gasping out, "I'm really Muke... that prop was taken by Bai Liu after he took control of me in the ward…"

Miao Gaojiang sneered, not believing him. "You're still a bit young, little boy. Come back and fight us after a year in the league."

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu loading Player Muke's system panel. Fully loaded.]

Miao Gaojiang's eyes narrowed as he saw the panel. His hands loosened as Bai Liu rubbed his neck and breathed heavily, quivering from the near-death experience.

Miao Gaojiang eyed the system panel with suspicion. It was indeed Muke's, and the Sculpture of a Mermaid was missing from the warehouse items.

But Miao Gaojiang wasn't someone who trusted panels easily. He had been around the league long enough to know that visual representations could be misleading. He remembered that Bai Liu was a control player, and though Bai Liu was a newcomer with only two games under his belt, no one was sure how his skills worked.

Miao Gaojiang had speculated about the possibility of sharing skill panels, but that was a serious infringement on the system's rights. It would fall under the highest level of [Rule Skills], like Spades and Hearts, or the third-ranked player in the standings, the [Judges of the Reverse Cross]. These were skills of the highest authority, on par with the system itself.

Bai Liu was unlikely to possess such a skill. If he had one, he wouldn't need to play this trick of wits against Miao Gaojiang—he could just take control directly. [Rule Skills] were powerful enough to kill across levels.

It was possible that Bai Liu had such a skill, but it was severely restricted, which seemed highly unlikely. Miao Gaojiang had never seen such a strange personal skill in the game.

Bai Liu cleared his throat, lowering his head. "When I was in the ICU, I was indeed controlled by Bai Liu for a while, but he released his control over me when his mental value got too low. He took one of my props, and that's how I knew the monster was Bai Liu."

"Is that so?" Miao Gaojiang's eyes were unreadable. As an experienced player, he was far more cautious than his son, Miao Feichi, who was eager for excitement and bloodshed.

Despite seeing Muke's system panel, Miao Gaojiang wasn't convinced. He could feel his suspicions mounting.

This wasn't enough to determine whether Bai Liu was truly Muke. Miao Gaojiang preferred to eliminate potential threats rather than leave them alive. But before he made a final decision, he softened his tone slightly. "Muke, it's not that I don't believe you, but you need to prove yourself. This system panel can confirm your identity, but it's not enough for us to trust you completely. You claimed you found the cure while in the ICU. Why don't you show us?"

Muke had been planning to restrict Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's movements, disrupting their attack rhythm. But the veteran players were watching closely, their intentions clear.

If he could provide the [renewal formula], at least Bai Liu would be safe to return to the ward tonight as Muke. But if he couldn't provide it, they would likely kill him to eliminate any potential dangers.

Unless Bai Liu could prove his worth to them.

The room fell silent for a moment, only the sound of Bai Liu's breathing and Miao Feichi slowly rubbing his twin swords together breaking the stillness.

Miao Feichi hesitated. "Dad, are you really sure he's Bai Liu? He saved my life once…"

Miao Gaojiang glanced at his son. "Trust me on this."

Miao Feichi paused but quickly deferred to his father's experience, bringing his twin swords up and approaching Bai Liu. Even though Miao Feichi's strength tank was depleted and he couldn't use his personal skills, his panel attributes would still make it easy to kill Bai Liu without any special abilities.

Miao Gaojiang pressed his hands on Bai Liu's shoulders, an outwardly soothing gesture, but one that could easily strangle Bai Liu if he so desired. Bai Liu, with only six life points, was vulnerable.

"Sorry to offend you," Miao Feichi said with a smile. "My father is just being cautious. It's better for you to prove your innocence."

Miao Gaojiang crouched in front of Bai Liu, smiling kindly, though his eyes were cold. "Show me the [renewal formula] you found, Muke."

Bai Liu, too weak to use his skills or escape with Mu Sicheng's cooldown, could do nothing to avoid the situation.

Miao Gaojiang's tone remained gentle, but there was an underlying threat. "Can't remember, Muke? Do you want me to help you recall? When you were under the bed, you suddenly shouted that you'd found the [Life-Sustaining Remedy], interrupting our attack. Were you already under Bai Liu's control at that point? If he manipulated you into lying, we'd be quite angry if we went to all this trouble only to come up empty-handed."

"You can't afford the consequences of our anger."

Miao Gaojiang, like an elder, suddenly snapped his hand around Bai Liu's neck. Just as he was about to tighten his grip, Bai Liu's phone rang. Both Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang exchanged a glance—none of them had expected the phone to ring.

Bai Liu picked up the phone, but before he could speak, Miao Gaojiang grabbed it, his gaze fixed on Bai Liu. Bai Liu immediately understood what Miao Gaojiang wanted.

A veteran player like Miao Gaojiang had an astute mind. Despite Bai Liu's control skill, Miao Gaojiang remained wary. His suspicion wasn't fully alleviated by the system panel alone.

The best way to confirm a player's identity in this game wasn't just through the system panel—it was through the child associated with the player.

The phone was a direct line between the player and their child, required to be carried at all times to ensure the child could call the player. The player couldn't discard or exchange the phone, and the call was strictly from the child.

The voice on the other end of the line would be unmistakable. A player could try to impersonate another, but they couldn't fool the child's voice.

Miao Gaojiang, an S-grade player, could easily distinguish between Muke's voice and Bai Liu's.

Bai Liu looked calmly at Miao Gaojiang, who had taken his phone. Miao Gaojiang didn't speak, though the nurses downstairs were starting to search upstairs.

After a few seconds, Miao Gaojiang tapped Bai Liu's shoulder, bringing the phone to his ear and tilting Bai Liu's chin with a cold gaze. Miao Gaojiang's message was clear: Bai Liu needed to speak, to maintain the illusion that he was still Muke's investor.

"Good evening," Bai Liu said smoothly, speaking obediently under Miao Gaojiang's watchful eyes.

On the other side, there was the sound of several children running, their breath ragged, accompanied by faint cries and eerie, ethereal laughter. It sounded like a group of children was running, but it was hard to tell how many there were.

“Evening, good evening, Mr. Investor,” came the soft voice of a young boy, sounding as if he were being dragged along. His voice was teary, “I… I… it’s Muke. I’ve come to call you.”

It was unmistakably the real voice of little Muke.

Bai Liu smiled faintly. Well done, little Bai Liu.

After hearing the child’s voice, Miao Gaojiang and Bai Liu stared at each other for a long moment before Miao Gaojiang slowly released his grip from Bai Liu’s neck.

The identity of the caller was confirmed, and Miao Gaojiang had no reason to suspect Bai Liu wasn’t Muke.

Miao Gaojiang finally relaxed, patting Bai Liu on the shoulder. “The nurse is coming up. Let’s return to the ward. Sorry for the earlier treatment—it’s just that Bai Liu is too clever. We had to confirm a few things first. Your child’s willingness to call you helped us a lot. We’ll handle things tomorrow. As for the [life-renewal remedy]…”

“I know what the [renewal formula] is,” Bai Liu interrupted. “But it’s too complicated. Let me give it to you in the morning, after I finish it.”

Muke would likely have finished the book in the ICU by then, just in time to pass it to Bai Liu.

Everything was working perfectly for Bai Liu. The news that Muke had found the [life-renewal remedy] had clearly softened Miao Gaojiang’s attitude. He nodded. “Then please. We’ll help you through this, but the nurse is coming, so let’s head back to the ward.”

After returning, Bai Liu entered Muke’s previous room, closing the door behind him. He picked up the handset, which was still on the line, and asked softly, “Bai Liu?”

“I’m in,” came the cold voice of the child, accompanied by the sounds of crying and running. It was unmistakably little Muke.

Little Bai Liu asked calmly, “Who else was on the phone just now?”

“How do you know there was someone else?” Bai Liu asked with a hint of amusement. “It was just my voice.”

Little Bai Liu’s tone was icy. “I heard three people breathing. Your voice was too far from the receiver to be the same as when you called me last night. The phone was probably not in your possession—you were coerced into taking my call.”

Little Bai Six paused before continuing, explaining, “And you didn’t say anything to me last night, like ‘good evening,’ which is normally what I’d say to the owner when I get paid. But you’re the owner, so you don’t have to say that to me. You didn’t say it last night, and it’s a bit odd to start the evening with a ‘good evening.’”

Bai Liu recalled that it was true; he only seemed polite and courteous to strangers when there was money to take. He could say anything strange, like to Zhang Gui’s master, without even noticing it himself.

“How did you come up with the idea of letting Muke talk to me on your phone?” Bai Liu asked, smiling. “And how did you end up with Muke tonight? How are you doing tonight?”

The player’s side of the phone is tied and cannot be exchanged, but the child’s side of the phone is not.

But with almost all children out on the phone with extreme difficulty, the idea of having one child take another child out and hand the phone to another to speak as soon as the call is answered was probably something Miao Gaojiang, who had never received a phone call from a child, had never thought about.

The execution and obedience of children is much lower than that of adults, especially when compared to the adults already in the game. Even Bai Liu himself, was a bit surprised by Little Bai Six's rare ability to execute.

Although Bai Liu knew he would probably do anything for money, he raised his eyebrows in surprise when he heard Little Muke’s voice on the phone.

Little Bai Six reported flatly, “Because of the christening tomorrow, the teacher asked that investors and parents be informed. So, many kids came out to call tonight, but so far, apart from the ones I haven’t managed, there are some who were drawn out by the sound of the flute. The deformed kids aren’t running after us, so things are okay.”

“As for why I’m with Muke tonight, I think you're asking the obvious question,” Little Bai Six’s tone grew cold and disgusted. “Didn’t you ask me to babysit two kids for you last night? One of the kids you said you paid me to look after was a blind girl, whose name is Liu Jiayi. The other one is Muke, the girl I can’t get in touch with at the moment. But Muke and I sleep in the same room, and when I call you tonight for the money, Muke will be in the same room."

"I meant for you to hear his voice, to give you an inspection, to verify that the little kid was in pretty good condition and could run and cry. But I didn't expect a situation on your end, so I stopped talking and gave him the phone to pretend to be your investment child."

There was a subtle pause in Little Bai Six's voice before he questioned Bai Liu directly, "Actually, I think when you told me last night that you were paying me to help someone, you were doing it so Muke would call you now, weren't you?"

Bai Liu's voice had a subtle chuckle in it as he leaned lazily against the wall. "You could say that."

When he told Little Bai Six that he would pay him to look after Muke and Liu Jiayi, he knew that tonight, Little Bai Six would drag one of them out to call him.

His fourteen-year-old self's penchant for money had never been stronger, and there was no way he would pass up such an opportunity to get his hands on it. But Bai Liu had grown up as a relatively deal-abiding person, so he wouldn't easily cheat the person he was dealing with. The best way to verify the success of the deal was for young Muke to speak directly to Bai Liu and say that he was okay.

And Little Bai Six certainly did so.

"You can just ask me to drag Muke out and call you tonight, no need to beat around the bush with me," Little Bai Six's voice had the distinctive youthfulness of a teenager, but it was also very cold because it was too calm. "I'll do anything for you if you pay me."

"But then you would have known in advance the hostile plan I was going to make against the other two investors," Bai Liu said nonchalantly. "You would have guessed what I was going to do, what kind of terrible threat I would face, knowing what the call would mean to me, and you might have betrayed my plans to my enemies in exchange for more money from them. Which is something you would have done, wouldn't you?"

There was a long silence from Little Bai Six.

Bai Liu gave a soft laugh. "I can't let you guess what I'm going to do, because you're a very dangerous guy too."

“I even feel that you are more dangerous to me than anything else in this game. But fortunately, I know you, and I tell you the truth on the basis of what I know about you, Bai Six: I will certainly give you more money than any other person in the world, and I will even give you all the money I have.”

Bai Liu lowered his eyes slowly. “There will never be a more generous man than I am to you, Bai Six.”

Because I am you, and you are me, money circulates strangely between us across time and latitude. But the essence is all ascribed to the identity [I], and the money I have is owned by both you and me at the same time. But the money Bai Liu has is not diminished by a single cent.

“All that money?” Little Bai Six’s tone remained cold, but there was an inexplicable irony in his words. “Then you are a rare and not at all self-serving kind man, Mr. Investor.”

“I am indeed very selfish and self-interested and greedy, so I am definitely not like that to others.” Bai Liu was not offended by the sarcasm, and his face remained unmoved by the affectionate smile. “But anyways, you are the most special person to me in this world, so I must have no reservations about you.”

Little Bai Six did not reply to Bai Liu's remark but merely maintained a subtle, indifferent, skeptical silence.

Bai Liu went on. “But I can understand what you're thinking. You must be thinking that humans are instinctively selfish and self-serving creatures, so why should I, as an investor, go against my instincts and do this for a stranger like you? There must not be such a person in this world, and even if there is, it must be pretending to get more benefits — after all, there is no free lunch in the world, is there?”

Across the table, Little Bai Six lapsed into another eerie silence, and it was clear that Bai Liu knew exactly what the fourteen-year-old was thinking.

“I thought the same thing when I was your age.” Bai Liu leaned against the wall, his eyes slightly closed as he tilted his head back.

Because of his physical weakness and the existence of the orphanage — a copy of which has a special meaning for him — as well as the presence of Little Bai Six, an in-game NPC, Bai Liu rarely dwelled on his past.

What was he like when he was fourteen? Bai Liu thought he wouldn't remember much.

For man is indeed a very forgetful creature, and perhaps it is true that man's memory lasts only seven seconds, and that the rest is just something that man constructs from his own shallow sense memory to deceive, confuse, and comfort himself.

But the moment he hears Little Bai Six's cold, emotionless voice, the moment Bai Liu closes his eyes, he can remember what he was like at fourteen.

Aloof, detached, and at odds with everything around him, no one could understand this scrawny little boy who spent his days reading horror stories and always looking at every available horror game.

When Bai Liu was fourteen, he was less able to hide his face and disguise himself than he is now. He looked at people with a trace of repulsion and a cold aura that made him a stranger.

This, of course, had a lot to do with Bai Liu himself.

While the other children in the orphanage had trains or blocks donated by kind-hearted people, Bai Liu's favorite toys were scary dolls with missing arms and legs. While the other children were reading comic books and storybooks, Bai Liu was reading books like The Long and Thin Ghostly Murder Story, with no idea how it had been donated to the orphanage.

But in those days, before these human cubs were socialized and imbibed with adult rules, every child in the orphanage would fight to the death for good toys, good food, the chance to be adopted, and even a less-damp straw bed.

No one had taught them to do so. It was something akin to a biological instinct to stomp on others in order to live better for themselves, and Bai Liu realized this early on, so he stayed further and further away from these people.

There were two people in the orphanage who didn't fight about these things at all — Bai Liu and Lu Yizhan.

Bai Liu didn't need these things because he preferred money, which is not usually given to children in orphanages, and Lu Yizhan gave them up because he thought other people needed them more. So this fool gave them up.

Lu Yizhan had foolishly given up better food, better toys, and the chance to be adopted, looking at the happy smiling faces of others using the fruits of his exploitation. All they needed to do was give Lu Yizhan a simple and shallow thank you, which made the fool scratch the back of his head and smile even wider than the other person.

“I used to think that there were no humans in this world who gave all for others,” Bai Liu's voice was soft and calm. “Even if one gives for others, it is to get that sense of self-giving and self-satisfaction that has been brainwashed by the world’s moral code. It’s still essentially for one’s own pleasure.”

“There are no purely good people in the world, only purely bad people.”

The sound of little Bai Six's breathing rushes across the room as he pulls little Muke, still whimpering, into a late-night run through the children's home. Bai Liu knows he is listening.

The little guy hadn't hung up yet, as it was billed by the minute—a really hard-working chaperone, albeit a child worker.

Bai Liu's voice takes on a lazy, idle laugh as he seems to recall something funny. "And then, when I was firmly committed to these ideas, I met a douchebag who volunteered to be my friend."

"He kept asking me why I was alone, starving himself to save food for me, and just froze when he found me reading some really bloody, weird books. Then he snuck out to get some for me," Bai Liu says in a flat tone. "But I was cold to him from start to finish. He was giving without getting anything in return, and I thought he'd give up soon."

The little Bai Six over there finally spoke up and asked, "Has he given up?"

"He stayed away from me for a while halfway through, and I thought he'd given up." Bai Liu paused. "Then, one day at noon, I saw a long, skinny, ghostly figure doll in the back of the yard."

It was a very clumsy, long, thin ghostly figure with a doll costume made from unwanted sheets from the orphanage, and a tattered hat that looked like some schoolboy's failed craft project. The figure waved its scarf and ragged clothes in a silly "hi" to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu's regular reading at that time was the story of the long, thin ghostly figure, as the orphanage had not received any more books like that.

But Lu Yizhan may have misunderstood Bai Liu's fondness for this strange legendary creature. As a teenager, Lu Yizhan secretly stayed up late to make such a doll, hiding it under his blanket, and then put it on his head and stood in front of Bai Liu, bouncing around in front of him, panting and sweating. His eyes were clear from the poor-quality cloth doll set, but red from staying up late.

Lu Yizhan saw Bai Liu as one of those children who love animated characters, and he simply wanted Bai Liu to be happy.

But he didn’t want Bai Liu to thank him, and Bai Liu didn’t appreciate him, because it was...

"...He's so stupid," little Bai Six spat, expressionless.

"Yeah, that's what I thought at the time," Bai Liu let out a low laugh. "I just looked at him like he was stupid, and then politely explained that I wasn’t a fan of long, skinny ghostly figures. I just liked reading horror stories and watching these strange, scary creatures eat stupid, errant humans. I liked stories like that."

Little Bai Six was silent for a moment before saying, "I like it too, but I don't think he... likes it."

No normal child would like it. At that time, Bai Liu was the odd one out in the orphanage because the books he read and the drawings he made were not normal and very gory.

Books, games, and even the Muppet toys Bai Liu looked at twice—they guarded him as if he were a potential prisoner of the law.

In fact, to some extent, this defense was correct.

Bai Liu had reined in his blatant hobby and was pretending to be a good boy who had lost his way.

Lu Yizhan was not a fan of such unconventional horror stories and games.

But just because he didn’t like it didn’t mean he couldn’t make Bai Liu like it. He knew Bai Liu liked it; Bai Liu just pretended not to.

"He really didn’t like it, but the guy was always well-liked. He scrounged up lots and lots of horror games and horror storybooks from somewhere," Bai Liu recalled, his eyes still closed. "Lots of them, really. And then he sent them to me full of them without the teacher's knowledge, for me to play and read."

Little Bai Liu was silent again, and after a while, he asked, "Why did he do that?"

"That's what I asked him," Bai Liu's voice was soft, almost inaudible. "He said, 'Aren't we friends? This is something I can do for you, so I did.'"

Little Bai Six wondered from the bottom of his heart, "Since when have you been friends with him? I don't remember you agreeing to this, do you?"

"I don't know," Bai Liu said. "But Lu Yizhan just assumed it wishfully. And when I told him that the odds were I was a freak and might do something bad later, he told me very seriously that if I was going to be a bad person, he would be the police to catch me."

Bai Liu gave a soft laugh. "So he reassured me that he wouldn't let me be the bad guy, because a cop's friend can't be the bad guy."

"He played a lot of horror games with me for many, many years, and then he gradually recognized that I wasn't a normal person, but he stuck with me as a friend."

"Why?" little Bai Six asked again, confused. "You can't understand each other at all. Would it do him any good to be friends with you?"

"Nothing good came out of it. I'm a pretty troubled person in every way." Bai Liu quickly admitted. "I'm not good at being a person, but that friend of mine wasn't friends with me for any benefits."

Little Bai Six asked, "That's for what?"

Bai Liu responded, "He just wanted to have a friend, in order for me to have a friend."

Lu Yizhan's reason was simple: he wanted to be friends with Bai Liu. He wanted to make Bai Liu happy. He wanted Bai Liu to have a friend —no sympathy, no pity. He just thought that, so he went ahead and did it.

Lu Yizhan was the first strange human being to appear in Bai Liu's perception—a person whose existence almost overturned Bai Liu's view of the world. In Bai Liu's world view, he was a textbook self-giving fool.

Bai Liu was the only friend he ever had in his life.

"There are still these purely good people in this world, who exist against evolution and human instinct, so they live a hard life," Bai Liu said softly. "But they just exist, and you will meet them soon."

Yes, Bai Six, you will meet this friend who will play games with you, make you laugh by pretending to be a long, skinny ghost, and keep you company for many years, Bai Liu whispered in his heart.

"Such people are rare, aren't they?" Little Bai Six's tone was as light as ever. "It's a miracle in the world that you've met one. I won't meet such wishful giving fools."

"You will." Bai Liu smiled up. "You still met me, didn't you?"

"I also knew you were a bad boy, Bai Six, and I knew there was a chance you would betray me, but I ended up telling you my plan." Bai Liu's tone was soft with a very odd bit of seduction. "You're really important to me, more important than the plan, even more important than me."

"You're the most important person in this place to me," Bai Liu smiled. "I promise I'll be your strange and reliable friend."

This time, little Bai Six was silent for a long, long time—so long that Bai Liu thought he was going to hang up. Then little Bai Six changed the subject in a very hard tone. "You like horror games too? Have you ever played any fun ones?"

Bai Liu's eyes drooped carelessly, the corners of his mouth curling unnoticeably as he slowly and leisurely chatted with Bai Six. "Yeah, I've played two really good games, one called Siren Town and one called Burst Last Train."

At fourteen, Bai Liu was still very gullible and mildly impressed by Lu Yizhan's self-sacrificing type of behavior.

If he had met a twenty-four-year-old Bai Liu, it would have been much more complicated.

Bai Liu didn't have much time to counsel his fourteen-year-old self, and he didn't think little Bai Six needed it either. He told this long list of stories just to set the stage for convincing little Bai Six to cooperate with him wholeheartedly—because unfortunately, the best tool to compel little Bai Six—his points, or money—had already been thrown out to Miao Feichi and the others. Bai Liu had already thrown out all his points, or rather, his money, to Miao Feichi and the others.

This was also a dangerous point, as Bai Liu now had a lower point total, meaning a lower money total, than Miao Feichi, and this total of props that were very much in the hands of little Bai Six was less than his enemies'.

And soon after little Bai Six met them the next day, this very perceptive child would soon realize this—that Bai Liu was not as rich as Miao Feichi.

This is awkward, as little Bai Six knows they are hostile, and from what Bai Liu knows about himself, little Bai Six is bound to fall back on the side with more money. He will probably betray his information to Miao Feichi, the father and son. Bai Liu knows very well that at fourteen, he is not a very obedient child. Bai Liu knows that little Bai Six is only obedient to his money.

Even if this would lead to his own death, little Bai Six wouldn't care—his desire for money was much stronger when he was fourteen than it is now.

So Bai Liu needs a point other than money that can hold little Bai Six back from doing whatever he wants for money, and that point needs to be as good as the money. From Bai Liu’s known experience, a great tool to hold himself back is Lu Yizhan.

The reason Lu Yizhan was able to keep the money-hungry Bai Liu from committing crimes for so many years was not only because of the man’s unusual obstinacy and his determination to be Bai Liu’s friend, but also because Bai Liu was very curious about Lu Yizhan.

Bai Liu was a relatively inquisitive person, with an appetite for exploring all sorts of bizarre and inhuman behavior, and in Lu Yizhan's case, his curiosity had never waned over the years.

Bai Liu is curious about how long this Lu Yizhan, a geek like himself, can be a good person, about what drives this person's behavior. When this curiosity is strong enough, it can even offset Bai Liu’s desire for money to some extent.

Lu Yizhan does not exist in this copy, so Bai Liu tells little Bai Six that such a person exists and takes on the role of Lu Yizhan himself. Bai Liu extracts the element of Lu Yizhan that holds the most power over him—that curiosity. It is this curiosity.

Little Bai Six became curious about him and wanted to explore the logic of his behavior, and that is where the story begins.

Just as he did with Lu Yizhan.

The Loving Welfare Home

"You said you kissed a silver-blue-tailed mermaid living in a jar, and a ghost in a mirror about to explode on a burning train?" Little Bai Liu tsked in a booming tone. "You sound like you have a slightly unusual emotional history."

Bai Liu remained unconcerned. "It's just a character in a game, but you haven't hung up after listening to me for so long today. So, what, you want to fight me for three hours?"

"If I may, I do want to play you for the full three hours," Little Bai Liu replied tersely. "After all, it's billed by the minute, and it's a rare day when everyone is scrambling to get the attention of that monstrous child. So far, only Muke and I have managed to call and inform his investors about what's going to happen tomorrow."

"But that little blind girl, Liu Jiayi, is fast too. She can't see, but she keeps walking against the wall. I just covered her a bit to lure away the deformed kid on her side. She should be back from her call soon."

"The two remaining children were quite fast runners—Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, as I recall. Though they called, they kept crying and didn't give a clear explanation to the people across the street about inviting the investors over to watch the ceremony tomorrow."

Little Bai Liu explained the situation to Bai Liu quickly, wheezing a bit, but still well-organized. "And you can rest assured I was more alert. When I didn't know that you and the two kids' investors had a grudge, Muke and I avoided them when we ran, so they didn't know we were calling together. We've never been spotted together on the phone, and it's probably because they ran amok and attracted the monster's attention that it was so easy for the rest of us to call tonight."

"Oh, yes, I forgot to tell you. There was more than one deformed child tonight," Little Bai Liu added in a calm tone. "There were three, each with different deformities. Not even the one from last night. One was crouching and crawling on all fours with purple lips. One had deformed limbs folded inward, his feet would turn inwards and limp when he ran, his limbs were strangely disproportionate to his head. Another had abnormal white hair and skin. Just now, I hid on the slide and looked, and though I couldn’t see clearly, this child’s eyes should be purple."

Bai Liu, familiar with some common deformities from his time at the orphanage, pondered. "It sounds a bit like precordial, osteogenesis imperfecta, and albinism."

All are congenital genetic disorders and largely overlap with those of the five children who survived in the real world.

Bai Liu quickly spotted two peculiar points.

First: While it is true that there is a disproportionate number of disabled children in orphanages, it is already a very special point that those who die and those who survive are children with certain specific congenital genetic disorders. What does this special point mean?

Second: Why do deformed children in the real world survive, while those in this world have turned into ghosts?

The first point Bai Liu needs more information to reason with, but the second point, Bai Liu feels, he has already come up with an answer.

Bai Liu played with the tattered coin on his chest with his fingers, as if in a moment of understanding, lost in thought—

According to the information given so far in this copy, normal children—those without deformities—were attracted to the sound of the flute and disappeared, not to reappear. The way these deformed children currently die suggests they can indeed turn into monsters after death and roam and play.

But not without death.

From the rules that Bai Liu knows about this game copy of Love Welfare Home, these six children with congenital defects in reality, including Liu Jiayi, should exist as NPC-like "deformed children" projected into the reality copy of Love Welfare Home. And since all these deformed children NPCs in this Love Welfare Home have died, it stands to reason that the six real-life children who have not yet had an accident are the ones most likely to die in order to fit the pattern of this copy.

But these six children are currently under the close watch of Lu Yizhan in reality, and the likelihood of their death is very low. Instead, the only one who could die and be turned into a monster is the dangerous Liu Jiayi, who has entered the game.

But judging from the system's usual planning—in order to fit the game logic of the copy—these real-life children will most likely still have to die.

The question then is, if they were to die, how would they die?

"So it's quite possible that the deformed kids who survived in reality will eventually die. But they were alive when I entered the game, and if they die, it will be because of what manner of death..." Bai Liu leaned against the wall, muttering to himself.

The game loading cannot be out of the ordinary, forcing the data of [NPC death] to be loaded. The [real world] will most likely become buggy, and NPCs like [Lu Yizhan], who are observing this case closely, will notice something is wrong. Of course, the system can use rogue methods to delete the memory data of all NPCs concerned with this matter, but the [player's] memory cannot be deleted. Bai Liu will know that there is a bug here, but if that happens, the official version of [the real world] would be lost to many [players].

So the question is: How should these six kids die in a way that is logical to the game and the world, and not considered a forced-loaded bug?

Bai Liu suddenly remembered the pile of corpses he had seen that day at the hospital and what Lu Yizhan had said to him with a gloomy expression.

"[The group of children entered the hospital with baseline normal signs, but suddenly started having seizures a day later... Both the necrotic spots and rigor mortis appeared too early. It felt like the deaths were delayed long before they appeared later...]"

Yes, that's the point: delayed death.

Bai Liu suddenly realized—the most logical, realistic, and conventional way to load a death without arousing suspicion from the NPCs.

It’s not that the six children were not poisoned by the mushrooms. It’s more likely that they were more resistant to the mushrooms than the other children, and that the signs of poisoning were delayed until later in the game. The children had not shown any signs until Bai Liu entered the game, but that doesn’t mean they wouldn’t have shown signs of poisoning.

Or rather, they are in the process of dying, but medical tests don't work on them, so no one except Bai Liu in the game has noticed it yet.

The discovery of the six deformed children who came back from the dead was still shrouded in the shadow of death.

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed—if the real-world copy was a loading of the game copy, would these kids in and out of the game die the same way?

Little Bai Liu did not disturb Bai Liu's silence as he quietly waited for Bai Liu's next inquiry and did not hang up—after all, he was paid by the minute.

After a moment of silence, Bai Liu suddenly asked, "Have you had mushrooms at the orphanage lately?"

"No," Little Bai Liu replied succinctly. "I'm fairly sensitive to the taste of mushrooms, and I don't think I've eaten any food that didn't have a bit of mushroom in it."

"Did those deformed kids running after you smell like mushrooms?" Bai Liu asked again, changing the topic.

Little Bai Liu quickly answered, "I don't know. We've been so far away from them, not close enough to smell them. Do you need me to get close enough to confirm? Certainly not for free."

"No, not yet," Bai Liu quickly dismissed Little Bai Liu's bold suggestion. "These kids aren't slow, and if no one else diverts their attention, getting too close could get you caught."

Moreover, according to the monster book's description of these "deformed children," the player's children are completely missing when caught. Bai Liu's life expectancy is now only six, and what he said to Little Bai Liu earlier wasn't all a lie—he still has plenty of life expectancy compared to himself. Little Bai Liu is indeed more important than him, and Bai Liu will do everything to ensure this overly money-grubbing child's safety.

"But you do need me close, right?" Little Bai Liu spoke in a cool tone.

"Right." Bai Liu was honest. "Not only do I need you to get close, I need you to find the weaknesses of these deformed children."

He needed to unlock the weaknesses of these monsters in the monster book and rely on them to control the monstrous children who wander out every night. This was much safer than letting them chase their own children every night. After all, Bai Liu believed the monstrous children's missing attacks were more dangerous and unpredictable than the plant patient's blood-sucking attack, which could be a one-hit kill.

No children had gone missing yet, most likely because these deformed children were so spread out that, once targeted, it would be easy to capture them.

What also struck Bai Liu as dangerous was that last night there was one, tonight there were three, and the number of these deformed children seemed to be increasing.

"I do need you to get close to these children to help me find out their weaknesses," Bai Liu said softly. "It is important to me, and of course, I will pay you for it. But not tonight, little friend. Tonight is too dangerous for me to sacrifice you for something like this. We'll do this tomorrow night after I find a way to protect you."

An eerie silence hung on the other side. After about a minute, Little Bai Liu quickly changed the subject as if he hadn't heard anything. "Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang are in the house, and the three kids are coming after me. Mr. Investor, the total call tonight is thirty-one minutes, so I'll give you zero thirty minutes. That's a total of three thousand. You already owe me six thousand."

Little Bai Liu's tone was polite yet aggressive. "It's not a good habit to owe underage escorts wages, so I hope you can pay me the six grand when we meet tomorrow. Thank you and good evening, Mr. Investor."

As usual, by this time Little Bai Liu would have simply hung up, but today he didn't hang up after finishing.

Bai Liu could hear his breathing as he ran across the open ground, the giggling of the children chasing him behind him, the gasps and cries that Little Muke was trying to suppress, the sound of running feet gradually slowing down, the texture of their footsteps changing from the feel of rustling sand to the hard stomp of concrete. The eerie laughter of the children behind them faded away—they should be heading back to their rooms.

Little Muke struggled to run after Little Bai Liu, a little boy who had been pulled along by Little Bai Liu all night. His face was purple from a bad heart, but he continued to run with good grace, clenching his teeth and not crying, as if he knew it was for his own good that Little Bai Liu was pulling him along.

Because Little Muke knew he wouldn’t make it to the end of the night to call his investors if Little Bai Liu didn’t pull him along.

If he couldn’t inform the investor, he wouldn’t be able to attend the christening tomorrow, which was a very serious matter for the children entering the orphanage, and they might be punished for it.

And if it wasn’t for Little Bai Liu’s investor, who said he wanted Little Bai Liu to look after him tonight, a kid like Little Bai Liu, who is so aloof, would not have cared about Little Muke.

Little Muke stole a glance at the phone in Little Bai Liu’s hand. Why did this kind investor gentleman want Little Bai Liu to help him?

And why haven’t they hung up yet? They’re already running into the room where they’re sleeping, and the teacher will see them and scold them.

"Is there something else you want to say?" Bai Liu began sagely. "You're going back to your room, aren't you? Why haven’t you hung up yet? You want more of my money that badly?"

"..... These minutes don't count toward your money," Little Bai Liu said quickly, his breath uneven and his voice tinged with something unspoken, as if hiding something. He spoke quickly, "The two horror games you talked about tonight are great. You can get credit for them."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow in surprise. "Being so nice to me tonight? Another zero wipe and offset..."

"Beep beep beep—"

The person on the other end hung up the phone without hesitation.

Bai Liu: "....."

This is clearly meant to compliment him on how well he plays the game. Was he such a twisted person when he was fourteen?

Wow, how disgusting.

Bai Liu put away the phone, and his eyes fell on the overly damp straw bed. They suddenly narrowed.

Tonight, he had been smelling a faint odor of decaying plants on the patient. He had been so focused on fighting Miao Feichi and the others that he hadn't tried to identify the smell. It was like humus, much like rotting straw, but there was something else beneath the strong scent of straw.

Bai Liu touched his neck, where he had been bitten. The mucus of the plant patient's mouth still lingered. Bai Liu scraped a bit of it off with his fingertips and carefully smelled it—the smell of his blood, the damp decaying straw, and underneath the straw, there was a very light...

Bai Liu calmly put his finger in his mouth.

—There's also a very light hint of mushroom flavor in the mucus.

You can't smell it, but you can taste it.

Here, the children aren't eating mushrooms—are the patients eating them?

The only thing the patients in the ICU ate was the [medication] that the nurse brought into each ward.

But [the drug] is clearly not a mushroom. It's a liquid, and though it can't be ruled out that this liquid contains mushrooms, Bai Liu feels that the other scenario is more likely than that possibility.

Bai Liu's gaze fixed on the straw bed in front of him.

He circled the straw bed, the more he observed it, the stronger the strange feeling of unease grew. The bed itself resembled a proper resting place, but the dim lighting, the constant humidity, and the thick, moldy straw created an atmosphere more reminiscent of a mushroom culture room than a place for sleep. The straw bed seemed more like the growing medium for mushrooms than a surface to lie on.

Bai Liu lifted the white sheet, revealing the yellowish straw beneath. A few flicks of his hand uncovered mushrooms sprouting from the rotting straw's roots. Bai Liu couldn't help but think back to a similar scene in his orphanage, where a child nearly perished after consuming such mushrooms.

Bai Liu's fingers sifted through the mushrooms growing from the straw. After confirming they were a common species, he pondered,

"The patients aren't eating these mushrooms... So what are they consuming?"

His gaze returned to the straw bed. Back in the ICU, the plant patient had been lying motionless, like a vegetable. With his own life expectancy running low, Bai Liu hadn't disturbed the patient, but he had noted the mushrooms growing beneath the straw—ordinary ones, at least in appearance.

Now, it seemed likely that each bed had its own distinct mushroom growth. But the question lingered: Why were they different? What kind of mushrooms were growing here?

Bai Liu felt that the answer lay in what the system had referred to as the "recipe for renewal."

"Muke," Bai Liu muttered to himself, almost sighing. "It's up to you to find out exactly what these patients are taking for their 'life-renewal remedy.'"

ICU Ward.

Muke crawled out from beneath the chaotic bed, standing up with a gasp, gripping the edge for support. His head still felt a little dizzy as he sat back down on the bed with another sharp intake of breath.

Muke lay on the bed where Bai Liu had been earlier, curling up under the blanket, inhaling the familiar scent that reminded him of Bai Liu—like a chick seeking security beneath its mother's wings. His body trembled from the aftereffects of his near-death experience. Though he had drunk several bottles of psycho-bleach to restore his mental clarity, his body was still weak from the blood loss, shaking uncontrollably as if in a convulsive state.

He clenched his teeth, curled up further, and shook his left hand, pushing his right down, trying to recover quickly. His eyes were red; he had truly believed he was going to die when the creature had sucked blood from him relentlessly. By the end, his eyes had glazed over, and the veins on his hand had begun to deflate.

But it had been necessary to push him to this extent so that he and Bai Liu could present themselves in a similar state. Bai Liu had managed to impersonate Muke and infiltrate Miao Feichi's team.

Muke closed his eyes, recalling the plan Bai Liu had explained to him earlier. It was the distraction he needed to regain composure.

Bai Liu's plan was simple yet bold: a game of paper cups and oranges.

The three paper cups represented the investors' identical shells, with Bai Liu hidden beneath one, like an orange being guessed by Miao Feichi.

However, there were many complications to address.

Muke's eyes fixed on the three paper cups of different sizes Bai Liu had placed on the table. He frowned, "You don't look exactly like the patient in the ward. He's more slender than you."

"Exactly," Bai Liu replied. "Miao Feichi and his son are S-rank players. They could easily break the cups open and check for the orange beneath them. Which, of course, would be me."

Bai Liu squeezed the paper cups, revealing the orange underneath, then tossed them into the bin casually.

Muke swallowed, "So, what do we do?"

Bai Liu spun the three paper cups in his hands at an alarming speed, his tone calm. "We need to make them believe that these cups aren't so easily crushed. Once they think that, they'll follow the rules of the game."

Bai Liu tapped a cup and marked it with an A+, "I'll disguise myself as a monster with A+ abilities, and pretend to be three different monsters at once. The nurses only have fifteen minutes to change shifts, and even if Miao Feichi and his son are S-rated players, they'll likely choose to kill one monster rather than face all three A+ monsters at once."

"But you only have one monster... how do you pretend to be three at the same time?" Muke trailed off, unsure.

Bai Liu continued rotating the cups in his hands. For a moment, they blurred, and all three cups seemed to have the A+ mark on them due to his speed. He smiled, "Shift speed."

"As for the appearance," Bai Liu continued, "the sicker the patient, the more slender they appear. For us players, there are two main indicators of sickness: life value and spirit value. We can lower both to match this monster's condition."

Muke frowned, "But Miao Feichi and his son are experienced. They'll see through a trick like this. Even if I'm not a veteran player, I'll recognize it. What if they figure it out?"

Bai Liu remained calm. "If you can't pull it off, we'll die together. But if you do, we'll survive. The key is to keep you safe tonight, in the ICU, while you search for the cure hidden in the bookcase."

Muke's eyes widened with disbelief, "I can't do it! I really can't!"

Bai Liu fixed him with a shallow, indifferent gaze. "Then we'll die together. That's the reality if you fail."

Muke winced at the tone, lowering his head in shame. After a long pause, he looked up with tear-streaked eyes. "I'll try my best..."

Bai Liu's voice softened as he patted Muke on the shoulder. "But I'm dead? That's the worst-case scenario. We need to avoid that. So, no, this isn't just a simple orange cup game."

Muke blinked, confused. "Not just a simple game?"

Bai Liu nodded. "No. The double-paper cup game is more intricate than that."

He placed six more identical paper cups on the table, marking one with "Bai Liu," another with "Muke," and the last with "Monster." He then demonstrated the layers of the game, showing Muke how the identity of the "orange" could be hidden behind different cups.

Muke watched, bewildered.

"This is the first round," Bai Liu explained, "These three cups represent Bai Liu, Muke, and the monster. But they won't believe it easily. They'll suspect my identity, which is why we prepared the second round."

Bai Liu moved the cups in a blur, then stopped. "Now, guess where the orange representing me is?"

Muke, convinced of his memory, pointed to the cup with "Muke" written on it. "This one."

"Wrong," Bai Liu smiled and opened all the cups. "The orange was under the [Monster] cup."

"How?! I clearly saw you place the orange under the [Muke] cup!" Muke exclaimed.

"A Man is indeed a creature that can be deceived by the instant information he receives. You are not mistaken, but I cheated." Bai Liu lowered his eyes, a meaningful smile on his lips. His hand slowly opened [Bai Liu]'s paper cup. At Muke's stunned gaze, Bai Liu's little finger and index finger caught the edge of the paper cup and, with a gentle tug, split the two paper cups into three.

Bai Liu lifted his eyes and smiled lazily. "Just a crude little trick of the hand. You actually remembered and guessed correctly, but I cheated—I put three paper cups on the one belonging to [Bai Liu]. What you saw was only the second paper cup, but in fact, there were three cups. So, I was actually hiding under the third paper cup in relation to the orange."

Bai Liu picked up the orange. "In other words, at the end of this orange game, I will use other information to shield my identity under a third layer of paper cups. This is to protect myself and confuse the old players, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang—a father and son."

"And they definitely don't doubt the information they're getting." Bai Liu peeled the orange in half under the paper cup and handed it to Muke.

Bai Liu smiled. "Because the other half of the orange called and told them, Muke, to eat the orange?"

Muke shook his head, a little dumbfounded, refusing the orange Bai Liu offered him. He was already stunned by Bai Liu's actions and was still a bit confused.

The moment he bit down, Bai Liu's face twisted slightly, and he slowly spat the orange into the paper cup with [Bai Liu] written in black marker. "Tsk, these hospital oranges are so sour."

The most successful paper cup identity swap in the scheme was when the monster patient died as [Bai Liu], and Muke spent the night safely in the ICU as [monster patient].

Meanwhile, Bai Liu, in the guise of the orange, stayed under the nose of the dangerous Miao Feichi father and son.

To achieve this, Bai Liu made more than two layers of [identity paper cups] for all three, or rather, for all three [monsters].

After Bai Liu's first round of [Swap Paper Cups], he gave Miao Gaojiang a simple answer to each monster's corresponding identity. The monster that was killed was [Bai Liu], the monster hiding under the hospital bed was the real monster, and the monster he took away was [Muke].

But Miao Gaojiang certainly did not believe the obvious answer Bai Liu had given him.

So, Bai Liu prepared for Miao Gaojiang and the second round of the [paper cup orange game] began.

In the second messy game, Bai Liu dared to give Miao Gaojiang the second round of the [paper cup swap]. He and Muke used various ways to suggest to the Miao family that their identities were abnormal. For instance, Muke obviously helped Bai Liu, and Bai Liu helped the patient—other abnormal behaviors. These actions altered the three monsters' identity cup labels in Miao Gaojiang's mind. Eventually, Miao Gaojiang trusted Muke as much as he did his own memory, making the same mistakes as Muke.

Believing too much in his own experience and the information he had received, Miao Gaojiang suspected Bai Liu of hiding the orange under the [Muke] paper cup, thus triggering a third layer of [identity paper cups] prepared by Bai Liu—one that Bai Liu had prepared long ago, from little Muke's self-incriminating phone call.

Muke looked up at the time with a gasp—it was half past nine, and all the nurses had started patrolling. Muke hadn't heard any news of dead patients or any sounds of fighting, so there was a good chance Bai Liu's [last layer of paper cups] protective information had come into play.

He lay on his back, his eyes lost from over-stimulation, and let out a long, unconscious breath.

Muke's part of the plan was to introduce the Miao family into the ICU, get psycho-altered, and reduced to a life level consistent with the appearance of the monster patient. He had to stay awake enough to work with Bai Liu's plan after the psycho-alteration. The final, most important part was to stay perfectly safe in the ICU with the dead monster. The ultimate goal was to spend the entire night in the dead monster's intensive care unit in perfect safety while following Bai Liu's instructions to find the cure for life hidden in the bookcase.

And all the rest of the dangerous parts of the plan—those were Bai

Liu’s responsibility.

Muke closed his eyes, his heart hadn't completely calmed down. He pressed his chest and could feel his fragile heart thumping unbearably fiercely—out of fear, out of backlash.

Because this plan nearly flipped several times during the process.

Miao Feichi didn’t follow Muke’s initial plan at all. He kept trying to kill all the monsters with his high panel attributes and force value, almost succeeding. If Bai Liu hadn’t held Miao Feichi up for 10 minutes with his skills and props, Miao Feichi might have been able to achieve a triple kill in the ICU, and Muke would be dead by now.

After calming his heartbeat, Muke breathed a sigh of relief and, after a brief moment on the bed to acclimate to his current physical state, he gritted his teeth, staggered to his feet, and began to tidy up the messy ward floor.

Time was running out. He needed to get on with the task.

The Loving Welfare Home

Central Hall – Core Screen – In Front of Bai Liu's Small TV
Wang Shun sighed as he looked at Bai Liu's small TV, now prominently displayed in the core promotion section. People really were different. Despite going up against league players like Miao Feichi and his father, Bai Liu was climbing the ranks at an astonishing speed. It was only the first day of the game, yet he had already made it onto the core promotion screen.

The surge of likes Bai Liu received came primarily from the moment he confronted the father-son duo. Meanwhile, on Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's side, their audience was celebrating Bai Liu's supposed demise.

At that moment, the Scavengers Guild had also bought a promotional ad, and thanks to a mix of various factors—including the absence of many high-profile players from the current streams—Miao Feichi's viewers went wild, pouring in likes and favorites, nearly pushing him into the King promotion spot.

But just as Miao Feichi was on the brink of securing that position, he fell—because Bai Liu wasn't dead. Instead, he had used the opportunity to blend into Miao Feichi's group.

Miao Feichi's fans and the Scavengers Guild were dumbfounded. Their hard-earned savings had all gone to—Bai Liu.

Even those who were hostile or resentful toward Bai Liu couldn't help but flood into his stream. No one could stop them. Most simply wanted to figure out what was happening, but after understanding the situation, they stayed.

Bai Liu's rapidly growing viewership propelled him into the core of the promotion. Not only that, but Mu Ke's small TV also benefited from the Miao Feichi hype, moving him from the multiplayer section to the center screen.

Among the audience, discussions ranged from disbelief to reasonable analysis. Bai Liu had previously evaded Miao Feichi's men and even managed to eliminate the King's Guild backup player, Zhang Gui. No one underestimated the newcomer anymore. Still, the dominant opinion remained:

"He's good, no doubt. But he's too reckless. He's either brilliant or setting himself up for a fall."

Someone in the crowd muttered:
"Even if he blends in for now, Bai Liu's control ability might have been enough to handle Zhang Gui, but with an F-rank panel, he doesn't stand a chance against Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi's S-rank skills. It's unlikely to work."

"Miao Gaojiang is extremely cautious. I heard that members of the Scavengers Guild watched Bai Liu's gameplay hundreds of times, analyzing his control technique. Their conclusion? Bai Liu's ability is likely limited—it requires a medium and the target's indirect consent. As long as they don't pick up anything from Bai Liu, they should be safe..."

"...But still, Bai Liu pulled off a beautiful sleight-of-hand here. Layer upon layer of deception, and Miao Gaojiang actually fell for it. Damn, this guy's got eyes everywhere."

"I mean, considering how Miao Gaojiang and his team specialize in control tactics, the fact that Bai Liu managed a counter-kill in a pairs match is insane. I really doubt he'll be able to control them again, though."

"Feels like Bai Liu's playing a runner strategy this time—grabbing any clues to the main quest and rushing to clear the instance first."

"But wouldn't it make more sense to pull that off with Mu Sicheng? What's going on with those two? They're splitting up? Both of them have new partners now—what, did they break up? I haven't seen God Mu take on a newcomer in years, and now he's mentoring two?!"

"Well, Mu Sicheng's picks are solid—one's a beast in combat, the other's a killer. They've got great synergy. If trained properly, they could be as strong as Miao Gaojiang's team in the future."

"Bai Liu's got a promising recruit, too. Lacks personal skills, but if trained for intelligence gathering, he'd be a solid asset. Isn't that exactly what the King's Guild is missing? A walking database? He'd be invaluable."

"Damn, these new guys actually look pretty good! I can't even find a single decent recruit. I've been chasing Mu Sicheng for three whole instances, and he just keeps vanishing into thin air!"

"Ha! You're dreaming if you think he'd join your team. You sure they would even want you?"

"He's got skill, no doubt. But let's be real—he's still gonna die. Miao Feichi is a complete mad dog. That sword attack of his hits like a truck. Last time, his flat A damage was 3,147—almost took me out in a single hit. Bai Liu's bringing in a complete rookie. I don't see them surviving this..."

"Still, if Bai Liu actually makes it into the league and levels up his panel, he might become terrifying. With the right strategy, he could be unstoppable."

"...Kinda want to recruit him. His skill is interesting—seems like he can copy the abilities of people he's controlled. The only downside is the range. I don't know if it's a stamina issue or a skill limitation, but he couldn't use Mu Sicheng's ability against Miao Feichi for more than a few minutes..."

Wang Shun watched in amazement as the audience swarmed Bai Liu's small TV, filling it with comments.

Even among the general viewers, there was a sense of awe. No one dared to be too loud—after all, standing in front of Bai Liu's screen were familiar faces from last year's league. Some of them were top players from the highest-ranking guilds.

With such players present, the average viewer didn't dare to speak too freely, just like how Mu Sicheng had previously silenced the crowd in Bai Liu's stream.

Miao Feichi's aggressive promotion had attracted not only casual viewers but also league players on his level. They had a rough idea of what Miao Feichi was planning, but after his first loss to Bai Liu, their attention shifted.

In other words, Bai Liu had now caught the eye of a large number of league players.

Wang Shun glanced at Bai Liu's small TV and let out a long sigh.

A lone player, rising so quickly... and already drawing the interest of major guild teams?

To be honest, if the King's Guild hadn't developed a feud with Bai Liu early on, Wang Shun would've been tempted to recruit him himself. But now—he sighed again.

Still, something felt strange.

Mu Sicheng was mentoring two newcomers. Bai Liu was mentoring newcomers too. And when counting them all together—including Bai Liu and Mu Sicheng—there were exactly five of them.

The number needed for a league team.

A ridiculous thought crossed Wang Shun's mind, but he shook his head with a chuckle, dismissing it immediately.

There was no way. Bai Liu would have to be insane to enter the league with a team of complete rookies, especially with only two months left until the competition.

But looking at these newcomers, he knew one thing for sure—the major guilds would be scrambling to recruit them.

He could only wonder: What teams would they end up on next year?

A chill ran down his spine at the thought.

---------- ----

In-game.
Muke pushes the bed back into place, pressing it against the body of the monster patient in the corner, who smells strangely of plants. Within minutes of Bai Liu's departure, a strong scent of fungal decay fills the air—so thick and dense that Muke covers his nose.

The vegetative patient that Miao Feichi had hacked to death slumps in the corner, head hanging down. The dim light casts unsettling shadows, making the corpse appear even longer than before. Its arms and legs stretch unnaturally, like thin metal rods. Muke roughly estimates that if this patient were to stand, it would have to tilt its head just to fit in the ward.

Given the patient's A-rank rating, it should have been impossible for it to survive the full force of Miao Feichi's S-panel attacks.

Muke quickly averts his gaze. Staring too long at such a human-yet-inhuman form was very triggering. He has only just recovered mentally and refuses to subject himself to further psychological strain.

Books are scattered across the ward, their pages undamaged but stuck to the wet floor. That doesn't stop Muke from reading. He carefully picks them up, organizes them, and places them back onto the fallen shelves in their original order. Then, he begins reading at a rapid pace, using a pen to guide his vision.

The contents align with Bai Liu's earlier speculation—filled with various notes. Since this is an ICU, multiple patients have likely been admitted, leading to different handwriting in the annotations. Muke's eyes flick rapidly over the pages, stopping for only a second or two on each one, much like an online reader skimming through Quantum Mechanics in Calligraphy.

After an unknown amount of time, Muke exhales deeply and sits up in bed. His eyes are bloodshot.

"The first skim is over," he mutters dizzily to himself.

From the notes, Muke deduces that the Life-Sustaining Remedy is exactly what its name suggests—a herbal treatment claimed to cure various diseases. However, since it has never been properly tested, it is considered an alternative medicine at best.

The terminally ill patients here had exhausted all traditional treatments. They had seen countless doctors, tried every possible cure, and, when finally told there was nothing left to be done, were advised to "go home and eat well"—a euphemism for preparing for death.

But these patients refused to give up. The wealthy among them established this secretive private hospital, a place free of doctors, whom they had come to distrust and even resent. Instead, the hospital was staffed only by nurses, while the patients themselves took on the role of doctors.

Many of them had accumulated extensive medical knowledge over their years of illness, reading medical texts in desperation. Their self-education led them to trust fellow patients over professionals.

Among them, one mysterious patient had discovered a particular herbal formula. Initial tests on several patients showed that it significantly alleviated their symptoms. This discovery ignited hope among the dying, who began referring to it as the Remedy to Renew Life.

However, for various reasons, the remedy could not be openly shared. Rules such as "The riddle must not be passed on", "Direct information invites disaster", and "It must not be directly transmitted to others" were strictly followed.

That said, the knowledge wasn't entirely lost.

The method of transmission was subtle and rigorous. Only patients who were truly dying, had significant financial means to contribute, and demonstrated patience were allowed into the circle. Each ward contained an extensive book collection, and only those who could finish reading through the texts would uncover the Life-Sustaining Remedy hidden between the lines.

Muke recognizes this as a form of coded communication. The patients were terrified that the formula's existence would bring disaster upon them, so they established a system of strict vetting, similar to the rigid membership-only structures of underground clubs frequented by the wealthy.

By piecing together scattered notes and using his quick-reading skills, Muke reconstructs a rough version of the formula. However, he soon realizes that while most of the ingredients are accounted for, the most crucial component is missing. No matter how much he searches, he finds only vague references to a one-to-one ingredient—something unique to each patient, highly specific, and not easy to obtain.

But nowhere in the notes is it explicitly stated what this key ingredient is.

Muke's expression darkens.

Night has deepened. At some point, the sky will begin to lighten, making him anxious. This missing ingredient is obviously the most critical part of the remedy—so why isn't there a single page describing it? How could none of the patients have taken notes on it?

In the dim light, repeatedly reviewing the information would have been difficult without marking the pages for reference. Muke even searches for folded corners but finds nothing.

"I don't think so..." he mutters. "Wait!"

—If there are no creases or annotations, there's another possibility. If something was too important, instead of marking it, a patient might have secretly torn out the page and hidden it.

Although destroying books is not allowed for new patients like Muke, this rule may not apply to the old patients—the monster patients. After all, these books have already served their purpose in passing on the Life-Sustaining Remedy.

Muke has already searched every possible hiding place: beds, cabinets, even the toilets.

If the missing pages weren't removed, then the only remaining place they could be hidden is...

His gaze slowly shifts toward the rotting corpse's hospital gown.

His eyes trail from the patient's hunched, shriveled head to its sunken face—skin dried out and withered in just a few hours.

Muke swallows hard.

Taking a deep breath, he tiptoes toward the patient slumped in the corner. The corpse's shriveled skin seems to ripple, as if something thin and long is wriggling beneath it. The greenish-purple face distorts, and a trickle of mucus drips from its sharp teeth, landing on its dangling index finger.

Then—the patient's fingers twitch.

It's a tiny movement, barely perceptible in the dim corner of the room. The ward's visibility is low, and Muke, standing close, notices nothing unusual. The only thing he registers is that the scent of decay has thickened, as though something is growing uncontrollably.

"What a strong mushroom smell…" Muke wrinkles his nose, waving a hand in disgust. The scent reminds him eerily of the fungal odor clinging to the disabled children back at the orphanage.

Steeling himself, Muke crouches and, suppressing his discomfort, reaches into the pocket of the corpse's hospital gown. His fingers brush against a stack of papers.

But before he can feel relief, a chilling realization sends a shiver down his spine—

The pocket... is pulsing.

As his hand digs deeper, the rhythmic pulsations beneath the fabric grow stronger.

The patient still has a heartbeat.

This vegetative patient is not dead yet.

Cold terror floods Muke's veins. From his head to his back, it feels as if he's been plunged into an ice bath. This monster had been killed by Miao Feichi—slashed through the head with full force. How is it still… alive?

Muke forces himself to take a slow, deep breath. He can't afford to think about what this means.

What beats in the heart of something that no longer breathes?

No time to dwell on it. Muke rips his hand out of the pocket, gripping the stack of papers tightly.

As long as he gathers enough intel to pass to Bai Liu, even if he dies here, Little Muke will still have 50% of his life value.

Have faith that Bai Liu will complete the task and take Little Muke through!

Repeating this desperate mantra, Muke steadies himself and unfolds the pages. His eyes flicker across the text:

"Blood Lingzhi, a type of lingzhi that requires the blood of a pure-blooded virgin… A mutated species of the mushroom Taiyaki… An elixir rumored to 'give life to the dead and flesh to the bones'..."

Muke freezes.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Muke for completing the main quest - Searching for (Life-Sustaining Remedy)]

[System Alert: New main quest triggered - Cultivate your own Blood Lingzhi using the hospital's fungal beds.]

Muke stares at the message in horror.

"...What the fuck is this?!"

During Muke's reading, the thin red lines writhing beneath the patient's shriveled face suddenly quickened. The bright crimson thread marks spread like living mycelium, creeping outward from the patient's heart to his limbs. Within moments, they surfaced as blood-red lines on the backs of his hands.

The capillary-like threads continued to pulse and spread, saturating the vegetative patient's body. His once pale, bluish skin swelled, distorting into something grotesquely slender. In the blink of an eye, he was transformed into a corpse draped in a tangled web of writhing veins.

Only his eyes retained their stark black and white contrast—everything else was consumed by the dense, pulsating network of blood-vessel-like tubes. These writhing lines extended beyond the patient's skin, slithering across the floor between the bed and his body, spreading like creeping vines throughout the ward. Eventually, the mass of veins converged at the bed.

The crimson veins thickened, pulsating with an eerie vitality, as though they were pumping blood into the bed itself. A dark, unnatural red light bathed the entire ward.

Beneath the rotting straw on the bed, something began to stir. A rustling sound accompanied the emergence of a cluster of bright red mushrooms, which grew and expanded at an unnatural pace. They swelled until they reached the size of a millstone, their grotesque form resembling an underdeveloped embryo—head and tail indistinct but unmistakably present.

The fungal mass throbbed rhythmically, mimicking the beat of a heart. A pale red glow radiated from it, bizarre yet mesmerizing. It did not exude the nauseating scent of decay but rather an unsettlingly pleasant aroma—like fresh blood, rich and inviting, an irresistible scent of food.

The Loving Welfare Home

The vegetative patient's pale eyes rolled wildly in their sockets as he staggered to his feet, his hands trembling as he reached toward the blood-soaked hospital bed.

Muke warily edged away, moving slowly until his back pressed against the door.

The sharp clicks of nurses' heels echoed down the corridor, a reminder of the hospital's strict rule: no patient was allowed to leave their room at night. The reason was simple—monsters roamed the hospital after dark, preying on anyone who broke curfew. If Miao Feichi caught wind of the disturbance in the ICU, the nurses would likely discuss it the next day. If Miao Feichi found out, all of Bai Liu's carefully laid groundwork would be for nothing.

Muke shifted his gaze to the patient across the room and the blood lingzhi sprouting from the bed. Logically, he wasn't completely doomed—this monster had a glaring weakness. According to the information Muke had received, the blood lingzhi was the patient. If the lingzhi remained alive, the patient wouldn't die. If the lingzhi perished, so would the patient.

But that wasn't the only factor at play.

Beyond being the monster's fatal weakness, this Blood Reiki phenomenon also served as an enhancement—a buff for the vegetative patient.

Muke clenched his fists. His C+ panel wasn't nearly enough to take on an S-rank monster. He had been prepared to rush straight for the blood lingzhi, but after seeing the overall rating, he hesitated. His grip tightened around the note in his hand. He hadn't delivered his message to Bai Liu yet.

Across the room, the patient remained hunched over the bed, ravenously devouring the blood lingzhi, red-stained saliva dripping from the corners of his mouth. He wasn't paying attention to Muke—for now. But Muke knew it wouldn't last. Once the creature had consumed enough to fully recover, he would be in imminent danger.

The problem was information transfer.

Certain items in this game—like notes and books—couldn't be stored in a player's inventory. Muke had gathered a massive amount of information, but he had no way to type it all out using the game's limited keyboard system.

If he tried a more direct approach, he'd expose himself immediately. If Miao Feichi or the others entered the ICU tomorrow and discovered his method of contact, Bai Liu's identity would be compromised.

What to do? What to do? Muke chewed at the skin around his fingernails in anxious frustration. How do I get this information across?

His eyes flickered toward the bookshelf. Then, down to the torn pages in his hands. Slowly, his mind cleared.

Bai Liu was in his room. And Bai Liu remembered everything—every book, every placement on his bookshelf.

That's enough.

Suddenly, Bai Liu's system panel chimed. He was still linked to Muke's panel, and though he hadn't been operating it, the keyboard had been moved.

Bai Liu, leaning against his door, snapped to attention. His eyes, which had been half-closed from fatigue, opened sharply as he accessed his system backpack.

Four keycaps had been removed from the keyboard.

"Y, F5."

Then another.

"X, 45."

And another.

"Z, 678."

The final key removed:

"Enter."

The message has been input. The task can begin.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes. XYZ—a three-dimensional coordinate system. And F… Bai Liu's gaze shifted to his bookshelves.

Could it be…?

His lips curled into a faint, incredulous smirk.

Damn. Does Muke have a memory that strong?

It didn't take Bai Liu long to grasp what Muke was trying to communicate. But even understanding it, he remained astonished by the sheer precision of Muke's recollection.

F = Bookshelf level
X = First book on the shelf
Z = First page of that book

Muke had memorized the layout of his entire bookshelf—every book's placement, every crucial page number—without making a single mistake. He had then converted this information into a coordinate system to relay it to Bai Liu.

Anyone else, even if they had found key information in the ICU, would have struggled to send it using just the in-game keyboard. But Muke had done it.

It was no wonder his father had tried everything to save him. A mind like that—even if it only lived for another year—was invaluable.

Bai Liu quickly scanned the bookshelves, flipping to the designated pages. He didn't bother folding them or marking them—it would be too slow.

Although the hospital explicitly forbade book destruction, Muke's room was far enough away that catching him was unlikely. Without hesitation, Bai Liu tore the pages free.

He removed another keycap—Enter—to signal execution completion.

A new set of coordinates was sent immediately. Within five minutes, Muke removed the final keycap: End.

Bai Liu skimmed the contents of the torn pages. His frown deepened.

"If the lingzhi does not die, the body does not die…"

His pupils contracted.

Muke is in danger.

His eyes flicked to the system panel. Muke's Mental Value, which had remained stable, suddenly plummeted. A thin red warning line appeared.

[System Warning: Player Muke is being attacked by the (Poison Mist Contamination) S-Skill of the monster (Plant Patients). Mental Value will reach zero in 90 seconds! Leave the attack range immediately!]

Under Bai Liu's bed, Muke curled up, pressing his hands over his mouth to stifle his coughing as the poisonous fog thickened.

Across the room, the monster twitched. It opened its limbs wide, clinging to the bedrails like a grotesque spider, arching its body while gnawing hungrily at the blood lingzhi. Its abdomen swelled grotesquely, transparent skin revealing wriggling masses of mycelium within.

With each bite, a dense red mist billowed from its body, tainting the entire ward a sickly, unnatural pink. Muke, still hiding beneath the bed, was forced to inhale it.

His mind grew hazy. His Mental Value continued to drop.

For a brief moment, Muke considered buying a bottle of Mental Bleach to recover. But then… he hesitated.

His message had already been sent.

His main storyline was worthless now.

Dying here would only serve to confirm Bai Liu's identity, solidifying their strategy.

There was no point in wasting points on himself.

His breathing slowed, his grip on the torn pages loosening. His mind drifted, hypnotizing itself into acceptance. Bai Liu had said it himself: a useless main identity could be abandoned.

Then… he could do the same.

But as his consciousness dimmed, the monster patient across the room let out a guttural burp, finally having finished its feast. It crawled off the bed, its grotesque head twitching as it began to sniff—searching for him.

Tears pricked at Muke's eyes. His fingers trembled as he struggled to pluck three final keycaps from his keyboard.

[Delete] [M] [E]

"Delete me, abandon me, empty my inventory, and don't let my dead body drop anything that could expose you. Please… don't come to my rescue," Muke said to Bai Liu on the other end.

Bai Liu had exhausted Mu Sicheng's skills, the fishbone was on Miao Feichi's side, and there was nothing left to save him. If Bai Liu came, it would be a death sentence—not even a good one. Muke thought as calmly as he could: My role is over. The message has been delivered. Dead is dead. It's no big deal.

But Bai Liu still had a lot to live for. There was still so much left for him to do.

For as long as Muke could remember, death had been one of his greatest fears. But no matter how much he feared it, he could never escape it. He was born with an illness, and from the moment he became aware of the world, death had cast its shadow over him. He had always struggled, desperately, in an undignified way.

He never imagined he would ever face death with such ease. Perhaps because he knew it wouldn't truly come. Or perhaps it was the blind trust—the fragile sense of security he found in another person—that let him escape his fear, if only for a moment.

Muke had been born with abilities and privileges most people could only dream of. His entire life had been spent at the pinnacle of luxury.

If there was a hierarchy, Muke stood at the very top—both in terms of ability and wealth. It was only natural that he should look down on the rest of the world.

He was supposed to be exactly what he presented himself as: an arrogant, condescending, hopelessly unpredictable young master.

And so, it was only fair that death had knocked him from the top of his gilded world in an instant. In the end, the young lord of the crystal palace had become just like the commoners he had once trampled underfoot—desperate, afraid, and willing to do anything humiliating just to survive.

He could have begged his father for more doctors. He could have dropped to his knees and pleaded with the audience for rewards. He could have sold his soul to Bai Liu.

But after all of that, he still couldn't avoid the moment of death.

Even if he had only lost fifty percent of his life, the pain of dying was still one hundred percent real.

Muke's breath became shallow. His heart clenched painfully, forcing him to curl in on himself.

His vision blurred. His trembling hands slipped away from his lips. His chest rose and fell in frantic, uneven motions. Silent tears streaked down his face.

His mind was supposed to be clear, yet as his mental value dropped, all he could see were memories—fragments of the past he had spent his whole life dreading.

He saw his father standing in the doorway, shaking his head with a hesitant, unreadable expression. And then, his father found other women, staying out late every night—because he needed a stronger heir.

His mother had silently accepted it.

Everyone had loved Muke, but it had been the love given to a pet—a fragile, short-lived thing. Something no one expected too much from. Something unfit for power.

He saw every doctor shake their head at him. He saw himself, a child curled under the blankets, hands clasped together as he whispered frantic prayers for time to slow down.

Would I wake up tomorrow?

He never knew the answer.

He had never been allowed to exert himself. Sometimes, even standing too long would leave him crouched on the ground, gasping for breath. His classmates mocked him for the pathetic display.

He always made sure his father punished them.

As a result, he never had any friends.

His father noticed.

And so, in an attempt to make the class understand Muke's condition, his father had bribed the teacher to show them a documentary called Bubble Boy.

It was about a boy with an immunodeficiency disorder who had to live inside a bubble his whole life. He had no immune system. If he ever left, he would die.

Afterward, the teacher had told the class, Muke has the same disease. Don't discriminate against him. Protect him.

One of his classmates had turned to him and asked, in an innocent, thoughtless voice, That's so pathetic. If I had to live like that, I'd rather just die.

Muke had been twelve at the time.

He had tilted his chin up proudly and said, "I just want to live. I don't care what you think."

And so, the high-and-mighty young master had grown up like a fragile, solitary little mole.

A ridiculous creature—like an ant tilting its head in stubborn defiance, pretending it had pride, even though any one of them could have crushed him beneath their foot.

But because he lived in a crystal box made of money, he survived.

And every day, he wondered: Will I be buried in this crystal box tomorrow?

So he started to try strange, reckless things.

Like parachuting into a gaming company to make video games.

And that was where he met Bai Liu.

Muke had remembered him immediately—he was the staff member whose computer he had lost.

Muke had an impeccable memory, after all. Perhaps to make up for his short life.

But when he saw Bai Liu, Muke was afraid.

Afraid Bai Liu wouldn't save him.

So he played dumb. He feigned helplessness. He tried desperately to show his weakness.

Bai Liu had only looked at him. Calm. Unreadable.

He had seen through it all.

But he never called Muke out on it.

Instead, he reached out and whispered, "Then let this be our first meeting. My name is Bai Liu, and I am the owner of your soul."

"I will save you and let you live. But you will have to work for it yourself. I think you have what it takes to survive on your own."

And with that, Bai Liu had pulled him out of the bubble he had spent over twenty years trapped inside.

Bai Liu—someone willing to stake his life on Muke, despite knowing how fragile he was—had told him, "Until something happens, I assume you can do it. And if you can't—then we'll die together, Muke."

"You don't need to rely on anyone. Even I can rely on you. You'll keep us alive. I believe in you, Muke."

Muke's vacant eyes flickered as the patient yanked him from beneath the bed with long, bony arms. His mental value was too low. His mind was drowning in fragmented memories.

He lay there, lifeless, as the patient lowered its head and opened its jaws to sink its teeth into his neck.

Warm saliva dripped onto his collarbone. His body trembled.

Tears slipped soundlessly down his face.

His trembling hands clutched three keycaps: [Delete] [M] [E]

His lips parted weakly.

"Bai Liu..."

So this was what death felt like.

It wasn't so bad.

Maybe he had never feared death itself.

Maybe he had only ever feared dying without meaning. Dying alone. Dying without worth.

And now—

"If my death brings more value than my life, then it's not so bad," Bai Liu said, guiding Muke's trembling hands around the bone whip at his neck. "If dying lets you enter the ICU and find the main quest for the [Life-Saving Remedy]—if it keeps you alive—then I will die for us, Muke."

Muke took a deep, shuddering breath.

"Me too, Bai Liu."

At the last moment—just as the patient lunged for his shoulder—

The door to the ICU slammed open.

Bai Liu stood in the doorway, eyes cold.

A black shadow flickered behind him.

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai uses personal skill (Flash Strike). A+ skill blast causes monster (Plant Patient) to stiffen for one and a half minutes.]

Bai Liu picked Muke up from the ground and shoved a bottle of psychotropic bleach against his lips.

Muke blinked up at him in dazed confusion.

Bai Liu had come to save him again.

The Loving Welfare Home

Bai Liu was not moving too fast, and soon, the nurse behind him would catch up.

It was baffling how nurses in high heels could still run faster than Bai Liu and the others on the slippery ground, but they had no choice—those nurses were just fast. Liu Huai was forced to use his skills, dragging Bai Liu and Muke—two low-level players—through the dimly lit corridor at high speed.

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai has used his personal skill (Assassin Concealment), covering himself, Player Bai Liu, and Player Muke.]

[Skill Description: Concealment Cover is an A-rank personal skill that reduces the probability of being detected by humans or non-humans when fleeing or sneaking. It grants the player the ability to blend into their surroundings, much like a chameleon.]

Almost instantly, Liu Huai vanished into the shadowed corridor like a wisp of mist. Bai Liu and Muke disappeared as well, as though a barrier had suddenly cloaked them, causing the nurses to rush past without noticing their presence.

It was as if they were covered by an invisible film, making them undetectable at a glance. However, upon close inspection, faint outlines could still be seen.

Moving cautiously along the wall, Liu Huai led the way, with Bai Liu and Muke following closely behind. They advanced toward the security exit, brushing past nurses hurrying toward the elevator.

"There are patients wandering at night," one nurse murmured.

"There aren't any patient rooms on the ground floor. Which floor are they from?" another questioned.

"I don’t know. Let's take the elevator up to check. It’s night shift—tell the other nurses to gather at the elevator and stay away from the security exit. We’re not supposed to go there after 9 p.m.…."

These nurses avoided the security exits. When searching for wandering patients at night, they checked floor by floor, using the elevators instead of the stairs.

But upon reaching the exit, Liu Huai's face darkened as he finally understood why.

Because something else lurked in the stairwell.

Just outside the security staircase stood a child, holding an oversized mobile phone.

Unplugged syringes were embedded in the child's neck, dried blood staining the pale skin. It was evident that the child had been repeatedly drained of blood, leaving it emaciated—nothing more than skin and bones. Its face was eerily pallid with a sickly blue-white tint, resembling a walking skeleton. The child trembled as it clutched the phone, its oversized head bobbing before it slowly turned to reveal its front.

Its eyes were rolled back, leaving only whites visible. A vacant, demented expression contorted its face, drool dripping from the corners of its mouth. The child flailed its limbs erratically, giggling in an unsettling, high-pitched manner.

Then, in a jarring, distorted voice, it spoke into the phone.

"Mr. Investor, are you coming to see me?"

"You're taking me away, aren't you?"

Its voice suddenly twisted with a chilling realization, and two streaks of blood-red tears trickled down its face. It waved its arms frantically, shaking its head.

"So you're not taking me away. You're taking my blood away… One tube, two jars, three… I don't have any blood left, Mr. Investor. I—I'm empty. It hurts! Please don't take any more of my blood!"

The child let out a shrill, ear-piercing wail before collapsing onto the floor. With a grimace, it stomped violently on the phone, which emitted no sound despite the apparent call. The syringes embedded in its skin quivered with the motion. Then, tilting its head, the child reached for the syringe lodged in its neck, yanked it out, and grinned.

Its smile stretched unnaturally wide—so wide that the corners of its lips cracked past its ears.

"I need blood too, Mr. Investor."

[Monster Book of Love Orphanage Updated – Deformed Children (1/3)]

[Monster Name: Deformed Child (Berserk Version After Blood Draw)]

[Attributes: Movement speed 1500-2000, indiscriminate berserk attacks on any investor with blood.]

[Weakness: ????? (To be discovered.)]

[Attack: Injection and Blood Extraction (A+ Skill) – Inserts a syringe into the investor's neck and continues drawing blood until the target bleeds out and dies.]

[Attack: Phone Tracking (A+ Tracking Skill) – Late-night wandering investors beware! The children will call your phone to find you. If your phone rings, they will track the sound. If you pick up, they will locate you even faster and jump onto your back immediately~]

"Oh no," Liu Huai's expression changed. "My Assassin Concealment skill is only A-rank! This thing's phone tracking can break my concealment!"

The phone was forcibly bound to them—the system didn't allow players to discard it. This ensured that the [child] could call the investor anytime. Liu Huai had assumed the child was just one of the orphans from the orphanage. He hadn't expected there to be one here in this private hospital too.

Then, in an instant, the phones of Bai Liu, Muke, and Liu Huai all began ringing.

Liu Huai quickly hung up. But the moment he did, the phone rang again. His face turned grim, and he began backing away slowly, clutching the phone tightly.

There was no way a single deformed child could call all three of them simultaneously.

Which meant only one thing—

"There's more than one deformed child here," Bai Liu stated calmly.

From the pitch-black stairwell, more beeping ringtones echoed into the silence. More and more deformed children, drained to the point of resembling mummified husks, emerged from the shadows.

Some had withered limbs. Others dragged themselves forward limply, crouched on the floor clutching their chests. Each child held an oversized telephone in their hands. Their ping-pong-ball-sized eyes were wide open, pitch-black, the whites stained with bloody streaks.

They opened their mouths and screamed in shrill, childlike voices—voices that sent shivers down the spine.

"INVESTOR! I WANT BLOOD!!!"

Then, shrieking, they dropped onto all fours, hissing as they plowed toward Bai Liu and the others at an unnatural speed.

Bai Liu narrowed his eyes, hung up his phone once more, and quickly dialed a new number.

The system had a rule—these children could only call investors at specific times: [9 p.m. to 12 a.m.] and [6 a.m. to 9 a.m.]. At any other time, the calls would be met with a busy signal.

There were too many of them. Too many freakish, ghostly children dialing nonstop, clogging up the phone lines. That meant that by ensuring constant calls, he could potentially block their tracking.

"Liu Huai, I can't keep moving while dragging both of you. Only one of us has a chance of escaping this," Liu Huai panted.

Bai Liu met his gaze, unwavering.

"I know you won't abandon your teammates," Liu Huai gritted his teeth. "So what's the plan? You always have one!"

Muke struggled, trying to pull his hand from Bai Liu's grip.

"Leave me behind, Bai Liu," he choked out. "If I die and you save the others—"

"Shut up." Bai Liu shot Muke a chilling glare. "You already wasted my points by throwing yourself into danger. You're going to pay me back. I haven't even settled that debt with you yet."

Muke froze. Bai Liu was actually angry—furious that Muke had wasted his life points.

And Bai Liu hated wastefulness.

Muke bit his lip and fell silent, not daring to speak further. Even Liu

Huai, seeing Bai Liu's unyielding expression, didn't press the matter.

Bai Liu's face returned to its usual calm, and he swiftly issued orders.

"They track us by phone. It's an A+ skill, but not unbeatable." His gaze flickered toward Liu Huai. "You worked with Mu Sicheng before. What's the strategy when he steals something?"

Before Liu Huai could respond, Bai Liu suddenly reached out and snatched the phone from one of the charging children.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has used Player Mu Sicheng's personal skill (Thief Monkey Paw) to steal (Deformed Child)'s phone. The deformed child is furious and has targeted him!]

The child shrieked and lunged at Bai Liu.

Without hesitation, Bai Liu ducked behind Liu Huai.

"Liu Huai," he ordered, "lure the child away."

Liu Huai and Mu Sicheng had worked together so many times that he was instinctively familiar with the need to deflect attention after a theft to protect his partner. Before his brain could even register it, his body moved on its own—his dagger stabbing the child in front of him.

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai stabbed (Freak Child) with his personal skill weapon (Shadow Dagger). Freak Child is enraged and has decided to call him!]

The child let out a shrill scream and lunged at Liu Huai. At the same time, Liu Huai's phone started ringing—louder, more frequent, more insistent.

Liu Huai cursed under his breath, his gaze snapping to Bai Liu. What the hell was that bastard doing? More and more children, their hands clutching syringes, were converging on him, drawn by the sound of the ringing. Cold sweat trickled down Liu Huai's back.

And then, just as another call came through, Bai Liu's voice cut through the chaos.

"Liu Huai, pick up the phone."

Liu Huai nearly lost it. "Are you insane?! If I answer, they'll pinpoint my location instantly! That freakish kid on the other end will track me through their (Phone Location) skill! I'll be dead!"

"No," Bai Liu countered calmly. He lifted a large black phone, his expression eerily composed. "Because I'm the one calling you."

Liu Huai's mind spun. "That's impossible! Investors' phones can't call each other! The system is one-way—only the kids can call investors! I literally can't even answer your—"

"I told you to pick up," Bai Liu repeated, his tone indifferent, his eyes cold. There was a faint but unmistakable killing intent beneath the surface, though his voice remained almost coaxing. "You can answer this call. Don't make me say it a third time."

Liu Huai's breath hitched. The emotionless look in Bai Liu's eyes sent a chill down his spine. Without another word, he pressed the answer button.

The ringing stopped instantly.

On the other end, he could hear Bai Liu's calm, measured breathing.

The children who had been honing in on Liu Huai based on the sound of his phone suddenly hesitated, confused. They clutched their syringes tightly, glancing around in search of their target. Only one child, phone absent from his grasp, continued running after Liu Huai, his eyes gleaming with eerie determination.

Liu Huai's gaze snapped to Bai Liu's hand, where the phone should have been—but it wasn't Bai Liu's phone at all.

It was one of the deformed children's phones.

Bai Liu… stole a kid's phone?!

No, wait—how the hell did he even manage to steal from a monster?! Isn't he supposed to be a control-type player?!

Before Liu Huai could fully process this, Bai Liu moved again. Without hesitation, his fingers flickered in quick, precise movements, swiping another phone straight from a child's grasp. The act was almost casual, as if he weren't robbing a deformed, bloodthirsty child but rather some clueless toddler.

The robbed child stared at his empty hands in stunned silence for a moment. Then his lip trembled. His eyes welled up with tears.

"Waaaaah! The investor stole my phone! Give it back!"

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has used Player Mu Sicheng's personal skill (Thief Monkey Paw) to steal (Deformed Child)'s phone. Player Bai Liu is running out of stamina! Please rest to recover strength!]

Bai Liu staggered, nearly collapsing to one knee as his legs gave out beneath him. He braced himself against the wall, his breath shallow and ragged. Using Mu Sicheng's (Thief Sneak) skill earlier in the ICU had left him completely drained, forcing him to rely on natural rest for at least a day before he could receive stamina supplements again.

But he hadn't rested nearly enough—just a few hours in Muke's ward. He had barely recovered enough strength to use (Thief Monkey Paw) twice.

An A+ ranked skill was far too taxing for a player of Bai Liu's F-rank level.

"Liu Huai!" Bai Liu called weakly as another deformed child lunged at him, syringe raised high.

Liu Huai snapped out of his daze, reacting on instinct. His dagger slashed forward.

The child shrieked as the blade cut into his back. Bloody tears welled up in his eyes as he staggered toward Liu Huai, syringe trembling in his grasp.

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai used his personal skill (Shadow Stab) on (Deformed Child). The deformed child is enraged and has decided to attack the bad guy who hurt him first.]

Bai Liu, still leaning against the wall, dialed Mu Ke's number. After several busy tones, the call finally went through. Bai Liu turned to Mu Ke.

"Pick up."

Mu Ke fumbled with his phone before answering. The moment he did, his phone stopped ringing. The children who had been closing in on him hesitated, aimless. But as Bai Liu's phone rang again, their heads snapped in his direction.

Mu Ke looked at him, face pale. "Bai Liu, your phone is still ringing!"

"Right." Bai Liu exhaled, voice steady despite his obvious exhaustion. "But I don't have the stamina to steal a third phone."

Mu Ke panicked. He could tell—Bai Liu was running on fumes. He had taken a massive risk to save him, and now he was surrounded. Without thinking, Mu Ke moved toward Bai Liu, ready to shield him with his own body.

His voice wavered. "What about you?! You should've just called yourself! What was the point of calling me?!"

Bai Liu took a slow step back. His gaze was cold. "Stay away from me, Mu Ke. If you keep throwing your life away like this, I won't hesitate to get you killed myself."

Mu Ke froze. His heart clenched. Bai Liu… was still angry at him. And that hurt more than anything else.

Bai Liu sighed, rubbing his forehead. Then, with a flick of his wrist, he tossed the stolen phone to Mu Ke. "Run back to 501 and call me on this phone to mute my ringing. I'll be fine."

Mu Ke swallowed hard, nodding. Determination filled his eyes. He still had strength left—he could do this. Without another word, he turned and ran, dashing toward the stairwell and disappearing from sight.

Bai Liu watched him go, his breathing uneven. His terminally ill body had been pushed past its limits for two days straight, and he was rapidly approaching collapse.

Mu Ke… that guy was far too naïve. He idolized Bai Liu, placed him on a pedestal, while completely downplaying his own worth. That wasn't good.

Bai Liu knew the truth: in a game requiring meticulous information processing, Mu Ke was more valuable than he was. The only reason Bai Liu had a shot at clearing this level was because Mu Ke was here.

And with Liu Huai now in the mix, Mu Ke's survival chances had skyrocketed.

Bai Liu turned to Liu Huai. His phone still rang at his belt. A grotesque, crawling child edged closer, syringe poised to strike. Bai Liu knew he didn't have the strength to run anymore.

He sighed and spread his arms lazily. "Great Assassin, now that it's just the two of us, you should be able to move faster than these kids, right?"

Liu Huai answered simply. "Yes."

A dagger whizzed through the air, embedding itself into the wall above Bai Liu's head. With practiced ease, Liu Huai leapt up, kicked off the wall, and landed behind him.

In a blur of motion, one arm slashed through the deformed child approaching Bai Liu. The other grabbed Bai Liu by the collar and—just as the child's syringe was about to pierce Bai Liu's neck—lifted him clean out of harm's way.

Liu Huai swung his arm, throwing Bai Liu out of the encirclement.

The circle changed from Bai Liu to Liu Huai, but the phone on Liu Huai's body did not ring and could not be called in because he was talking to Bai Liu, and without the phone ringing to locate it, many of the children looked confused.

And soon, the phone rings on Bai Liu's side.

The children's black and red eyes fixed eerily on Bai Liu as he stood up, their contorted bodies moving toward him in unnatural poses. Meanwhile, Liu Huai drew his dagger, flung it, then stomped off the wall, covering the distance between them in a few lightning-fast horizontal jumps.

Liu Huai appeared behind Bai Liu in a flash, grabbed the collar of Bai Liu's oversized hospital gown, and darted across the wall. With Bai Liu in tow, he slid swiftly across the slick floor.

If being carried by Mu Sicheng was like riding a high-speed train, then being carried by Liu Huai was akin to sitting on a low-flying swallow—light, soundless, occasionally skimming the surface before soaring again.

The alternation between these two vastly different movement styles was one of the reasons Liu Huai and Mu Sicheng had once made such an effective team, effortlessly hoisting monsters around.

Behind them, the monstrous children pursued relentlessly. Whenever they drew too close, Liu Huai flung Bai Liu—whose phone continued to ring—out to draw their attention, before swiftly switching positions. It was the same tactic he'd used with Mu Sicheng before, shifting aggro between them. The seamless coordination brought a brief moment of déjà vu, momentarily pulling Liu Huai into memories of their past partnership.

But Bai Liu's soft voice quickly pulled him back to reality:

"The sound stopped. Muke must have made it back and called me—he ran pretty fast. Let's take the emergency stairwell; there's no nurse there."

Their goal was to buy time for Muke to return safely to his room and deactivate the [phone tracking] function linked to his deformed child. The private hospital only had two ways up—the elevator, which was guarded by a nurse, and the stairwell, which, while dangerous, was their only viable option. Getting caught now would mean missing the baptism tomorrow.

Since Bai Liu could only use his skill twice to stop two phones from ringing, he had chosen the most cost-effective option: ensuring Liu Huai—the fastest among them—and Muke, who needed to survive, were safe first.

That left Bai Liu in the riskiest position. He was the only one whose phone continued to ring.

But Bai Liu didn't mind. At this moment, he was, after all, the least valuable among them.

Even if Liu Huai had miscalculated and left him to die with only six life points remaining, Bai Liu wouldn't have regretted it. Yet, Liu Huai had been more protective than Bai Liu anticipated, managing to get him safely back to Ward 501 without losing a single life point—though he had been unceremoniously tossed around a few times in the process.

501—Liu Huai's ward.

Muke crouched on the floor, drenched in cold sweat, his hands clutching his chest. A heart patient shouldn't run that fast—let alone sprint up flights of stairs. But he had run for his life, racing back to the ward to call Bai Liu as quickly as possible. Now, he could barely breathe, his body curled in on itself as he gasped for air.

Liu Huai sat on the edge of the bed, panting heavily, gripping a dagger in each hand. His hospital gown was soaked through with sweat.

Dragging Bai Liu at high speeds was exhausting. Unlike Mu Sicheng, whose stamina was significantly higher due to his thief-like attributes, Liu Huai wasn't built for prolonged bursts of movement. The pursuit had taken a toll on him.

Sweat dripped from his jaw. He wiped it away with a trembling hand before tilting his head back and downing a stamina potion.

Bai Liu, in comparison, appeared to be in the best condition. But that wasn't saying much.

His stamina was depleted, and with only six life points left, his physical condition had hit rock bottom.

He perched on the edge of the straw bed he had avoided until now, hands resting weakly on his knees, fingers trembling slightly. His head was bowed as he slowly regulated his breathing, his chest rising and falling in deep, deliberate movements. His face was pale—almost frighteningly so.

Muke, noticing Bai Liu's state, hesitated before stepping forward to check on him. But before he could get close, Bai Liu lifted his head, his elbows still resting on his knees.

His eyes, void of emotion, locked onto Muke.

The sheer indifference in Bai Liu's gaze made Muke's heart lurch. It wasn't anger or disappointment—it was something colder. A detached, clinical scrutiny, as if Bai Liu were assessing a malfunctioning tool.

Muke instinctively halted.

"Muke." Bai Liu's voice was soft, sickly sweet. "Who gave you the right to override my decision and risk your own life?"

Bai Liu's expression remained unreadable as he continued, "Your soul belongs to me. I have the right to allocate every single one of your life points. You may only die when I say so. Before I give that order—" His voice dipped lower. "I don't want to see you making independent decisions, like telling me to 'delete you' ever again. Our relationship is one-way. I give orders. You don't."

Muke, visibly shaken, nodded frantically. "I-I understand."

"As punishment for your insubordination," Bai Liu said lightly, "all your point rewards from this game will go to me. Any objections?"

Muke dropped his gaze, picking at his fingers. "……No."

A few moments passed. Then, suddenly, Muke started sobbing.

He tried to hold it in, but the overwhelming rush of emotions—surviving, being reprimanded, being punished—was too much. His body curled into itself as he cried, tears dripping onto his hands. He wiped his face roughly with his sleeve, trying to suppress the uncontrollable grief.

The helplessness of dragging Bai Liu into danger. The despair of knowing he wasn't strong enough to protect him. The bitter acknowledgment that, in the end, Bai Liu had saved him—and yet still viewed him as nothing more than a liability.

He couldn't stop the tears.

"What are you crying for?" Bai Liu sighed, exasperated. "Look at me, Muke. Do you have complaints about my decision?"

Muke, still hiccuping from his tears, lifted his head. His eyes and nose were red, tear tracks glistening down his cheeks. "No—hic—no complaints."

"Then why are you crying?" Bai Liu asked softly.

Muke didn't answer, his lips pressing together stubbornly.

Bai Liu's voice remained even. "I order you to tell me why you're crying."

"I—I don't understand!" Muke blurted between sobs. "Why did you save me? I'm useless! I'll just drag you down! What if you died because of me?! I wouldn't even survive alone! I'm going to die anyway, so why—why not let me—why couldn't I just—" He broke down completely, crying harder. "If only I were Mu Sicheng, I'd be able to help you more!"

Bai Liu interrupted. "Everything you did tonight—pretending to be a normal player, deceiving Miao Feichi's team, dodging the lie detector scale, reading through those books and effectively passing me the renewal formula—" He paused, his voice unhurried. "All of that was something neither Mu Sicheng nor I could have done. Only you could."

Muke stared at him, dazed.

"You may not see any value in yourself," Bai Liu continued, reaching out to ruffle Muke's hair. "But in my eyes, you're irreplaceable. That's why I saved you."

Muke's breath hitched. His wide, tear-filled eyes reflected Bai Liu's gentle smile. If Mu Sicheng had been here, he would have screamed at him to run—because Bai Liu's business-like, soothing smile was never a good sign.

And yet, Muke knew Bai Liu was telling the truth.

"I was so scared," Muke admitted, still crying. "I thought I was really going to die. I tried my best, but I couldn't do anything, the monster was too strong—"

"You didn't use everything at your disposal," Bai Liu corrected.

Muke hiccupped. "I did!"

"You haven't asked me for help yet."

Muke froze.

"Remember that next time." Bai Liu patted his head like a kindergarten teacher rewarding a child. "All in all—good job tonight, Muke."

Muke burst into fresh tears. "Oooooh! Yes, yes! I'll remember next time, I swear!"

The Loving Welfare Home

Bai Liu looked at Mu Ke, who was crying. He tried several times to get him to stop, but nothing worked. Even when Bai Liu used commanding words like, “I order you not to cry,” Mu Ke only covered his mouth to stifle his sobs. Tears still fell in steady drops, bata bata, down his cheeks. He hiccupped out in a particularly pitiful voice that he couldn’t stop and that it might take a few more minutes.

Mu Ke didn’t think of himself as someone who cried easily. But for some reason, whenever he saw Bai Liu, he felt like a wronged child finally seeing his parents—someone who would allow him to complain.

Even though he felt a little ashamed, he just couldn’t help it.

Lowering his head, Mu Ke’s face burned with embarrassment. At the same time… he felt a subtle sense of relief.

Bai Liu ignored Mu Ke’s sniffles and turned to Liu Huai, who looked somewhat puzzled.

Liu Huai’s expression practically screamed: Is this how you usually fool your teammates?

Bai Liu paid no mind to it and instead spoke in a calm, serious tone. “Let’s talk about the next plan.”

Liu Huai exhaled, his eyes complicated as he watched Bai Liu. After witnessing the entire process of him manipulating Mu Ke, Liu Huai sighed in frustration. “I still can’t believe I let you talk me into this. I’m going up against Miao Feichi as part of your team. Even if I make it through this game, I’ll have a lot of trouble waiting for me afterward.”

“But if you weren’t on my team, you and your sister wouldn’t even have a chance of making it through this game.” Bai Liu’s gaze was steady. “And your sister, Liu Jiayi, would most likely be sacrificed by Miao Feichi. Or eaten.”

Convincing Liu Huai was easy for Bai Liu. Finding him and bringing him in had also been a simple decision.

The monster in Mu Ke’s room would revive, and Bai Liu would have to break into the ICU again, navigating through a sea of nurses if he wanted to get Mu Ke out once Mu Sicheng's speed ability was exhausted.

Bai Liu couldn't do it alone. And he definitely couldn't rely on Miao Feichi again. At best, he could trick Miao Gaojiang—a slow-moving but monster-resistant player—into handling it.

But Miao Gaojiang wasn't particularly useful to Bai Liu, who needed someone adept at escaping.

What Bai Liu needed was a player with high movement speed, someone skilled in concealment and evasion, and someone who had a firm grasp of their weaknesses. There was no better candidate than Liu Huai.

Liu Huai was on the fifth floor, along with Miao Feichi. Finding his ward had been easy—there were only three new patients on that floor: Miao Feichi, Miao Gaojiang, and Liu Huai.

New patients had differently marked rooms. By process of elimination, the room that wasn't Miao Feichi's or Miao Gaojiang's had to be Liu Huai's. And with Bai Liu holding two valuable bargaining chips—Liu Jiayi and the Life-Sustaining Remedy—it had taken him less than a minute to convince Liu Huai.

Liu Huai collapsed onto the hospital bed, head tilted back, staring up at the foggy ceiling. His voice was hoarse. "You're telling me Jiayi is a hunting target for the investors? That we need the blood of those kids to water the bed in order to survive?"

"Firstly, it's not exactly that we need her blood to water the bed," Bai Liu corrected. "Rather, you need to consume the blood lingzhi that grows from this bed after it absorbs her blood. She is the recipe for life for this terminally ill patient of yours." Bai Liu patted the bed Liu Huai was lying on.

Liu Huai raised a hand to cover his eyes, lips pressing into a thin line, as if he were running from the truth.

Bai Liu didn't stop. He calmly held up two fingers. "Secondly, as I told you, Liu Jiayi isn't just a target for the investors. Her blindness puts her at a disadvantage among the children as well."

His tone remained unhurried. "You should know, Liu Huai, that among the children, there's also a younger version of Miao Feichi. One who already enjoys eating human flesh. My little friend told me that Miao Feichi is particularly fixated on Liu Jiayi. A blind little girl is at a complete disadvantage in every way—she's the perfect target for little Miao Feichi."

"In other words, your sister Liu Jiayi is a double-hunting target."

Liu Huai's hands clenched into fists. He lowered his arm from his eyes and turned to stare straight at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu remained impassive. "I promised my little friend that I'd protect your sister. The fact that she managed to call you tonight is already proof of my friend's protection. And I said I would protect Liu Jiayi because she's also the child my friend wants to adopt."

Liu Huai inhaled sharply, then sat up. He crossed his legs on the bed and met Bai Liu's gaze. "I believe you now. So what's next?"

"The logic of this game is mostly clear." Bai Liu leaned back, casually opening a drawer beside the bed. He pulled out a pen, then took a blank title page from somewhere and began sketching as he spoke.

Bai Liu was concise when analyzing a situation. He tapped the pen against the paper and wrote down key terms:

[Secondary game] [50-80]

"The Caring Home is a secondary game with a mortality rate of at least fifty percent. It splits our life values, dividing us into two separate identities: adults and children. Each of us has fifty percent of a shared lifebar."

Bai Liu wrote two [50] marks, then drew an arrow between them.

"But our two identity lines were never meant to be allies. Because this game only allows fifty percent of the players to survive, the logical conclusion is that we're adversaries to the children we share a lifebar with."

That was why Bai Liu had been wary of little Bai Liu. Because in a way...

"We're enemies." Bai Liu glanced up at Liu Huai, whose face had darkened. He continued, "And this renewal formula only confirms my hypothesis."

"For investors to survive, we have to drain the children's blood. Based on the timeline of that Mother Goose rhyme—

Born on Monday, baptized on Tuesday, married on Wednesday, seriously ill on Thursday, critically ill on Friday, sick and dead on Saturday, and in the ground on Sunday—

We have to at least be seriously ill by Thursday. That means we need the children's blood before then. Otherwise, we'll be dead in a day."

Bai Liu jotted down [DDL: three days later].

"The same applies to the children. They have to escape Caring Home before Thursday, or they'll be drained and killed. Their main task is to run."

Bai Liu tapped his pen against the page, thinking aloud. "Actually, I suspect that little Bai Liu has already sensed the antagonistic nature of our roles. But when I handed him control over my own lifebar, he realized my intentions. I allowed him the opportunity to kill me, and because of that, he ultimately chose to trust me."

Liu Huai looked at Bai Liu in stunned silence. He shuddered when he met Bai Liu's steady gaze.

"You'd do anything for your sister, wouldn't you?" Bai Liu asked softly. "Mu Ke and I are nearly at the end of our lifebars. You can see where this is going."

Bai Liu's voice was unwavering. "We'll keep it small. Not big."

He had earned little Bai Liu's trust by making himself someone little Bai Liu could rely on. The kind of person Lu Yizhan had been for him.

Lu Yizhan had always chosen to sacrifice himself rather than let Bai Liu get hurt.

And now, in this game, little Bai Liu would trust him for the exact same reason.

Liu Huai's face darkened.

Bai Liu, as if unaware of Liu Huai's turmoil, simply looked down and continued writing in the paper in his hands.

Bai Liu remained unaffected by Liu Huai's turbulent emotions, continuing his analysis with impassive precision. "In my opinion, simply taking a child's blood to instill a blood lingzhi that could save us is highly unlikely. This is a game with a minimum mortality rate of fifty percent. If obtaining just a child's blood could grant survival without any issues, it wouldn't reflect the typical mortality rate for a level two game."

As he spoke, Bai Liu wrote [6] → [3] on the paper.

"From that perspective," he continued, "there's more to this game than meets the eye. If we consider the mortality rate between eighty and fifty percent for a secondary game, it's a six-player death game. The number of players expected to die would be between three and 4.8."

With a few swift strokes, Bai Liu sketched a small girl on the paper. "What's also notable about this scenario is the presence of another player on the child's side—Liu Jiayi."

Upon hearing Liu Jiayi's name, Liu Huai's gaze fixed on Bai Liu's face.

Bai Liu proceeded as if nothing had changed. "There are only five children from whom we can take blood. Assuming a fifty percent mortality rate, only three players need to die. If Liu Jiayi is among those who die, one of the deaths is accounted for. Assuming the surviving players are all us 'investors,'"

Bai Liu, eyes still on the paper, wrote: [Maximum clearance efficiency for investors].

"With all conditions most favorable to the investors, a maximum of three would survive. With a fifty percent mortality rate, it would take about 1.6 children's worth of blood for an 'investor' to clear a bed."

He wrote [1.6] on his paper and drew a small circle around both the [1] and the [6] after the decimal point.

His gaze remained steady. "So who represents the [1] and who represents the [0.6]? The game has already hinted at the answer."

"The child we invest in is our primary blood donor, the [1], and by supplementing our bed with the blood of this invested child, and adding about 0.6 worth of another child's blood, we can sustain the blood lingzhi that provides maximum relief for the terminal illness." Bai Liu drew a cross over the [1.6], blotting it out. "But that option is ruled out for me because the return on the investment is too low."

"The probability that an investor's pass requires 1.6 children's blood for maximum cost-effectiveness is high. So sacrificing one investor by not taking their blood will, in turn, preserve 1.6 children."

"We, the blood-sucking adults, are far less valuable than their survival. It's more cost-effective to sacrifice ourselves to survive." Bai Liu drew a protective shield over the sketch of Liu Jiayi he had made earlier, looking up at Liu Huai as he continued, "So I decided to prioritize the children's lives in this game. This remedy won't work for me or Muke. We're not going down this route. We're not going for the main quest."

Bai Liu paused, his gaze lingering on Liu Huai, who was pale. "But our situations are different. We've chosen to sacrifice ourselves to protect our younger selves, and if the plan succeeds, we won't die, and we'll pass."

"But you, Liu Huai, are not like us." Bai Liu's eyes narrowed slightly as he observed Liu Huai's silence. "You and Liu Jiayi are separate and hostile individuals. If you choose to prioritize Liu Jiayi's survival, you will most likely die, as you won't receive any blood."

"So, how will you choose?"

Bai Liu looked at Liu Huai with deep concentration, as though studying an entirely different species.

How far would Liu Huai go for his sister? Could a man's professed love for his sister really be like the strange Lu Yizhan's, where someone could give up everything for such an unprovoked emotion?

Liu Huai, a man with an intense desire to live, intrigued Bai Liu. His pen idly circled the protective shield he had drawn around Liu Jiayi's sketch, which now appeared covered in strange black dots, as if the shield itself had been overshadowed.

Liu Huai sat on the bed's edge like a silent plant, his hands hanging by his side with the dagger, motionless yet breathing heavily.

Bai Liu quickly turned his gaze away, sensing the twisted, fearful expression on Liu Huai's face—fear of the approaching unknown that he could not control.

Liu Huai's fear and hesitation were palpable, twisting his features. His retreat from death made his supposed love for Liu Jiayi seem self-serving, a signal of self-interest. Bai Liu grew bored, dismissing it as no different from other forms of 'love' he had encountered before.

To him, it was like the hollow declarations of love he'd seen countless times, empty words chewed over and spat out with no real sweetness, only for one's own gratification.

People were always selfish, after all.

Bai Liu spoke again, his tone indifferent, "If you want to pass as an investor, I can have little Bai Six help you extract..." He trailed off, his words hanging in the air.

"Liu Jiayi's blood?" Liu Huai's voice trembled with dread, looking at Bai Liu with fear in his eyes. "Bai Liu, if I die, will your friends really adopt Jiajia?"

Liu Huai looked as though he were a foster parent forced to give up their child, anxiety clear on his face. "Jiajia can't see and clings to me. I'm afraid she'll be alone when I'm gone. I know your friend is very kind, please take good care of her. If you can help with her sight..."

It was odd, hearing a not-yet-graduated university student ramble about raising a child, his words betraying a maturity that made him sound more like a parent than a young man.

The fear on Liu Huai's face never faded, and his words were consumed by concern for Liu Jiayi, as if he feared his death would leave her struggling more than death itself.

"She doesn't like sleeping alone at night. She has a little bear I sewed for her. It's a bit old, but she loves it. If you take her from the orphanage, remember to bring it with you. She's quiet but kind. She's just scared when she can't hear anything. Just turn the TV on for her. She likes hamsters, but she's a bit careless with her hands. Don't buy her one; she'll cry if it dies. Very badly..."

Bai Liu paused, his gaze focused on Liu Huai. "Have you really thought about sacrificing yourself for your sister?"

Liu Huai hesitated for a moment before replying, "It doesn't require thinking."

"I entered this game to give her a brighter future, but it all depends on her being alive."

Liu Huai's thoughts were clear, and his bitter smile was full of resignation. "Bai Liu, I wish I were as good a player as you and Mu Sicheng. But I'm not. There's nothing I can do for her future, except fight to keep her alive. That's all I can do for her."

"Death isn't hard to accept," Liu Huai continued, his shoulders slumping as if he was reassuring himself. "I knew this day would come when I entered the game, but Jiajia hasn't fully trusted me yet. She hasn't even seen what I look like, and it's hard to let go of that..."

But there was no point in regret. This game was about Liu Jiayi's life or death, and it gave Liu Huai no chance to make peace with it.

"If I could live by sacrificing any of them, I would. I'd do anything to try..." Liu Huai trailed off, his body sagging in defeat. He fell silent for a long time.

Tears slid from Liu Huai's eyes, landing on the dagger he clutched—the same dagger he'd used to kill his best friend to survive.

But now, he had reached the one person he couldn't betray.

Bai Liu didn't stop him. Liu Huai sat on the bed, pale as a corpse ready for the coffin. His hand trembled as he gripped the dagger, but Bai Liu found it almost comical. Liu Huai was only now fearing his own death.

When faced with the reality of death, Liu Huai's first thoughts were for Liu Jiayi, then for himself—a subconscious emotional reaction that Bai Liu found unbelievable.

Liu Huai smiled bitterly, his head lowered. He clenched his fists, took a deep breath, and raised his head again.

"Bai Liu, I remember your personal skill is trading. If I die, I can leave you something useful." Liu Huai's exhaustion was evident, his face a mask of empty relief, only fear and tears lingering in his eyes. He grabbed Bai Liu's hand, his voice thick with emotion. "But only if you help me..."

"Let Liu Jiayi see again?" Bai Liu's voice was calm as he looked at Liu Huai's weary face and averted his eyes. "Wait until you're dead. I don't do short sales."

The Loving Welfare Home

It's night at the Children's Home.

Little Bai Six lay on his bed, his eyes quietly opening as he heard the faint sound of a flute. It was loud enough to wake him, but the other children in the room remained fast asleep, exhausted from the night's activities. All except Little Bai Six, who, always alert, was wide awake.

He gingerly slipped out of bed, quietly put on his shoes, and glanced at the clock hanging on the wall—2 a.m.

The only sounds in the dark dormitory were the soft snores of the children. They huddled in their beds, soft bodies hidden under blankets. Little Muke even had his head covered, as if trying to shield himself.

But really, anyone could easily break these children if they wanted to. Little Bai Six watched the door of their room slowly creak open, the sound in sync with the flute's steady rhythm. The wooden door, twisting and groaning, revealed the dim, empty corridor outside.

There was no one outside, and yet, the door had opened by itself.

The sound of the flute grew clearer, its melody drifting lazily and cheerfully into the room. The children began to stir, frowning in their sleep, their bodies squirming as if caught in a strange, magical dream. They murmured softly, twitching their arms and legs.

Little Bai Six calmly nudged Little Muke awake.

—It was no wonder the flute didn't affect him. The sound worked on the sleeping children, but Little Bai Six had only been in the orphanage for two days, and being a light sleeper in an unfamiliar place, he woke up the moment the flute played, unaffected by its hypnotic effect.

Little Muke woke with a start, rubbing his eyes, his forehead slick with cold sweat. He took a long, dazed breath before looking up at Little Bai Six, standing at the foot of his bed, still half-asleep as if not fully realizing someone was there.

Groggily, Little Muke smiled and stretched, then shuffled out of bed, putting on his shoes as he mumbled, "We need to leave this orphanage. It's going to draw our blood and kill us..."

"You're awake. It's just the flute's hypnosis," Little Bai Six said, taking Little Muke by the wrist and pulling him to face him. His eyes narrowed, sharp and calculating.

Little Muke's eyes were still glazed, his body trembling. Though he was sleepy, his eyes glistened with fear as tears welled up.

"It wasn't a dream," Little Muke shuddered, voice cracking. "I saw nurses strapping us down to beds, pushing syringes through our hands and feet, drawing our blood into tubes, then it dripped into a metal jar. We couldn't stop them... we couldn't get out..."

He clutched his shoulders, shivering in terror. "They used thick black needles on our scalps and faces, like the ones used to pierce livestock. They tied rubber tubes around our necks to crush the veins in our faces, draining us dry."

"We were suffocating, with purple and black faces, struggling helplessly against the hospital bed..." He began to cry, his face streaked with tears as he looked up at Little Bai Six, desperate. "I swear it wasn't a dream! I saw what's going to happen after the christening tomorrow! The investors are bad people. They're going to baptize us, but it's just a way to drain our blood. They're not helping us; they're just using us!"

"Of course, they're not helping us for free," Little Bai Six responded, his voice cold and detached. "Nothing is free in this world, especially for young humans like you and me, who don't have much value. The only thing we have is our bodies. They invest in us for what we have inside. Why be surprised? Isn't it just how the world works?"

Little Muke stared at him, dazed and afraid. "You knew all along, didn't you? You knew they were bad people?"

"They're not bad," Little Bai Six said, his voice emotionless. "They're just consumers, capable of buying our bodies. People like us, without purchasing power, are nothing but commodities. We can be bought and sold at will. It's a simple fact."

Little Muke, looking at the calm, emotionless face of Little Bai Six, took a step back, stunned by the cold truth. "You knew they would do this to us all along?"

Little Bai Six's gaze was sharp and unfeeling. "There's no such thing as good people out there. Do you think they're kind? That they won't take advantage of you? They might eat your flesh, do even worse things to you. Do you have any power to stop them? Escape? Until you have the means to buy back your freedom, running away just means you've gone from one shelf to another."

Little Muke was struck speechless. He opened his mouth, but no words came out.

Little Bai Six tilted his head slightly, then asked, "How old are you?"

Little Muke, barely holding back tears, twisted his fingers together nervously. "I... I'm eleven."

"Oh, eleven," Little Bai Six said dismissively. "Don't be so naive, Muke. This orphanage exists to make children disappear every Sunday. The children who vanish are always carefully chosen. Our group... we're the ones they want."

Little Bai Six glanced at Little Muke, his eyes lingering on the boy's delicate, pale shoulders exposed by his pajamas.

Little Muke, still confused and frightened, asked quietly, "What do they want with us?"

Little Bai Six looked away, his expression unreadable. "Nothing... forget it."

For a moment, he thought this place was about child exploitation, a thought that crossed his mind when his "investor" first told him to protect Muke and Liu Jiayi. But soon, he realized the truth wasn't so simple.

The investors were after something else.

If it were about lust, they could have begun the moment the children arrived. But it had been a day, and none of the investors had made any moves yet, only contacting them via phone.

Little Bai Six suspected the investors weren't sure what they wanted from the children either. Were they interested in charity, psychological comfort, or some form of superstitious belief that helping would prolong their lives?

But those were indirect, subtle purposes. He had the feeling there was something more central at play—something that led the investors to watch them closely. And the hospital across the street only deepened his suspicions.

Maybe they were after a cure of some sort.

The ability to heal wasn't just physical. It could be psychological, like the church where they were supposed to be baptized the next day. It looked beautiful, but there was symbolism hidden behind its pristine façade. The investors might believe that by doing good deeds, praying for divine protection, they could heal something in themselves.

But there was a more direct way to heal.

And that's where the children came in.

Little Bai Six, his expression still neutral, turned back to Muke. "From the first day, I knew my role here. I just didn't know exactly what part I played. Now it's clear—it's our blood."

Little Muke's voice shook as he protested, "But if you knew, why didn't you run? You were talking to your investor last night for half an hour—are you crazy? He's not a good person! He's a monster who sucks people's blood!"

Little Bai Six's eyes darkened as he looked at Muke. "First of all, this place is completely closed off. We can't escape unless it's an open day. Secondly, if my investor hadn't paid to save you last night, I wouldn't have cared if you died. Even if he's a monster, he's the one who saved you. You need to understand that."

Little Muke opened his mouth to argue, but Little Bai Six's words silenced him. "Impossible. He didn't save you for your blood. If that was his intention, he could have paid me to drain it last night, and you would've been empty by now."

Little Muke staggered backward, his face pale with fear. "What do you mean... how could you—"

Little Bai Six grinned coldly, taking a step toward him. "How am I? By your standards, I'm much worse than my investor who saved you. Little Muke, you're ten years old. Shouldn't you be smarter than this?"

Muke recoiled in fear, almost falling over. His voice trembled as he screamed, "Aah! Don't come any closer!"

After a moment of frightening Muke with his icy demeanor, Little Bai Six stepped back, returning to his usual emotionless self. "Even if all the investors are bloodsuckers, mine is on our side. He could've killed you, but he didn't. He will help us. So, you'd better listen to him and not act recklessly."

Muke nodded furiously, trembling. "Yes, yes, I understand."

Little Bai Six turned toward the open door to the corridor, peering through the crack. His expression darkened when he saw something.

The corridor was eerily silent, save for the sound of the flute. Several doors to rooms were ajar, with lamps swaying gently, their faint light illuminating cobwebs in the corners. In the distance, the sound of children's running feet echoed softly through the halls.

But that wasn't what made Little Bai Six frown.

"Something's coming," he muttered.

Little Muke, hiding behind him, peeked cautiously into the corridor. "I don't see anything... nothing's coming in..." he said, confused.

"Look up," Little Bai Six ordered, his tone calm and distant.

Muke hesitated but followed his gaze. Slowly, he craned his neck upward. The long, narrow hallway was adorned with old paintings of animals, their eyes eerily lifelike in the dim light. But Muke's gaze drifted past them, and his heart stopped when he saw what was truly terrifying.

Children hung from the ceiling like bats. They were covered in blood-dried IV bags and tubes, their faces gaunt and skeletal. Their limbs were thin and frail, their eyes wide and unnaturally large. The tubes that twisted around the children were plugged into the walls, pulling them forward like marionettes.

The scene was haunting—terrifyingly real, as if it had come straight from a nightmare.

And among them, the flute-playing children continued their eerie melody, not with a flute, but with a large, hollow needle.

Little Bai Six's voice was low and understanding. "The Piper in Colour." He paused, watching the children. "So this is why I couldn't find the flute players yesterday. They were on the ceiling all along."

Little Muke, shaking with fear, tugged at Little Bai Six's sleeve. "I... I want to go back to bed."

Little Bai Six didn't care about Little Muke. He looked up at the flute-playing children for a while, watching them enter the different open doors of their bedrooms. Then, he gently followed them out. Little Muke, about to faint from fear, was too afraid to be left alone in his bedroom with the door wide open. Bai Six still trembled, like an ungrateful follower.

After entering the different sleeping rooms, the flute-playing children —whose eyeballs were so large they seemed to be about to fall out of their sockets—stood on the ceiling, twisted their heads with a click to an angle almost parallel to the floor, and cocked their heads to observe the sleeping children below.

Little Bai Six sidled up next to the half-open door, not entering, and leaned slightly to watch through the crack, trying to see what the group of flute-playing children was up to.

The child on the ceiling walked around the room, cocking its head at each sleeping child above them. It finally stopped at one child, as if selecting a target. Slowly, it dropped its tentacle-like IV tube and gently lifted the child's blanket.

Little Muke covered his mouth in fear, trying not to scream.

The boy soon woke up, apparently from the same horrible dream as Muke, triggered by the sound of the flute. Tears and panic filled his face. He almost screamed at the sight of the grotesque child, but his mouth was covered by an IV tube.

The child on the ceiling seemed to gesture something to the waking child with the IV tube. The child soon broke into tears, quickly jumped out of bed, put on his shoes, and followed the child on the ceiling. Little Bai Six quickly retreated into his room and closed the door, leaving only a small crack to watch the scene in the corridor.

Each flute-playing child who entered a different sleeping room came out with a beaming child. The child on the ceiling played a quirky tune on a flute made from a syringe. The children on the floor lined up, humming, following one by one, just like the scene Little Bai Six had witnessed yesterday.

But suddenly, the procession stopped. All the children on the ceiling craned their heads through the doorway, staring with dead eyes at Little Bai Six, who was peeping through the crack in the door. Little Muke, hiding behind Little Bai Six, tugged frantically at the corner of his coat, staring at him with a look of terror that made him almost cry.

Little Bai Six covered his mouth to prevent himself from crying out. He slowly raised his hand and pointed to the top of their heads.

Little Bai Six fell silent. He looked up slowly and saw a child above him, head cocked, a pair of ping-pong-ball-sized eyes on a wrinkled, blackened face, staring at him with unseeing eyes.

The child had come in through the ceiling, just as Little Bai Six had exited. The IV tube beneath it had a child's head wrapped around it—one who had been sleeping in the same room as Little Bai Six. That child was now staring at him and Muke with a strange smile, wrapped under the IV tube.

Little Bai Six slowly opened the door to let them out. The child bounced away. The child on the ceiling leaned over to observe Little Bai Six and Muke, who was shivering and tearful. It stroked them with its IV tube, as if confirming something, then finally retracted its tube and left with a grimace across the ceiling.

The sound of the flute rang out again in the corridor, whining through the bloodstained syringes, fading away in time with the humming voices of the children being taken. It echoed ethereally down the corridor and disappeared into the distance.

After confirming that no monsters were on the ceiling, Little Bai Six quickly unlocked the door of the sleeping room from the inside.

He covered his heart and exhaled with difficulty to calm his racing pulse. He had just been terrified. But when Little Muke recovered and turned around, Little Bai Six acted as if nothing had happened. He was already lying in bed with the covers up, ready for sleep.

It didn't look like he had just been nearly taken by a monster.

Little Muke was speechless and devastated. He walked over to Little Bai Six's bed and, in a low voice, scolded him, "We almost got caught just now! Can you think before you rush out next time?!"

Little Bai Six, eyes closed under the covers, didn't open them when Little Muke scolded him. Instead, he explained nonchalantly, "It wouldn't have taken us. I've observed before that the children taken by the flute are very specific."

He had noticed this when he observed it yesterday. The flute had an indiscriminate hypnotic effect on all the children, but only a select few ended up being taken. Before, Little Bai Six had wondered how it worked. His door hadn’t been opened by the flute yesterday. He had been in his room, watching the corridor through the window with a restricted view, so he hadn’t seen the children on the ceiling.

Since no flute-playing children had entered his room yesterday, he didn’t know how the others had locked up and taken the children.

But Little Bai Six felt he needed to find out. After all, his [investor] would surely be interested in this information, which is why Little Bai Six had ventured out.

"But even if there is a pattern, how do you know we’re not the kind of kids who get taken?" Little Muke questioned. He had also sensed that the group of flute-playing children was clearly targeting children who fit a specific profile, but the problem was that they didn’t know the criteria the other party used to select them.

Little Muke raised an eyebrow. "Our door was open tonight too, meaning we also had children in our room who were eligible to be taken. How do you know we weren’t?"

"Because it’s Tuesday," Little Bai Six finally glanced at Little Muke. "It’s just our baptism day, so we won’t be taken."

Little Muke was a bit overwhelmed by the reaction: "..... Why won't we be taken away on Baptism Day?"

Little Bai Six: "According to my understanding of baptism, we shouldn't be eligible to have blood drawn before we are baptized. We are considered sinful before baptism, and only the blood of the Lord can cleanse us of our sins."

Little Bai Six said lazily with a snort, having stayed up for two days straight and feeling really sleepy: "And haven't you noticed? These [flute-playing kids] are saving the day."

Little Muke was stunned: "Saving people?"

"Yes, saving lives." Little Bai Six closed his eyes again, hands folded over his chest, lying peacefully as if he was about to fall asleep. "They're carrying IV tubes and bags. They must be coming from a private hospital, so I'm guessing they know which children those terminally ill investors are going to draw blood from next. They're taking away the ones selected for the upcoming blood draw."

"For example, the child taken from our room. I saw the dean register him during the day, saying that an [investor] wanted to adopt him." Little Bai Six said calmly. "I'm sure you saw it all in your dream, Muke."

Little Muke shuddered at the thought of the blood draws in his dream.

Little Bai Six continued without skipping a beat: "And because of this, if I'm not mistaken, the children were first hypnotized by the sound of the flute to see what might happen to them in the future. Then they met the children who looked exactly like the ones whose blood had been drawn in their dreams."

"The [flute-playing kids] must have expressed to them that they were victims of this blood draw, and that they would take them to a safe place where they'd never have to come back. That's why the kids voluntarily and soberly followed the weird-looking [flute-playing kids], walking away so happily."

Little Bai Six paused. "And our [investors] have given up on bleeding us, so even after the baptism, we're safe."

"Because we don’t need saving, they don’t take us away."

Little Muke, lying on his bed, turned sideways to look at Little Bai Six, who seemed to have fallen asleep. He couldn’t resist asking in a whisper, "..... Little Bai Six, what makes you so sure that your [investor] won’t secretly register behind your back to take you and bleed you?"

Little Bai Six breathed evenly and didn’t answer, as if he had fallen asleep. Little Muke sighed sadly, muttering under his breath, "Little Bai Six, you’re so gullible trusting your [investor], who is more naive." Then he fell asleep, his thoughts still filled with worry.

In the final moments of Little Muke’s sleep, he seemed to hear Little Bai Six answer calmly, "If he lies to me, I will kill him."

Two more pairs of eyes were rigidly open in the darkness of the children's sleeping room.

Little Miao Feichi and Little Miao Gaojiang were trembling under the covers, listening to Little Muke and Little Bai Six. They saw the horrible [flute-playing child] that had entered, seemingly because they were both awake. The flute-playing child hovered above them for a long time.

Now, these two children—who had not yet experienced the various horrors in the game and later achieved fame and fortune as S-rank players—were in a cold sweat, afraid to move. In the end, these two were just ordinary people in their childhood.

Perhaps it couldn’t be considered ordinary. After all, one of them grew up with the guts to kill his mother and condone his own children killing his wife and eating the corpse.

But how can killing your terminally ill mother (wife), a woman who was useless, be the same as being killed yourself?

Little Miao Gaojiang, her clothes drenched in cold sweat, could barely contain her composure and was terrified enough.

Little Miao Feichi, the man who had the audacity to scald his terminally ill mother to death with boiling water and who loved eating children's flesh, couldn’t accept being treated like this—the thought of being bled dry, reduced to a skin-and-bones state, was so terrifying that his feet twitched a few times.

Even though he covered his head with the blanket, he let out a whimper, trying to suppress it, but it was still audible in his shock.

Hearing two slightly heavier breaths and a little light crying from the sleeping room, a strange smile curled up on the face of Little Bai Six, who appeared to have been asleep for a long time.

At 6:15 AM on Tuesday morning, Bai Liu's phone rang on time.

"Good morning, Mr. Investor." Little Bai Six greeted politely. "I found out last night..."

"A child playing a flute?" Bai Liu asked rhetorically, his voice laced with sarcasm, as he crossed his system panel.

[The Monster Book of Love Orphanage Refresh - Deformed Children (1/3)]

[Monster Name: Deformed Child (Berserk version after blood draw)]
[Characteristics: Likes to go out late at night to take away children]
[Weakness: ????? (to be explored)]
[Mode of Attack: Blood Injection (A+), Phone Location (A+)]
[Trigger new attack: Flute Player, A rank skill, can lure away the player's secondary identity line with the sound of the flute]
[Congratulations to player Bai Liu for collecting all the Freak Child attacks]

There was a silence on Little Bai Six's side. He didn't ask why Bai Liu knew what was happening on their side but continued to report without any fluctuation. "Yes, the time of appearance was around two in the morning. It was in sleep hypnosis mode, and we could see the investors pumping their own blood in the future..."

Bai Liu listened quietly to Little Bai Six's report and thought: "It seems that the deformed children and you are on the same side. Yes, you're all victims, so the deformed children who chase you every night are probably the same as this child playing the flute. Even if they make you disappear, their main purpose is to take you away and hide you to protect you. In fact, it's to keep me from finding you."

But hidden somewhere—a group of ghost children could hide a group of real children so that the living couldn't find them at all. It was hard to say whether they were hidden in the underworld or the world above. Bai Liu felt that the children taken by this group might have died on a different level, only euthanized.

According to the scene in The Piper in the Flower, where the child is taken away, the child should also have been drowned, dying happily to the sound of the flute.

"I don't think it's protection," Bai Liu thought. "It should be death, too. If you take children away every night, with such a large number of children, I don't think these rich [investors] can't find them. One group of dead children can't hide another group."

"Yes, but it does have something to offer." Bai Liu's eyes narrowed. "These flute-playing kids should know how to escape from your fully enclosed orphanage."

Little Bai Six went silent for a moment before asking, "You need me to escape this [loving orphanage]?"

"Yes," Bai Liu replied. "But now the question is, if you run out of the orphanage after this group of flute-playing kids, how will you protect yourself from them? You can't just run; you need to take the others with you."

Bai Liu's fingers tapped twice on the edge of the bed, his eyes hiding a lot of obscure emotions. "All of them, including Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang. You need to take them and run out. Then—"

"Do them and get the blood for you, right?" Little Bai Six added without a ripple in his voice. "That's no problem. I can get them to follow me, but for an additional fee."

"One hundred thousand for one person."

Bai Liu gave an unnoticeable pause, then lazily curled his lips. "Deal."

"But there are two core points to note about this deal, and if you break one of them, the deal is null and void," Bai Liu added casually. "First, the core mission is to escape, but the first priority is your personal safety, followed by the safety of Muke and Liu Jiayi. If that's not guaranteed, don't take it lightly."

"The second point is that killing Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang is not a necessary task for you." Bai Liu's voice softened, his eyes downcast. "I'd like you to leave them to me if you can, Little Bai Six. After all, you're only fourteen, and I'm twenty-four. I might be more suited for this sort of thing than you. And of course, I'll pay you the two hundred thousand as usual."

This time, Little Bai Six was silent for a long time before asking, his voice tinged with genuine doubt, "Is there any difference between doing this at fourteen and at twenty-four?"

"The substance isn't that different," Bai Liu paused. "But I just don't want you to do it. Wait until you're an adult and can take responsibility for your actions before deciding if you want to be a bad person."

"Let the bad guy be me, the adult, little friend."

After Little Bai Six hung up, Bai Liu looked out the darkened window of his ward and exhaled. He thought about how he had truly been conditioned by Lu Yizhan.

Lu Yizhan was most afraid of Bai Liu doing this, after all, Bai Liu was really good at it.

So, Lu Yizhan recited eight hundred times a day to tell him not to engage in marketing with underage people, and even in the game, Bai Liu subconsciously avoided such situations.

But it was better that he was here. After all, Little Bai Six had enough problems with his tasks, and it wasn't easy for him to get rid of Miao Feichi. It was best to leave him with tasks that could easily go wrong.

9 a.m.

The announcements in the ward informed all patients that they were ready to come out and about, as well as informing new patients to go and watch their children's baptism.

[System Alert: A side quest has been triggered. Players who have been notified of the children's phone calls have been invited to go and watch their invested children being baptized at the orphanage.]

Bai Liu is now in Muke's hospital room. It's baptism day, but Bai Liu is dead, and one of the five investors attending the baptism is bound to be missing. It's obvious that Muke is giving up on the side quest.

Muke was in a poor state of mind. He had been up for two nights in a row, overwhelmed with memories. He had been hunted, chased, and cried all night. Now, his eyes were swollen like a goldfish, and he lay dazed and motionless on his back.

This young master didn't really like the wet and sticky straw bed either, but he didn't have the energy to care right now.

It was clear that the young master, who had been overworking his brain and eyes, needed a break. Bai Liu decided to attend the baptism as an investor in [Muke].

But it's one thing for Muke to need a break; it's another for him to actually get one.

He couldn't sleep at all, even though he was too tired to speak. As soon as Muke closed his eyes, his mind filled with a jumble of images and messages. His headache was splitting from the overwhelming emotions that kept his cerebral cortex active, even though Bai Liu had given him the bed and slept on the floor.

Muke saw Bai Liu getting up from the floor, preparing to leave. Muke struggled to get up from the bed and looked at Bai Liu with concern. "Why don't I go? I'm the real Muke after all. If they have any more props or tricks for the lie detector, I can handle it."

"No need," Bai Liu said, straightening his hospital gown. He had slept on the floor last night, padded with books, and hadn't rested well. His face looked tired.

Bai Liu turned to Muke on the bed. "I have something for you to do in the hospital, something only you can do."

Muke was stunned. "What is it?"

"I need you to look up some human case information for me," Bai Liu said.

The timeline for this copy of the orphanage is ten years ago, exactly when those entrepreneurs in reality invested in that children's home to prepare for the first group of children to be enrolled.

These two orphanages are caught in two manifestations of the same copy. Referring to [Bursting Last Train] and [Mirror City Bombing], although the game copy and the real events manifest differently, the core events are generally the same. It's likely these seriously ill entrepreneurs did the same thing to these children—extracting blood to feed the blood lingzhi to cure the disease.

But Lu Yizhan's investigations have been so devastating that he hasn't been able to find any clues as to what these entrepreneurs did to the children. After all, it's been ten years, and many of the ideas that could be traced back to them have long been broken.

Bai Liu also thinks that even if there were clues, they've probably been swept under the carpet by these powerful people. Otherwise, this group of people would not have given up funding the orphanage and allowed a place like this—where they've committed crimes—to slip from their control.

Even if Bai Liu gets out of the game and tells Lu Yizhan about the orphanage case, Lu Yizhan might believe Bai Liu's strange claims, but without concrete evidence or clues, there's nothing they can do against a bunch of reputable, well-established entrepreneurs.

But Bai Liu promised to look into the matter for Lu Yizhan, and he accepted Lu Yizhan's payment. He likes making deals with a clear finish line.

What can't be done outside the game may still be possible inside, and what clues aren't available outside may exist within.

Bai Liu looked at Xiang Muke. "Muke, I'll write down some names for you later. The nurses are very lax in watching the patients during the day. See if you can infiltrate the file room where they store the patients' data and find the medical records of these people. Remember them all for me."

"Especially the names of the children whose medicines they used, and the time of each blood extraction. It would be good if you could remember them and tell me when I return."

The case files are quite voluminous—several of them—and it would be difficult for anyone else to remember everything in the short time it takes to blend in unnoticed by the nurses in the file room.

But for Muke, it's a simple task. He nodded without thinking. "Yes, just give me the name of the patient."

Bai Liu said a few names and then asked, "Did you remember the names of these people?"

Muke nodded, but then his brow furrowed slightly in confusion as he asked, "These are real-life entrepreneurs, they're supposed to be normal people, right? How did their names end up in this game's archive?"

Bai Liu lowered his eyes. "They're probably no ordinary people.

They're supposed to be monsters in this game. Also, Muke, if you can, remember as many names as you can of all the investor patients registered in the sick bay."

Muke was stunned. "Does… does it have to be all of them? Why?"

"A large children's home that has been open for ten years and has only recently started to taper off investment…"

Here, Bai Liu paused subtly and then continued.

"The investment cost of a large private children's home is huge, and without a relatively large chain of interests behind it to support it, I think it's unlikely to sustain such a long period of unpaid investment from multiple groups, unless a commodity chain is formed."

Bai Liu calmly analyzed and elaborated. "It's clear that the commodity a children's home can provide is children—and the by-products of children. Conventionally, I would guess it's something like an erotic or exploitive chain, but here it would be blood."

Bai Liu's attitude had an almost impersonal indifference as he stated emotionlessly, "The amount of blood that can be provided by the number of children circulating in an orphanage that has been open for ten years and can house hundreds of children at a time... I think that more than the few people I've mentioned could be saved. I think that, at the time this orphanage was opened, there were more than just the few entrepreneurs in line for the terminally ill, too—on the bright side."

Bai Liu looked at Muke with a calm expression that made Muke uneasy. "If my suspicions are correct, the information in that archive, except for the players who have logged into this game before…"

"…should all be [investors] who have, in reality, sucked the blood of children to cure themselves."

[System warning: Player Bai Liu is talking about something that is at the heart of the game, and this conversation has been blocked and silenced by player Bai Liu's TV.]

Muke was completely confused. He was a bit overwhelmed, and he fumbled, feeling a spine-tingling sensation as he got out of bed. "Wait, Bai Liu, you mean—no, wait, if I have to remember all the patient case information, I probably can't remember that much in a short time now! I'm… I'm not thinking very clearly right now. And what the hell did you mean by what you just said...?"

"I'll explain the details to you later." Bai Liu interrupted Muke's questioning. He glanced at the panicked Muke lightly. "If you can't remember everything, just focus on the ones I told you about. With this level of crime, there should be a relatively tight chain of connections between them. Once you catch a few, it will be easy to pull out the carrot and bring out the mud."

Bai Liu pushed the door open and turned his head to a dazed Muke sitting on the edge of the bed, nodding with a calm look. "Rest, I need you to maintain a high level of accuracy at all times. There's still a lot of information you need to remember."

"I don't need to rest. I can't sleep. I'll go and help you with the case… The information now... I can't remember it in a short time. I'll remember it in a little longer…" Muke slowly blinked twice, tossing his head, but his head hit the straw bed with a thud as if it suddenly sank. He looked up at Bai Liu, who was looking down at him from above, holding the door handle.

Bai Liu looked at Muke, who had collapsed on the bed with no expression on his face. "You need to rest now, Muke."

Muke's eyes went black, and he felt the ward spinning. He struggled hard to lift his eyelids, only to see Bai Liu turn and close the door, disappearing from his view. He reached out to grab Bai Liu's departing back, but only moved his fingers twice before his eyes reluctantly closed.

"I don't want to rest... I want to do something..."

The last words Muke heard Bai Liu say before he faded into sleep were, "The sleeping pills will take effect around 11:30 p.m. when the nurses are eating and the file room is deserted. That will be a good time for you to wake up."

"Sleep well, Muke."

Muke curled up in a small ball on the straw bed, his eyes closed, and his breathing even, sleeping soundly.

Bai Liu glanced at him and then turned and locked the door behind him. Muke was in a terrible state of mind, having been in a state of shock since last night, like a cat in a frenzy. His inability to sleep and rest would affect his memory.

There aren't many safe times in the game for Muke to rest, and it's understandable that Muke is in that over-vigilant state Bai Liu is in.

Only today, with Miao Feichi away and a high density of nurse patrols during the day, the odds of monsters appearing are low. There's no better time than now for Muke to rest and fully recover.

But Bai Liu's absence would greatly deprive Muke of his sense of security. Muke immediately sat up from the bed as soon as Bai Liu stood up, his eyes red and bloodshot, wanting to follow him.

At 9:30, all the investors who were going to observe the baptism gathered at the entrance of the hospital.

The Loving Welfare Home

Central Lobby of the Game, Core Screen Area.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's minor TV rankings were slightly lower than Bai Liu's from earlier matchups, causing both of them to drop from their positions near the [King's Promotion] to the core promotion. Bai Liu's minor TV ranking rose slightly, though it wasn't high enough to reach the [Nightmare Rising Star Promotion].

The two sides are now meeting in the [Core Promotion], with Bai Liu holding a slight advantage, his promotion ranking directly above Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang.

There's a lot of circulation between players in the same promotion, as viewers can see each other's TV rankings. When a player performs well, the viewers of their mini-television cheer and get excited, and although viewers from different players' mini-televisions can't hear one another, the atmosphere can influence nearby viewers, causing one side to absorb viewers from the other. This leads to one player rising higher while the other falls. This stalemate is the situation Bai Liu and Miao Feichi are currently in.

However, this stalemate could easily result in a loss of viewers.

Fortunately for Bai Liu, he hasn't lost too many viewers, and none of the high-profile names standing in front of his small TV have left. Wang Shun exhaled in relief—mainly because Bai Liu's gameplay is so intense, the kind that keeps you on the edge of your seat. The game's curiosity factor is definitely in the air.

A senior player from the Kabbalah guild (the fourth-ranked guild) commented to Bai Liu with a tearful smile, "What a hang-up, this guy's style of play still suits the [Comedy of Death] section. No wonder he supposedly fell into it the first time."

The green charm in the form of a growing branch in the hair of a Kabbalah guild member is easy to recognize. Wang Shun immediately noticed it, as the darker the branch in the hair, the higher the rank. The charm on the long hair of the audience member commenting on Bai Liu was close to dark green, indicating he was likely a high-ranking member of the guild.

"Indeed, I rarely see such desperate players anymore," a spectator in a neat white uniform with a winged seven-stringed lyre embroidered in gold thread on his right chest said, nodding.

The spectator had a handsome, elegant mixed-race face with brilliant blonde hair worn back. His expression was somewhat indifferent, and Wang Shun recognized the uniform as belonging to the Golden Dawn Guild (the third-ranked guild).

This player wasn't familiar to Wang Shun, likely a new addition to the team this year, similar to Zhang Gui before his untimely death.

"But Bai Liu will also have a tough time dealing with this situation," the spectator added lazily. "He's walking a tightrope. One wrong move, and Miao Gaojiang will kill him."

The lazy-eyed spectator, dressed in rags like a beggar, was from the Heavenly Masons (the seventh-ranked guild), a peculiar guild. The founder was a rich beggar who had died in the game, and under his spiritual influence, the entire guild wore rags. The most frequent mention of this guild's players came from the [Report Wall] within the game, where many players reported them for having exhibitionist fetishes and dressing inappropriately.

The Masonic spectator who had just spoken was on the verge of being reported, but he didn't care. Instead, he tapped his finger on Bai Liu's small TV and said with amusement, "So it's true that newcomers have an aura. The small TV in this game is designed to avoid situations where newcomers have no points to use, which would result in a high mortality rate. It lets newcomers earn bounty points to buy props in time."

"The small TV bounty points earned by veteran players are transferred to the system wallet and only reach the player after the game ends, with a tax ranging from five to twenty percent depending on how many points were earned."

"A newcomer in a live game can judge whether they're operating correctly based on how many points they've earned. Veteran players don't have that benefit and must rely on their experience," the spectator continued, raising an eyebrow. "But in this stalemate, this aura of a newcomer is ineffective, since Bai Liu doesn't earn too many bounties."

"And once a newcomer realizes they've made a mistake and their bounty points drop significantly, many will lose their focus and end up in a dead end." The viewer watched Bai Liu on the small TV with rapt attention. "What will you do, Bai Liu? How will you, a poor, penniless fellow, take the next step?"

He pondered aloud, "Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi are waiting for you at the hospital door to explain [the cure]. They're saying they'll kill you if you don't. Miao Gaojiang isn't a player who tolerates instability around him. Will you honestly explain your hard-won quest clues?"

Bai Liu's eyes drooped in the small TV as he hurried down the hospital's long corridor toward the meeting with the investors.

Apart from Bai Liu and the other players, there were other [investors] observing the ceremony. However, all [investors] looked the same, and if you didn't take the initiative to say hello, you wouldn't recognize anyone standing at the hospital entrance.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, however, were easy to recognize. Miao Feichi liked to play with his two hogweed knives, and Miao Gaojiang usually stood next to him.

Bai Liu, pretending to be Muke, approached and greeted them respectfully. Upon seeing him, Miao Gaojiang immediately brought up the matter of the [Life Extension Remedy].

This was something Bai Liu couldn't hide from Miao Gaojiang. There was no way to lie, as the system would only unlock the main quest if these two players received the correct [Life Extension Remedy]. Otherwise, the system wouldn't respond. Bai Liu and Miao Gaojiang locked eyes—Miao Gaojiang looked at him critically, and Bai Liu needed to prove his worth in front of him.

Bai Liu handed Miao Gaojiang the pages he had torn out, but there were a few confusing pieces of information mixed in.

After scanning through the ten lines quickly, Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi paused. The system panel unlocked the main quest, and Miao Gaojiang's face softened for a moment: "It is indeed a [Life Extension Remedy]."

However, even with the confusing information, Miao Gaojiang quickly pieced together the entire [Life-Sustaining Remedy]. His face darkened considerably. "But asking us to kill children to get blood? If we do that, we'll lose half of our life points."

"Old secondary gameplay," Miao Feichi said dismissively, pulling out his ears with his pinky. "It's just forced consumption of half of a player's total life. I don't like that little brat of mine either—he's a pain and useless. He was staring at me earlier like he wanted to eat my flesh. It's disgusting, so let's get rid of him."

"And that little Bai Liu," Miao Feichi added, rubbing his fists and licking his lips, clearly salivating. "This game is designed to kill kids. I like killing kids and eating their flesh. After the blood's drawn, I can eat the skin. No waste. Just right."

"But it's best not to do it today." Miao Gaojiang warned Miao Feichi. "You still have at least a day before your stamina slots restore, and if you act today, you'll mess up the skill badly."

"Tch." Miao Feichi gave Miao Gaojiang a sidelong glance. "I know. But even if the monsters here are A+, there's no need to be this nervous. How many times have we played all three levels of the game?"

Miao Gaojiang gave a few words of gentle advice: "Better to be careful."

Miao Gaojiang was too cautious to act unless he was 80 or 90 percent sure. The items he received from Bai Liu included points. He had used the same cloth item that Du Sanying had used in the previous game: [Fabric of Disguise].

This fabric, according to the system, was explained as [False Reality]. It existed but was untouchable. The item wrapped in it wasn't considered to be directly owned by the player, which meant Bai Liu's trade skill wasn't valid because the other player didn't technically "own" the trade item.

Miao Gaojiang deliberately avoided Bai Liu speaking to him in imperative sentences. He was very cautious, nudging any questioning tone from Bai Liu back without a word.

Bai Liu now understood the meaning of Miao Gaojiang's popular poll logo: "A heart as fine as dust, a heart as deep as a city."

Miao Gaojiang was indeed a difficult opponent to deal with. His observations were so meticulous that even though Bai Liu had the upper hand now, he couldn't find any holes for Miao Gaojiang to exploit.

After a few failed attempts, Bai Liu had to pretend to keep quiet under Miao Gaojiang's increasingly suspicious gaze.

We'll just have to think of something else.

When it was nearly ten o'clock, the director of the orphanage, who had led the investors yesterday, appeared again. He guided them across the orphanage to witness the baptism.

They followed the same path they had taken the day before, passing the back of the classroom building where Bai Liu had logged in. From there, they could see a church of considerable size and fine construction—a building that, in reality, had not existed after several financial downsizings.

The church was a typical one, with a spire made of pure white marble and a base carved with runes that Bai Liu couldn't quite understand. After a few glances, he realized that the runes weren't from the New Testament or the Old Testament. They were strange, twisted hieroglyphics, belonging to no language Bai Liu knew.

The tallest part of the church was adorned with life-size angels in niches. Their faces were so lifelike it was as if they were sculpted from the features of real people. Their eyes were large, almost as if they might roll off their faces any moment, their faces marred by cracks from peeling paint.

But despite the eerie vibe, the rest of the church appeared so new that the sculptures hadn't yet aged to this extent.

Bai Liu shifted his gaze away, following the other investors into the church.

Inside, the church was spacious, its high, wide ceilings echoing with the sound of footsteps across the floor. Light streamed in through the high windows on either side, illuminating the pale faces of the terminally ill, who sat facing an altar with a one-meter-high cross. It was an ordinary church setup, but Bai Liu squinted, sensing something was wrong.

Although Bai Liu had seen countless depictions of the crucifixion of Jesus in horror games, this was clearly different. The cross was inverted, and instead of a statue of Jesus, there was the statue of a youth.

The boy on the inverted cross looked a little older than Bai Liu, his eyes closed, his hands and feet bound with thorns. The wooden cross had thorns twisting through his ankles, neck, and around his face. Bai Liu could almost see the shadows of his long eyelashes falling across his thorn-scarred face. But this was just a plain white statue, not meticulously carved.

Despite the lack of fine detail, the sculpture still had an undeniable beauty. The boy's limbs were fluid and graceful, his face surprisingly proportionate as he lay among the thorny branches growing out from the cross. His face was slightly tilted, nestled into his bound arms, as light from the side window bathed his serene sleeping face with a holy glow in the dimly lit church.

He looked like a sleeping god.

The Mother Superior stood in front of the statue, blocking Bai Liu's view, and addressed the patients who had taken their seats. "We are here today to welcome the newborn. But baptism is only the beginning. Killing children is forbidden in the church. Please, investors, wait until you are truly sure that the child you choose can bring you new life. Only then can you take them."

"Not all children can bring you new life," the Mother Superior continued, gazing deeply at the seated investors. She raised her arms dramatically and shouted, "It takes a child of pure blood to bring you new life!"

The investors stirred, murmuring excitedly, "A brand new life!"

Bai Liu sat in the back row, next to Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang. When he heard this, Miao Feichi leaned toward Miao Gaojiang and complained, "Why does this game have a safe house for children? It's so inconvenient."

"Normal," Miao Gaojiang responded thoughtfully. "After all, it's a level 2 game. It can't always be that easy to get through."

"But I think the key to this game is still to catch that child of yours. The blood purity should mean something—like being of the same bloodline as us. Only one child who meets the conditions can serve as the main blood inducer, the one who will provide us with the blood we want."

Miao Gaojiang paused briefly, then added, "But based on the usual trends of secondary games, I think one child's blood won't be enough to save a player. To ensure safety, we'll need a few more. One player should get two children—it should be about right."

As Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang continued to discuss how to deal with the children, they showed no hesitation in labeling them as enemies after learning about the [Life Extension Remedy]. They were now debating how to extract blood from the infants, with Miao Feichi joking about buying an oversized juicer in the system to squeeze their blood.

Bai Liu listened silently from the back.

He wasn't surprised that the investors couldn't take a child just yet. According to his understanding of baptisms, children before baptism were considered sinful and impure—most likely incapable of being used.

If it had been possible to attack the children directly today, with Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang—two high-risk players—attending the baptism, and the children being completely defenseless, Bai Liu would have tried to get little Bai Liu to escape with the others earlier this morning.

Soon, the Dean led all the investors in a few prayers before ushering a group of children dressed in wide white robes down to the room. Their bare feet and ankles were visible as they entered.

A ripple of excitement passed through the investors. Their faces lit up with avid greed as they surveyed the children—their potential new life.

This, Bai Liu realized, was their rebirth.

Even Miao Feichi, who had been slouched back in his chair, sat up straighter, his head stretched out to survey the children. His gaze was as if he were a juicer eyeing the fruit about to be processed, full of cruel excitement and greed. He twitched his nose twice, his expression slightly intoxicated.

"These little brats smell so delicious." Miao Feichi looked like an animal about to devour its prey. He kept licking his lips and stared deadpan at little Bai Liu, walking in line with the other children. "That little Bai Liu, so tender... I haven't eaten a baby in one go for a long time. He might be able to do."

Little Bai Liu, wearing a wide white robe that trailed to his ankles, stood at the end of the line of children, holding a flickering candle in his hands. The light from the candle danced across his calm face as he walked barefoot and took his place on the dais under the guidance of the dean.

The children stood in a row on the platform, all holding and pulling together under the dean's direction. Little Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes and saw many identical investor faces staring up at him from below. Their thin, pale faces twisted into eerie smiles, examining the children. As the candles flickered in their hands, the faces seemed to distort and stretch in the heat, their mouths wide open, ready to lunge at them.

Little Muke, standing next to little Bai Liu, peeked up briefly before lowering his head in fear. Meanwhile, little Bai Liu continued to look at everyone below him, his gaze finally landing on Bai Liu without wavering. It was clear he had been searching for Bai Liu among the investors.

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow in mild surprise. How did this child recognize him when all the investors looked the same?

Someone brought in a bathtub—or something that resembled one. The altar, as the dean explained, was used to baptize the children. It was filled with water that bobbed and swirled, surrounded by a ring of what looked like dried, residual blood.

This bath was placed in front of the children.

The dean stood in front of them and raised her hand in a gesture that made all the children look up at her.

With a kind smile, she spoke, "All right, children, let's sing the hymn once and then start baptizing you one by one. Remember to add your name at the end."

The children's voices, clear yet uneven, echoed as they sang. The flames on the candles they held danced brightly in their innocent eyes.

"Born on Monday of our moon,
We were baptized on Tuesday, Fire Day,
We get married on Wednesday,
We get sick on Thursday (Obsidian),
We are sicker on Golden Obsidian (Friday),
We die on Saturday,
We were buried in the earth on Sunday (Sunday),
This is our life—this is the life of Bai Liu (each child's name)."

"Very good." After the strange hymn, the dean opened the register she held and began reading the names. "Next, each investor will baptize their chosen child. It’s simple: just dip your child into this pool of clear water. This water will wash away the germs they've brought from the outside world—sorry, not germs, I misspoke, it's sin. And water alone won't be enough to wash away their sins..."

The dean looked up, her eyes sweeping over all the children. The smile on her face turned grim and mean. "After washing them with water, you can take some of the children's blood to cleanse their sins. Then take the blood to the hospital for identification. If there are no other sins, you can come back on Wednesday to take—or rather, adopt—these children."

Bai Liu's eyes twitched slightly.

No wonder there was such a twisted ceremony of baptism here.

It turned out that the investors feared these children might carry some other virus, so they used this ritual to cleanse them both spiritually and physically. The blood would also be tested to ensure there were no infections or diseases present.

These investors were quite sophisticated. They despised the children from the outside world on both a spiritual and physical level, so they set up this gruesome baptism to screen the children's blood quality.

It was like a pre-match test. On Wednesday, they would be able to officially begin taking the children away.

The Loving Welfare Home

Wednesday's song represents [marriage], and marriage symbolizes another level of [one-to-one] matching.

The frenzied-looking investors approached one by one, dipping the trembling children into the water before fishing them out again. Afterward, someone would step forward to draw their blood, collecting it in transfusion bags. The investors would then step down, smiling in satisfaction as they cradled their blood-filled bags.

Soon, it was Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's turn.

Little Miao Feichi, who had been crying, was shoved impatiently into the water by Miao Feichi and then forcibly held down as his blood was drawn. His face turned deathly pale. Beside him, little Miao Gaojiang trembled violently, but unlike Feichi, he seemed to understand that resistance was futile. His eyes, filled with desperate sorrow, darted toward the investors before he hesitantly stretched out his arm for the blood draw.

As Miao Feichi stepped down, he weighed the bag of blood in his hand. "Almost 100ml. Damn, if I didn't have to take this to the hospital for testing, I'd be tempted to take a sip."

Miao Gaojiang, after observing the surroundings, came to a conclusion. "Each of these children corresponds to an investor. If we touch anyone else's kid, their investor will be left empty-handed, and these sick freaks will eventually waste away—turning into those monsters locked up in the ICU ward. There's a high probability that if we interfere, we'll end up being targeted by those very same monsters."

Miao Feichi frowned. "So we shouldn't mess with the NPC kids, huh? Getting aggro-locked by monsters is a pain in the ass, especially if they come after us for revenge later."

He tossed the blood bag from one hand to the other, eyes fixed on the liquid swirling inside. "Then we'll go after the players' kids instead. I'll take little Bai Six. You want the little blind one? Or should we leave Muke's kid out of this?"

Turning his head, Miao Feichi cast a casual glance at Bai Liu, who sat silently behind them, before grinning. "Since Muke was nice enough to tell us the recipe, we'll leave your kid alone. But if you need more than one child's blood to pass the level, that's on you. Little Bai Six and the blind kid are ours."

Miao Gaojiang, feigning kindness, patted Bai Liu on the shoulder. "There's another option. You could try sending Muke's kid out of the orphanage alone. As long as he doesn't get caught by any monsters and survives long enough to complete the main quest, you'll clear the level too."

Although Miao Gaojiang spoke as if offering a reassuring alternative, it was clear neither he nor Miao Feichi believed it was a viable plan.

They had never intended to rely on the children in the first place—the odds of them successfully escaping were laughably low. This was a Level 2 game. Even experienced A-rank players would struggle to flee from A+ ranked monsters, let alone a bunch of clueless, powerless children.

The probability of success was nearly zero.

Bai Liu bowed his head, his shoulders trembling as if in fear. "I'll try."

Miao Feichi scoffed at his reaction, snorting in disdain before turning his attention back to the blood bag in his hands.

The moment their backs were turned, Bai Liu's expression returned to normal—calm and composed.

Having children as the subject of the game was a highly risky approach. But after calculating his options, this was the most cost-effective and least dangerous way for him to clear the level.

The stakes were already high enough.

"Investors of Muke, please come forward to christen your child." The dean's voice rang out.

Bai Liu lifted his gaze. Across the flickering candlelight, little Bai Six—dressed in pure white—stared back at him, expressionless. Their eye contact was brief before Bai Six looked away, seemingly uncomfortable with being watched.

Bai Liu's lips curved into a lazy, knowing smile.

—At fourteen, one of the things he was best at was escaping from orphanages.

Now playing the role of Muke's investor, Bai Liu stepped forward as the dean guided him.

Little Muke swallowed nervously, glancing up at Bai Liu as he handed over his candle. He then opened his arms, body trembling slightly.

He was scared.

So terrified, in fact, that he couldn't even tell this wasn't his actual investor—after all, they all looked the same.

Following the dean's instructions, Bai Liu slid his hands under Muke's knees and lifted him into his arms.

Little Muke clung to Bai Liu's neck, his fear evident in the way he shivered and the tight grip of his tiny fingers. His feet dangled in the air, shaking violently, his face drained of color.

As Bai Liu lowered him into the water, Muke squeezed his eyes shut, fists clenched tight. Bubbles floated up from his face as he struggled to hold his breath, his warm tears blending into the icy liquid. It felt as if the warmth of his body was dissolving into the cold abyss.

Am I going to die? ...Muke thought, dazed.

It felt like... his heart was still beating...

After several long seconds, Bai Liu pulled him out.

Soaking wet, little Muke gasped for air, his lips tinged blue. He instinctively clung to Bai Liu's neck, his tiny body shuddering as he coughed up water.

The man in charge of drawing blood approached, rolling up his sleeve and revealing the sharp tip of a needle.

Muke's eyes widened in terror. He shook his head frantically, struggling to escape. Desperate, he nearly clambered up Bai Liu's shoulders, trying to get away as Bai Liu gripped his ankles to keep him in place.

Bai Liu looked down at the child, whose tear-filled eyes were begging him for mercy.

"Be still," Bai Liu ordered calmly. Then, without looking away, he addressed the man drawing blood. "Don't take any."

Both the man and little Muke froze in shock.

The dean tilted her head. “Investor, are you certain? If you choose not to take this child’s blood, we will not be responsible for any illness he may carry. If he infects you, that will be your own liability.”

Bai Liu’s expression remained unchanged. “Whatever’s in his blood doesn’t matter.” He glanced up at the dean, his tone indifferent. “There’s no need for screening—I’m sure this is the child I’m taking. If he has a disease, I’ll deal with the consequences myself.”

A wet little Muke curled up in Bai Liu's arms, staring blankly at him with water dripping from the ends of his hair.

Bai Liu looked down at little Muke for a moment, then put the child down, whispering in his ear, "Follow little Bai Six and get out of here. I won’t take your blood." He patted little Muke’s shoulder as if nothing had happened, then turned and walked back to his original position.

Little Muke numbly took his candle back from the dean and stood next to little Bai Six in the queue.

Quickly reacting, little Muke leaned in close to little Bai Six and whispered, his voice low and slightly agitated, "Little Bai Six, he's your investor, isn't he? He really didn’t want my blood, just like you said!"

"I told you," little Bai Six replied with a bemused look. "He’s a 'doesn't want to die to save us' kind of strange investor."

But soon, little Muke turned to little Bai Six in horror. "But he’s your investor—why is he baptizing me? What will you do if he baptizes me?"

"The next person to be baptized, little Bai Six. Will the investors of little Bai Six please come forward and baptize him?" The dean's voice echoed through the hall.

Little Bai Six obediently bowed his head and stepped out of line.

The dean called out two or three times, but no one answered from below. Suddenly, someone chuckled mockingly and stood up slowly. "Dean, the investor of little Bai Six has unfortunately passed away. Why don’t I baptize him instead?"

The speaker was Miao Feichi.

"No, Mr. Investor, you have already baptized a child," the dean said, shaking his head in refusal. Miao Feichi looked at little Bai Six for a moment, licked his lips, then sat down again with some regret.

The dean walked up to little Bai Six, eyeing him like an unsold commodity, though his words dripped with feigned compassion. "What a poor investor, what a poor child. You have been abandoned. Of course, the very fact that you came to this institution means that you were already abandoned by your parents. But now, even the only investor who could have given you a future—the one who was willing to take you away—has forsaken you on the eve of your baptism."

Little Bai Six stood silently with his head bowed as the dean scolded him. His dark eyes flickered toward the candle in his hands, the firelight reflecting sharply on his otherwise expressionless face.

"You are a child forsaken by the gods," the dean sighed, long and pretentious. "The sin within you is immeasurable, so the gods have chosen to let everyone abandon you. Do you know what you have done wrong, little Bai Six?"

"I don’t think I do, Dean," little Bai Six answered calmly.

The Mother Superior’s cold, grim gaze bore into him, her tone laced with righteous condemnation. "My son, your sin is that no one is willing to help you cleanse the stain of your birth. You must be baptized alone. You must be punished. You will remain in this water for a long time to wash away your sins."

Before little Bai Six could move, the dean had already taken the candle from his hands. Gripping his shoulders, she pressed him down onto the altar, gazing down at his expressionless face.

With one hand holding the candle aloft, she placed the other firmly on his head, fingers tightening in his hair before shoving him toward the water. "You need to be cleansed, my child."

The instinctive panic of choking and suffocation made him grab at the sides of the baptismal font, but soon, little Bai Six had no choice but to let go, sinking completely to the bottom.

The dean, still gripping his hair, smiled gently as she held up the burning candle. She lowered her gaze to look at little Bai Six beneath the water’s rippling surface. "You are not allowed to leave the baptismal font until this candle has burned out, little Bai Six."

The candle's flame flickered twice, casting eerie shadows. Hot wax dripped onto little Bai Six's hands as he gripped the edges of the pool. The sharp sting made him instinctively loosen his grip on the already slippery altar.

Through the distorted water, little Bai Six saw the dean's gentle, smiling face above him. But in his vision, warped by the liquid, her features twisted into something grotesque and monstrous.

The white wax droplets solidified instantly upon hitting the water, forming eerie floating masses that resembled peeled fingernails. His hair was still tightly held in the dean's grasp, forcing his head back as his chest rose and fell in a desperate attempt to breathe. He looked small, fragile—like a defenseless little creature.

Only his eyes remained eerily calm.

Calm, as if he had expected this all along.

When little Bai Six was running out of oxygen, he would seize the opportunity to push himself up to the surface of the wax with all his might, gasping for air—only to be forced back down again by the dean. He struggled desperately, over and over, each time barely managing a breath before being submerged again, as if he were about to drown in a baptismal pool. The suffocating sensation of drowning, the frantic struggle to stay afloat—it was overwhelming.

Miao Feichi watched with undisguised pleasure, craning his neck to get a better look at little Bai Six's pained expression beneath the water.

Miao Gaojiang, on the other hand, was visibly uncomfortable. He had never been fond of scenes involving child torture—it reminded him too much of the child Miao Feichi had once kidnapped. His expression darkened, and he turned his head slightly, avoiding the sight with a furrowed brow.

Bai Liu stood below, watching quietly. His gaze was distant, strangely calm, as if the scene before him had nothing to do with him.

As if the boy struggling to breathe wasn't his fourteen-year-old self. As if this wasn't his only bargaining chip for survival in this game.

Memories long buried surfaced—of a waxed seahorse, of a younger version of himself struggling beneath the water.

Bai Liu had always hated water.

Because once, when he was fourteen, he had been punished just like little Bai Six.

Or at least, he thought he had. Bai Liu didn't remember much—humans tend to forget memories that make them uncomfortable. But he knew he had done something wrong. He had taken money from an adult and promised to do something in return, just like little Bai Six.

The other children at the orphanage quickly reported him. The dean had looked at him with horror and disgust, as if he had done something truly unforgivable. At the time, Bai Liu—then still called Bai Six—was already whispered about among the teachers and staff for his "unseemly" and bloody hobbies.

The way they looked at him said everything.

Ah, I knew it. You finally did something like this.

To be honest, Bai Liu had enjoyed that look of fear.

But the punishment came soon after.

Bai Liu squinted, struggling to recall the details—it was as if his head had been pushed into something. A container full of water? He couldn't quite remember. There had been shouting, accusations, screaming voices telling him never to do it again. He had nodded along, choking, gasping, obediently agreeing.

Of course, they hadn't let him go so easily.

They drowned him a little longer, just to be sure.

When they finally tired themselves out, they left, satisfied, as if they had "saved" a wayward child from becoming a murderer.

Beside him, also soaking wet and gasping for breath, lay Lu Yizhan.

Unlike Bai Liu, Lu Yizhan hadn't actually done anything wrong. But when the teacher interrogated the children, asking who was responsible, Lu Yizhan—without even knowing what had happened—had stepped forward and claimed responsibility.

He had willingly taken the blame for Bai Liu.

But the truth always comes out. The real culprit—the child who had reported Bai Liu—was actually the one who had committed the crime.

And so, in the end, Bai Liu and Lu Yizhan—the “accomplice” who had covered for him—were the ones who received the harshest punishment.

Lu Yizhan, of course, was a well-liked student, a “good boy.” If he had just walked away, he would have been spared the worst of it. But he refused to leave. He didn't resist, didn't protest, didn't even try to stop the teacher.

He just stayed.

Stayed and watched as Bai Liu was drowned again and again, coughing and choking on water.

Each time Bai Liu was forced under, Lu Yizhan buried his own head in the water alongside him, whispering anxiously, It’ll be over soon. Just hold on a little longer, Bai Liu. It’ll be over soon.

Bai Liu had looked up at him through the murky water, at the bubbles rising from Lu Yizhan’s mouth as he spoke. His expression was frantic, desperate.

And Bai Liu—laughed.

Even as he was drowning, he laughed.

He couldn’t hear a word Lu Yizhan was saying. He couldn’t understand where this idiot’s unfounded belief in him came from.

If he had the strength to speak, he would have told Lu Yizhan: You fool, I really did do something very, very bad.

But he had no strength left. He was drowning.

In the end, both of them survived.

Soaked and trembling, Lu Yizhan had stumbled to his feet and helped Bai Liu up.

Then, as if struck by sudden inspiration, Lu Yizhan had squatted down, looked Bai Liu straight in the eye, and asked, Do you want to change your name?

Tell them you’ve changed, that you won’t use the name Bai Six anymore, that you won’t do bad things again.

Maybe then, they won't punish you like this next time.

It was a ridiculous suggestion. Utterly useless.

But Lu Yizhan was always coming up with these strange ideas—like insisting on being Bai Liu's friend, too.

Bai Liu, half-dazed, had let himself be lifted by Lu Yizhan's arm. For a moment, he had simply stared at the soaked, wide-eyed idiot in front of him.

Then he had started laughing.

Loud, wet laughter, echoing through the damp room as he lay sprawled on the ground.

When he finally stopped coughing up water, Bai Liu had looked at Lu Yizhan's stunned face and said indifferently, Fine. If you want me to change it, I'll change my name.

And so, Bai Six became Bai Liu.

Back in the present, the baptism—no, the punishment—of little Bai Six finally ended.

The dean let him go.

Churches weren't allowed to kill children, after all. Bai Liu hadn't been worried. She was just punishing little Bai Six, a child no investor wanted—because baptism was part of the group's mission, and failure required consequences.

Little Bai Six lurched out of the water, coughing violently, clutching the pool's edge as he gasped for breath. He wiped his mouth with a trembling hand, staggered upright, and—just like that—he recovered.

The near-drowning left no trace on his face.

As if he was used to it.

Without hesitation, he took the melted candle from the yard's hand, bowed politely to the dean—the same woman who had just tried to drown him—and stepped back into line.

His soaked hair clung to his pale face, water dripping down his cheeks. His white robe, now heavy with moisture, clung to his thin frame.

He coughed quietly into his hand. His eyes were red.

He looked... almost pitiful.

Behind him, the statue of the inverted cross—previously serene—now bore a faint frown.

Its outstretched fingers twitched ever so slightly.

As if disturbed by little Bai Six's ragged, choking breaths, the thorns coiled around its body wound themselves tighter.

Chapter Notes

See the end of the chapter for notes

After the baptism of little Bai six, it was Liu Huai's turn to come forward and baptize Liu Jiayi.

Liu Huai was very gentle with Liu Jiayi's baptism, and Liu Huai didn't want to keep Liu Jiayi in the water for long, so she was soon out.

He finally dropped a cherished kiss on Liu Jiayi's forehead, declined the man's offer to take Liu Jiayi's blood, and silently returned to the investor's seat below amidst Liu Jiayi's somewhat confused expression.

Liu Huai was sitting far away from Bai Liu, at the back of the room. He didn't hear Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang talking about laying hands on Liu Jiayi, but he could probably guess what the two veteran players were doing, and Liu Huai looked at Bai Liu from a distance with a tense expression.

"That's all for today's baptism, please take a break and eat in the orphanage canteen." The director greeted them with a smile as if they were opening for business.

"In the afternoon our baptised children will offer you pure song - a choral performance to celebrate our encounter, to be performed in front of the church, from 3 pm to 7 pm, investors are invited to be there in time to hear the singing."

Bai Liu glanced down at the time, it was now eleven forty.

Muke's eyes snapped open as he lay on the straw bed. He quickly sat up and checked the time—it was 11:40. He had been asleep ever since Bai Liu left!

Grinding his teeth in frustration, Muke scolded himself. He felt like he was wasting precious time. Even with access to the file room, it wasn’t guaranteed that he’d remember everything in just half a day. There was no telling when Miao Feichi would return. The sooner he blended in and started memorizing files, the better.

Still, the effect of Bai Liu putting him to sleep was undeniable—his mental state had significantly improved.

After a morning of uninterrupted rest, Muke made his way down to the ground floor. Most of the patients and nurses were in the canteen now, eating their meals.

The ones who hadn't come out were the patients who had been given medication earlier in the morning. Their rooms were now locked. As Muke passed by, he could hear faint creaking noises and the soft, unsettling sound of chewing coming from inside.

It reminded him of the sound that monster patient had made that night, gorging himself on blood lingzhi.

Muke instinctively moved away from the doors, refocusing on his goal. He mentally mapped out the ground floor—he knew the case file room was located behind the nurses' duty room. He could only get inside when the duty room was empty, like now, or during shift changes.

After glancing around to ensure no one was watching, Muke took a deep breath and scurried into the file room—only to freeze the moment he stepped inside.

His breath caught.

"...Okay…" Muke stared at the dust-covered folders in dismay, his eyes widening. A sinking feeling settled in his stomach. "There's so much! Why are there even more than yesterday's books?!"

For the first time in a long while, he felt like a student cramming the night before an exam.

Slapping his cheeks to focus, Muke pulled out a file, flipped it open, and started memorizing.

"Name: Wang Guoqiang. Donated 1,700,000 to The Love Welfare Institute in 200X. The child he 'married' is…"

3:00 PM
At the front of the church, the children jostled in a messy pile while the investors sat on chairs arranged on the grass. The director handed each investor a program—every child in the orphanage was required to perform in groups, all in choral arrangements. Some groups would sing multiple songs, and at the end, there would be a group photo. That was why the entire event lasted a grueling four hours.

Bai Liu was no stranger to this kind of spectacle meant to impress investors. His orphanage did the same whenever officials came to visit, parading the children out to perform. The teachers drilled them to behave, to smile, to act as if they adored the visiting dignitaries. They sang from beginning to end because, as the teachers said, singing was better than talking.

There was nothing inherently wrong with this—it was a strategy to secure funding for the orphanage. But Bai Liu had never personally benefited from such efforts. To him, it felt like being a circus monkey, performing tricks without even the promise of payment.

Yet, he had never imagined a day when the roles would be reversed, when the children would be singing for him. It was... a novel experience.

Bai Liu flipped through the program resting on his lap: "Happy Day," performed by the newly baptized children.

Among them, little Bai Six stood at the back of the group, dressed in a fresh outfit. His face was painted with garish makeup, a red dot centered on his forehead. His hair was still damp from a recent wash, and he hummed carelessly along with the song, his gaze half-lidded with disinterest.

"Happy day, happy day, God saved me and made me joyful.
The blood of atonement cleanses my sins, the living water of life quenches my thirst.
Happy day, happy day, God saved me and made me joyful."

The meaning was obvious—this was a "happy day" for the investors, not for the children.

Bai Liu quickly lost interest. In front of him, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang were already dozing off, arms crossed. Miao Feichi still clutched his knife even in sleep, and Miao Gaojiang wasn't entirely unconscious—both veteran players maintained a basic level of alertness. But it was clear that the performance was long and tedious.

Only Liu Huai, sitting in the back row, remained completely focused. His eyes never left Liu Jiayi. He stared at her as if he was afraid to blink, as if each second was something he couldn't afford to lose.

Four hours.

To Miao Feichi, it was an unbearable eternity—he had already grumbled several times, asking if they could just start slaughtering kids already.

But for Liu Huai, four hours was too short. He gazed at Liu Jiayi, her small frame swaying gently as she sang, the red dot on her forehead standing out against her pale skin. His fingers clenched, and he suddenly lowered his head to wipe his eyes.

Then he looked up again. He didn't want to miss a single second.

But perhaps Liu Jiayi would never know how intently Liu Huai had watched her. She was still blind.

When little Bai Six's performance ended, there was a fifteen-minute break before the next act. Bai Liu got up and strolled toward the chapel behind the seating area. Miao Gaojiang, who had seemed asleep, opened his eyes instantly and narrowed them at Bai Liu.

"Where are you going? The show's barely started."

Bai Liu glanced at him lazily. "Just checking on my kid. See if I can teach him how to escape."

Miao Feichi snorted in amusement. "Hah. If you let him go, you're taking away someone's only chance of survival."

Miao Gaojiang hesitated for a few moments before ultimately letting Bai Liu pass. This was the front of the church—Bai Liu couldn't sneak off with any of the children they had marked. Not to mention, the church strictly forbade killing children within its premises. That was the only reason none of them had made a move yet.

Of course, the other reason was that Miao Feichi still hadn't fully recovered his stamina.

Bai Liu nodded at Miao Feichi and continued on his way. Miao Gaojiang watched his retreating figure with a heavy, unreadable gaze.

"I still feel like something's wrong with this Muke," he muttered.

Miao Feichi, slouching in his seat, groaned. "Dad, you're getting annoying. You checked his player panel, his system storage, even his damn phone. He's a low-ranked, average player. C-rank panel, only two games played. A complete rookie. If Bai Liu did control him, we could just kill him to break the influence."

Miao Gaojiang's brow furrowed. "That's not what bothers me. It's his broken keyboard."

Miao Feichi's expression sharpened slightly. "What about it?"

"I checked his system inventory twice," Miao Gaojiang said slowly. "Each time, the missing keycaps on his keyboard were different."

At this, Miao Feichi finally sat up properly.

Miao Gaojiang was meticulous—he always caught details others overlooked. And when he got suspicious about something, he was rarely wrong.

Miao Feichi considered his words carefully. "Are you saying someone's been using the keyboard to communicate with Muke? Do you remember which keys were missing?"

Miao Gaojiang scowled. "That's the problem. I'm not familiar enough with keyboard layouts. I only noticed that the arrangement changed, but I didn't memorize exactly which keycaps were missing."

"Normally, system inventories are only accessible to the player who owns them. Muke has been with us the entire time—it's not like he could've handed the keyboard to someone else. And if he were, why take such a risky approach to communicate?"

His tone darkened. "I think someone is sharing a system backpack with him. If there's a skill that allows that, then this method of communication would be both feasible and extremely covert."

Silence stretched between them for a moment.

There was only one player whose personal skills they hadn't fully figured out.

"You mean Bai Liu isn't actually dead?" Miao Feichi's voice was low, dangerous. His eyes narrowed. "And his skill isn't just personal control—it includes shared inventory access?"

"Muke was his pawn to infiltrate our side?"

"And he's been communicating with Bai Liu through that damn keyboard?"

Miao Gaojiang's voice was calm. "It's just a theory."

Miao Feichi's fingers twitched against the handle of his knife, but Miao Gaojiang warned him: "He's a C-rank player. You can kill him whenever you want. But don't be reckless—this is the support season. Killing a normal player who has surrendered to you won't do your reputation any favors. It'll affect your sponsorships.

"And more importantly—" Miao Gaojiang's expression turned grim.

"A skill that allows shared system access would fall under Rule Skills. That would mean breaking the game's system rights."

There were very few players in the game who had Rule Skills.

"I don't think Bai Liu has a Rule Skill," Miao Gaojiang admitted. "If he did, he wouldn't be playing so passively. If he had something that broken, he could have just locked us down like Queen of Hearts."

"But we can't rule it out entirely," he added. "After all, Bai Liu is a newcomer. Maybe he just doesn't know how to use it properly.

"We'll watch him for now."

His gaze turned toward the church where Bai Liu had entered.

"If he reveals himself, we'll kill him then."

When Bai Liu came backstage, little Muke and little Bai Six were sitting face to face, wiping their faces with tissues dipped in water.

However, little Bai Six simply swept him a glance and said softly, “This isn't the place to talk. Let's go somewhere else.”

Little Muke instantly realized that this was little Bai Six—the [investor] who had christened him. He nodded slightly, a bit awkward in his greeting, before little Bai Six took Bai Liu's hand and led him away.

Bai Liu leaned against the wall, looking down at little Bai Six, who was still persistently rubbing at the blush on his face.

Without a word, Bai Liu naturally took the damp tissue from little Bai Six's hand and knelt down, carefully wiping his face.

“You can't wipe it off like that.” Bai Liu used a fresh tissue, pressing it lightly but repeatedly against little Bai Six's brow. “If you rub like that, you'll just smear the lipstick all over your forehead."

Little Bai Six remained expressionless as Bai Liu held his shoulder and wiped his forehead. "You know how to use lipstick?" he asked dryly. "Do you use it often yourself?"

Bai Liu ignored the sarcasm in his tone. "I've been made up like this before—on an occasion similar to yours," he admitted. "Are you mad because I didn't christen you and you got punished by the Dean?"

"I'm not really mad." Little Bai Six pursed his lips, looking up at Bai Liu. "I just feel like I was played." He paused for a moment before raising his eyes fully. "But because of that, you'll have to give me—"

"—Okay, I know. Extra money, right? Whatever you want." Bai Liu leaned in, close enough to wipe the careless smudge of red lipstick at the corner of little Bai Six's eyes.

Bai Liu's breath fanned steadily over little Bai Six's skin, his lowered gaze giving the illusion of someone utterly absorbed in a moment of tenderness. "Don't move. There's still a bit here." His voice was light, teasing. "You're really not mad at the Dean for what he said? About you being abandoned by parents, by the gods... and by me, the investor?"

Little Bai Six held his breath for a few seconds.

Then, quickly, he looked away and answered in a calm tone, "I'm not angry. After all, the Dean wasn't wrong in a way."

"True." Bai Liu finished wiping and straightened up, looking down at little Bai Six from above. His investor's body was so slender that, from this angle, it almost felt like he was looking down from a great height. "The gods haven't favored you because you're a bad boy who never believed in them."

Little Bai Six met his gaze, his expression calm, but the words [So what?] were written plainly in his eyes.

Yes, he had been born a bad boy. He didn't believe in gods. So what?

"So do I," Bai Liu murmured, chuckling softly.

Casually, as if it meant nothing, he ruffled little Bai Six's hair, his tone light and almost joking. "Do you want to change your name? Maybe then the gods will finally favor you. I had slightly better luck after changing mine—though, of course, it was still bad."

Little Bai Six scoffed, expressionless. "If gods decide human fate based on names, then they're stupid."

Bai Liu untied a pendant from around his neck—a coin wrapped in broken fish scales, cradled in a bandage. He leaned over and carefully hung the coin around little Bai Six's neck. "This is everything I own," Bai Liu said. "My skills, my money, everything I've gathered by selling my soul, so to speak. It's the most expensive and precious thing I could ever give."

"Now I'm giving it to you." Bai Liu's voice was light, almost casual. "From now on, you are me. You have my skills, my money. And—I'm sorry for leaving you alone to be baptized."

[System Warning: Is player Bai Liu handing over the system to his secondary identity line? After the transfer, the player will no longer be able to use any skill points from the panel. Furthermore, with no doubt from the NPC characters in the game, the game survival rate will significantly decrease.]

Bai Liu: [OK]

Bai Liu closed his eyes and bent down, pulling little Bai Six into an embrace. His tall, slender body folded awkwardly, almost eerily, as if he were an old man curling protectively around something precious.

And he smiled.

"But I think, from now on... the gods might have taken a liking to you, just a little."

It wasn't some distant god wrapped in a reversed cross who favored little Bai Six. It was this strange investor who had appeared out of nowhere.

And if a god truly existed—then perhaps Bai Liu himself was one.

Little Bai Six remained in Bai Liu's arms. He opened his mouth as if to speak, but in the end, he said nothing. He simply accepted the hug in silence.

Even though he found physical contact a little disgusting.

But his Mr. Investor had paid him, so little Bai Six decided to put up with this somewhat disgusting Mr. Investor.

“This coin is important,” Bai Liu warned, pulling back. “You have to take good care of it.” His gaze sharpened slightly. “If you die, the coin will fall out, and someone else might pick it up. That would be a very scary thing.”

Bai Liu tapped the coin on little Bai Six’s chest with a long, thin finger. “Because my secrets—and my soul—are hidden inside.”

Little Bai Six’s grip tightened around the coin. Then, abruptly, he spoke. “Did you just ask me if I wanted to change my name?” His tone was casual. “I don’t accept drastic changes, but… in return for the money you so generously gave me, I’m willing to indulge your personal wickedness, Mr. Investor.”

[Lu Yizhan, I can change my name, but I don’t want it to be too different. Do you have any recommendations?]

Bai Liu’s eyes flickered, and he whispered, “How about Bai Liu?”

“Bai Liu?” Little Bai Six echoed, confused. “Which Bai? Which Liu? It sounds the same as if it hadn’t changed at all.”

Ten years ago, Lu Yizhan had looked at Bai Liu with a bright, unwavering gaze.

“How about Bai Liu?” he had asked.

Bai Liu had been bemused. “It sounds the same as before. What’s the point?”

Lu Yizhan had only smiled, as if he saw something Bai Liu couldn’t. “Because it’s Bai as in ‘daylight’ and Liu as in ‘willow.’ From now on, you will walk into the daylight. Bai Liu, you will have a better future.”

Bai Liu smiled.

Just like Lu Yizhan once had.

A smile full of inexplicable confidence, bright with something resembling innocence.

The sound of children singing floated in from the church, the summer breeze carrying the scent of wild grass. And in little Bai Six’s eyes, the strange, ghostly investor in front of him—tall, thin, eerie—was smiling.

And that smile was genuine. Almost like a prayer.

Softly, Bai Liu whispered, “Your name is Bai as in ‘daylight’ and Liu as in ‘willow.’”

Little Bai Six looked away after a brief silence. “Boring word games.”

“So, did you change it?” Bai Liu asked.

Little Bai Six nodded. “I changed it. You paid for it.”

“From now on, you are Bai Liu.” Bai Liu paused. “There’s a good chance my deception will be exposed, and I might die tonight at the hands of my opponents. You are my only hope. I’m entrusting everything to you.”

“You must survive, Bai Liu.”

Bai Liu knew well that he was up against two veteran players from the league.

Miao Feichi was impulsive, but Miao Gaojiang was cautious. That was why he had prepared the [triple paper cup].

But [paper cups] are only paper cups after all, and paper can't cover fire.

Muke can't remain in hiding given the large-scale player conflict that will arise in the future. However, once Muke appears, Bai Liu's previously prepared plan to swap identities with him will likely expose their collaboration and reveal a backroom connection.

Judging by the way Miao Gaojiang treated him today, it's clear he has already noticed something suspicious—like the keyboard in Muke's backpack.

Bai Liu had anticipated this when forming his plan. The exposure of Muke's panel was inevitable, meaning the communication props hidden in the system's backpack would eventually be discovered by Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang. That was precisely why Bai Liu chose to use the keyboard—a relatively unobtrusive and unintuitive method of communication.

By using a keycap to communicate with Muke, Bai Liu was already exploiting a gap in knowledge. Miao Gaojiang, despite being a highly intelligent middle-aged man, likely had limited familiarity with digital tools. However, that didn’t mean Miao Gaojiang was completely unaware.

He had inspected Muke's panel twice—both times noticing different gaps in the keycaps. These gaps occurred when one side was waiting for the other to respond, an unavoidable sign of two people sharing a prop exchange through the system's backpack.

Miao Gaojiang had most likely realized the keycaps were changing, but due to his lack of understanding, even with access to the keyboard, he couldn't fully decipher what Bai Liu and Muke were communicating about. This was one of the key reasons Bai Liu had chosen the keyboard as their method of communication.

It was now clear that Bai Liu had become an unstable factor in the impending conflict between Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang—a dangerous position to be in, especially in a level 2 game where lives were at stake.

Before things escalated further, Bai Liu knew he needed to hand over the most valuable thing he possessed to little Bai Six.

That is, the hollowed-out, broken coin-shaped game manager at the center of it all.

Bai Liu taught little Bai Six about the specifics of the game manager and how to use his personal skills. The child was initially confused but quickly caught on. He accepted the fact that his reality was a multiplayer game with surprising ease, without requiring much elaboration from Bai Liu. Soon, he was navigating the system shop on his own.

Before Bai Liu left, little Bai Six looked at him and asked, "You told me the exact process of those two games before so that I could get used to this so-called game manager quickly, didn’t you?"

"It's not even a game shared between friends." Little Bai Six’s face remained emotionless. "You're a liar, full of lies. Everything you say and do to me has a purpose, which makes it even harder for me to understand why you gave up taking blood from me and died for me."

"It’s simply not something you would do. And I certainly wouldn’t do something that stupid."

"Say it." Little Bai Six clutched the coin hanging from his chest, staring straight at Bai Liu. "What else do you need me to do for you? You've given me enough money—I can do a lot of things for you."

"I just want you to live." Bai Liu turned his head and smiled at him. "Nothing more, really."

As he stepped out from behind the church, he spotted Liu Huai, who was also rambling on about something to Liu Jiayi.

Liu Huai wanted to give everything to Liu Jiayi, just like Bai Liu had done. But Liu Jiayi couldn't see it, and it wouldn't be good for her to have so much.

Although Liu Huai didn't trust Bai Liu, he trusted his integrity when it came to transactions. With no other choice, he told Bai Liu: "If I die, I'll leave everything to you. You'll pass it on to my sister."

Liu Huai then transferred his assets to Liu Jiayi, and in return, she gave Bai Liu 400 points.

Bai Liu agreed.

Soon, it was time for a group photo at the choral performance. Little Bai Six, who had quickly removed his makeup, was caught by the teacher and had a large dot of lipstick pressed onto the center of his forehead for the photo. With his hair still damp from washing up, he stood in the back row, glancing slightly at the investors gathered at the front.

Bai Liu and several new investors stood at the forefront.

The director positioned the camera. "A group photo for the 200X Love Children's Home cultural performance."

With a click, little Bai Six—his gaze unfocused—was captured in the colorful photograph.

Bai Liu had always wondered how little Bai Six had managed to pick him out from the group of investors. But he never asked. If he had, little Bai Six might have simply pointed at the photo of Bai Liu and told him—

—Only you look at us without the implication of deprivation or greed.

You look at us calmly, as if you were once one of us.

"At the end of the choral performance, investors will receive a thank-you gift from the children they've sponsored." The dean raised a hand. "This was your task yesterday. Have you completed it?"

A sparse chorus of small voices rang out. "We did, Dean!"

The children lined up to hand out their homemade gifts to the investors.

Little Bai Six walked in silence, passing by Bai Liu without giving him anything—because his investor was dead. He neither had to, nor could, give anyone a gift.

But later, after church, Bai Liu asked him for the gift he had prepared. Little Bai Six was reluctant to hand it over, but Bai Liu shamelessly reminded him that he had paid for it. Eventually, the boy caved to the charm of money and begrudgingly handed over the gift.

It was two drawings.

One depicted a small fish placed in a glass jar.

The other showed a broken mirror burning amidst the wreckage of an exploding train.

They were exact depictions of the two game scenarios Bai Liu had described to him last night, signed with a simple [W] in the corner.

As Bai Liu looked down at the paintings, understanding dawned on him. He finally realized where the paintings he had once seen in the real world had come from—and why they had felt slightly… off.

His gaze drifted to little Bai Six, standing before him.

Since little Bai Six had never actually experienced those games, he could only rely on what he knew to imagine and depict the scenes Bai Liu had told him about.

And this orphanage… was the only world he knew.

So, he had used things from the orphanage to illustrate the grand, chaotic events Bai Liu had described. That was why the scenes had felt strange when Bai Liu first saw them. They were too narrow, too hostile, unlike his usual style.

That oddity came from little Bai Six—and his cognitive dissonance.

Bai Liu's eyes lingered on the boy, who still had a smudge of lipstick at the corner of his eye.

Little Bai Six quickly looked away. He didn't like being stared at.

Oh, right. Bai Liu remembered now. At that age, he hated being looked at directly.

But now, Bai Liu had long since grown used to staring people straight in the eye. It was a habit he had picked up from his work.

Little Bai Six was so different from him.

He was no longer the child trapped in a narrow orphanage, seeking sharp, saturated colors to make himself seen.

But once upon a time, he had been.

The chorus ended at 7:30 PM.

After the director sent all the investors back to the hospital, Miao Gaojiang bid a long and meaningful farewell to Bai Liu, who simply returned to Muke's room with an unconcerned "good night."

Muke's room was empty.

That guy was still down in the file management room. Bai Liu glanced at the clock.

He had allocated Muke a total of nine hours and fifteen minutes, from 12:00 PM to 9:15 PM. At Muke's fastest memory speed, he could recall between three hundred and five hundred cases before the nurses changed shifts—this estimate was based on the number of orphaned children Bai Liu had encountered in the real world.

An hour and a half remained.

By now, Muke should have contacted him via the keyboard, but—Bai Liu rubbed his bare neck—he had given the game manager to little Bai Six. That meant he couldn't reach Muke, nor could he go down to check on him or give him any instructions.

File Management Room
Muke covered his mouth as he rummaged through the dusty piles of files. The room was dark, devoid of any clocks, leaving him with no clear sense of time. The only way he could estimate it was by watching the nurses patrolling outside.

His nerves tensed when he saw a nurse heading towards the canteen—that meant it was dinner time.

By now, Miao Feichi and the others should have returned. Muke quickly opened his system backpack and was just about to type on the keyboard to ask Bai Liu when he saw it move.

[Enter]—this meant to proceed. They should already be back.

Muke hesitated before pressing [Backspace] and [?], forming a question: [Am I coming back now?]

Bai Liu's reply was quick: [End][?]

Muke reluctantly responded: [N][O].

There were more cases than he had expected. Even with his memory, the sheer number of irregular names was overwhelming—not to mention the detailed medical histories attached to each case.

He had to admit Bai Liu had planned well. Reviewing such complex information after a proper night's rest was far more efficient, yet even with that advantage, Muke still struggled to finish in one afternoon. The files were just too extensive.

Each patient had a detailed record of previous diagnoses and treatments at other hospitals. Their medical histories resembled small books, filled with reports from multiple doctors before they were deemed incurable.

Another message appeared from Bai Liu: [9][1][5].

Muke understood—he was to return at 9:15 PM, after the nurses' shift change.

But there was a problem: Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang had already returned. If Muke left now, he might run into them.

He typed: [V][P][?]

Muke had only one [P] key on the keyboard, so he used the second half of "PVP" to ask about Player vs. Player encounters—essentially, what to do if he ran into Miao Feichi. He figured Bai Liu, a gamer, would understand.

This time, Bai Liu took longer to reply. Muke waited, confused, before finally receiving a cold response: [L][F][G].

Muke sucked in a sharp breath. It took him a moment to recall what it meant—LFG, an old gaming term for "Looking for Group."

Bai Liu was telling him not to panic or act hostile if he encountered Miao Feichi but to calmly act as if he was looking to join their team.

In other words, Muke was supposed to pretend to be Muke.

A strange way to put it, but he got the idea.

Still, Bai Liu had warned him the night before—Miao Gaojiang was likely to be suspicious of them today. Muke was not absolutely safe. However, they wouldn't attack immediately; Miao Feichi's stamina pool wouldn't fully recover until 9:15 PM.

Without their main attacker at full strength, Miao Gaojiang wouldn't make a move just yet.

Last night, Miao Feichi had burned through his stamina using his S-rank skill to break into the ICU. Because of that, he couldn't recover using potions today and was forced into a passive regeneration state.

That meant as long as Muke slipped out at exactly 9:15 PM, he would be safe.

Everything fit together perfectly.

Muke let out a long breath. Under Bai Liu's arrangement, every detail was calculated, every opportunity maximized.

He couldn't even tell when Bai Liu had started planning this.

Looking back, it felt like even Miao Feichi's rampage last night—where he burned through his stamina—had been part of Bai Liu's design.

Though, at the time, it had nearly gotten them both killed.

Yet, because of it, today was eerily peaceful. The children were safe. Muke was safe.

It was as if Bai Liu had orchestrated everything.

And yet… it never felt like part of a plan while they were living through it.

Everything was far too risky.

It was like watching a desperate gambler place one final, all-in bet.

If Miao Feichi had succeeded last night, both Bai Liu and Muke would have been instantly wiped out. An S-rank attack could erase half their life points in one hit.

But Bai Liu had won the bet.

And now, they had Christmas Eve.

At 9:10 PM, the keyboard moved again.

[G][O].

The signal to leave.

Muke took a deep breath, glancing over the case files one last time before peeking out into the hallway.

The nurse's duty room light was on, but the corridor was empty. The patients had already been locked in their rooms. Muke exhaled slowly, pushing the door open and stepping out cautiously.

The hallway was shrouded in a dense, damp mist from the humidifier, making the air feel sticky and eerie. The only light came from the dull yellow glow of the nurse's station.

In the silence, all Muke could hear was the faint scuff of his feet on the floor—and something else.

A soft, creeping sound.

Like time-lapse footage of a plant growing at thirty-two times speed.

Red fluorescence flickered beneath the doors of several wards. The same glow he had seen on the blood primrose mushrooms last night—mushrooms that released spores when they matured.

A strong, coppery scent filled the air.

Muke quickened his pace. He avoided the stairwell—last night, there had been too many deformed children there. The safer option was the elevator.

He pressed [7] and stepped inside.

The doors closed agonizingly slowly.

At the end of the corridor, the ICU door creaked open.

A figure crawled out.

No—not crawled. It was too long, its limbs grotesquely bent. It sniffed at the air, head tilted, searching for the scent of blood.

[System Warning: Player Muke, 6 life points remaining. Two monsters have detected you. Evacuate immediately.]

Muke’s breath hitched.

Two? But there was only one patient in sight. Where was the second—

A cold dread washed over him.

Someone was pressing the "Open" button from outside.

Slowly, he turned his head.

A child, covered in syringes, knelt at the side of the elevator. Its fingers were broken, neatly severed at the joints. It tilted its head back and grinned.

"Don't go up. Go down. Someone's waiting for you up there."

Muke nearly collapsed in terror.

But finally, at the last moment, the elevator doors shut, and the lift began to rise.

The time: 9:14 PM.

One more minute.

Then the elevator stopped.

The doors slid open on the fifth floor.

Miao Feichi crouched outside, twirling a knife between his fingers.

"Good evening, Muke. Out late, aren’t you? Were you visiting Bai Liu?"

The elevator clock flicked: 9:15:00.

Miao Feichi’s grin widened. "Oh? Looks like my stamina just came back."

With that, he drew his twin knives against Muke's chin, and with a twist of his wrist forcing Muke's head up, Miao Feichi leaned down to look at Muke, who had been gagging in fear, and spoke in a brisk tone, "I thought you said this was a straw hog knife? But this knife of mine hasn't fucked an animal as dirty as a pig, but if you don't tell us the truth."

"I'll fuck you with this knife through your rectum." Miao Feichi smirked as she pulled the twin knives from her sides and clicked them on the sides of Muke's body.

Muke shuddered at the reflection of the snow on the back of the knife and tried to stomp back towards the lift, but Miao Gaojiang was standing behind Muke at some point, looking down at him expressionlessly.

There was no way back for him.

Chapter End Notes

This chapter was sooooo long. Why???

The Loving Welfare Home

Muke was dragged down from the lift on the fifth floor by Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang and pulled into Miao Feichi's room, where the door slammed shut with a swift kick from Miao Feichi.

Outside, the nurse began her rounds, the clattering of her high heels echoing clearly through the quiet of the late night.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang stood on either side of Muke, who was shivering in fear, guarding the door and preventing his escape.

Miao Feichi knelt down and looked at Muke, who was kneeling on the floor. He stuck out his long tongue and licked his dry lips. "Alright, it's interrogation time. Tell us where Bai Liu is."

Muke gritted his teeth, his shoulders shaking violently, but he kept his head down, refusing to speak.

Impatient, Miao Feichi grabbed Muke's jaw, squeezing hard to tilt his head up. "I'm asking again. Don't think I can't torture you just because you only have 6 life points. I have ways of pushing you to the brink of death, making you suffer, or you could just open your system panel and let's see what you're exchanging on that keyboard."

Muke's jaw creaked painfully as his TMJs dislocated. His mouth was sore and aching, tears brimming in his eyes as he stammered, his words slurred. "I don't know what you're talking about..."

Miao Gaojiang crouched beside him, his expression overly sympathetic, almost like a greasy middle-aged man trying to convince young people to drink more at a bar. "Muke, if you were a normal, honest player, we wouldn't even want to touch you. As long as you were cooperative, we'd leave you be. But if you keep this up, if you refuse to open your panel for us to look at, then we have no choice."

Muke's breathing was heavy, but he remained silent.

Miao Gaojiang sighed and stood up, nudging Miao Feichi with his index finger. "Forget it. He's probably under Bai Liu's control. We won't get anything from him."

Miao Feichi shrugged, his tone flat. "Kill him. His keyboard will fall out of his backpack. Even if we can't read it, at least Bai Liu will have one less character to use."

What should he do? Muke's heart raced. Bai Liu wanted him to cooperate with Miao Gaojiang, but doing so would mean betraying the keyboard Bai Liu used to communicate with him. The problem was, the others might not even be able to read the messages on it.

But resisting would only destroy the keyboard and drop it anyway.

"I'll show you." Muke lifted his head.

Struggling to control his trembling hands, he tapped on his system panel and selected the keyboard. He prayed mentally that Bai Liu wouldn't send him any new information at that moment, but as soon as the keyboard appeared, Muke shut his eyes.

Three keycaps were missing from the keyboard.

Miao Feichi leaned in, his interest piqued. "I can tell what this means. The missing keys are 9, 0, and 6—looks like a room number."

"This must be Bai Liu's ward number," Miao Gaojiang said, his smile shifting from fake to genuine. "Muke, is your master asking you to meet him?"

Miao Feichi tightened his grip on Muke's neck. "Reply to him that you're on your way."

Muke shook his hands, his mind in disarray, but he tried to keep his tone steady. "There's a nurse out there now. How are you going to get to the ninth floor?"

"We'll kill the children in the emergency staircase," Miao Feichi said with a grin, slapping Muke across the face with his twin knives. "Forgot? I've got my stamina back, and I move faster than the nurse."

Muke was forced to respond on the keyboard, and Bai Liu immediately replied.

Miao Feichi looked at Miao Gaojiang. "Do you want to kill him now?"

Miao Gaojiang thought for a moment before shaking his head. "Bai Liu's a highly intelligent player with fast reactions. If Muke keeps using the keyboard to communicate, Bai Liu might grow suspicious. We can afford to wait. Muke's desperate enough to comply."

They dragged Muke quickly out of the ward as the nurse went to patrol another floor, taking the safe passage to the ninth floor.

But the safe passage was filled with deformed children.

Muke watched in horror as Miao Feichi hacked down the children who had chased them around the hospital the previous night. His twin knives sliced through their bodies, their veins twisting with hunger and thirst, their cries echoing in the corridor.

Miao Feichi clicked his tongue in boredom as his knives flashed, severing a child's head with a sickening thud. The head rolled to Muke's feet, its wide, resentful eyes staring up at him, but no more cries escaped its gaping mouth.

It was a crushing force, and Muke's fear intensified. He recalled the terror he had felt the night before under Miao Feichi's ruthless assault, no longer certain if he had interpreted Bai Liu's instructions correctly.

Was Bai Liu really making himself obedient to Miao Feichi and the others? If this continued, Muke would be taken straight to the seventh floor.

Frantically, Muke prayed that Bai Liu wouldn't be in room 906.

Meanwhile, in the orphanage.

Little Bai Liu pressed his body down and hurried out to make the call, warily looking from side to side as he walked. "I pulled the keycap to 906 like you asked. Is this your ward number? Are you in 906 now?"

"Yes," Bai Liu replied. "Someone contacted you earlier with a keyboard. How did you reply?"

"Let him team up. In this situation, he's either going to drop his keyboard dead or alive to reveal his spy status. Might as well let him surrender first and linger." Little Bai Liu frowned. "But you and I both said those two were likely to come and attack you at night. I thought you had me dial in to 906 to make them run empty. Why are you in 906? Are they coming for you right away?"

"You don't need to worry about my side," Bai Liu said calmly. "I'm trolling them by making a game. You just make sure your side is fine."

"You did a good job earlier by having the opposite contact seek out the enemy and form a group. What about your side? Are you ready to escape the orphanage?"

Little Bai Liu glanced over at the deformed children wandering around the playground. He quickly looked for a place to hide from detection. After two days of chasing, he had gotten good at finding places to conceal himself. Bai Liu had told him earlier to escape with the kids tonight, because tomorrow was the [Wednesday] pairing day.

"There are deformed children wandering the playground between nine and twelve, and the teacher isn't completely asleep. If it were any other time, I wouldn't recommend running away. It would be easy to get caught by the deformed children and the teacher." Little Bai Liu spoke calmly into the phone. "But it's open day for the christening, and the orphanage doors are still open."

"After twelve, the orphanage doors will close, and flute-playing kids will come in during the early hours to take the rest of the children, so we have to run before twelve."

"But if we choose to run before twelve, avoiding the teachers and deformed children will be a problem, right?" Bai Liu asked after a moment of contemplation.

"Right." Little Bai Liu said coldly, "But running away gets harder the later it gets. There were five deformed kids tonight, and their numbers are increasing by two each night. Tonight, we're up against exactly the same number of deformed kids we have to escape from."

"If there were only three or fewer, I'd consider letting Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang lure the others, and then I'd run with Muke and Liu Jiayi. But tonight, there are five. That means we'll each have a deformed child chasing us, and letting Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang lure away three of them wouldn't do much good."

Bai Liu seemed intrigued. "You managed to get Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang to go with you so quickly?"

Little Bai Liu responded lightly, "It was easy to convince them."

"How did you convince them?" Bai Liu asked.

"I made a deal with them," Little Bai Liu said, his tone unhurried. "I told them I could take them out, but they needed to make a deal with me."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "You used my personal skills to buy their souls? You're quick on the uptake."

"No," Little Bai Liu retorted. "It's not that I pay for their souls. They pay me to look after them. They gave me twelve dollars and fifty cents and then entrusted me with their soul. I take them, and we escape."

"But for some reason, the Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang soul notes I got weren't quite what you said they would be." Little Bai Liu spoke with a mix of doubt and dissatisfaction, as though he had been cheated out of his money.

Clearly, this little friend had earned two souls and twelve dollars without even contributing a penny to the robbery.

Little Bai Liu frowned. "After trading with Miao Feichi, the coin's system indicated that I didn't have a full trade, just partial soul debt rights for the character. I couldn't use the other person's skills or system panel; I could only view their system panel."

"So, what can you do with the soul notes you get?" Bai Liu inquired.

"Nothing." Little Bai Liu said, a bit irritated. "The system states I need to collect all the souls and successfully trade with all of them at the same time, or part of the souls will die and return to the trading partner. Only then will this soul note have the effect of a full trade. But it's not all useless. I can use it to restrict Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's movements, which will make my escape tonight more manageable."

Bai Liu thought for a moment. The reason he had given the coin to Little Bai Liu was to see if he could get him to trade for the souls of Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang to control each other indirectly from the children's side.

But what he ended up with was really just a half-finished product—this soul note with only partial debt rights was like a torn half of a soul note. It seemed like something, but you couldn't use it to buy anything from the person you were trading with.

To get the other person's complete soul, either you had to have the soul sold to him at the same time as Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's original bodies—that's what the system calls a set of full souls. But that had zero possibility.

Miao Gaojiang wasn't a fool. Why would he do such a thing? The previous incident with Zhang Gui had made this guy wary. Though he hadn't figured out exactly how Bai Liu's skill worked, Miao Gaojiang had likely guessed that Bai Liu's ability was far more complex than it seemed.

Throughout the day, Miao Gaojiang hadn't taken anything from Bai Liu, nor had he agreed to any of Bai Liu's verbal traps. He had barely responded to Bai Liu's requests and only used active sentences to engage in conversation. This was a major flaw in Bai Liu's control skills, as it made it difficult for him to gain control or trade with his opponent when he was on the defensive.

There was, of course, a second possibility: to kill Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's original bodies and allow the souls to revert to the secondary identity line.

That possibility was even less than zero.

But not entirely impossible.

"Little Bai Liu, when you use this skill, don't forget what I warned you about," Bai Liu reminded him. "This trading skill is restricted for both parties. You promised to take Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang and lead them to escape. You have to do it, or you'll also—"

"—end up with half a soul note in an old wallet, right?" Little Bai Liu said calmly.

Bai Liu was quiet. He hadn't mentioned his identity to him from the beginning, and the name they registered was just an investor. No one knew their real name. It seemed like the system intentionally kept the children from learning their true identity. They were more like a nebulous symbol for the child NPCs in the orphanages generated by the system.

It was probably hard for any child to think that these creepy, eerie-looking [investors] were their future selves.

But Bai Liu wasn't surprised that Little Bai Liu could guess who he was.

Little Bai Liu's voice had no ripple. "You should have guessed that when you gave me this coin, I would have figured it out based on the message in your coin. I'm a curious person, and when I see a message, I think. Now I finally understand why you're willing to die for me."

"I'm as much your secondary identity line as any other kid—half your soul, right? The future Bai Liu? Or the ever-anonymous Mr. Nice Investor?"

"I wonder what life has done to you to turn you this way," Little Bai Six said icily. "It makes me a bit disgusted."

"You've been lying to me from the beginning. You knew I liked money, you knew what type of person I would be curious about, you understood my motivations and psychological constructs, and you used that to constantly entice me to do things for you without question. And you deliberately let me know that I was your secondary identity, didn't you? To make sure I stayed in touch with you after my successful escape from the orphanage."

"You need to ensure that I don't betray you, that I continue to give you more money than you give me. And you know very well that money can't sustain a connection with me for long."

Little Bai Six's breathing came through the phone, which had a weak signal, sounding like a stuttering flow of water—ragged and hurried. "You're not talking now, you're waiting for me to calm down, aren't you?"

Bai Liu didn't respond. One hand held the phone while the other rested on his elbow. He leaned against the wall with a pale expression, silently waiting for Little Bai Six to calm down.

Little Bai Six, being a sensible child, took a couple of deep breaths. His breathing became more regular, and after a moment, he spoke again. "I have to admit, you really know yourself. It's true that I would never betray myself."

Having half the soul of a creepy investor who draws blood himself is an outrageous thing, and it only took fourteen-year-old Little Bai Six a few seconds to come to terms with it. He quickly moved on, focusing soberly.

"The two problems I escaped from tonight were the teacher and the deformed children, the sleeping quarters for the baptized children, the teacher who would do rounds, and the fact that we weren't allowed to stay out late. Also, Liu Jiayi, for some reason, knew the orphanage as if she had lived here before."

Bai Liu spoke in a slightly subtle tone, "She figured out the rules of the teacher's rounds and told me the teacher usually finishes her rounds of our bedroom at 9:15 and her bedroom at 9:30. After 9:30, we could leave the bedroom and escape. Liu Jiayi also gave us a rough escape route based on her familiarity with the orphanage."

Little Bai Six commented, "She was very resourceful in her planning. Although she was a little flustered when I first approached her about escaping, once she realized I was sent by her brother, Liu Jiayi started sending me useful information. It was more effective than both Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang combined, even though she's just a blind eight-year-old girl."

"If she wasn't blind and had a deformed child to worry about, I think she could have made her way out of the orphanage completely on her own tonight," Little Bai Six concluded.

Bai Liu remained silent, letting Little Bai Six continue. It was normal for Liu Jiayi to know the orphanage, as she had spent time there. Given the poisonous mushroom incident, it was clear Liu Jiayi was mentally and intellectually brilliant. Bai Liu wasn't worried that Liu Jiayi would hinder Little Bai Six's escape.

Little Bai Six continued, "But these wandering deformed children are indeed a big problem. However, after inspecting the props in the coin you gave me, I found one that could help."

Bai Liu and Little Bai Six spoke in unison, "[The Passenger's Blessing]."

This buff-type item was the main reason Bai Liu had given Little Bai Six the coin.

[Passenger's Blessing] - A bonus item obtained by collecting the Monster Book in the second scenario. The system explains the item: "The passengers are grateful for your efforts to save them from their painful fate. They have blessed you, and their spirits will watch over you, preventing any monsters from harming you as long as you sit in the transport seat."

However, the vehicle cannot be carried by the player themselves and must be inherent to the original scenario. It can only be used once in a game.

This item had not been dropped to Miao Feichi during Bai Liu's fake death. It had been left in the coin, the Game Manager, because it was a buff-type item. Its use wasn't attached to the entity but to the player, and it couldn't be dropped, so Miao Gaojiang didn't suspect it.

"We had one of those toy cars in the children's playground," Little Bai Six continued. "I think it's considered a vehicle in this scenario, but it's locked up at 6 PM by the teacher."

Little Bai Six remained calm, as if what he was about to do was not some nefarious scheme but just playing with toys. "Liu Jiayi said she could trick the teacher who has the key into coming alone, and then we can knock the teacher out, steal the key, and drive the toy car."

"But this toy car only seats four people," Bai Liu rubbed his chin thoughtfully. "Where else would one of you sit?"

Little Bai Six was eerily quiet for two seconds. "We're also going to steal a large walker for handicapped children and attach it to the toy car to let it run."

Bai Liu paused, delicately silent.

The toddler car was a small toy resembling a pair of crotch trousers on four wheels, propelled by two feet running underneath while the legs were crossed. The children were running around with abandon.

"Who are you going to put in this toddler car?" Bai Liu asked.

"Liu Jiayi is too dangerous to be in the back," Little Bai Six paused, mischief evident in his tone. "So... it would be more appropriate to put the shortest of us in it. And I'm not the shortest."

"Muke is the one."

Outside Bai Liu's ward, the sound of high heels clicking on the floor echoed. It was the nurse. But soon, new footsteps approached, signaling more than one person—Bai Liu's eyes darkened. The steady, fast-moving footsteps belonged to Miao Feichi and his team.

Miao Feichi had clearly caught up to the nurse's patrol timing to reach Bai Liu's door. This was the advantage of players moving faster than NPCs, allowing them to exploit gaps in NPC movement speeds without being chased to death, unlike Bai Liu last night.

"Ta-da-da." There was a knock on Bai Liu's door, followed by Muke's shaky voice. "I-I'm Muke. I'm here."

Bai Liu's eyes moved to the door, and he whispered into the phone,

"I'm hanging up."

"Wait," Little Bai Six paused before asking, "When do I call you again?"

Bai Liu replied carelessly, "After 9:30, I guess. You can call me anytime. Calls are still billed by the minute."

"If I'm still alive to take your call."

Little Bai Six was silent for a second. "From a monetary point of view, I want you alive, but considering the plan and who you are, I'd be in a lot of trouble with you alive. The most valuable thing you have is already in my possession, so from that perspective, I'd rather you be dead."

After saying this, Little Bai Six simply hung up the phone.

Bai Liu smiled indifferently as he put the phone behind his back. His hand holding the phone looked like a monkey's paw. Bai Liu's eyes dropped to the "monkey's paw" in his hand—he had manipulated it in the system interface when leaving the orphanage. This allowed him to use Mu Sicheng's skills even after giving the Game Manager to Little Bai Six.

But he could only use Mu Sicheng's skills.

He couldn't switch back to the other soul notes, and Little Bai Six couldn't manipulate Bai Liu's main identity panel. However, Bai Liu's Game Manager coin was bound to both his main and secondary identities, allowing Little Bai Six to see his survival status and receive alerts on Bai Liu's attributes panel to know if he was alive or dead.

Bai Liu had kept his Monkey Paw skill half-active since hearing the footsteps. His stamina slot had been depleted last night, so he couldn't use Mu Sicheng's skills before. He had to use Muke as bait to lure Miao Feichi to the ward and stall for time instead of confronting them head-on.

But—Bai Liu glanced at the clock on the wall—Miao Feichi wasn't the only player who had recovered their stamina slot by 9:15.

Miao Feichi wasn't the only player with a teammate to work with.

Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes and saw Liu Huai standing quietly behind the door, holding his breath.

Liu Huai, the assassin, was clutching his dagger in both hands, standing quietly in the shadows like a true killer, with the coldness and determination of a real assassin. After receiving a nod from Bai Liu, Liu Huai took a deep breath, leaped gently, and hung silently from the ceiling lamp.

Looking down at Bai Liu, Liu Huai's emotions were mixed. His gaze fell on the monkey's paw Bai Liu had already equipped. Liu Huai couldn't have imagined working with Mu Sicheng's skill like this after all this time.

This might be the last time [the thief and the assassin] worked together.

Liu Huai closed his eyes, his fingers brushing the doll Liu Jiayi had made for him, which looked like him but was crudely done. It was a gift from Liu Jiayi—her handmade doll.

Liu Jiayi loved dolls, even though she couldn't see them. She liked to touch and make them, perhaps to compensate for her inability to see the world. Despite how ugly the dolls were, Liu Jiayi cherished them.

Because of Liu Jiayi's love for dolls, Liu Huai had clumsily made a bear doll for her, though it turned out ugly—like the two siblings, they shared a similarity. The good part was that Liu Jiayi couldn't see how ugly the doll was, and she liked it.

Perhaps this was the last time Liu Huai would see Liu Jiayi's ugly brother dolls.

Liu Huai took a deep breath, gently pulling open the ward door with his hand.

The door creaked as it opened slowly. Before the figure standing outside could be fully seen, two twin swords suddenly cut through the air in an arc, followed by Muke's cry of alarm: "Bai Liu!"

The coin on his chest kept vibrating. Little Bai Six tapped the system panel on his chest and saw several prompts appear.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's main identity line stamina slot is restored. You can use a stamina restorer to recover stamina. Would you like to restore it?]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's main identity line stamina is fully restored.]

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu, main identity line—Do you want to use your personal skill (Thief Monkey Claw)?]

Little Bai Six took a deep breath and closed the system panel. He watched the teacher approaching his bedroom in the darkness. After a phone call with Bai Liu, he moved to step on the escape point, then crept back inside, pretending nothing had happened. He lay in bed, breathing evenly as if asleep.

After ensuring the teacher had finished her rounds, Little Bai Six, still pretending to sleep, quickly jumped out of bed. Miao Feichi, Miao Gaojiang, and Muke also leapt from their beds.

They exchanged a knowing glance as Little Bai Six reached the bedroom door. Quietly, they followed him into the unlit corridor.

The floor opposite Bai Six's bedroom was Liu Jiayi’s, and between the two buildings lay a small square, like a children's playground, where deformed children roamed.

The window of the women's toilet, situated across from them, and the back of the building leading down to the ground floor, provided a good route to avoid detection by the deformed children—this was a path Liu Jiayi had shared with them.

Bai Six moved swiftly, entering the women’s room with precision. He looked left and right, then quickly passed through, tumbling out of the ventilation window by the last cubicle. He landed on the grass. Behind the building was covered with thick bushes and tall grasses. Bai Six touched the wall and followed its edge toward the other building.

As they moved, they could still hear the faint, eerie laughter of a child from the building.

The laughter grew closer, transforming into a shadow following them. It felt as if something had tumbled out of the building and was now tailing them, playing a game of chase.

Muke, trailing at the back, turned back often at the sound of approaching laughter. His face turned pale with fear, sensing something was following them.

"Don’t look back," Little Bai Six said calmly when Muke turned again, unable to resist. "Something is following us, but it probably thinks we're playing a game. Keep going—don’t let it catch up."

The faces of the deformed children emerged in the ghostly moonlight, their mutilated or less-mutilated faces grinning wide with innocent, eerie smiles. They raised their hands, smeared with crimson mud from crawling through it, and chanted, almost rhythmically.

"Play! Play with me! Stay and play!"

Muke's heart nearly stopped from the terror. The group ran as fast as they could, finally making it through the window of the women’s room in the other building, just as the monstrous children were nearly upon them.

Miao Gaojiang, clearly distressed, fell to the ground with a pale face. He was the last to climb in and had one of his shoes ripped off by the deformed children who were chasing him. Meanwhile, the ones unable to squeeze through the window crowded around the small air vent in the women’s room.

Several bizarre, almost-human faces pressed against the vent, their white forms lit by the moonlight. A few pairs of large, lifeless eyes stared at Bai Six and the others, still reaching and mumbling.

"I want to play! You’re going to play with me! Come out!"

Bai Six handed the shoes he had grabbed back to Miao Gaojiang with a cool glance at the deformed children. "They can’t get in for now. Put them on so you can run faster later."

Miao Gaojiang took the shoes with a complicated expression, muttering a thank you. Bai Six gave a dispassionate nod and turned to exit the women’s room. They had finally reached the building where Liu Jiayi's bedroom was located.

As they made their way down the corridor toward Liu Jiayi’s room, they overheard her whispering to one of the teachers, pretending to be sick.

"Teacher, I don't feel well," Liu Jiayi's voice was weak and convincing, a slight cough making it sound realistic. Being a [commodity] to be collected tomorrow, being sick on the first night was not ideal for the teacher at this orphanage.

After asking Liu Jiayi repeatedly about her symptoms, the teacher was growing more impatient. But after hearing two cat-like cries outside from Bai Six, Liu Jiayi finally said, "Okay, let's go to the doctor." The teacher turned, exposing her back to the waiting Little Bai Six and the others.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, two of the more physically capable children, overpowered the teacher, choking her until her eyes rolled back in unconsciousness.

Instantly, Liu Jiayi let go of the teacher's hand and stood up, her disoriented eyes searching anxiously for the little Bai Six. "I can't see. Find the key on her! Other teachers will patrol soon! We don't have much time!"

Liu Jiayi, unable to see, was struggling to keep up. Little Bai Six instructed Miao Gaojiang to carry her, and the group ran as quickly as they could, leaving the teacher's lifeless body behind.

None of the children, save for Muke, glanced back at the teacher they had just killed.

The others seemed to be born criminals, gifted in the art of murder, behaving like bad kids who felt no guilt about killing. Muke, however, the most normal of the group, followed them, occasionally glancing back at the teacher's body with fearful eyes, but quickly pulled away, chasing after them in nervous apprehension.

With no more time to waste, they pressed forward. Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, both fast runners, reached the square and began luring the deformed children away. Meanwhile, Little Bai Six took the opportunity to unlock the child carriage at the edge of the playground.

Miao Gaojiang, with Liu Jiayi on his back, reached the carriage, and the two climbed in, panting. Little Muke...

Little Muke hissed, eyes brimming with tears as he ran with bent legs, crossing over the walker. "Bai Six, drive faster! Stop messing around!

The kid behind me is catching up!"

Little Bai Six, at the wheel, gritted his teeth. The toy car wasn't fast to begin with, and with all four children crammed inside—Liu Jiayi being the lightest and the others all teens—it was even slower.

The deformed children behind them, enjoying the chase, were closing in. They dragged their feet or crawled on all fours, almost catching up. But as the deformed children reached out to touch the toy car, black smoke suddenly erupted from the vehicle.

The smoke boiled, swirling upward, forming a myriad of hissing and clawing charred corpses that looked both real and illusory. These twisted figures roared as they spewed flames from their mouths, chasing the deformed children away.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's secondary identity line uses a prop (Passenger's Blessing) to activate the vehicle's spirit-driven defense.]

The monstrous children, now frightened, chattered and scattered but still remained at a distance. They were wary but unwilling to let go of their game, watching from afar.

Little Muke, still screaming and teary-eyed, was stunned. Bai Six, one hand on the child's mobile phone and the other on the steering wheel, smiled quietly as he spoke into the receiver. "Hello, Bai Liu. How are you?"

There was no response.

Little Bai Six kept dialing. He hadn't heard Bai Liu's voice since their brief conversation at 9:15 AM.

Quickly, he checked the system panel. Bai Liu's health had plummeted from 6 to 3 during their escape, and it was still dropping at an alarming rate, values flashing across the screen.

The system coin vibrated again, flooding the panel with red warning boxes and prompts.

Across the street, the private hospital building loomed dark and foreboding. Bai Six's eyes reflected its dark silhouette as he glanced up, his lips pressed tightly together.

Suddenly, the orphanage behind him lit up, followed by a frantic scream from one of the teachers: "A child has knocked out the teacher and run away!"

It was as if the lights in the orphanage were voice-activated, brightening with the scream. The teachers stood by the windows, their faces grim and fearful, their shadows stretching out like thin, ghostly specters watching the runaway children.

In that moment, the teachers shed their daytime veneer of kindness, becoming as monstrous as the hospital investors.

"Get them back!" The Dean's voice rang out over the radio, commanding and cold. "Get those kids who tried to escape and punish them severely! Drown the leader in the baptismal font!"

The Loving Welfare Home

The teachers and caregivers rushed out of the lit rooms one by one, transforming into shadows with unreadable faces in the night, writhing and hurrying toward little Bai Six.

This private orphanage, with over two hundred caregivers, was a place where even an adult could struggle to keep up with an overloaded car and a toddler. The caregivers emerged from the classrooms, their faces twisted with anger and grimaces, appearing far more frightening in the night than the giggling, deformed children.

The deformed children chasing Bai Liu seemed afraid of the teachers as well. Upon seeing them, they screamed and scattered from a distance, as though they had encountered a natural enemy.

The coin worn by little Bai Six vibrated.

[The Monster Book of Love Orphanage Refresh - Deformed Children (1/3)]

[Monster Name: Deformed Child (Non-Blood Pumping Naughty Version)]

[Characteristic: Enjoys playing with others late at night and abducting children who play with it.]

[Weakness: Teacher at the orphanage (1/3)]

[Mode of Attack: Blood Injection (A+), Phone Location (A+), Flute Player (A)]

The deformed children fled while the teachers closed in.

These teachers were clearly not monsters, so they couldn't be repelled by the "Passenger's Blessing" buff prop. With the orphanage's gate now within reach, little Bai Six looked up at the large metal door, half-hidden in the night.

Moonlight flickered outside, and the sound of wind rustling the grass could be heard, as if someone was walking outside, enticing them to run.

Little Bai Six made a quick decision. "Get out and run!"

Several children scrambled out of the car in panic. Muke barely managed to escape his walker with little Bai Six's help, but there was a downside to the group's frantic scattering — the faster runners ignored the slower ones.

Miao Gaojiang left Liu Jiayi behind the moment he got off the bus. Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, being the oldest and strongest, were the quickest and soon left the others behind.

Liu Jiayi and Muke were slower. Liu Jiayi, precocious yet frail, and Muke, nearly invisible and young enough to be dragged along by little Bai Six, slowed the group. However, little Bai Six, not being very strong, found himself struggling to keep pace.

He gritted his teeth, panting. After a moment, he calmed down, pulled out his soul note, and ordered Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, "Come and carry them both."

Despite their reluctance, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang turned back, compelled by the task-like pressure of the soul note.

The two men soon had Liu Jiayi and Muke on their backs, and Bai Six, running alone, kept pace with them. However, the teachers, closing in behind, were gaining ground. Little Bai Six could hear them gnashing their teeth, cursing the "filthy little brats," while others screamed for the door to be shut.

Little Bai Six pressed on, his lungs burning as if he had swallowed a torch. He gasped for air, the moonlight casting a scattered sheen on his sweaty, pale face, and the wind whispered past his ears.

--Get out of here, get out of here.

"You bad child, you are not favored by the gods. You need to leave quickly, no one likes you here."

Bai Liu took a deep breath, pushing himself to run faster.

Suddenly, Miao Gaojiang screamed. Little Bai Six's sharp gaze darted to him, thinking the man might be up to something, but he saw Liu Jiayi, lying on Miao Gaojiang's back, covering her mouth and coughing up black blood, her fingers turning white and fragile. She weakened instantly, her face as pale as paper.

Liu Jiayi, fearing to disturb the others, curled up, coughing quietly, but blood spilled from her mouth, mixed with the tears she had been holding back.

"It hurts so much..." Liu Jiayi whispered, her unfocused eyes streaming with tears as she choked on black blood.

She coughed, calling out in a daze, "- I'm in pain, brother, brother."

Warm blood soaked Miao Gaojiang's back. Fear flickered in his eyes as he turned to little Bai Six. "Bai Six, she's spitting blood!"

Little Bai Six realized that Liu Jiayi wasn't lying or acting when she had told her teacher she was unwell. The little blind girl was truly sick and had only held back for their sake.

He remembered what Bai Liu had told him earlier that day about Liu Jiayi.

"I suspect she may have been poisoned by some kind of delayed-onset mushroom toxin. It's just a guess, but keep an eye on her. She's special and could be very dangerous."

Soon, Liu Jiayi, having vomited until she was drained, began to slide off Miao Gaojiang's back. Her descent slowed him down.

Miao Gaojiang, panting, shouted with red eyes, "Bai Six! Let her go! She's useless! She won't survive if we keep going! Let her stay in the orphanage, maybe a doctor will see her!"

Miao Feichi, carrying Muke on his back, was now also struggling to run. Sweat covered his head, his teeth bared as he yelled, "Bai Six! Where's this fucking kindness coming from? Let them go! If we don't, we'll be overtaken!"

Had it been the old Bai Six, he would have abandoned the two of them without hesitation. His personal interests always came first — that was his code.

But now, things were different. There were now two versions of him.

And those who held him back were tied to his other interests.

Little Bai Six's gaze settled on Muke's fearful face, his voice barely a whisper, calling out his name. Then, it shifted to Liu Jiayi's nearly unconscious face, her body trembling in pain.

His emotionless gaze swept over them, calculating their value, weighing what he could sacrifice for his own benefit and the benefit of the other version of himself.

By leaving Muke and Liu Jiayi behind, little Bai Six could escape unscathed and protect his interests.

But by not saving them, there was a chance they wouldn't survive, yet the other version of him would be safeguarded.

Liu Jiayi finally lost all strength and slipped off Miao Gaojiang's back, her bloodied face desperately reaching out for him. After they fell, Miao Feichi cursed and dragged little Bai Six away.

"What are you carrying useless people for?"

"Get out of here, Bai Six! They're not even one of us!"

The sound of Muke's frightened face, reaching out to him, the rustle of feet on sand, the scolding of the teachers drawing nearer, the frantic waving of something in their hands...

The frightened Muke, lying on the ground, reaching out in fear, and Liu Jiayi's bloodied face calling out for her brother, along with the distorted, grim faces of Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, swirled before little Bai Six's eyes. The scene felt like a strange, flickering memory, like footage from an old movie.

If he stopped, little Bai Six would be a good boy. If he ran, he would be a bad boy.

This, it seemed, was the worldly definition of good and bad — little Bai Six thought, momentarily confused.

But he was supposed to be a bad boy.

Yet, the other version of him didn't seem to see it that way, oh, and had even given him a strange new name — "white as in daylight, willow as in willow."

[You don't have to be an adult to choose to be the bad guy.]

[For now, it's better to let me handle what bad guys should do. I'll take care of the rest.]

...I promised to help him save Liu Jiayi and Muke. He paid me — little Bai Six's right hand gripped the coin-shaped game manager on his chest. The coin, a reward from Bai Liu.

[My status is that of a wanderer, and as a wanderer, you just need to honor your agreements, even with me.]

Little Bai Six's consciousness drifted back, these thoughts unfolding in milliseconds, as he had just been tugged by Miao Feichi when he stopped.

Miao Feichi, surprised, looked back at him.

"Stop," little Bai Six said, his voice unnervingly calm. "Go back and carry Muke and Liu Jiayi."

Miao Feichi stared at little Bai Six in shock. "You're crazy, Bai Six, I'm fucking—"

"I said, go back and put them on your back," little Bai Six interrupted, his tone unwavering. "I'm giving orders, not talking to you. Understand?"

He raised his eyes. "Go back and carry them."

"Fuck!!!" Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang lost it, spinning around to carry Muke, bawling, and Liu Jiayi, barely hanging on, their movements frantic. They muttered insults as they went: "I'm sorry, I'm sorry."

"You're really sick, Bai Six! I thought you were level-headed like us! But you're a saint, always helping other people out! Let's see what happens if you can't get out of here!"

"Can't run out..." little Bai Six suddenly laughed, a mischievous, carefree sound. He darted through the wind and night like a child, laughing, panting, capricious. "Anyway, someone said they'd help me clean up my mess. That's his problem."

The three children were obviously not as strong as the adults, but little Bai six had started running as soon as the clock struck 9:30. This gave them a time advantage, and the teachers chasing after them couldn't catch up right away.

As they neared the gate, elation flickered across Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang's faces—only for it to freeze on Miao Feichi's like wax hardening in cold air.

He halted abruptly at the threshold of the open doorway, his body going rigid. Instead of stepping forward, he took two cautious steps back.

Beyond the door, lurking in the shadows, stood a multitude of long, thin, ghostly figures—investors with wide-brimmed hats and faces wrapped in bandages.

Their mouths chewed at the very bandages meant to conceal them, revealing sharp, unnervingly wide grins stretching to their ears. Their upturned noses twitched as they sniffed at the fresh scent of children, their jaws dripping with thick, viscous saliva.

They were shrouded in black, blending seamlessly with the night. Only as they loomed closer did Miao Feichi realize that the eerie white patches shifting outside the door weren't caused by the moonlight—it was the movement of their bandaged faces.

They were blocked by the orphanage's half-open, half-closed door, their long, spindly hands reaching through the iron bars, grasping at the children inside. Their jagged teeth clicked together in a grotesque imitation of chewing, strings of saliva pooling beneath them.

Frozen in terror, none of the children moved. Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, still carrying Muke and Liu Jiayi on their backs, sank to their knees in disbelief.

Little Bai six also sat down, steadying his breathing as he cast a calm, sweeping glance at the door.

“...Failed,” he murmured. “It was never going to be that easy to escape.”

These monsters—these investors—were once people who had fallen victim to the orphanage’s twisted dealings. Those who had failed to receive the proper blood donations had succumbed to a gruesome fate. Now, they prowled outside, eternally lingering. Any child who had managed to flee the orphanage before had likely met their end at the hands of these creatures.

The teachers arrived behind them, spitting in contempt at the children who had dared to run. One of them struck little Bai six, sending him sprawling onto the ground.

Pinned down, he endured a series of sharp blows from a broom. He didn't flinch. His expression remained impassive, as if he had anticipated this all along.

The dean arrived shortly after, locking the door behind her. She stood over the children, gazing down at them with a grim, condescending air.

Her face was so tight with anger it seemed water might seep from her skin. She regarded them coldly and spoke in an eerie, deliberate tone:

“Now, tell me—whose idea was it to run away? Whoever confesses will be spared from the worst of the punishment. But if you refuse...”

Before she could finish her threat, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang turned their hatred onto Bai Liu. Without hesitation, they pointed at him.

“It was him!” they accused.

The dean’s gaze shifted to little Bai six, who was still on the floor from his beating, slowly getting up. She paused before speaking, her voice heavy with disdain.

“It seems today’s baptism wasn’t enough to cleanse you of your sins, Bai Liu.”

Her lips curled into a smile, though her eyes remained devoid of warmth. “I suppose you need a more thorough cleansing.”

She turned to the rest of the children. “The others will be confined together and fast until tomorrow. Bai Liu, however... I’ll take you to the church myself."

Little Bai six had barely gotten to his feet before the dean seized him roughly by the collar. Without any resistance, he was dragged toward the church, stumbling over his own feet, breath coming in shallow gasps.

He had spent all night running and had little strength left to fight back.

The church doors creaked open, and he was flung inside.

At least, he thought bleakly, she was punishing him the same way as before—forcing him into the baptismal font and making him choke on the water.

But this time, she seemed truly furious. She shoved his head under the surface with far more force, muttering words he couldn't make out.

"Filthy little beast."

"You owe your survival to the generosity of your investors, yet you dare pull a stunt like this?!"

Little Bai six's eyes remained half-open, droplets clinging to his eyelashes. He surfaced, gasping for breath, only to be forced down again.

Water flooded his nose and throat. He tried to cough but barely had a moment before she plunged him under once more.

"Do you realize what kind of trouble you're causing us?!" she shrieked. She yanked him up by the hair, her voice escalating into a hysterical scream. "You inhuman little monster! Your parents should have drowned you at birth for the good of society!"

Little Bai six's vision blurred.

He had lost interest in this game of drown and resurface.

He had also lost his strength.

On his next attempt to come up for air, he was too slow. He choked, his body convulsing involuntarily.

The dean's face was void of emotion as she held him beneath the water. Bubbles streamed from his mouth and nose. His expression, however, remained eerily calm—not the twisted terror of a drowning man, but something far more resigned.

Although he truly felt like he was going to drown this time, he was getting used to it.

His fingers slipped from the edge of the baptismal pool. His body floated limply in the water, his consciousness fading. The small coin on his chest slipped from his shirt, glinting faintly as it bobbed in the ripples.

The dean sneered and yanked the coin from his neck.

“How dare you steal from an investor!” she screeched. “You wretched, cursed child!”

As she continued tormenting him, and as little Bai six genuinely began to believe he would drown out of sheer boredom, a deafening explosion shook the church.

A bright red warning flared before his half-conscious eyes.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu’s main identity life value is dropping rapidly! Please evacuate the dangerous area immediately!]

[...Life value reduced to 2… reduced to 1… Warning! Player Bai Liu’s main identity line is about to die!]

The church trembled from the explosion, forcing the dean to finally stop. She turned toward the commotion outside, cursing.

“What now?!”

Little Bai six weakly lifted his head, his half-lidded eyes reflecting the glowing red system warnings. He exhaled shallowly, gaze flickering toward the unfamiliar idol beside the baptismal font.

It wasn’t long before the dean returned, her expression livid.

“There’s been an explosion at the private hospital,” she hissed. “Tomorrow’s matching ceremony is canceled. Did you do something with what you stole from the investors?!”

She grabbed him by the throat again and shoved him back into the water.

This time, Bai Liu didn’t struggle. He had no strength left to.

Through the distorted surface of the water, he could see the strange god on the reverse cross—its pure white, pupil-less eyes staring straight at him.

Then, a warm, holy glow radiated from its body.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's life level continues to drop… Player Bai Liu's life level has stopped dropping. Remaining life value: 0.5. Player Bai Liu's main identity line survives.]

[System Warning: Attempted strangulation of a child in church by NPC Dean has triggered divine taboo.]

[The gods send down their punishment.]

The dean was thrown backward as if struck by an invisible force, crashing hard against a church pillar with a scream.

But the punishment did not stop there. The thorns on the reverse cross grew wildly, multiplying at an alarming rate. From the ground, countless branches erupted, twisting and coiling around the abbess. Within moments, she was completely ensnared, her body wrapped in razor-sharp vines. Only her terrified eyes remained visible, peering through the dense jungle of thorns. She stared in horror at little Bai six, who was crawling out of the baptismal font—behind him, the god on the reverse cross had opened its eyes.

Trembling with fear, she fell to her knees and prayed for mercy.

In the next moment, the thorns tightened.

The dean's blood splattered across the marble floor of the church as she let out a piercing, ear-splitting scream. The thorns burrowed into her flesh, piercing through her wide-open mouth and tearing through her insides like a merciless meat grinder. Her body convulsed violently, her head tilting to the side as the thorns bound her in place.

Blood dripped from her mangled form like water, pooling on the ground beneath Bai Liu.

Within seconds, her body stilled—she had been reduced to nothing more than a lifeless husk. The thorny vines gently laid her corpse on the floor, where it remained for only a fleeting moment before dissolving into flickering data points of light, vanishing into the church.

The bloodstained thorns gathered swiftly from the ground, a few brushing against the backs of little Bai Six's bare, wet feet. The touch was so light it didn't hurt at all—almost comforting, like a gentle caress.

Eventually, the thorns retracted to the cross, but they coiled even tighter around the god bound to it. Where before his face had been fully visible, now only half of it remained exposed.

The god beneath the thorns opened his eyes, gazing at little Bai Six in silence. Then, as if growing drowsy once more, he blinked slowly.

Little Bai Six watched as the last of the vines slid across his feet, curling softly around his ankle in a way that felt almost affectionate—like a playful tease.

He curled his toes, then lifted his gaze from his foot to the thorn-covered face of the god. His expression turned subtly contemplative as he studied the entity, who looked as though he were about to drift into sleep again.

…So this guy was probably the one Bai Liu said he kissed twice—some kind of god-tier NPC, right?

But this NPC looks only sixteen or seventeen… so in the future, Bai Liu just ends up with someone so much younger than him…?

The god's movements were sluggish, restrained by the thickening thorns. It was as if he were being forcefully pulled back into place as he descended from the cross. Little Bai Six took a few cautious steps backward.

According to Bai Liu, this god-level NPC wasn't particularly hostile and was both trustworthy and immensely powerful.

Still, the system's warning left little Bai Six on edge.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's secondary identity line has triggered a god-tier NPC!]

[The Monster Book of Love and Welfare is updating—Thorn God unlocked.]

[Monster Name: Thorn God (God-tier NPC)]
[Characteristics: Punishes those who strangle children in its presence.]
[Weaknesses: None at this time (Players are not required to discover this monster's weaknesses.)]
[Attacks: Fish Tail Strike, Bite Face (2/????)]
*(Note: Since the maximum number of attacks is undetermined, all attacks will be considered unlocked once one is set.)

The young face, shrouded in darkness and streaked with bloodied thorns, showed no sign of pain. If anything, the god appeared completely unfazed by the thorns pulling at his body. Instead, with quiet insistence, he moved toward little Bai Six, tilting his head with a look of pure curiosity.

"Bai Liu, you've become… a human cub."

He reached out, seemingly intent on touching Bai Six's face. Instinctively, little Bai Six dodged.

The god stilled, his expression dazed for a moment. Then, as if recalling something, he murmured, "Ah, right. You only have 0.5 life left—you can't afford to be touched by me."

His fingers twitched slightly as his gaze lingered on little Bai Six, filled with an unreadable emotion.

"But… even if you only have 0.5 life…" His eyes practically glowed with the words [Want to pinch] written all over them. "Bai Liu, your face is so much rounder as a cub than it was when you were an adult. I can…"

Little Bai Six knew he had a bit of a baby face—his body was lean, but his cheeks held a hint of softness.

Still, hearing this from this guy made his face feel strangely warm.

—This god-tier NPC really has an odd way of talking.

Expressionless, little Bai Six quickly shut it down. "…No pinching."

The god lowered his eyelids, visibly disappointed. "…You let me bite your face before, and now I can't even pinch it?"

Little Bai Six: "…"

For some reason, he felt like he was the one bullying him.

The system warning clearly marked this guy as a monster with an explosive attack stat, and yet… this personality…

What the hell did Bai Liu do to this god-tier NPC?

Little Bai Six's expression subtly shifted again.

He had 50 life points left, but he kept quiet, still assessing the danger of this entity. Bai Liu had told him to try collecting all the Monster Books, after all…

After a long moment of hesitation, little Bai Six took a deep breath, subtly tilting his head to the side. His fingers brushed against his slightly chubby cheek before he stiffly muttered, "…Fine. You can pinch me if you want. It counts as an attack, right? Just… don't make it hurt too much. I need you to attack me."

The god's gaze lifted, his eyes glowing faintly. He stared at the offered cheek, his expression almost studious. The concentration in his eyes made little Bai Six's back stiffen.

Then, slowly, the god extended a thorn-covered finger… and, incredibly gently, poked little Bai Six's cheek.

The thorns barely grazed his skin, the touch impossibly light—so light it was hard to believe it came from a finger wrapped in thorns. There was no pain at all. Just a faint, cool sensation lingering where the god had touched him.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's secondary identity line has been attacked by god-tier NPC "Thorn God." Life value has dropped… Calculation in progress… Calculation complete. Life value dropped by 0.3.]

[New attacks unlocked: Fish Tail Strike, Bite Face, Poke Face (3/????)]

*(Note: Since the maximum number of attacks is undetermined, all attacks will be considered unlocked once one is set.)

[Congratulations, Player Bai Liu has successfully collected the Monster Book entry for (Thorn God).]

"It's warm," Tawil whispered. "Bai Liu… when you were a child, were you always this warm? Your face… it's warmer than any of your lips I've touched before."

Little Bai Six's eyelashes fluttered. Almost unconsciously, he raised his hand to touch the spot where he'd been poked.

"I'm not warm," he murmured. He had just climbed out of the baptismal pool. His fingers brushed against Tawil's unnaturally cold ones. "You're the one who's freezing."

"I've always been this cold," Tawil replied simply. His gaze softened. "But you were the first person to come close enough to let me know I was."

A faint, tired smile tugged at his lips. His eyes gradually drooped. "Waking up… going against the system's restraints just to kill NPCs… it forces me back into slumber."

"But I felt your call. So I woke up to see you."

Tawil curled his palm around the finger that had absorbed little Bai Six's warmth. His voice grew fainter.

"Bai Liu… it's always nice to see you when I wake up. See you next time."

"I love your warmth. I hope that next time, you'll share even more of it with me."

Let me, a warmthless monster trapped in eternal cold, steal a little of the heat you grant me each time I wake… so I can sleep just a little warmer.

The thorns tightened, pulling Tawil back into the cross. They wrapped around him like shackles, growing denser as if punishing him for his defiance.

The young god curled his fingers, cradling the tiny warmth still lingering there. Bound in bloodstained thorns, he fell into deep slumber once more—breathless, unmoving, his expression inexplicably fatigued.

…And yet, despite the overwhelming attack stats, this guy had deliberately held back his strength…

Was Bai Liu playing with him? Forcing him into these "attacks" just to collect monster entries?

Little Bai Six thought about Bai Liu's dismissive tone whenever he mentioned Tawil. "It's just a game. He's just an NPC."

He looked at the god, now peacefully bound to the cross again, seemingly satisfied by nothing more than a simple poke to the cheek.

This NPC looked only sixteen or seventeen. The age gap between him and Bai Liu was big. He had been tricked into following Bai Liu's orders, forced to attack him, helping him collect items. Bai Liu had taken advantage of him—kissing him, clinging to him… And now he seemed to be looking forward to their next meeting.

Little Bai Six, who was also aware that he was an NPC, suddenly felt a complicated emotion.

—This felt uncomfortably like an underage kid being seduced by a seasoned scumbag.

"Wow," he deadpanned. "I'm disgusting."

Chapter End Notes

Tawil is back

The Loving Welfare Home

Little Bai Six, dizzy from climbing out of the baptismal font, banged his knee against the edge and stumbled forward, limping as he struggled to push open the heavy church door.

Outside, the teachers who had been chasing him just moments ago were now running and screaming, their faces pale with shock. They stared at the smoldering remains of the private hospital, where an explosion had erupted moments before. Embers and burning debris floated through the air like fireflies, glowing fiercely in the night.

“The seventh floor of the private hospital just exploded! All the investors on the ground floor were seriously injured!”

“…The hospital says this batch of children can’t be matched tomorrow. The investors need time to recover. They want us to wait another day, until Thursday…”

“There’s nothing we can do. The children won’t be sent to the hospital until Thursday…”

Little Bai Six clutched the church door and gazed at the burning hospital in the distance. Against the dark night, it glowed like a coal still pulsing with heat, its embers rising in the air, swirling in golden arcs like fireworks.

He stood in the cold orphanage church, freshly pulled from the baptismal font, but somehow, the warmth radiating from the fire made him shiver less.

That was his other self.

Giving his life to buy him one more day.

Little Bai Six pulled out his waterlogged phone and gave it a shake, hesitating. He wasn’t sure if it would still work.

The dean had been planning to take it away, along with the coin manager. But she hadn’t taken them yet.

He dialed Bai Liu’s number. Once. Twice. Three times. The call didn’t go through.

But he didn’t give up.

When the call finally connected, Little Bai Six wasted no time. “Still alive?”

On the other end, Bai Liu let out a choked laugh, coughing twice from the smoke before replying lazily, “Thought I was gonna get blown up, but turns out I’m still here… What, you didn’t run after all? Calling me this early?”

“No.” Little Bai Six’s voice was calm, devoid of defeat. “I gave up when I saw the dead investor monsters guarding the orphanage gate.”

Bai Liu wasn’t surprised. “It’s a Tier 2 game. If escaping was easy, the mortality rate wouldn’t be so high.”

He coughed a couple more times before adding, “But giving up at the sight of a monster isn’t like you. I thought you’d try to break through with the props from the game manager. It was a rare chance to escape. Something must’ve happened to make you change your mind.”

Little Bai Six hesitated, then admitted, “I considered using [Passenger’s Blessing] to break out.”

“My plan was to have Miao Feichi and the others rush out first, see if they could find a fast-moving vehicle outside—maybe a car. Since today was a big day for investors and the private hospital is so close, chances were good that some of them had parked outside and hadn’t left yet. With a vehicle, I could use [Passenger’s Blessing] to filter out the investor monsters and attempt an escape. Risky, but possible.”

Bai Liu chuckled. “And in the process, you could sacrifice Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang while scouting the area. That way, you’d kill two birds with one stone—you’d eliminate them for me and still hold up your end of the deal to ‘get them out of the orphanage.’ Meanwhile, you’d escape with the children I asked you to save.”

“A solid strategy,” Bai Liu admitted, a note of appreciation in his voice.

Little Bai Six’s lips curled slightly at the praise—but the smirk faded quickly.

“So?” Bai Liu’s tone was soft, almost coaxing. “Why didn’t you go through with it?”

Little Bai Six was silent for a long moment before he finally answered, “Liu Jiayi was in trouble. She started vomiting blood while we were running. If we left, she wouldn't have gotten help in time. She would've died."

Bai Liu's voice held a hint of surprise. "Wow… I didn't think that was a choice you'd make. I expected you to drop her and keep running—after all, the alternative was a much higher personal gain for you."

Little Bai Six clenched his fists, his lips pressed together. For once, he pushed back against Bai Liu's words. "…Was staying the wrong choice?"

"No." Bai Liu's voice softened. "In terms of Pro values, your choice was the correct one."

There was something almost melancholic in his tone. "But neither you nor I benefited. The Pro values are strange that way."

"Because 'right' in universal values means giving something to others—it's them who receive, not us." Bai Liu let out a quiet chuckle. "Liu Jiayi got to live. Her brother still has his sister. Right now, he's thanking me… and thanking you."

"You did well, Little Bai Six."

Little Bai Six's lips parted slightly, an unusual flicker of confusion crossing his face before he schooled it back into impassiveness. "…Tell her brother I don't work for free. Make sure you charge him—enough to at least cover our vested interests. But overall, staying was a poor decision for me."

"I didn't escape the orphanage."

"It's fine." Bai Liu's tone was casual, as if he'd already expected this outcome. "I prepared a contingency in case you failed tonight."

"The hospital won't be able to take you in tomorrow. You've bought yourself one more day to escape."

Little Bai Six lifted his gaze to the still-burning hospital. "…You caused the explosion to make that happen, didn't you?"

"Correct." Bai Liu chuckled. "But I don't work for free either."

His voice took on a lazy lilt. "Now it's your turn to repay me, Little Bai Six."

Little Bai Six was silent again. This time, longer. As if thinking back, weighing something.

Eventually, his lashes lowered slightly. Instead of answering, he changed the subject. “…I’m curious. How did you do it? The main identities of Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang don't seem easy, and the system shop is on my side—it forbids you from purchasing large explosive props. How did you take out two players stronger than you in under ten minutes? And where did you even get a bomb?”

Bai Liu lay on the scorched ground, his body covered in burns and puncture wounds, his clothes tattered from the blast. The hem of his hospital gown was still smoldering. One arm was missing, the stump raw and bleeding.

Yet his face bore a satisfied smile, as if everything had gone exactly as planned.

He clutched his phone—the system-issued prop had miraculously survived the explosion, remaining intact despite everything.

“…It was a complicated plan,” Bai Liu said slowly. A dismissal.

Little Bai Six, unimpressed, responded calmly, “I charge by the minute for two-way conversations. You can take your time.”

Bai Liu: “…”

The Loving Welfare Home

Seventeen minutes ago, in ward 906.

Liu Huai dropped down from above, gripping his dagger with both hands and gritting his teeth to block the strike. But the sheer force of Miao Feichi's twin swords slammed him straight into the wall. Meanwhile, Bai Liu darted past Miao Feichi, moving at full thief speed, slipping by him like a shadow.

Miao Feichi watched in disbelief as Bai Liu passed beneath him in a crouch, gliding like a swallow skimming the water, heading straight for Muke.

"Fuck!!!" Miao Feichi roared, swinging his knife down at Bai Liu, who had slipped past his feet. But his blade was intercepted—hooked by Liu Huai's dagger. Liu Huai, gritting his teeth, jammed his weapon against Miao Feichi's twin swords, sliding his dagger over the blades and slashing Miao Feichi hard.

At the same time, Miao Feichi's swords sliced into Liu Huai's hand.

[System Alert: Player Miao Feichi was attacked by player Liu Huai's Shadow Dagger at full force. Spirit value dropped by 43. Entering hallucination danger level!]

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai has been attacked by Miao Feichi's Twin Swords. Life expectancy dropped by 13.]

Liu Huai threw his head back, biting down a scream as a piece of flesh fell from his arm. But his attack had worked—Miao Feichi staggered back, dazed. The reason Miao Feichi had always looked down on Mu Sicheng was his low resistance stat.

But resistance wasn't a strong suit for players who relied on high judgment skills, like Mu Sicheng—or players with spirit-based attacks, like Liu Huai.

Thieves and assassins were meant to counter low-resistance opponents.

Yet, over time, everyone forgot about Liu Huai—the once-feared assassin lurking in the shadows—and only remembered the dazzling, arrogant thief.

“Feichi! Bai Liu has teamed up with Liu Huai! We’ve been ambushed! Drink the psycho-bleach!!!” Miao Gaojiang shouted.

Seeing Bai Liu charging toward Muke, Miao Gaojiang snapped to his senses. He twisted Muke’s neck, intending to snap it and eliminate him, but Bai Liu shot forward like a gust of wind. His bare feet barely touched the ground as he maneuvered with inhuman agility, closing the distance in mere seconds.

Miao Gaojiang instinctively raised his arm to block, but Bai Liu wasn’t aiming for him—his eyes locked onto Muke. With a sudden twist of his wrist, Bai Liu’s monkey claw skill hooked onto Muke’s collar and yanked him free at an impossible angle, sending him skidding across the slippery floor.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has successfully stolen Player Muke from Player Miao Gaojiang using his personal skill (Monkey Claw Thief).]

Muke tumbled out of the room, coughing and gasping for air, finally slamming into the elevator doors at the corridor’s end, where he woke up, alive.

Miao Gaojiang lunged forward to finish the job, but Bai Liu ran up the wall, moving too fast to catch, and landed right in front of him, blocking his path. His cold eyes remained locked onto Miao Gaojiang as he raised a hand to attack, issuing a command to Muke at the same time.

“Take the elevator down and call the patrolling nurses,” Bai Liu ordered, his voice ice-cold.

Though still disoriented, Muke quickly grasped the urgency of the situation. Scrambling to his feet, he fumbled with the elevator buttons, forcing himself inside. As the doors closed, he slumped against the smooth wall, breathless.

Then it hit him. His eyes widened in horror.

Bai Liu is insane! He actually teamed up with Liu Huai to take on Miao Feichi and his father!

Miao Gaojiang, still exchanging blows with Bai Liu, was thinking the exact same thing.

Letting Liu Huai, an A-rank assassin, hold off Miao Feichi, a high-damage attacker, with a sneak attack? And then having Bai Liu, a near-dead thief, engage a tank?

What kind of suicidal battle plan was this?!

Miao Gaojiang's thoughts screeched to a halt as his gaze fell on the black monkey's paw Bai Liu held.

That's… Mu Sicheng's skill—[Thief Monkey Paw].

"How the hell can you use Mu Sicheng's skill?!" Miao Gaojiang's head snapped toward Bai Liu in disbelief. "Your personal skill—it's an actual rule-breaking ability?! Not only can you share inventories, but you can even share skills across time and dimensions?!"

Bai Liu didn't bother answering. He simply kept attacking, his strikes relentless and precise. Gritting his teeth, Miao Gaojiang barely managed to keep up, all while glancing sideways at Miao Feichi, who was still locked in combat with Liu Huai.

This battle strategy… Miao Gaojiang suddenly understood.

It was ridiculously simple. Bai Liu wasn't even trying to fight them—he was using an ancient trick.

A textbook [thief and assassin] setup.

Bai Liu wasn't here to kill them. He was here to rob them.

First, he used Liu Huai to ambush Miao Feichi, forcing him into a defensive fight. That way, the assassin kept the heavy hitter occupied, acting as a decoy. Meanwhile, Bai Liu, the thief, seized the chance to steal from the remaining player—Miao Gaojiang.

It was the same tactic Mu Sicheng and Liu Huai had once used in their early days to prey on guild groups.

Liu Huai, the assassin, would bait away the team's high-damage dealer, and Mu Sicheng, the thief, would loot the rest.

Miao Gaojiang dodged another swipe from Bai Liu's monkey claw. Gritting his teeth, he retaliated with a vicious punch, but Bai Liu slipped away like water, impossibly fast.

Damn it!

This is why no one wanted to deal with Mu Sicheng!

Thieves were slippery, impossible to pin down.

Bai Liu's skills weren't strong enough to take down two S-rank players like Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang—but at the same time, they couldn't catch him either. The fight dragged into a stalemate. But Bai Liu's relentless, almost fanatical attempts to steal from him put Miao Gaojiang on high alert.

What was he after?

Bai Liu was risking all their lives on this ambush. Whatever he wanted to steal had to be something critical.

Miao Gaojiang's mind raced.

There was no item in his inventory that could incapacitate two S-rank players instantly.

So what the hell was Bai Liu trying to take from him?

No. It didn't matter. Whatever it was, Bai Liu couldn't have it.

[Miao Gaojiang: Activate personal skill (Carrion Zombie)? Warning: Full activation will upgrade the skill to S-rank but cause extreme stamina drain. Stamina recovery items will be unusable for 24 hours.]

[Miao Gaojiang: Confirm.]

[System Alert: Player Miao Gaojiang has activated (Carrion Zombie). Defense +8037. Stamina entering extreme decline...]

Miao Gaojiang's body twisted and expanded grotesquely. His skin thickened and turned a sickly shade of blue. His teeth grew long, curling into sharp fangs, and his eyes gleamed with an eerie, greenish glow.

Bai Liu's clawed hand shot forward.

The sound of metal scraping rang out as Bai Liu's nails raked against Miao Gaojiang's hardened flesh—like trying to claw through iron.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu's (Monkey Claw Thief) attack was judged ineffective.]

Miao Gaojiang's palms grew larger, his nails darkening and lengthening as he wheeled toward Bai Liu. Bai Liu failed to land a blow but sidestepped lightly, pressing against the wall, using his speed to evade Miao Gaojiang's attack. Yet, Gaojiang's sudden transformation did nothing to deter Bai Liu's assault.

His gaze remained cold, unfazed by his ineffective strike. With a swift tap of his foot against the wall, Bai Liu flipped midair and lunged again, his monkey claws slashing toward Miao Gaojiang in another lightning-fast attack.

But Miao Gaojiang had completely settled into place. He no longer bothered to chase Bai Liu, instead waiting—like a patient old hunter—knowing his prey would eventually tire itself out.

As long as he didn't make any reckless moves to slow Bai Liu down, it was only a matter of time. The moment Miao Feichi finished off Liu Huai, the two of them would easily kill Bai Liu together.

Bai Liu seemed well aware that this was an all-or-nothing gamble. If they couldn't end the fight quickly, they were dead for sure. That was why he had sent Muke downstairs to call the nurse—his safety net.

If their side couldn't finish the battle in the short term, they would inevitably fall into a disadvantage. The nurse, an NPC with some restraining power over players, was Bai Liu's last-ditch effort to halt Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi's counterattack.

But—

"I think by the time the nurse arrives to save you," Miao Gaojiang sneered contemptuously, "the battle will already be over. All she'll be able to do is collect the bodies."

Perched on the railing above, Bai Liu lifted his eyes and looked down at Miao Gaojiang, his voice light and unhurried.

"I agree with you."

Miao Gaojiang's expression darkened as he suddenly realized—Bai Liu wasn't talking about his own side.

He was talking about theirs.

With an ugly scowl, Miao Gaojiang spat out a curse. "Big words for a dead man!"

The Loving Welfare Home

It was true that Bai Liu's sneak attack had briefly thrown Miao Gaojiang off balance, causing him to panic for a moment. But once he calmed down, he quickly realized there was no way they could lose.

Miao Gaojiang patiently held his ground as Bai Liu darted around him like a monkey, relentlessly attacking. He occasionally glanced out of the corner of his eye at Miao Feichi and Liu Huai behind him.

Liu Huai was indeed an excellent assassin when it came to sneak attacks—but Bai Liu was not a good thief.

Bai Liu's side had failed to steal what they needed in time to retreat, and players like Liu Huai, who were not skilled in head-to-head combat, were quickly overwhelmed by Miao Feichi's relentless assault.

Miao Feichi ripped open a packet of psychic bleach with his teeth, the combined rush of the attack and the drop in his mental value making him manic. His twin swords blurred into a flurry of rapid, deadly slashes.

Liu Huai was struggling. Against Miao Feichi—a high-level player who had entered a berserker state—he barely held on. But Miao Feichi wasn't interested in toying with him. With a swift, brutal slash, he severed Liu Huai's hands, rendering him completely powerless.

[System Alert: Player Miao Feichi attacked Liu Huai with his Twin Swords. The attack was successful. Player Liu Huai's HP dropped by 17. Player Liu Huai has 20 HP remaining.]

Cutting off a player's hands was a crude but effective way to disarm them. It prevented them from retrieving their weapon—just as Liu Huai himself had once done to Mu Sicheng.

It was also the reason Bai Liu had previously targeted Liu Huai's hands. And now, Miao Feichi had done the same.

A torrent of blood erupted from Liu Huai's shoulders. His daggers clattered to the ground along with his severed hands, landing with a crisp metallic clang. He dropped to his knees, face as pale as a sheet, panting heavily—completely incapacitated.

He had done his best. He had only managed to stall Miao Feichi for this long.

[System Warning: Player Liu Huai's mental value has dropped to 57. Hallucinations imminent. Please recover your mental value immediately.]

Normally, Miao Feichi would have finished Liu Huai off. But time was running out. Killing an A-rank player would take too long, and right now, there was someone he wanted to kill even more.

Gritting his teeth, Miao Feichi swung his sword around and snarled, "Bai Liu—!"

He leaped forward, slashing across the wall as he aimed his twin blades at Bai Liu, who was attempting to sneak up on Miao Gaojiang. The sheer force of his attack sent wallpaper and plaster exploding into the air, debris flying across the room.

Bai Liu managed to block the strike momentarily using Mu Sicheng's Monkey Claw skill, absorbing most of the impact. But it wasn't enough. With a furious, tooth-clenched swing, Miao Feichi cut through—severing Bai Liu's arm in a spray of blood.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's HP has dropped from 6 to 3! HP is continuing to decline! Please leave the danger zone immediately!]

One more hit. That was all it would take. One more attack, and Bai Liu would be dead.

Lying in a pool of his own blood, Liu Huai coughed violently. His plummeting mental value warped his vision—everything around him slowed, distorted, like a broken camera stuck in slow motion. Sound faded into an eerie silence.

All he could see was Bai Liu, his severed arm suspended midair, blood spilling in slow, heavy droplets.

Bai Liu's eyes, eerily still, met Liu Huai's.

The moment their gazes locked, Liu Huai was wrenched out of the slow-motion haze. His body trembled as he forced himself to move, struggling to rise.

It wasn't over. Not yet.

Everything was still in place.

In Bai Liu's plan, this was only the beginning.

For Jiayi—

Bai Liu must not die.

Liu Huai's gaze darted to the ground, desperately searching. Then, he saw them—his severed hands, still clutching his daggers.

The blades lay face-up in his loose grip, their tips glinting faintly with fresh blood. Liu Huai's focus zeroed in on that single drop.

Bai Liu was locked in battle with Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi. No one was paying attention to this small, bloodstained corner of the room.

He collapsed.

Liu Huai slowly rose, drenched in blood.

His arms hung limply at his sides. His only weapon was the dagger gripped between his teeth, and the one plunged into his own heart. His expression was blank, eyes hollow—an assassin with no future, forged purely for this one fatal strike.

Bai Liu was his handler.

And perhaps, his last handler.

Tears slipped unknowingly from Liu Huai's vacant eyes.

[OK.]

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai has confirmed use. Dagger attack +6037. Combined panel attack stat +2200. Total attack stat 8237. Player Liu Huai's stamina is in extreme decline…]

Miao Feichi was about to bring his swords down hard when he suddenly felt a gust of wind approaching his back—something dangerous, something alarming, closing in on him at breakneck speed. His battle-honed instincts kicked in, and he turned quickly.

With the dagger clenched between his teeth and no arms to wield it, Liu Huai lunged at Miao Feichi, his eyes burning with fierce determination. There was no time to dodge.

"Feichi, look out!!!" Miao Gaojiang yanked Miao Feichi toward him, but Liu Huai reacted instantly. Lowering his body, he adjusted his grip on the dagger and switched targets the moment Miao Gaojiang moved to shield Feichi. With tears in his eyes, Liu Huai drove the dagger deep into Miao Gaojiang's abdomen.

"How can you..." Miao Gaojiang stared in disbelief at the blade buried in his stomach. "...break through my defense...?"

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai used personal skill (Flash Strike). Skill blast penetrated player Miao Gaojiang's defense, causing stiffness for 30 seconds. Mental value drops to 51—hallucination imminent. Due to mental shock, player Miao Gaojiang's defense value is dropping...]

At the same time, Bai Liu sensed a shift in Miao Gaojiang's hardened skin—the brief moment when his body went rigid and dazed. Without hesitation, Bai Liu seized the opportunity, reaching out with his only intact hand to grab Miao Gaojiang.

Miao Feichi, having been pulled back by Miao Gaojiang, saw Bai Liu's move and let out a furious roar, his eyes red with rage. "Don't you fucking touch my father!"

He raised both swords—one slashing toward Bai Liu and the other toward Liu Huai.

Liu Huai clenched the dagger between his teeth and yanked it out of Miao Gaojiang's waist, but his strength was nearly depleted. He no longer had the power to deliver another deadly blow.

But Bai Liu didn't care.

He ignored the incoming blade, utterly focused, indifferent to whether he lived or died. His monkey claws stretched toward Miao Gaojiang, his back left unguarded—entrusted completely to Liu Huai, who had no arms.

That was their plan from the start.

I don't think I can block Miao Feichi after stabbing Miao Gaojiang. This is too risky, Bai Liu—you'll die if you leave your back to me!

But you've worked with Mu Sicheng so many times, haven't you? He gave you complete control of his back, and you didn't let him die.

...I made him lose both arms.

You betrayed Mu Sicheng with the dagger in your hand. But by the time you betray me, Liu Huai, you'll have no hands left to do it. My way of doing things is simple—I assume my teammates can succeed before they prove it. And you can, can't you?

Liu Huai's dazed, unfocused gaze traced the arc of Bai Liu's reaching hand. The all-too-familiar rhythm of their synchronized attack sent a tremor through him, his mind spiraling into an eerie déjà vu.

For a split second, Bai Liu's face blurred, overlapping with another—a memory of a long-lost, never-to-be-reunited friend.

Fourth Brother.

Liu Huai's lips moved soundlessly.

Betrayal was like a dagger lodged in his own heart.

Tears streaked his bloodied face as he charged straight at Miao Feichi. He no longer knew if the person behind him was Bai Liu or Mu Sicheng. He was just doing what an assassin in a Thief & Assassin combo was meant to do.

—Hold the line. Clear the way for the capuchin thief who steals with impunity.

Miao Feichi's twin swords slashed into Liu Huai's body at full force, even as Bai Liu finally hooked his monkey claws into Miao Gaojiang's flesh.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu successfully stole Siren's Fish Bone, Ghost Mirror (Fully Assembled)... and other items from Player Miao Gaojiang's warehouse using personal skill (Thief Monkey Paw).]

Bai Liu pulled a white fluorescent whip from the motionless Miao Gaojiang, who was still paralyzed. Without hesitation, he swung the whip backward in a sharp crack aimed at Miao Feichi's descending blades.

Siren's Fishbone might not be particularly powerful in Bai Liu's hands —his F-rank stats left much to be desired—but this weapon had one major advantage: its attack priority was absurdly high.

With a loud snap, Bai Liu's whip sent Miao Feichi's swords flying from his hands. Liu Huai's knees buckled, and he collapsed onto the blood-soaked floor.

[System Warning: Player Liu Huai has only 2 life points remaining! Please evacuate immediately!]

Miao Gaojiang's 30-second paralysis was nearing its end, but a growing unease gnawed at him. His body remained frozen, but his mind reeled. Liu Huai was barely breathing. Bai Liu was critically injured.

Miao Feichi would finish them off soon.

They had stolen some items, but none that could turn the tables entirely. There were no props in the stolen pile that could ensure a full comeback.

So why—why was this suffocating sense of dread creeping up his spine?

Miao Gaojiang quickly recalled the items Bai Liu had taken—every prop that Bai Liu had scattered himself when he played dead earlier.

Was this guy really making all this fuss just to retrieve the props he had thrown away while faking his own ghost tricks?!

No—wait!

Miao Gaojiang's gaze froze as he remembered something peculiar. Among the props, there was one that wasn't entirely Bai Liu's.

The ghost mirror.

They had pieced it together last night after obtaining the broken lens, but it had no apparent use. The system's instructions lacked a specific function—its attribute was listed as "Unknown," meaning its purpose had to be discovered through experimentation. Additionally, it could only be used once per copy.

But after assembling it, the mirror hadn't reacted to anything. It appeared to be nothing more than an ordinary mirror, capable of storing objects.

Miao Feichi had even complained about it for a long time. Is this all? A storage device that looks like a mirror? Isn't the system's backpack good enough? Who would use this thing to store anything? What if it disappears?

Yet, the ghost mirror could store things—like the bombs from The Last Train to Explosion.

Miao Gaojiang hadn't been concerned about the bomb before. With his skills at full power, it wouldn't be enough to kill him, and under his protection, Miao Feichi wouldn't die easily either. He had been right—Bai Liu didn't have a prop that could kill them in one blow.

But Miao Gaojiang hadn't considered the possibility that someone in this copy could hold him still for a full thirty seconds.

He wouldn't die if he was frozen in place with his skills activated—but Miao Feichi, a player with low resistance to damage, would definitely be killed by a close-range blast.

Until now, Miao Gaojiang had never considered that Bai Liu would actually use the bomb. The thing targeted Miao Feichi, sure, but it wouldn't guarantee a kill. However, Bai Liu and Liu Huai—players with very low life points—would die if they were caught in the explosion.

These two lunatics weren't engaged in some covert, assassin-style sneak attack. This was a full-fledged suicidal assault.

Bai Liu was playing a two-for-two game.

From the very beginning, Bai Liu hadn't been trying to sneak up on them.

He had been trying to kill them.

"Feichi! Don't attack him! Get away from him!" Miao Gaojiang broke through all restraints, his eyes bloodshot as he roared, "Get behind me!!!"

Bai Liu had one foot on a bookcase and the other on the frame of the enormous ghost mirror he had stolen. Perched atop it, he crouched like a predator, his intact hand—no, his scarred monkey's paw—resting idly on his bent knee. Blood dripped from his wounds, smashing against the mirror's surface.

In his hand, he held a faintly glowing white fishbone, while more blood trailed from his forehead, staining his long eyelashes. Yet, his eyes remained open, unwavering, as he gazed down at Miao Feichi, who had yet to react, and Miao Gaojiang, who had screamed in fear. His bloodied face bore a serene, almost lazy smile as his hand reached deep into the mirror, pulling something out with effort.

"Too late, Papa Miao." Bai Liu smiled. "Isn't it nice to watch your son die? But don't worry—I don't like separating fathers and sons. You won't be apart. You'll die together. Oh, not exactly together..."* His smile widened. "You're more resistant than your son. So you'll get to watch him die first… and then you'll follow him."

Miao Feichi had already ducked behind Miao Gaojiang, still unaware of what was happening. But Miao Gaojiang's frantic warning had been serious enough that he instinctively obeyed.

Now staring up at Bai Liu, who stood barefoot on the mirror, Miao Gaojiang tried to steady himself. "This bomb won't kill me."

To be precise, it would normally take at least five large explosions to finish him off.

Bai Liu lifted his blood-streaked eyelids and looked down at them, his gaze eerily indifferent—like a god passing judgment on mere mortals.

"You think this bomb can't kill a high-resistance player like you? But have you forgotten... you're not just a player anymore?" Bai Liu tilted his head slightly. "You're also a monster now."

"—A terminally ill monster that suck the blood of sick Children."

"And like any monster, you have a weakness."

Miao Gaojiang's breath hitched. His pupils shrank to tiny pinpricks.

Yes. He had almost forgotten. Players who took on monster status also inherited that monster's inherent weaknesses. Normally, these weaknesses weren't a major hindrance—but sometimes, they could be the final straw that tipped the scales.

The weaknesses of these patients—this damp, unseen room where mushrooms were cultivated—had been clear from the beginning. The system simply hadn't provided any countermeasures.

"You can't see the light." Bai Liu's hand disappeared into the mirror's rippling surface. "And you can't handle fire… or more precisely, dryness."

He yanked a massive, pitch-black bomb from the mirror and hurled it to the floor, flashing a ghostly smile.

The bomb detonated in a violent burst of heat and light.

Bai Liu, standing atop the mirror, and Liu Huai, lying motionless on the ground, were consumed by the crimson glow.

"STOP IT!!!" Miao Gaojiang bellowed.

The entire building shook with a deafening roar as fire and smoke engulfed everything.

"So what?" Little Bai Six asked, unusually intrigued. "You survived? I heard Liu Huai made it too. How?"

Bai Liu yawned lazily. "Right before the explosion, I used my whip to drag Liu Huai into the mirror. The ghost mirror blocked the blast. I actually thought I was going to die—our life values were too low. Even a glancing blow from the explosion should've killed us. But I got lucky and was only knocked unconscious. I just woke up."

"And Miao Gaojiang?" Little Bai Six pressed.

"Unfortunately, they didn't die either." Bai Liu didn't sound frustrated at all—just calm and analytical. "I miscalculated. Miao Gaojiang lowered his own sanity below 20, triggering Panel Berserk and resisting the explosion."

"But they still lost life points. The nurse rushed in right after and dragged them to the operating room. I doubt they'll be in any shape to come after you tomorrow. The orphanage won't allow it."

"The explosion injured a lot of investors too. The blood Lingzhi was caught in it as well. So the hospital canceled tomorrow's match. All in all, I achieved my goal."

Silence stretched between them. Bai Liu's breathing was weak.

Little Bai Six wanted to ask how he was—but the thought disgusted him. So he said nothing.

"Hello? If you don't answer, I'll report you for negative escort scamming," Bai Liu teased.

Little Bai Six clenched his jaw. "How are you?" The words slipped out before he could stop them. "Slightly nauseating, but I needed to ask. After all, you nearly died to make an opening for me."

Lying on the floor, battered and broken, Bai Liu stared at the starless sky through the hole he had personally blown in the ceiling.

"It’s fine," he murmured with a tired smile. "We’re all still alive. We did well tonight."

The Loving Welfare Home

After hanging up the phone, Bai Liu turned to look at Liu Huai, who was struggling to drink the psycho-bleach. Both his hands had been cut off, and now he was curled up, trying to drink from the bottle like a begging mouth, choking as the liquid spilled everywhere.

Earlier, Bai Liu had intended to help him, but with only one hand and the interruption of a call from Little Bai Six, Liu Huai had insisted he answer the phone first. Now that the call was over, Bai Liu reached out, took the bottle, and fed Liu Huai. Liu Huai hesitated for a moment, looking at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu, expressionless, extended the bottle.

Liu Huai still leaned forward to drink.

He must have looked pitiful—his face covered in grime, drinking from someone else's hand like a stray dog. He knew there were countless spectators watching this disgraceful scene. As his mental state recovered, the humiliation set in, stirring emotions he couldn't suppress. Tears welled up and dripped down his face.

"Why are you crying?" Bai Liu asked flatly, holding up the bottle. "Didn't you survive?"

"...I don't know," Liu Huai muttered. His spirit value hadn't fully returned, and he turned his head away, covering his face like a self-conscious college student embarrassed by his own vulnerability.

His voice was hoarse as he curled his neck and bowed his head. "...I look like a homeless stray dog."

"A bit," Bai Liu remarked, unemotional as his gaze lingered on Liu Huai. Blood still seeped from the stump of his arm. "We both look like strays now. But at least we're strays who are alive—all of us. Including your sister."

Liu Huai bit down on the bottle, holding back for a moment before a sob escaped him.

Armless, he arched his back as he cried, lowering his head until it rested against Bai Liu's hand. He bent forward so deeply it was almost like he was kowtowing, his voice trembling as he choked out, "...Thank you. For saving me. And for the other you—thank you for saving my sister."

Seconds before the explosion, Liu Huai had thought he was going to die. Without hands, a spent assassin like him had little value to someone like Bai Liu, a man who prioritized self-interest.

But Bai Liu had run through the fire and dragged him into the mirror with his whip.

"I didn't expect the other me to save your sister," Bai Liu admitted, lowering his gaze. "I don't know his reasons." He lifted his arm and straightened Liu Huai, who was still pressed against his wrist. Looking at Liu Huai's tear-streaked face, Bai Liu continued nonchalantly, "But I saved you for a reason. You saved me first. That was our deal—if you managed to stall Miao Feichi, I would do my best to save you."

"I'm a trustworthy stray," Bai Liu said calmly, looking into Liu Huai's teary eyes. "A stray dog, I guess."

Thirty-seven minutes ago, Ward 913.

Liu Huai paced back and forth restlessly, glancing at Bai Liu, who sat calmly on the edge of the bed. Taking a deep breath, he finally spoke:

"Are you really planning to ambush and kill Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang? Those two are S-rank players. If we don't succeed in one strike, we're all dead!"

"Which is why we have to finish it in one go," Bai Liu replied without hesitation. "They're already suspicious of Muke. By now, they've probably gone to his ward looking for me. But since I'm not there, they'll start searching elsewhere, trying to track me down as [Muke]."

"But they'd never guess that Muke is in the case management room. If they can't find him in the hospital, they'll assume he has to return to his ward by 9:15 when the nurses start their rounds. I expect they'll have someone waiting for him."

Liu Huai tensed. "Where will they be waiting?" he asked nervously. "In Muke's ward? Won't they catch him there?"

"It would be foolish to wait inside Muke's ward," Bai Liu explained. "If Muke doesn't return there but instead goes to [Bai Liu's] ward or another empty room, they'd be trapped. The nurses' rounds would force them out, but that would only cause more trouble. It's not an efficient approach."

Bai Liu locked eyes with Liu Huai. "If I were Miao Gaojiang, I'd take a more effective route—I'd guard the elevator."

"The elevator?"

"It's the most likely way for Muke to return. Only patients sneaking back to their wards would take it. In other words, Muke."

Bai Liu's voice remained steady. "Once Miao Gaojiang captures Muke, he'll want to figure out our plan. But Muke won't talk easily. So naturally, he'll focus on the keyboard Muke and I use to communicate. I'll ensure he sees something that seems like a clue—[9] [0] [6]. Given the circumstances, Miao Gaojiang won't doubt its authenticity."

"And since the adoption is happening tomorrow, he won't want to risk us interfering. He'll try to kill me tonight."

Bai Liu turned to Liu Huai, his expression unwavering. "Because they believe they have the upper hand, they won't be overly cautious about Room 906. That's our opportunity. Your role is the key to this plan, Liu Huai. On the surface, it looks like a standard [Thief and Assassin] routine—like the ones you used to run with Mu Sicheng. But this time, you, the assassin, are the core of the operation."

Liu Huai clenched his fists against his forehead. "I know," he murmured. He hesitated before admitting, "But Bai Liu, I've never been the lead attacker before. That was always... Fourth Brother. You're putting everything on me. The risk is too high."

Bai Liu's voice softened slightly. "There are three steps to this plan. First, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang will attack. The moment they open the door, you sneak in and keep Miao Feichi occupied. I'll grab Muke from Miao Gaojiang and send him to the nurses. Once Muke is out of reach, Miao Feichi will abandon his fight with you and go after me instead."

Liu Huai's voice turned hoarse. "If Miao Feichi wants to cut the fight short… and he doesn't want to be distracted by my counterattacks… the best thing he can do is disarm me."

"In other words, he'll cut off your hands," Bai Liu stated, completely emotionless.

Liu Huai dropped his head lower. "……Yeah. It's the fastest way to neutralize a player whose greatest weapon is their hands."

"But there's an advantage to that," Bai Liu continued. "Once your hands are gone, Miao Feichi won't see you as a threat anymore. He'll lower his guard. That leads us to step two: I'll stall Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi, buying you time for your panel to explode."

He spoke as if holding off two S-rank players at once was nothing more than a trivial inconvenience. "Once your panel bursts, you can use your [Flashing Strike] to immobilize Miao Gaojiang."

"That brings us to step three. You block Miao Feichi's next attack. I only need a second or two to activate the bomb—"

Liu Huai snapped his head up, his face pale with fear. "Bai Liu… I won't be able to block Miao Feichi after striking Miao Gaojiang. It's too risky! If you put everything on me, you'll die! I'll die too!"

Bai Liu's gaze was calm, eerily unshaken. "But you worked with Mu Sicheng so many times. He trusted you to guard his back, and you never let him die."

Liu Huai was silent for a long moment before closing his eyes. "…… But I made him lose both arms."

"You did betray Mu Sicheng with the dagger in your hand," Bai Liu said flatly. "But now, you have no hands left to betray me with."

Bai Liu looked at him as if he were seeking confirmation. "Liu Huai, my approach has always been to assume my teammates can do it until proven otherwise. Can you?"

Liu Huai whispered, "I don't know."

Bai Liu withdrew his gaze without hesitation. "Then we'll try and find out."

Liu Huai's voice trembled. "What if… we die?"

"If you block Miao Feichi, I won't die easily. If you don't, I won't let you die. But if you fail completely…" Bai Liu's tone was completely indifferent. "Then I'll most likely die with you."

Liu Huai stared at him in disbelief. Bai Liu raised an eyebrow. "What? Not satisfied with me giving you a funeral?"

Liu Huai couldn't believe he was still alive.

When Bai Liu dragged him out of the mirror, he was in a daze—convinced he had already gone to hell. It wasn't until he saw his still-broken arms that he realized, with some confusion, that he had somehow survived. Bai Liu wasted no time forcing psycho-bleach into his mouth. Liu Huai coughed and choked on it, but as his mental value gradually stabilized, Little Bai Six's call came in.

After Bai Liu hung up, Liu Huai slowly pushed himself up, feeling weak but steady enough to stand. Only after Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang were carried away by the nurses did he and Bai Liu dare to step out of hiding. Since the nurses hadn't seen them earlier, they assumed no one had needed help.

Bai Liu, unbothered, lay down on the still-warm floor. "Muke will come up to us later."

The explosion had torn apart his straw bed, but Bai Liu, ever pragmatic, didn't seem to care. After a brief hesitation, Liu Huai murmured,

"If I sell you my soul now, do you want it?"

"Yes," Bai Liu answered without hesitation. "But Little Bai Six is holding my game manager right now. When he gives it back, how much do you charge for your soul?"

Liu Huai blinked in surprise, then let out a soft laugh. Bai Liu looked so serious, as if he had to seize this bargain while it was in front of him.

"I thought you wouldn't want it," Liu Huai said quietly. "After all… I'll probably die in this game. A dead man's soul isn't worth much."

"But if you really want to buy it… how much did you pay Fourth Brother?"

Bai Liu eyed him warily. "Don't set your price based on Mu Sicheng's. It was too high. I won't buy at that rate."

Liu Huai almost teared up laughing. Bai Liu had somehow turned a soul trade into a mundane business negotiation. The heaviness in his chest lifted slightly.

Dropping his gaze, Liu Huai spoke in a near whisper: "One point. I think… one point is enough."

The Loving Welfare Home

"I just want to find someone to entrust my soul to," Liu Huai murmured. "I heard someone in the guild say that the souls of players who die in the game are recycled by the system."

He fell silent for a moment. "I don't want that."

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai's content regarding soul trading is illegal and will be automatically blocked and silenced during the mini-television broadcast. Please limit mentions of this subject, or the system may consider blocking Player Liu Huai's mini-television entirely.]

Liu Huai remained quiet.

"Besides my soul, I have something else to give you, Bai Liu." Lifting her tear-streaked face, Liu Huai continued, "This is more useful than my soul. After all, I'm dying—my soul is just paper money to you. There's no real value in it. But if you sign this with me, after I die, you'll be able to use my personal skills as if they were your own."

A strange, yellowed parchment appeared before Liu Huai.

When Bai Liu reached out, the parchment drifted into his hand like unburned ash.

He glanced down.

[Twenty-four notices and various instructions regarding Party A and Party B in the transfer of personal skills before a player's death.]

[Player A voluntarily transfers their desire-derived personal skills to Player B before death. If Player B agrees to inherit Player A's skills, they will also inherit Player A's desires and become the bearer of those desires, fulfilling them on their behalf...]

[If Player B already possesses a strong desire-based personal skill, acquiring Player A's skill may result in diminished effectiveness. Additional skills acquired thereafter will continue to weaken in function...]

[Before signing, Player A is required to disclose the origin of their desire to Player B, allowing Player B to fully understand the implications before agreeing...]

[The agreement is bound by the souls of both parties. Once signed, neither party may renege until their souls are extinguished. As it involves both desire and soul, signing must be voluntary and from the heart—coercion is not permitted.]

[A copy of the agreement will be recorded in both players' systems upon signing, while the original will be held by the impartial public institution system.]

[Party A: --]
[Party B: --]

After a quick scan, Bai Liu looked up at Liu Huai. "I can't sign it now. The system isn't on my side, and I won't be able to access it later. Besides, this agreement is too restrictive for me—I'd have to inherit your desires, and any skill I gain from you would be weakened as my second skill."

His gaze flickered to Liu Huai's severed arms. The daggers, pure black with the engraving [Blood], lay at his feet.

Bai Liu paused. "You do have an interesting skill set. It's the most valuable thing you have. But it wouldn't work best for me."

"Your real goal is for me to inherit your desires, right?—to protect Liu Jiayi." Bai Liu's tone was indifferent.

Liu Huai looked at him anxiously. He had laid down all his chips, yet Bai Liu showed no eagerness to take them. It made him panic.

"Don't you want my skill?" Liu Huai asked, his voice trembling.

"It's not that I don't want them. Your skills are useful, just not for me. But there's someone better suited for them." Bai Liu lifted his eyes and looked directly at Liu Huai. "It depends on whether you're willing to change the recipient."

Liu Huai hesitated. "...Who?"

Bai Liu said, "Muke."

Muke climbed up the lower floors of the bombed-out ruins, his teeth clenched, his face twisted in pain. The still-hot concrete scalded his hands, but he pushed on.

He wasn't the athletic type—his illness had always held him back—but with all the nurses gone to rescue the half-dead patients, he had time. A lot of time.

When he finally reached the top and saw Bai Liu, his arm broken, speaking with Liu Huai, Muke's legs gave out. He collapsed to his knees, tears spilling down his face.

He had been terrified all night. When he ran downstairs to call a nurse and saw the explosion on the ninth floor, he thought he had lost his soul. He had scrambled back up, rolling and crawling, desperate.

But Bai Liu was okay.

Muke wiped his tears and lunged forward, pressing himself against Bai Liu. "You scared me to death!"

"Don't cry yet," Bai Liu said, his voice steady. He placed a hand on Muke's shoulder, turning him toward Liu Huai. "Let's get down to business."

Muke, still teary-eyed, looked at Liu Huai. The man met his gaze with a serious expression, and for some reason, that look made Muke's tears stop.

Bai Liu patted his shoulder. "Introduce yourself. Briefly. Age, family situation, future marriage plans, number of kids you intend to have, any bad habits, your education level, and how many girlfriends or boyfriends you've had."

"…?????"

What the hell?!

Am I on a blind date with Liu Huai?!

Muke blinked, completely lost. But Bai Liu's gaze remained calm, expectant.

Though still confused, Muke began to introduce himself hesitantly, almost formally. "Oh… uh, my family's pretty well off? A few tens of billions, I think? I'm not really sure, but I can go back and ask if you need me to. I'm almost 21, I don't smoke or drink, no bad habits. Future marriage… uh, haven't thought about it. Never had a boyfriend or girlfriend. Education—bachelor's degree, but I could go for a master's if I wanted."

When he finished, he turned to Bai Liu with pleading eyes, silently asking—what the hell is going on?

Bai Liu simply raised his chin. "Your turn, Liu Huai."

Liu Huai let out a long, deep breath, his eyes sweeping over Muke, almost critically. "You're not exactly my type. I'd rather have Bai Liu, but since he won't take me, I guess you'll do."

Muke stared at Bai Liu in horror.

You already went through a blind date round with this guy?! And now you're making me do it?!

Without addressing Muke's clear distress, Bai Liu handed him a parchment. "Look at this."

Muke glanced down at the document, then up at Liu Huai with a mix of emotions.

Was he… transferring his personal skills to him?

He had known Liu Huai's death was inevitable—the moment Bai Liu put his plan into motion, it had been decided. But still…

"I have a sister…" Liu Huai began, his voice distant. He spoke about Liu Jiayi, about their past, about things Muke had never known.

Bai Liu listened patiently, his gaze unreadable. Then, when Liu Huai finally stopped speaking, Bai Liu's voice cut through the air like a blade.

"What is the core of your desire?"

Liu Huai's breath hitched.

"If you want Muke to carry your life's burden—to take care of your sister—you have to be honest. Otherwise, I won't let him sign this agreement. It's engraved in his soul. And his soul belongs to me now."

Bai Liu's expression was impassive. "I need to know everything."

Liu Huai opened his mouth, then closed it again.

[System Alert: Does player Liu Huai wish to spend 200 points to purchase the sound-canceling service?]

[OK.]

[System Alert: Purchase successful. For the next ten minutes, all speech will be muted and hidden from the small TV audience. Please speak freely.]

Liu Huai turned his head, his eyes red. His voice, when he finally spoke, was hoarse. "…Jiayi and I are half-siblings."

He told his story.

About their home in a far, remote countryside, where you had to walk for an hour and a half in rubber boots just to reach the nearest road.

About his first sister—the one who drowned in the weir while their father stood by, waiting for her to catch fish, not lifting a finger to save her.

About his father, who had never cared about his education—until the village rewarded his cousin with a 20,000 yuan bonus for getting into a prestigious university. Suddenly, everything changed.

His father began beating him whenever he failed a test. Called him useless. Said he wasn't even as good as a woman.

The more he was beaten, the more afraid he became. The worse his grades got.

One day, his father brought his cousin—the brilliant university student—home to tutor him.

Liu Huai fell silent.

For so long that Bai Liu thought the story had ended.

Then Liu Huai suddenly doubled over, his entire body trembling. He gritted his teeth, took a deep breath, and let out a laugh—empty, miserable.

"Do you know why Jiayi was born blind?"

Bai Liu's eyes flickered. He looked up at the night sky, his voice light. "Many birth defects are caused by inbreeding."

Muke's breath hitched. Realization slammed into him like a punch.

"Holy shit… No way. That's illegal. Someone must've done something

—"

Liu Huai let his head fall.

His voice was barely above a whisper.

"No one cared. It was too dirty. Everyone who knew covered it up. My cousin tried to report it, tried to get an abortion, but my father refused. He said she was carrying another ‘college student’ for the family. And with my grandfather’s help, he got his way."

A few months after Jiayi was born, premature and blind, his cousin drowned in the weir. Just like his first sister.

And his father?

He stood by and watched.

Liu Huai clenched his fists. "I studied like crazy. I got into a prestigious university. Took the 20,000 yuan and ran away with Jiayi." His voice cracked. "But my father followed. He demanded money. Tortured us. I wanted to kill him—I spied on him a million times, thought about stabbing him in his sleep—but I never did it. I was a coward. I couldn’t risk losing the life I fought so hard for."

He fell to his knees, forehead pressed against the ground, crying without sound.

Beside him, the black dagger engraved with 【Blood】lay in the dirt. A symbol of his sins. His desires. His agony.

Bai Liu’s voice was soft but merciless. "You’re an assassin who wants to kill but is too afraid to do it."

Liu Huai exhaled shakily. "Yes."

Liu Huai looked up at Muke, eyes red. "Will you live bravely for me? Will you take my dagger and protect Liu Jiayi?"

Muke hesitated. Looked at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu simply smiled. "I suggest you accept. A skill will only help you. But in the end, the choice is yours."

Muke turned back to Liu Huai.

His hands trembled as he reached for the dagger.

The hilt pulsed beneath his fingers, warm, like living flesh.

For a moment, he felt everything—Liu Huai's fear, his desperation, his rage.

Muke looked at him—this broken man, drowning in his own past—and for the first time, he understood.

"I accept," he whispered. "I will inherit your skill as an assassin."

Liu Huai exhaled, eyelids fluttering shut. "…Thank you."

The Loving Welfare Home

Bai Liu and Liu Huai were finally carried away by a nurse who arrived late.

It was bound to be a chaotic night—Muke running after them in a panic, the child monsters in the hospital frightened by the explosion and disappearing into the shadows.

After a rushed and unprofessional treatment, Bai Liu and Liu Huai—who had not suffered any blast injuries but had lost a significant amount of blood—were quickly taken out of the operating room and returned to their original wards.

The nurses had initially intended to place them in the intensive care unit, but the ward was already full of more critical patients. Since Bai Liu and Liu Huai were in relatively stable condition, they had no choice but to remain in the general ward.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, on the other hand, had sustained severe injuries and were now in intensive care on the first floor, both in a coma and unlikely to wake up anytime soon.

At the moment, they had no major offensive force left.

Liu Huai had lost both arms, Bai Liu's strength and vitality were nearly depleted—he was hanging by a thread. If anyone so much as touched him, he might die. Muke, though in better shape, only had six life points remaining.

Even if Muke attacked with his dagger, Miao Gaojiang would remain motionless, his defenses too strong for Muke to break through within an hour.

And if they did wake those two up, they would likely be the first to die—so it was best to stay put for now. Their objective had largely been achieved.

With Bai Liu and Muke's wards destroyed in the explosion, returning to them was out of the question. The blast had rendered the available space even scarcer, making it impossible for them to share a room with other monster investors. They had no choice but to settle in Liu Huai's ward.

Liu Huai lay on the bed, while Muke and Bai Liu tore pages from books and laid them on the floor to make makeshift bedding for the night.

After setting up his own sleeping area, Bai Liu did not lie down. Instead, he pulled a pen from the drawer, placed the torn paper on his lap, and began writing and drawing something at random.

Muke peered over curiously. “Bai Liu, what are you writing?”

Bai Liu replied, “I’m piecing together the clues we have so far, both in-game and out-of-game.”

“Oh! Right, that reminds me!” Muke suddenly perked up, speaking earnestly as he reported his findings. “When I was going through the medical records downstairs, I noticed something. The [renewal formula] suggests that selecting children with [pure blood] means prioritizing those with direct blood relations. But when I checked the files, most investor patients selected children who weren’t biologically related to them.”

“—And yet, they still achieved relatively good treatment results, correct?” Bai Liu continued writing, not lifting his gaze. “We’re a minority—players assigned NPC children who are system-designated as our blood relatives.”

“Logically speaking, most investors wouldn’t have biological children readily available to exploit. They wouldn’t go searching through orphanages for a child related to them either.”

Bai Liu casually sketched a small house resembling an orphanage and two or three long, thin, ghostly figures labeled as [investors]. Between the orphanage and the investors, he wrote: [Probability of no blood connection].

Tapping his pen thoughtfully against the paper, Bai Liu mused, “So, blood relation is only one interpretation of [blood purity] in the [renewal formula]. It’s likely a mechanic intended for players like us. For the real investors and businessmen outside the game, this [blood purity] clearly has another meaning.”

“In other words, the children who meet this definition aren’t necessarily biologically related to the investors—there must be another criterion for what qualifies as [pure blood].” Muke nodded in agreement, then frowned. “But I don’t really understand how the investors determine which children to select.”

“If [blood purity] referred simply to matching blood types, I’d expect the chosen children to have the same ABO or RH blood type as the investors. But when I checked the records, I found inconsistencies—some investors’ chosen children had entirely different blood types.”

Muke analyzed the data meticulously. “I even reviewed their biochemical markers, hemoglobin levels, and background information, including their geographical origins. No pattern emerged. I couldn’t pinpoint what criteria the investors used to define [blood purity].”

His brows furrowed in confusion. “And another strange thing—many of the selected children weren’t healthy at all.”

“—They had various congenital diseases or defects, didn’t they?” Bai Liu’s eyes remained fixed on a point on his paper. “Strange, isn’t it? Why would investors choose frail children with congenital disorders instead of healthy ones?”

Muke’s eyes widened in surprise. “How did you know that? I only noticed the pattern after combing through numerous case files.”

“I had my suspicions before, but I thought the idea was too far-fetched—even for someone like me. But Liu Jiayi’s birth confirmed it.” Bai Liu’s expression darkened as he sketched a small girl and shaded in her eyes with his pencil. His tone was unreadable.

“This [blood purity] has nothing to do with blood types, biochemical markers, or hemoglobin levels.”

Liu Huai, upon hearing Liu Jiayi’s name, struggled to sit up and looked at Bai Liu.

Bai Liu gazed down at the drawing of the little girl.

“This [blood purity] refers to children who are ethically ‘pure’ in blood.”

“They are all products of inbreeding—children born with congenital defects.”

[System Alert: Congratulations to Player Bai Liu for unlocking the hidden branch message of the main identity line—The True Meaning of Blood Purity.]

[System Tip: Among all the children, there is one special child whose blood alone is enough to save an investor. No additional blood transfusions are required, nor is a blood relation necessary. Guess who it is?]

Silence fell over the ward.

A shiver ran down Muke's spine as he whispered, "…No way. Are these investors deliberately seeking out children with congenital disabilities?"

Bai Liu drew a simple diagram—two circles connected by a line—and labeled it with [Aa] and [Aa]. Muke instantly recognized it as a genetic inheritance chart.

"Normally, each of us carries recessive genetic traits," Bai Liu explained, his tone cold. "Inbreeding increases the probability of these recessive genes manifesting, leading to congenital disorders. This probability is known as the inbreeding coefficient."

"My medical knowledge is average, but I've read about it while designing games. Inbreeding also raises the risk of chromosomal abnormalities."

Muke's thoughts wandered. What kind of books does Bai Liu read for game development? …No wonder most of his games don't pass the review.

"Inbreeding doesn't directly equate to congenital disorders, but it does raise the likelihood. However, that still doesn't explain how the investors identify [pure blood] children when orphanage records lack parental history."

"There's a screening mechanism," Bai Liu said, his gaze sharpening. "And you've already seen it once."

Muke froze. "…I have?"

His eyes drifted to the paper in Bai Liu's hands, where Bai Liu had just drawn a large mushroom—a blood lingzhi.

Muke paled. "…The poisoned mushroom incidents in orphanages…?"

"Blood lingzhi thrives on the blood of [pure blood] children. It needs their blood to grow properly," Bai Liu murmured, tracing over the mushroom sketch.

"Children who consume it and survive with only mild anemia—rather than full-blown poisoning—are the ones being screened. Those children meet the [pure blood] criteria.”

Muke’s body prickled with goosebumps.

“…Then, Liu Jiayi’s poisoning case doesn’t make sense…” he hesitated, his voice trailing off.

"Yes!!!" Liu Huai joined the discussion with a dark expression and fear in his eyes. "When Jiayi's accident happened, there were no investors left to screen them at the orphanage anymore! Why would there be such a massive poisoning?"

Bai Liu lifted his eyes and looked blandly at Liu Huai, sitting on the bed. "In reality, the orphanage is on the verge of closing down, and no one wants to take over these abandoned children, but the actual value of these children is very high, equal to the value of life. If you were the custodian of this pile of goods, what would you do?"

Liu Huai, sitting on the bed, stared at Bai Liu in shock and uncertainty, as if he feared the man who so coldly compared children to commodities.

Bai Liu indifferently continued, "If I were the director of this orphanage, in order to benefit further from these goods, I would start a screening process to select the most useful ones and destroy the useless ones that waste resources. The quality ones would be used as leverage to attract new investors."

Bai Liu glanced at Muke, who suddenly remembered that his father seemed to be investing in the orphanage. Muke frantically waved his hands. "Although my dad is not a great man, if the director of the orphanage offered him this... kind of advice, he would never accept such a heartless offer! He's a man with a moral compass!"

"Really?" Bai Liu suddenly lowered his tone, leaning forward and moving closer to Muke, who subconsciously took a few steps back at the look in Bai Liu's eyes.

Bai Liu's dark eyes appeared haunted and strangely focused in the dimly lit ward, staring at Muke as if trying to pull his most unseemly thoughts from the depths of his mind.

"If I tell your father that these five children are about to be drained of blood by the Blood Lingzhi in their bodies, and that if you don’t want them to die too, you go to the police now... I will kill them immediately. You are wasting these children's lives by doing nothing..."

"You're so old, yet you haven't prepared for the inevitable, have you? Your child is also precocious, right? This Blood Lingzhi can cure all diseases, even for your child..."

"Let these children live their last days in peace. After all, they're deformed. When they grow up, they won't be able to enter society. Life will be hard, and they will only be able to live in this narrow orphanage..."

"Some of the children have severe depression and suicidal tendencies, and no methods have helped. They're congenital, inbred— they don't live very long. It's voluntary. How can you force them? We talk to the kids properly, promise them cakes, sweets, and toys, and they're all overjoyed..."

"Let them live a simple, happy life with plenty of supplies, even if they won't live long..."

"We are an orphanage. A place to do good..." Bai Liu lowered his eyes and whispered in a voice that sounded like a seductive degradation to Muke, who had cowered into a corner. "We love these children more than you do. How could we harm them? You're saving them by making their lives better and sending them to a better place."

Bai Liu slowly lifted his eyelids, calmly meeting Muke's eyes with a predicted look. "So, now what? What will your father choose?"

Muke's heart tingled at the look in Bai Liu's eyes, and he opened his mouth, but no words came out.

"Don't expect to restrain them with human morality just to stop them from gaining benefits," Bai Liu said faintly as he withdrew his gaze and returned to his original position. "Doing so would only turn the acquisition of profit into something moralistic."

Liu Huai sat paralyzed on the bed, stunned for a long time. He felt a lingering fear in his chest and finally spoke, "...Bai Liu, if Jiayi is now chosen by this mushroom to suck blood, is it possible that if we don't pass the level soon to find out the solution to this Blood Lingzhi, Jiayi will..."

Bai Liu was quiet, and instead of answering Liu Huai's words, he retreated to where he had been sitting, his eyes focused on the little girl he had drawn on the paper in his hands.

Black and white lines outlined the little girl, curled up with her legs, and Bai Liu had written a blood count on her—50 (?).

This meant that Liu Jiayi's blood level was unknown, and she was in a constant state of depletion.

Caring Orphanage, Wednesday morning, 3:45 AM.
Craft classroom.

The other four children, apart from Bai Liu, were locked in a craft room at the back of the orphanage, where the teacher had confined them. The craft room was located deep inside the institution, with no windows on three walls. The only wall with windows faced the corridor, opposite the toilets. The caregivers and teachers came to use the toilets frequently, making the craft room a perfect small prison to lock up misbehaving children who might try to escape.

The room was filled with canvases, glue, cloth, and other craft materials scattered randomly on the floor. These had once been used to make gifts for the investors, but now they were scattered not because the children had made gifts yesterday, but because of the angry, agitated Miao Feichi.

He frantically swept everything to the floor, walking in circles around the room. Miao Gaojiang watched him silently when Miao Feichi suddenly turned to him and shouted, "Do something about it! Tomorrow I'm going to be taken for a blood draw! Then we're all finished! Dead!"

Just as Miao Gaojiang was about to respond, the classroom door burst open, and the teacher returned from the infirmary with two pale children, Liu Jiayi and Muke, in her arms.

Liu Jiayi and Muke had just been sent for check-ups because they were both having health issues. Liu Jiayi had been vomiting blood, and Muke had heartburn. After the check-up, they were sent to this mini-prison, the craft room, to prevent them from escaping.

The teacher turned to Muke and Liu Jiayi. "You two aren't in serious trouble. Stay here quietly, and when the investors come tomorrow, you'll be taken to a private hospital. I don't want to see anyone else trying to escape."

With that, she turned and left, closing the door behind her.

Muke crouched on the floor, clutching her heart, while Liu Jiayi leaned against the wall, frowning and breathing deeply. Her lips were pale, and neither child looked as though they were doing fine, contrary to what the teacher had said.

Miao Feichi, furious at the sight of the two struggling, raised his hand and charged forward, cursing, "Damn it, we wouldn't have gotten out without you!"

As his slap was about to land on him and Liu Jiayi, Muke subconsciously stood in front of Liu Jiayi and reached out to catch Miao Feichi's hand, arguing, "You can't get out without us! There are monsters out there!"

Liu Jiayi slowly slid down the wall to the floor, her face weak, her lips barely moving between her covered fingers as she struggled to breathe, looking worse than Muke.

Miao Feichi looked at the frail Liu Jiayi, swallowing a mouthful of saliva. He grabbed Muke, ripping her away, and then stepped toward Liu Jiayi in the corner. His eyes became unfocused, and he swallowed repeatedly. "Damn, tomorrow I'm going to be eaten. I haven't even had a bite of what I want to eat..."

Muke, who had been pushed away by Miao Feichi, tried to position himself in front of Liu Jiayi again. Having been taught to protect girls at that age, and recognizing that Miao Feichi was clearly wrong, he bravely shielded Liu Jiayi with his arms wide open. "Miao Feichi, I've told you! I told you! We have nothing to do with you not running away! If you dare lay a finger on Jiayi, I'll tell Bai Six!"

The experience of fleeing and being left behind together quickly shortened the psychological distance between young Muke and Liu Jiayi, whom he now saw as a little sister—just as vulnerable as he was, but someone he needed to protect.

Knowing he had no power to resist Miao Feichi, young Muke wasn't sure what the two men had agreed upon with Bai Six. However, it was clear that Bai Six could control Miao Feichi, so Muke, the child, had no choice but to threaten him.

Muke's eyes widened, but his tone remained calm and persuasive. "You wouldn't dare disobey Bai Six, would you? If Bai Six sees you doing this to us tomorrow, what do you think will happen to you?"

Miao Feichi stepped back from them, his expression turning fierce as he swatted Muke aside. "I'm no better off now! Get the hell out of my way! I'm going to do whatever I want with this little blind girl today, and if you try to stop me, I'll make sure you regret it!"

Muke shuddered at the sight of Miao Feichi's bloodshot eyes, while Liu Jiayi suddenly screamed, "Teacher! Teacher!"

A teacher, who had been passing by on her way to the restroom, heard Liu Jiayi's cry and hurriedly entered, clearly annoyed. "What's going on now?"

As Muke was about to point at Miao Feichi, Miao Feichi's eyes lit up, and he quickly spoke, standing up and smiling at the teacher. "Teacher, I had a little fight with Muke and Miao Gaojiang, but it's nothing serious."

Young Muke was stunned by his words but quickly scowled. He stood up and shouted, "Miao Gaojiang and I didn't have any trouble with Miao Feichi! He’s the one who tried to bully—"

"There's a conflict!" Miao Feichi interrupted, raising his voice. His eyes narrowed, and the corners of his mouth curled into an evil smile as he turned his head slowly to look at Teacher Xiang. "Sensei, if I stay with them, we'll probably keep fighting, and it won't be good for anyone if someone gets hurt, right? I didn't hit them too hard, and Muke has a heart condition, right? What if I kick them twice and something happens?"

Muke's face turned red with anger, but the teacher frowned. "This is getting out of hand. Let's separate you."

Miao Feichi smiled in satisfaction. "Teacher, Miao Gaojiang also bullied Liu Jiayi when we were fighting, but I don't bully girls."

Muke's eyes bulged in fury, and in his haste, he sputtered, "Liar!!!" It was the worst curse word he could muster at his age.

"A couple of kids having an internal fight." The teacher glanced around the room and concluded, "Then you and Liu Jiayi will stay together. Don't cause any more trouble."

Muke finally saw his chance and interjected, "Teacher, he's the one bullying—"

Miao Feichi turned to Muke with a smile. "Think about it, Muke. I'm not staying with Miao Gaojiang. It's either with you or Liu Jiayi. Have you considered what will happen if you stay in a room with me?"

The look in his eyes was so menacing and bloodthirsty that it made Muke's skin crawl. He took two steps back but, upon glancing at Liu Jiayi, who was still panting from shouting at the teacher, he gritted his teeth and said, "I'll share with you."

At that moment, Liu Jiayi slowly stood up, fumbling with her hands before placing one in the teacher's outstretched palm. She bowed her head, an unreadable expression on her face. "Teacher, let's go over there."

Muke jumped up and down. "Jiayi! Don't go with him!"

Liu Jiayi turned her head and "looked" at Muke with a smile, her eyebrows arched. Her tone was light and seemingly pleasant. "Don't worry about me, I have a plan."

Muke froze for a second, then instinctively took a half-step back.

Liu Jiayi's smile had sent a strange chill down his spine. It felt as if she had anticipated Miao Feichi's actions and had intentionally kept them together in the same room.

And she seemed to condone Miao Feichi's behavior.

Muke remembered that Liu Jiayi had once proposed killing the teacher when leaving the orphanage to delay their discovery, but Bai Six had vetoed it, arguing that the n-whatever c in the orphanage shouldn't be executed lightly, a reasoning Muke didn't quite understand. Still, Liu Jiayi had said that if something went wrong, they could always blame Miao Feichi and the others.

There was an almost naive cruelty in Liu Jiayi. She was intelligent, quick-witted, and extremely capable—except that she was invisible, a schemer on the same level as Bai Six.

The plan to escape from the orphanage had been devised by her and Bai Six together.

It took Liu Jiayi, a blind girl, only a minute to deceive the teacher, and she had even considered killing her on the way out to prevent the teacher from waking up and chasing after her. However, little Bai Six had paused and said, "I thought so too, but no, killing is too much of a waste of time for us."

As Muke watched Miao Feichi and Liu Jiayi being led away by the teacher, a sense of unease filled him.

Liu Jiayi, no matter how clever, was still a young girl. The physical disparity between her and Miao Feichi was something that intellect couldn't counter.

Ahhhhh! What should I do? Muke thought. If only Bai Six were here!

The teacher led Miao Feichi and Liu Jiayi to another craft room.

Liu Jiayi was crouched silently in a corner at the bottom right of the craft room, where she had made her dolls yesterday. The box in this corner still contained some scraps of fabric.

"Ah! It's bleeding." Liu Jiayi let out a soft cry as she put her finger in her mouth, dropping her eyelids to cover her cloudy eyes. She spoke vaguely, as if with some regret. "It's a bit of a waste... it's blood that could've saved my brother."

Miao Feichi, who had been gulping nervously since entering, approached Liu Jiayi step by step, a fierce and frenzied look on his face, like a starving man seeing a feast for the first time.

After seeing Liu Jiayi stab herself, a drop of bright red blood oozed from her white fingertips. The sight stirred something dark in Miao Feichi's chest as he stepped closer to her.

"What are you looking at, sister Jiayi?" Miao Feichi, ready to start, glanced at Liu Jiayi's cloth case.

Yesterday, Liu Jiayi had spent the whole day hunched in the corner, her face a smile as she worked on the box. In the end, she had created an ugly doll with thick, awkward stitches that didn't resemble a normal sewn doll—it seemed like its limbs would fall off if pulled too hard...

But Miao Feichi remembered seeing Liu Jiayi ask Teacher Xiang for a needle the day before. The teacher had refused, saying it was too dangerous for a blind person, so where had she gotten the needle to sew the doll?

Miao Feichi peered inside the cloth box, his pupils dilating as Liu Jiayi, still smiling, tilted her head. "I'll have to sew my brother's doll with a needle."

The box was filled with various fabrics, and among them, a blood-stained needle was stuck in the head of a half-finished doll—almost penetrating it.

And that doll was dressed in the exact same clothes as Miao Feichi.

"Isn't it nice? I made it," Liu Jiayi said as she slowly stood up. Her pale face lit with an innocent smile. She hid the doll behind her back and approached Miao Feichi, syringe in hand. "According to the 50% mortality rate of Level 2, it takes at least 1.6 children's blood to save one player. I don't think I can save my brother with my own blood, so I'd like to ask Miao Feichi to donate some blood."

Miao Feichi took half a step back and landed on his buttocks, hysterically shouting, "Teacher! Teacher, help!!!"

Miao Feichi lay like a puddle of mud, his neck craned back. He whimpered as tears streamed from his eyes.

"No one can hear your cries for help, Brother Feichi," Liu Jiayi crouched beside him, her head cocked and eyes blinking as she gazed at him, "I've heard your little TV videos before. I heard you like to eat the flesh of children, piece by piece?"

"I also like drawing blood from your veins one at a time." Liu Jiayi smiled sweetly, dimples forming at the corners of her mouth. "Have you ever seen a little rabbit having its blood drawn from its ears? They can end up executed by air injection from here. It's said to be a painful death, almost like semi-asphyxiation. I had a little hamster before, my brother gave it to me, and I was going to experiment on it."

"Unfortunately, it was too fragile, and I cried when it died shortly after I played with it." Liu Jiayi lovingly stroked Miao Feichi's head, but her tone remained light. "Do you want to be my little hamster?"

Miao Feichi, face streaked with tears, trembled at the sight of the large, glowing syringe in her hand. He shook his head vigorously, full of fear.

"The little hamster doesn't have the right to refuse," Liu Jiayi said with a smile. "I'm starting now."

The Loving Welfare Home

Wednesday, 4:17 am.

Liu Huai was anxious about Bai Liu's speculation. He had lost a lot of blood and was worried about his sister, so his health and mental state were deteriorating. Bai Liu took advantage of the situation and knocked Liu Huai out with a sleeping pill.

Liu Huai now lay sound asleep on the straw bed, while Bai Liu and Muke remained awake, sorting and analyzing the information they had gathered today—mainly from Muke's case files and from Bai Liu's observations of Little Bai Six.

Muke glanced at Liu Huai, who slept peacefully on the straw bed, his feelings mixed. He remembered his own behavior earlier that morning and realized that Bai Liu had a rather rogue way of dealing with people. When he couldn't get through to someone, he would just drug them, which was... not something a nice person would typically do.

Muke slowly shifted his gaze to Bai Liu, who was leaning against the wall, still analyzing the combined information.

Bai Liu leaned against the wall, one leg bent over the paper, the other stretched out casually. His face showed obvious fatigue, his eyes distinctly darkened with exhaustion, but his gaze remained clear and calm. He continued to write with a pen on the paper, speaking evenly, "Now that we have a general understanding of how the orphanage operates and most of the information in the copy, most of the points I was wondering about have been explained. But there are still two remaining points that are best not discussed in front of Liu Huai."

Muke blinked in surprise.

Bai Liu looked up at Liu Huai, still asleep on the hospital bed, then continued, "First, why are Liu Huai and Liu Jiayi bound together, with their life points reduced to fifty?"

"I had speculated earlier that it might be due to her being poisoned, but there were two issues with that theory. First, Liu Huai's lifesteal was also cut in half. But now, after combining the information you gave me, Muke, and what I got from Little Bai Six and Liu Huai last night, I've disproved that possibility. There's another point of doubt."

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed slightly, his gaze steady as he marked a big question mark on a sketch of the skinny girl in his notes. "The second point—if Liu Jiayi was infected in reality by the blood lingzhi due to her inbreeding, or if she was parasitized by this blood-sucking mushroom, it doesn't make sense for her to have vomited blood during her escape. The blood lingzhi wouldn't waste her blood like that."

"Another oddity was the timing of her blood vomiting. It wasn't early, but late—just as she was about to escape and touch the gate," Bai Liu continued, his eyes narrowing further. "Little Bai Six was right to hesitate and be cautious. If it were me, I would have suspected that she didn't want to escape and was deliberately delaying things."

Muke's scalp tingled as he listened. He lowered his voice and asked, "Bai Liu, what are you implying...?"

"But now, after piecing together enough information, it's clear that she was acting and lying to me, or rather, to Little Bai Six," Bai Liu said, his eyes glazing over in conclusion.

A chill ran up Muke's spine. "But why would Liu Jiayi do that? She's not doing herself any favors by staying in the orphanage!"

Bai Liu turned his gaze to Liu Huai's sleeping face. "I think she wanted to save her brother, and she planned to stay in the orphanage until her brother came to draw her blood."

"But she'll die herself, won't she?" Muke asked, confused. "How old is she? Isn't she afraid to die?"

Bai Liu paused for a moment. "She doesn't have to die."

Muke became even more confused. "Why? If she gets her blood drawn, she'll die when her life runs out. With only fifty life points, she's more likely to die."

Bai Liu slowly raised his eyes. "What if she has a personal skill that restores her lifesteal?"

Muke stared at Bai Liu in stunned disbelief. "Holy shit! No way! You mean she..."

At that moment, Liu Huai, half-asleep, was nudged awake. As soon as he opened his eyes, he saw Bai Liu's calm, unnerving gaze, which sent a slight shiver down his spine.

"Jiayi—" Liu Huai shook his head, remembering the argument he had with Bai Liu before he went to bed. His sleepiness faded instantly, replaced by anxiety. "Bai Liu! You promised me you'd save Jiayi! I've done everything for you! You promised!"

Bai Liu responded nonchalantly, "Perhaps your sister doesn't need saving from either of us."

Bai Liu then shared his suspicions.

Liu Huai was stunned, his mind sluggish from blood loss. He stared at Bai Liu's emotionless face, confusion clouding his thoughts. "What do you mean, Jiayi is acting and lying?"

Bai Liu lifted his eyes. "You still don't understand. I told you a long time ago that your sister is not as innocent as you think. She's very clever—cleverer than you and I expected."

"The system nerfed your group for game balance, mainly to nerf your sister. Without nerfing her, the game would have been unfair to the rest of us, because her personal skills are too strong. In a game where more life points are an advantage, without nerfing her and your life, the game would be unplayable. She's essentially a cheat."

"Liu Jiayi has always played the good sister to you. Even Little Bai Six was fooled by her. But eventually, it came out—because of you."

Bai Liu looked straight at Liu Huai. "She guessed the mechanics of this game. She wanted to save you, so she didn't want to run. She pretended to vomit blood to stay in the orphanage, waiting for you to pick her up for a blood draw tomorrow. She didn't want you to discover her true nature, so she was careful from the start. But in the end, she made a mistake—because of you."

Liu Huai shook his head in disbelief, muttering that this was impossible. His body, unbalanced due to the loss of an arm, wobbled as he tried to get out of bed, nearly falling. Muke scrambled to help him.

Muke couldn't bear to watch Liu Huai's expression. What Bai Liu had revealed to Liu Huai so far was only a fraction of the cruel truth.

Liu Huai staggered out of bed and approached Bai Liu, his gaze vacant and tearful, as if unable to comprehend Bai Liu's words.

"How could... identity? She's just a little kid. What identity could she possibly have? I'm going to protect her..." Liu Huai whispered.

Bai Liu tilted his head, his gaze piercing. "Liu Huai, from the beginning, we've had the wrong logical assumption. It wasn't you who influenced Liu Jiayi to enter the game."

Liu Huai stood frozen, head bowed, waiting for Bai Liu to tell him the painful truth.

Bai Liu spoke slowly, each word clear and deliberate, "Rather, Liu Jiayi's desires influenced you to enter the game. She was a player who entered before you, someone who forced the system to weaken her lifesteal and then bound you, her brother, to limit her. She's a player with very specific personal skills."

Liu Huai was silent for a long time, before he slowly lowered his head, his expression dull and dazed.

Bai Liu's eyes were ancient, his tone calm. "Liu Jiayi is the little witch. She's the one who will team up with Zhang Gui in the league. She's the new star player launched by the King's Guild—the rookie ranked number one on the Rising Star list. Her personal skill can actively restore life value."

Game Hall, Inside the King's Guild, Queen Hearts' Office.

Hearts lazily crossed her heels, letting them wobble as she gave a large, bored yawn, resting her cheeks in her hands and rolling her eyes. She watched as the people on stage gave her a long and tedious briefing.

The debriefer read the report aloud, "Next is a small TV data analysis of each member of the King's Guild for this quarter..."

"Among our team members this season, the fastest rising overall stats for small TV is the newcomer [Little Witch], who has been firmly locked in first place on the Nightmare Rising Star list since she entered the game seven weeks ago. She has a high popularity and support rate, and after a few large group battles, she has become a core support player within the guild. Her output and support have been exceptional since joining..."

With that, the debriefer tapped on his system panel, and a large video panel floated in front of the Queen of Hearts, like a PowerPoint presentation. The debriefer slid across the top of the panel, eventually stopping on a video.

The video above was titled [Forbidden Witch's Collection of High Energy Cuts - Tonight I Have a Bottle of Poison, I Have an Antidote, but It's Not Christmas Eve. Guess Who I'm Going to Kill?]

The Queen of Hearts barely showed any interest at first, but the title caught her attention, and she sat up a little straighter. She raised her hand and tapped the video screen, signaling the reporter to play it. "You've got the [Little Witch] support video ready? Show it to me."

The video began as Hearts gestured.

The pitch-black video slowly began to reveal itself in white smoke. In the swirling haze, a player draped in a black floor-length lace dress appeared. She was no taller than half the height of an adult, glancing briefly at the camera before looking away without a care. A veil covered her face, making it impossible to see who was underneath, adding to her mystery.

She walked barefoot through the misty jungle of early morning. Her pale skin showed through the openwork patterns of the lace embroidery, and her footsteps were light and graceful, though that mystery was soon broken.

Hordes of monsters appeared in the jungle, writhing from the rotting ground along vines. Players ran and shouted, but they were soon overtaken and devoured by the monsters.

Two glass vials with liquids protruded from beneath her black veil as she darted through the jungle, black smoke rising from her veil. With swift, clean movements, she dispersed the liquid from the vials, causing the monsters to rot away.

Players who begged for mercy rotted alongside the monsters, while the witch saved the players in her party with great precision. She didn't even spare a glance at the others, even though her magic potions could have easily saved them too.

The video rapidly cut between different game scenes, with the witch hidden beneath her black veil bringing death with poison and then delivering the antidote to save those on the brink of decay.

Her steps were light and agile, moving between monsters and players with ease. Her black veil, soaked with the blood of the dead monsters and fallen players, grew heavier and stickier. It was impossible to tell whether it was a person or a ghost beneath it.

Blood dripped from the veil onto her pale feet, and she shook it off without care, along with the hand of a player still gripping her ankle in a death grip. The hand left a hideous bloody print on her ankle, which was soon covered by the veil as she leapt away.

"[Little Witch]'s gameplay is precise. Her standards are extremely high, and her attacks are simple yet efficient and ruthless. Her psychological strength rivals that of many seasoned players in the league. It's hard to believe this is... is a..."

The debriefer paused, looking at the system panel with a complicated expression.

The Queen of Hearts smiled knowingly and continued unhurriedly, "You can't imagine this is a girl who's only eight years old and still blind, can you?"

The debriefer sighed tersely, "Yes, Empress. The Little Witch was only seven when she first entered the game. She quickly outplayed a group of newcomers and took first place. She's very intelligent and adapted to her skills quickly."

"The Little Witch's skills are so unique and rare that many guilds tried to control her, threatening her into joining their ranks. Instead of succumbing to their tactics, she realized her own value and started a charge bid, saying she would join whichever guild gave her the most points."

"Yes, she's quite clever," Hearts recalled with amusement. "All the guilds in the top ten got involved in the charge bids. It was a very crazy time."

"And she surged to the top of the Rising Star list in just seven games, moving between guilds and working with different teams. It made all the guilds realize her value. Rather than trying to control her, they all decided to charge points to recruit her, which only made the bidding more frantic. I remember when her charge for a game went up to 300,000 points."

"Yes," the debriefer patted his chest, "That's an astronomical amount for a newcomer. Our guild combined to charge at least half a million to seven hundred thousand points just to win the bid for Little Witch's small TV."

Hearts casually flipped through the profile on the reporting system, and Liu Huai's face appeared on the screen.

Looking at Liu Huai's confused expression, Hearts laughed softly, her smile widening as she tilted her head, letting her long hair fall off her shoulders. "And even with all those points, if our guild player Wang Shun hadn't discovered her weakness—her brother, Liu Huai, who happened to enter the game at that time and was known to us—Little Witch might not have joined our King's Guild in the end."

"But, Empress, this is something I'm wondering as well," the debriefer said, confused as he rummaged through the system panel. "After the Little Witch joined the King's Guild, why didn't she simply bring her brother into our guild? Why did she go through such a convoluted method of Zhang Gui controlling him? And after Liu Huai joined, why didn't Little Witch let him know she was our ace rookie? Why did she let Zhang Gui torture him like that?"

The debriefer furrowed his brow, looking at the profiles of Little Witch and Liu Huai with mixed feelings. "It seems like her weakness is her brother, yet there's something almost cruel about the way she treats him..."

"And now, as the season approaches, why is Little Witch still refusing our offer to fully restore her sight with a prop eye? Why does she continue to use some intermittent prop to restore her sight during the game, staying in a semi-blind state? And why have you, Empress, allowed this? A Little Witch who could see on the field would be far more helpful to us."

The debriefer looked at the Queen of Hearts, full of questions.

Hearts' feet buckled, her heels slipping off her feet as she ignored them, instead sweeping a smirking glance across the desk at her reporter. "You didn't seriously read the information Wang Shun found about the little witch, did you? Go look at the core of her desire to enter the game."

The debriefer was stunned, quickly moving to click on the profile of [Little Witch] that Wang Shun had synthesized and analyzed.

Wang Shun's report on the core of [Little Witch's] desire to enter the game: [to be loved by her brother, to be with her brother forever, to be loved by her brother forever].

Such childlike desires were exactly the kind an innocent eight-year-old girl might wish for.

But the reporters knew beyond a shadow of a doubt that the little witch, who danced on the palms of everyone's hands begging for help, and bounced from guild to guild with ease, was no child. She was bloody, cruel, indifferent, with the wisdom of an adult and the innate recklessness of a minor.

Her [core desires] seemed like she was throwing them out at random to fool people.

The debriefer furrowed his brow as he looked at the [Core of Desire]. "Empress, I don't understand..."

"You really don't know anything about women," the Queen of Hearts said, her bare foot nudging the floor. Leaning forward, her smooth hair slid down her collarbone to her snow-white chest, making the reporters avert their gazes, some of them blushing.

But the Queen of Hearts only smiled, leaning forward without a care in the world. "Don't you wonder why the little witch's desire is to be loved by her brother? That's certainly because she feels she hasn't gotten it yet."

The debriefer was stunned.

The Queen of Hearts lazily rested her head on her hand, smiling flirtatiously. "That's how it is with wise women. The little witch's upbringing made her completely distrustful of men. She had a purely natural aversion to them, especially to Liu Huai, who triggered her bad upbringing. But she couldn't bring herself to care about Liu Huai. I don't trust men either, but that doesn't contradict my desire to be loved by them—and most of the time, I do."

"Of course, we both knew that Liu Huai's desires centered around saving his sister. But to recruit this suspicious, still slightly youthful, intelligent young girl, I chose to withhold from her what we had researched about Liu Huai." The Queen of Hearts shrugged, exposing her snowy white shoulder as she leaned back in her chair like she had no bones. The smile on her lips remained undiminished. "I taught her a more reliable way to get the love she wanted."

The reporter blinked in disbelief. "It's true that you personally recruited the little witch at first. We're not sure of the exact process, but I remember that at the time, you took a confidential level transcendent god-grade prop from the guild warehouse to the little witch, and she agreed to join. But what exactly is this prop? It was always kept secret from us."

"Hearts," the Queen of Hearts whispered with a lazy smile, "It's about to start the game, so I'll tell you. The prop I took to her from the warehouse is called [Psyche's Tears], a consciousness-level prop in a beautiful glass vial. And it was perfect for the little witch. The instructions for that prop said that when you drank it, you could be with the person you wanted to be with, forever. But the drug would guide her into some pretty interesting actions... I drank it too."

Her smile was like that of an older sister giving advice, her voice a compelling murmur. "The little witch was very hostile and wary of men, but she had a natural trust and affection for women, especially grown women like me who had similar experiences to hers and expected a lot from her. Eventually, at my urging, she drank the potion."

Hearts dropped her long eyelashes carelessly, casting a light shadow on her pupils. "Then she began to control the brother who kept her on edge, step by step, under the influence of the drug, eliminating the possibility of the man being in any danger and dividing his attention between others, eventually turning him into Zhang Gui's puppet."

The debriefer shivered.

Hearts laughed softly. "But soon, the little witch regretted not wanting a puppet, a soulless brother. She would doubt whether the love she received through the prop was real, and feel guilty for hurting Liu Huai in the process."

"She was more and more afraid to leave Liu Huai, unsatisfied and unable to be fully convinced. She was bewildered, terrified of the possibility of not being together forever. Eventually, at my suggestion, she kept asking for more and more [Psyche's Tears] to secure this possibility of being together. After all, the effect of the prop wasn't deceptive."

As the reporter looked at Hearts' still gentle smile, a chill ran down her spine—she was such a clever little witch, but at this point, she was being played by the Queen of Hearts.

No wonder so many men whose hearts had been broken by the Queen would say that Hearts was irresistible to anyone. Even after being used to that extent, these men had never said a bad word about Hearts and cried for a return.

The little witch was getting caught up in Hearts' game.

"The end result is that she begins to constantly validate the possibility that the other person loves her by torturing both them and herself." Hearts lowered her eyes to the image of Liu Huai on the panel, then reached out a finger to tap the side of his face, whispering, "What a poor sister and a poor brother. A brother who has clearly made the conscious decision to give up his life for his sister, and a sister who still doubts him."

"And the sister eventually has to join the league to earn huge amounts of points to ensure her brother's safety and love for herself."

"We women usually call this process that Liu Huai goes through a 'test of sincerity,'" Queen Hearts said, looking at the debriefer. She winked and wiggled her fingers, smiling with girlish playfulness. "And of course, the vast majority of men in this world wouldn't pass the sincerity test that the little witch and I have."

Thinking of Liu Huai, who had been forced to lose his best friend after being controlled by Zhang Gui, the debriefer quickly snapped out of Hearts' beauty. He shivered again, looking at her luscious face. "But what does this have to do with the little witch's reluctance to completely restore her sight?"

The Queen of Hearts laughed. "Would you love a woman who tested you like this?"

The debriefer shook his head frantically.

Hearts raised her eyes, whispering, "But what if she's blind? What if you didn't know she had tested you, and you thought she was a helpless, miserable little girl of eight who couldn't live without you? Wouldn't you have been unable to resist pitying her and loving her forever because she had been tortured after all?"

The debriefer remained silent for a long time. Finally, he spoke with mixed feelings. "Liu Huai... a bit poor... being tricked into loving such a sister."

"I don't think he's pitiful," Hearts said, her eyes clear. "It's the little witch who's pitiful. Because if Liu Huai ever finds out that he's been tricked into loving and protecting her as a sister, she'll go crazy."

"So this support video for the little witch signing up for the league after clearing enough copies..." The debriefer tentatively asked, "Empress, do you think it went through?"

Hearts nodded casually, then reminded the debriefer as he sighed in relief, "Take care to protect her real information and don't let the other teams or Liu Huai herself find out, or you and I will both suffer."

The debriefer, already scared from earlier, let out a bitter laugh. "That's for sure."

"Oh yeah, the little witch should be clearing a copy right now. Which one did she go to?" Hearts asked, suddenly remembering. "When she's out of the game, we'll let her know it's time to start team training. We gave her a control player late in the game, hoping to mitigate the system's lifesteal nerf by using multiplayer control. But Zhang Gui died before it could have any noticeable effect, and we need her to adapt to the new team and strategy."

The debriefer began to have a headache. "But Empress, we don't know which Ben the little witch is in now. We checked all the little TVs that are opening, but none of them showed the little witch's TV."

Hearts' eyes suddenly narrowed as she reacted quickly. "Tell Wang Shun to check if anyone has turned off the mini-TV in any of the copies. She's one of the top 100 players and is allowed to turn off the TV."

After a brief pause, she quickly sat up straight again, her eyes calm as she gave the order, "Forget it. Just check Liu Huai's little TV and see if there are any strange players disguised in his copy."

"Liu Jiayi is a very well-planned person. She wouldn't do anything outside of her plan unless it had something to do with Liu Huai."

There was a knock on her office door. After she nodded, a sweaty Wang Shun rushed in, looking at Hearts. "Empress! Liu Huai knows that Liu Jiayi is the little witch!"

"Who told him that!" Hearts sat up from her chair, her tone darkening.

Wang Shun, panting, hurriedly said, "Bai Liu! He's relying on the game mechanics to figure it out! The little witch managed to fool everyone else, but she couldn't fool Bai Liu. Now, all the players are flocking to his TV! He's reached over 200,000 viewers and is number one on the Rising Stars list. Fans of the Little Witch are going crazy since he deduced that Liu Jiayi is the Little Witch! What do we do?"

Hearts narrowed her eyes slightly. "Bai Liu? The new guy again?"

The Loving Welfare Home

Game lobby centre screen, Nightmare Nova Room.

Bai Liu's small TV was bustling with people, with regular players looking up incredulously at the small TV screen of the first Nightmare Nova.

"Bai Liu is rushing too fast! What is he eating that is making him rush so fast?!"

"He is eating the Little Witch. That child is already stunned. Who did he just call Little Witch?"

" Liu Jiayi ."

"What Jiayi ?"

"Liu Jia what?"

"…You Little Witch fans, don't deceive yourself. Liu Jiayi, Lui Huai's little sister. I think Bai Liu reasoning is 80-90% correct. "

"I won't listen. I won't listen! The forbidden witch is so cold, elegant, and mature. She must be a beautiful girl in her twenties under that black veil!"

"Wake up, the forbidden witch is so short, she's more like an eight-year-old girl."

"... Didn't the character formula book from the King Dogby guild say the Forbidden Witch was an underdeveloped person? Damn it! I always thought the Forbidden Witch was a dwarf! So that's what underdeveloped means!"

"The forum threads have exploded with flying melons, and countless Little Witch's boyfriend fans are wailing about how their wives have suddenly become their daughters. They're not ready to be dads..."

"Hearts seem to be dealing with it, but it's in the game that the real problem lies. I don't think Liu Huai is in a good position. Honestly, the league support season is strong this year, and such a big scandal involving a hot newcomer..."

"I think Bai Liu's the one who's not doing well. The little witch has always been hard on non-team members. I feel like Bai Liu's going to get cold feet."

"A clash between old and new Nightmare Nova No. 1—who will become whose nightmare? The forum has opened a post about it...."

Liu Huai threw himself to his knees in front of Bai Liu, his mouth hanging open for a long time, as if he wanted to speak but nothing came out. His eyes were clouded with tears, dark and murky, like a piece of sky that had lost its light.

Kneeling in front of Bai Liu with his head hanging low, Liu Huai resembled a puppet whose soul had been drained. His upper limbs had been torn off by a mischievous child, leaving a limp torso curled in discomfort as though the puppet strings had been yanked free.

Tears no longer flowed, and Liu Huai's eyes stared vacantly, his face streaked with the remnants of them. Everything seemed far away.

The damp ward and the dark little countryside gradually appeared before him, with Liu Jiayi's dirty, good-natured smile the only thing he could see, unlike anything else.

She ran barefoot through the hills, inhaling the wildflowers and grasses near the weir. Then Liu Jiayi turned to him, smiling at his nervous scolding.

Liu Jiayi tilted her head, eyes crinkling as she called him loudly to come, darting towards him with open arms, a little bird, a butterfly, a sun unaware of its own shine.

What a reckless and naive little girl. She fell into Liu Huai's arms, her body bruised, covered in marks from the beatings she had endured. Hold on a little longer for your brother!

And Liu Jiayi meekly leaned against his chest, her voice soft, "Jiayi will stick around for her brother."

That night, Liu Huai carried Liu Jiayi down the mountain in the pouring rain. From that day on, Liu Huai vowed to make sure she would never see the darkness of the world again, to give her the brightest future and to be worthy of what she had given him.

They both carried the blood of the man they hated most, stumbling and clinging to each other out of fear and disgust.

Liu Huai told Liu Jiayi, “We’ve been through the worst together, so we will never let go of each other’s hands, no matter what.”

Liu Jiayi was the most important person to him. Liu Huai was willing to endure this horrible game to give her a bright future, to be Zhang Gui’s lapdog, to take up a dagger and betray his best friend, even to die for her.

But she still lied to him.

Just as he had lied to Liu Jiayi, so too had Liu Jiayi lied to him.

Liu Huai drifted back to that dirty, hidden face of Liu Jiayi under the bed... Is this retribution?

Is this the punishment for what he had done to Jiayi, for his cowardice and inaction? Is this Jiayi’s revenge against him?

"... Do you know why I followed Zhang Gui and betrayed Fourth Brother?" Liu Huai’s head seemed to drop to the ground as he spoke softly, "... Because at that time, Zhang Gui used Jiayi's real-life information to threaten me. He made me join the King's Guild and become his puppet to besiege Fourth Brother..."

Liu Huai’s eyes were dull, as if all the light had left them. "He promised me good treatment and safety, and I was indeed the best treated of all his puppets... but I always wondered why, when I had never told anyone in the game about Jiayi, Zhang Gui knew about her. How did he know Jiayi was my sister, why did he know so many details about her and me, as if I had told him myself?"

Bai Liu listened quietly without speaking.

Liu Huai laughed softly, tears rolling down his face. "So, Jiayi and him... they were a pair. These should be Jiayi's words to him. Why would Jiayi say this to him? Bai Liu, you say Jiayi is so smart... is she? Is she..."

He finally managed to choke out, "... Did she do it on purpose? She knew everything from the beginning... She's punishing me... punishing me for the things I've done. I’m not a good brother..."

"If you ask me," Bai Liu replied calmly, "I think she probably thought it would be safest for you. Joining the King's Guild as a puppet under Zhang Gui would keep you safe in this game. As for Zhang Gui manipulating you into betraying Mu Sicheng on her cue, it's true that following Mu Sicheng wasn't safe for you."

"So if her goal was to ensure your survival, then what she did was perfectly reasonable—letting senior players mentor you, giving you shelter, helping you hone your abilities, choosing the best guilds and teammates she could control, and stepping in to save you when you entered more dangerous games. Everything she did was with the plan to protect you."

After Liu Huai entered the game, fearing for his life, he had sent Liu Jiayi to the orphanage on the day when the little girl curled up in his arms and worriedly asked, "Brother, am I a burden? Are you going to send me away?"

He smiled and shook his head. "No, Jiayi is my future. I'm sorry I have to send you here for now, but one day, if I survive, I'll take you with me."

"I'll give you the brightest future."

Liu Huai lowered his head in silence for a long time before looking up vacantly. "... So from that time on, was it such a trouble for her that I had to live?"

"It's a different story if she's not in trouble, but she definitely doesn't need you to save her. And there's a good chance she'll go after the other kids to save you. As a veteran player with experience, Liu Jiayi must understand the mechanics of this secondary game." Bai Liu's eyes moved evenly to Liu Huai. "That means her own blood alone isn't enough. She needs at least one more child's blood to save you."

"So now comes the question: which child will she seek to draw blood from?" Bai Liu paused. "And as for Liu Huai, because I controlled you in the last game, and given her protective nature, I think it's likely she'll see me as a threat to you. To eliminate me, she'll probably go after my children—Little Bai Six."

"I suspected she would target my children, but thankfully they're in church now." Bai Liu said calmly. "And unfortunately, due to my mobility, Little Bai Six will soon catch up to their confinement and have to flee today—but I've managed to learn this information."

Bai Liu shook the Big Brother in his hand and frowned. "But since this call is one-way, I can't contact Little Bai Six to inform him. I'll have to wait until he calls after 6 a.m. to tell him what I know."

Bai Liu was quiet for two seconds. "But I seriously doubt if he'll survive long enough to fight."

"So now it's our ragtag group of league players facing off against Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang..." Muke looked at Bai Liu and Liu Huai with a smile that was worse than crying. "And over there, our children have to deal with your sister—the little witch —without knowing anything about it."

"Probably so." Bai Liu said nonchalantly. "Most likely, we're going to die, Muke."

---------- ------

5:37 a.m., craft classroom at the back of the orphanage.

The chaos from the private hospital explosion had only settled down by nearly 3 a.m. When little Bai Six made sure there were no teachers patrolling near the church, he quickly darted from behind, circling the orphanage in search of where Muke and the others might be confined. There were usually two locations where the teachers kept them: one was the canteen storehouse, and the other was the two-room craft room, which had only one side with windows facing the corridor toilets.

Bai Six first checked the canteen and found no children there, so it was likely that Muke and the others were being held in the craft room. He carefully climbed through the window of the orphanage's ladies' room and waited silently behind the door.

When a teacher entered, the sound of keys clinking on his waist gave Bai Six the signal. He swiftly attacked the teacher, knocking him unconscious with a candlestick he had taken from the church. Taking the teacher's keys from his belt, Bai Six hid behind the ladies' room door, carefully controlling his heavy, rapid breathing. Once he was sure no teachers or caretakers were nearby, he moved quickly, making almost no sound, to the two craft rooms across the corridor.

At the door, Bai Six scanned left and right for any approaching figures before quickly opening the craft room outside.

Muke, shocked, saw little Bai Six dart into the room, his face lighting up with joy. "Bai Six! What are you doing here?"

"I came to take you on a run," Bai Six replied briefly, outlining the situation. "I stepped outside last night and noticed the group of flute-playing children with IV bags wrapped around their bodies came from a tunnel behind the church idol. They used this tunnel to get out, and I followed them for a while. The tunnel reeks of disinfectant."

"We can escape through this tunnel while it's still light, and while the teachers are asleep. From the strong antiseptic smell, I believe it leads to the private hospital, where the investors usually leave the wards active after 9 a.m. We need to escape before that to avoid running into them and getting caught."

"There should be a car near the hospital. Once we get there, we'll be safe," Bai Six added. "This is a backup plan my investor and I discussed earlier. If we couldn't escape the orphanage last night, this plan could still work—we follow the group of children and figure out how they got out."

"I scouted the escape route last night. After analyzing it, I think this plan can work. Get ready and pack. We need to move fast."

Bai Six quickly glanced around the classroom, eventually focusing on Miao Gaojiang and Muke, who had not spoken a word. "Where are the others? Miao Feichi and Liu Jiayi?"

Bai Six's sharp gaze fixed on Muke, his expression suddenly more serious. "What happened? Why were they put in another classroom?"

Muke swallowed hard, stepping forward to explain. Bai Six's expression darkened.

Bai Liu had mentioned that Miao Feichi had a habit of eating people. It wasn't surprising that Miao Feichi, unsure if he'd be saved, might act on that impulse before his death. But Liu Jiayi wasn't so simple either—she had followed Miao Feichi without resistance. Considering the information Bai Liu had given him, Bai Six had his suspicions, but he didn't have time to deal with them now.

His investor, his future self, was waiting for him to escape with the others. Bai Liu needed him to save Liu Jiayi, no matter the doubts surrounding her.

After all, Bai Liu had paid the price.

"I'm going to check it out. Stay here," Bai Six said, turning to leave the room. As he opened the door, a thought made him pause. He turned to Muke, who was watching him groggily. "If I'm not back in ten minutes, you'll need to jump out of the window of the ladies' room and take the detour through the jungle to the church."

"The exit is below the thorny tangle of the Reverse Cross idol, under the baptismal pool. Once I'm done here, I'll bring Liu Jiayi and the others to you," Bai Six continued, his eyes narrowing slightly as he addressed Miao Gaojiang. "Muke has a heart condition. You'd better go with him and take care of him. You know what you promised me."

"Yes!" Miao Gaojiang replied quickly, a faint excitement in his voice.

Muke, still uneasy, spoke up. "Just going to another classroom—what can happen? Miao Feichi won't do anything to you! Come back and run with us!"

Bai Six's voice was heavy with irony as he propped himself up against the door. "I don't know what will happen. I've just always had bad luck. Nothing good happens to me." He turned to look at Muke, the faint morning light casting long shadows behind him.

His pale, bloodstained face caught the light as the golden rays slowly gilded his features. Even the tiny hairs on his face seemed to glow, and his lips curled into an inexplicable, enigmatic smile.

He chuckled softly, his eyes sparkling with something unsettling. "But I seemed to have had some good luck last night. Maybe it was because I changed my name. Something strange seems to have blessed me, and for once, something good happened."

He pushed the door open, turned his back to Muke, and casually waved as he left the craft room, the place where he had once painted two gift paintings for Bai Liu.

The Loving Welfare Home

Looking at Bai Six's retreating figure as he disappeared into the morning light, Muke's heart stopped for a few seconds. The image of Liu Jiayi's strange smile flashed through his mind, and he suddenly felt the urge to grab Bai Six's hand and tell him not to go to that classroom. But little Bai Six was running so fast that Muke didn't have the time to stop him. Bai Liu quickly unlocked the door to the other classroom and entered.

Muke's breath came in two quick gasps. He suddenly remembered—he hadn't heard a sound from that classroom in nearly an hour.

"Bai Six! Come back!" Muke rushed out, calling Bai Six back, and pounded on the classroom door. "Something's wrong with this classroom! Come out! We don't care about Liu Jiayi, okay? Bai Six, let's just run with the two of us!"

But no matter how much Muke shouted, stomped, and yelled, the only sound in the empty corridor was his own labored breathing, which no longer carried to the other craft room where the [silent] prop had been placed.

Soon, Muke's strength was spent from his emotional slamming against the door. He crouched in front of the classroom Bai Six had entered, clutching his chest and panting heavily, his lips bruised. The sound of footsteps soon echoed down the corridor as a teacher heard the commotion and approached.

Miao Gaojiang followed him out, glancing at Muke with a mixed expression. He then gently pulled Muke's fingers from the door handle, one by one.

He dragged the exhausted Muke back to the classroom and whispered, "Stop shouting, you'll draw the teacher here, and Bai Six will get hurt too. Just wait ten minutes like Bai Six said. He's better than us. You have to trust him."

Muke's chest rose and fell violently. He glanced at Miao Gaojiang and opened his mouth to say something, but because he was breathing so heavily, no words came out. He just looked at the quartz watch in the classroom, biting his lip in silence as he mentally counted down the ten minutes.

---------- ------

Another craft classroom.

As soon as Bai Six entered, he was hit with a strong smell of blood. His gaze fell on Liu Jiayi, huddled in a corner, holding her shoulders, trembling and sobbing. Her body was covered in blood, with cuts and marks that looked like someone had bitten her hard.

The teeth marks were unmistakably those of a child, the kind Miao Feichi could have left.

Little Bai Six furrowed his brow, and the scales of suspicion slowly tipped back toward the idea that Miao Feichi might have been involved in cannibalism.

But Bai Six didn't move closer right away. He kept his distance and asked softly, "Liu Jiayi, where is Miao Feichi? He attacked you, didn't he?"

Liu Jiayi nodded with a small sob as she huddled in her own cloth box. "Yes."

With a shaking hand, she pointed to another corner, where the shadows were thick.

Miao Feichi, the second tallest of the children, was hiding behind a pile of discarded handicrafts. He was holding something in his hand, ready to attack.

Miao Feichi must have seen Bai Six enter and was preparing to hide.

"Miao Feichi?" Bai Six gripped the candlestick and cautiously examined Miao Feichi's soul note, taking one tentative step at a time.

With the soul note in his hand, Bai Six wasn't worried about Miao Feichi attacking him. He cleared away the tangled mess of cobwebs and dust, revealing Miao Feichi hiding behind it, his eyes wide with terror.

Miao Feichi was suspended from the ceiling by his limbs, like a puppet. His face, hands, and neck were covered with syringes, needles embedded in every vein of his body, feeding blood into an IV bag.

He had been drained by these blood-sucking bags to the point where his lips were dry, his skin paper-thin, and his arms and legs trembled constantly. Even his tongue was full of needles, leaving him unable to make a sound. He could only breathe weakly, writhing in pain.

Miao Feichi hung limply, his eyes glazed. The moment he saw Bai Six, he burst into tears and screamed twice in a weak, airy voice. His eyes reflected a desperate wish to die.

Liu Jiayi's sobs turned into a wry laugh as she slowly stood, hands behind her back. She turned to look at Bai Six, who was standing in front of Miao Feichi, and smiled with a dimpled grin. "I can't be hurt by a big idiot like Miao Feichi."

"I probably gave him a bad first impression when I bit him and cried while begging him to leave me alone." Liu Jiayi casually traced the bite marks on her body and smiled. "But I couldn't have fooled you into coming here without doing that, could I, smart, cold little brother Bai Six, who doesn't look like a normal, good boy at all?"

Bai Six shot a sidelong glance at Miao Feichi, who was still whimpering behind him. He raised the candlestick in a defensive posture, his voice low. "I don't think you're in a position to say anything about me right now. Did you deliberately leave Miao Feichi alive so I wouldn't notice something was wrong and wouldn't enter this classroom?"

Bai Six wouldn't have come over if he'd known Miao Feichi was dead, as he could have seen from the soul note in his hand.

"With your skill, you can probably see the death status of those you control, right?" Liu Jiayi's voice was light as she took a step forward, casually walking towards him.

Bai Six kept his distance, still holding the candlestick warily.

But Liu Jiayi didn't seem bothered. Her smile never wavered. "Soul control skill? Your investor, or future you, talked about it in front of me. It's a perfect skill for exchanging souls, requiring only the other person's consent. It's a rule skill with a bit of restriction, but it's quite impressive, for a newbie like Bai Liu."

"It's like becoming another system that lives and dies with those under its control." Liu Jiayi's smile faltered slightly, her eyes dulling with condescension and boredom. "The desire to control and acquire souls is a disgusting personal skill derived from the twisted desires of a dirty adult man."

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi's comments about (soul trading) and other related content have been blocked by the system.]

Liu Jiayi continued to move toward Bai Six, her steps increasing in speed. Bai Six backed up, moving quickly to avoid her approach.

Liu Jiayi bounced through the clutter of handicrafts like a wind-up doll, skipping over boxes with ease, her voice light. “So, at your age, you’re already addicted to the thrill of controlling others? It’s just like the man who gave birth to me. No wonder he did what he did to my brother in the last game. It all stems from something.”

Little Bai Six backed away cautiously, using objects to shield himself. His mind raced. “You want to save your brother Liu Huai, don’t you? But you’ve already taken Miao Feichi’s blood. You could probably save him yourself. So there’s no need to go after me, is there? Liu Huai and the future me are still working together.”

“Cooperation?” Liu Jiayi’s laughter filled the room, echoing from all sides as she circled Bai Six. “The kind of cooperation that uses restrictions to force my brother into choosing between me and him? How disgusting.”

Bai Six kept his eyes scanning the center of the classroom, watching every potential escape route. His tone remained calm. “But you didn’t stop it, did you?”

“You could have called your brother and told him you didn’t need him to save you, so he wouldn’t be coerced into cooperating by the other me. But instead, you let Liu Huai make this painful choice between you and him. Maybe you were waiting for this answer, for him to choose between you and his life.”

“If anything, that’s a disgusting collaboration,” Bai Six’s eyes remained steady. “And you’re a participant and facilitator of it, Liu Jiayi.”

“It’s clear you want to see Liu Huai sacrifice his life for you to further this ‘cooperation.’ You want to watch your brother suffer and die to save you and protect you. You wouldn’t have revealed yourself unless you knew Liu Huai was certain he’d die for you, right? When it comes to being disgusting, we’re nowhere near as bad as you.”

Liu Jiayi’s laughter suddenly stopped.

The faint light in the corridor flickered suddenly, and when it illuminated again, Bai Six saw Liu Jiayi standing very close to him, holding a doll with its head and limbs torn off. Her face was expressionless, her eyes fixed on Bai Liu, and her breathing was soft and close.

The doll in Liu Jiayi's hands wore a white shirt and suit trousers, with a strange coin—having a hole in the middle—around its neck. Its head was twisted almost 180 degrees, and it wore a strange, dull smile, looking up at Bai Six with Liu Jiayi.

Although Bai Six had never seen his future self, he instantly recognized the crude doll in Liu Jiayi's arms as his future self, based on Bai Liu's description of him.

Bai Six's eyes rested on the doll, and his breath caught in a slight pause. His throat tightened as his heart raced. For a moment, he wondered what it felt like to be so close to death. The fear wasn't as terrible as he had imagined; it wasn't as scary as he thought.

Liu Jiayi's voice was low as she looked down, stroking the doll in her arms. She spoke almost to herself, "Do you know why medieval witches made voodoo dolls? When they cursed someone or when they loved someone, they would create dolls of that person, hoping the doll would capture their soul. The person they hated would die in a cursed way, and the person they loved would remain close, cherished in a loving way."

Bai Six had retreated to the edge of the wall, his expression calm. "Is there any difference between your approach and Bai Liu's?"

Liu Jiayi was silent for a long time before tilting her head, giving a delighted laugh and a wink. "Essentially, no. So I deserve to be a disgusting presence and not treated well by my brother."

"But Liu Huai gave everything for you. You got exactly what you wanted." Bai Six breathed softly, pressing his toes against the wall. His eyes were fixed on Liu Jiayi, who was now close enough for their faces to almost touch. "You got what you wanted. What is there to be unsatisfied with?"

Liu Jiayi finally looked up, her expression pale and indifferent. Her foggy, grey eyes were set in her childish, emotionless face, creating an eerie, sad dissonance.

She curled her mouth and spoke like a well-behaved but untutored child, though her words floated in the air, heavy with mist. "Because I was never afraid to truly believe in my brother. And because I refused to believe, I never got what I wanted."

Liu Jiayi's eyes reflected Bai Six in a foggy, almost otherworldly quality, as though her soul had left an imprint in her eyes.

"My brother is a very cowardly man who wouldn't, and wouldn't dare, give everything for me."

"Betrayal is a bad habit of his," she continued, "he is a cowardly repeat offender."

Bai Six looked at Liu Jiayi, remembering what Bai Liu had told him about Liu Huai—a man who seemed to have a habit of betraying others, from Mu Sicheng to Zhang Gui. If betrayal and cowardice were bad habits, the people who suffered most from this must be the ones closest to him. If betrayal and cowardice were a bad habit, then those most affected by it must be those who spent time with him.

Bai Six suddenly understood something. He looked at Liu Jiayi and asked, "What did Liu Huai betray you?"

The smile on Liu Jiayi's face finally disappeared, and she looked directly at Bai Six.

"He has betrayed me... what?" She whispered softly, smiling again. "You might as well ask, when did he stop betraying me?"

Everyone had spoken to her in a tone of disgusted lust.

"Inbred children. Not very intelligent, are they?"

"Surely you are blind, and it's a female child. Why didn't you get rid of it?"

"My mother said you inbred children simply can't go on, won't amount to anything. You can't even go to school. Your brother also said he'd send you to study, to let you go to university. Ha, funny!"

The man would punch and kick her when drunk, slapping her face, forcing her to go down to the weir to catch fish, cruelly telling her that she wouldn't be allowed back up until she caught a few pounds.

The weir was freezing cold, the water rising to her throat when she stepped in it as a young child. It was all mud and water, and the fish were slippery, darting around her like dead limbs, impossible to catch.

She was trapped like her dead mother in this weir, one she would never be allowed to escape from. Liu Jiayi could never catch enough fish to satisfy the man, who she understood was trying to drown her there as a useless, little cub who only wasted food.

It was like drowning her sister and her mother.

In Liu Huai's absence, during school hours, Liu Jiayi hid in the chicken coop, the pig pen, among the animals, or under the wardrobe or bed, fearing the man would come looking for her to beat her if he couldn't find what was bothering him.

Most of the time, she was fine as long as she hid well. But she had to stay on constant alert or risk being grabbed by her hair and thrown to the ground, whipped with a water-soaked bamboo strip, or dragged to the weir to catch fish.

For as long as Liu Jiayi could remember, she hid in the unseen parts of the house, hugging her knees in silence, counting the hours, waiting for Liu Huai to return from school. She felt the coldness of the countryside seep in as the night fell, soaking into her skin and heart.

Sometimes, she would cry out or scream, beating the animals she was locked in with as if they were retarded, insane, or psychotic. As though it might vent the resentment and pain she could never rid herself of.

She never dared let Liu Huai see this side of her. In front of him, Liu Jiayi was always the meek, well-behaved, innocent sister who knew nothing and would always smile sweetly when he came home from school, calling him "brother."

Even if she had just risen from struggling in a weir full of mud and silt, even if she had nearly strangled a goose ten minutes earlier in a fit of madness.

Since she was a little girl, Liu Jiayi had known that all the affection Liu Huai gave her was in exchange for her disguised appearance. She had always been vigilant, like hiding under her bed or in a dark closet, not wanting her true face to be exposed by Liu Huai in the same crude manner as the man had, only to be whipped, disappointed, and questioned, "How could you be such a son of a bitch?"

Or maybe not. Even if she stood in front of Liu Huai with her true face, he would cower and look away from her.

Because her brother was a man too afraid to face his true self. He was cowardly.

Liu Jiayi stood in front of little Bai Six, gazing into his dark eyes with questioning expression.

She had learned to hide under the bed or in the closet to escape the man's drunken beatings. She would sneak out after Liu Huai returned or after the man had fallen asleep, snoring.

One day, the man, not knowing where she had gone, searched for her for half a day, but couldn't find her.

The sound of chopsticks cracking on the floor. Liu Jiayi covered her mouth with her hands, not daring to breathe loudly, holding her breath as she listened to the man's insults.

"Damn, this little fucker is getting better at hiding! I can't even find anything to pass the fucking time. Liu Huai! Liu Huai, get your ass over here!"

Then, there was a sharp slap, and the boy's muffled cries echoed fearfully. The man cursed, took a big gulp of wine, and the sound of him drinking seemed to echo in Liu Jiayi's ears. Her breath caught, and a bitter taste that made her dizzy rose in her mouth.

The process began—a drunken, heavy-handed beating of Liu Huai's back, the sound ventilating through the room until it stopped at Liu Huai's shuddering cries.

"Shit," the man cursed drunkenly. "Fuck, you're the Liu family's only hope, and I don't want to hit you, but my hands itch when I'm drunk. And the little bitch is hiding, only coming out when you're around. I trick her with your voice, make her come out… burp… and she still won't."

"Go!" the man slurred, kicking Liu Huai. "You trick that little bitch out, and I won't beat you up."

Liu Jiayi waited for what felt like forever, until she thought it was dawn. Then, she heard Liu Huai's voice, trembling with sobs.

"Jiayi, brother is back. Will you… come out for a bit?"

"Will you come out for a minute? Outside… outside, Dad is gone! Come out! No one's going to hit you!"

"Come on out! It's really… only brother out here! Brother wants to see you!"

Liu Jiayi stayed silent for a long time, the sounds ringing in her ears, muddled and incomprehensible, before she burst out from under Liu

Huai's bed, where she had been hiding all day, shivering.

The man pulled her by the hair and wrestled her to the ground. He slapped her, his breath a mix of pleasure and alcohol, and lashed her body with a thumb-thick whip, kicking her soft belly. Liu Huai stood beside him, shuddering with each strike, eyes shut tight, unable to look.

But Liu Huai didn't dare step forward. He cowardly leaned against the wall, silently waiting for the torture to end.

Afterward, Liu Huai held the nearly lifeless Liu Jiayi in his arms, crying, saying he would get her out, that he'd get into a good university and get her out!

"You'll bear it for your brother just a little longer, and he'll get you out! Soon! Very soon!"

Liu Jiayi's fingers curled slowly as she listened to Liu Huai's voice, which now sounded like the man's in her ears.

"Yes, Jiayi will help brother bear it." She said weakly, meekly, knowing Liu Huai needed her to soothe his guilty heart with this "good sister" facade.

Liu Huai, her ever-cowardly brother, too afraid to defy the man who betrayed her, stood by the dimly lit hall where she had crawled out, only to be beaten for him, eyes closed, too afraid to look at the horror of it all.

Her brother was a cowardly assassin, incapable of hurting anyone, even with a weapon.

But the best thing she ever had in her life was such a cowardly brother.

Betrayal and suspicion were born to be brother and sister.

She looked at Little Bai Six quietly. "Have you ever had those moments when a cowardly liar, full of deceit, suddenly starts treating you well, and you wonder over and over again what he's really up to?"

"...They give you this unexplained kindness, like the beautiful, poisoned tail of a scorpion, the honey-laden needle of a bee, and you swallow it, always wondering when the poison, the sting, will pierce your heart. What is he really doing? Will he betray you?"

"Isn't that exactly what you did to Bai Liu, the lying liar? Little Bai Six, did you ever truly believe the kindness he showed you before he was willing to die for you last night? Before you knew he was someone else?"

"Haven't you been tempted along the way?"

Little Bai Six pursed his lips but didn't answer Liu Jiayi's question.

Liu Jiayi snorted. "You're just like me, born to trust no one, always caught in the cycle of doubt and temptation. But unlike you, I'm not as lucky—he's not the other version of myself."

She paused, her breathing shallow, her voice tinged with confusion. "I could never truly understand what my brother was thinking because I'm not him. He's a man of that bloodline, with the same voice as the man who gave birth to me. I could never stop doubting him. Every time I hear his voice, I can't help but feel that hatred. But when he smiled and called me Jiayi, when he was kind to me, I couldn't help but think—if only he could live a little longer, stay with me a little longer. When he calls me Jiayi, when he's kind to me, I can't help but wish he could stay... just a little longer."

"...Even if he had betrayed me and sold me out to that man, I would have liked it if he could have been my brother with that smile forever." Liu Jiayi's voice trailed off, as if lost in a memory.

"He's the only person in the world who's different. The only one who ever pulled me away from everything." Liu Jiayi whispered dreamily, "...But despite trying thousands of times to trust him, no matter how many promises he made, I couldn't stop doubting him, just as he couldn't help but betray me."

"...Even if he cried bitterly the day before, swearing he would never deceive me again, saying it would be the last time, the next day, as soon as the man who had me started beating him, my brother would search for me everywhere, crying and begging me to come out. And when I finally did, he would tremble, take my hand, and lead me back to the man's abuse... no matter how many times it happened."

Liu Jiayi smiled, the smile of a soft little girl who had been trained into submission. "We can't be sure that someone important to us won't betray us. So, controlling each other is the best option. And looking at what you're doing now, you and I are making the same choice, aren't we? Little Bai Six?"

"No," Little Bai Six retorted plaintively. "I chose to be controlled by him."

Liu Jiayi was stunned.

"Bai Liu, the other me, gave me two guesses about the oddity of having only fifty percent of your life before we fled. He told me to choose for myself." Little Bai Six had moved so close to Liu Jiayi that he had to look down at her, who was nearly standing on his foot.

Little Bai Six lowered his eyes, his voice calm. "The first guess is that you were poisoned by a mushroom-type poison from outside, which weakened your vitality. He has more evidence and information to support this theory. But the problem with this guess is... it doesn't explain why Liu Huai's vitality was also weakened."

Liu Jiayi's face froze, as if realizing something. Her grip on the doll tightened, but she kept her tone mostly calm as she looked at Little Bai Six and asked, "So what? What about the second guess?"

"The second guess is that..." Little Bai Six said faintly, "he thought you might be a player who had already entered, and your personal skills might be linked to mortality and lifesteal, which forced the system to intervene and weaken your presence. He even gave me the name of a suspected player."

Little Bai Six looked directly at Liu Jiayi and whispered softly, "I think it's called... Little Witch, isn't it?"

Liu Jiayi's breath caught for a few seconds.

"Then why did you stop to save me?" Liu Jiayi's mask of a good girl cracked, revealing a fierce, almost panicked expression. "You knew I was a little witch, so why did you stop? Why did you come into this classroom tonight? Aren't you afraid I'll kill you?"

"Because the other me told me to try to keep you alive." Bai Six looked calmly at Liu Jiayi. "It was a gamble. If you weren't a witch and were poisoned, vomiting blood, I would have had to save you, or you would've died. The other me paid for your life so you couldn't die by my hand—that's my ethics as a wanderer in this trade."

Liu Jiayi's hands trembled slightly, her eyes welling with tears as she stared at the calm Little Bai Six, bewildered and shocked. "You knew... you knew... you came here tonight to die, didn't you? You guessed it, didn't you? Why did you come?"

Little Bai Six spoke softly, "If I die by your hand tonight, it only means I made an error in judgment from the beginning. I was doomed when I chose to save you, so tonight was always doomed, whether I came or not."

"But if you're not a little witch, then I could come in tonight and save your life." Little Bai Six said matter-of-factly, "In terms of a trade-off, whether you're a little witch or not, the possibility that you're not means I was required to come tonight."

Liu Jiayi suddenly arched her back, choking and coughing as green, mushroom-smelling juice seeped from between her fingers.

She coughed so violently that the blood drained from her face, and her eyes filled with physical tears from the violent choking, but she still glared at Little Bai Six like a small, angry animal, holding up a doll whose limbs and head had been torn off, threatening him.

Bai Six ignored it, stepping forward to help her. "It seems Bai Liu was right on both guesses. You are faking vomiting blood, but you were poisoned at the orphanage, and you are indeed a little witch. You used a prop to fake the vomiting blood at that time, didn't you?"

"I'll really kill you, Little Bai Six!" Liu Jiayi fiercely swatted away his hand, but her eyes were clouded with tears, her cheeks streaked with them. "Ahem, I was just stalling for time, waiting for my skill to run out. But now that the cooldown's over, you can't escape! Little Bai Six!"

[System Alert: Liu Jiayi's personal skill (Poison and Antidote) cooldown is over and can be reused.]

[System Alert: Witch, you have a bottle of poison and a bottle of antidote tonight. Do you want to use the poison or the antidote?]

Little Bai Six looked quietly at Liu Jiayi.

Liu Jiayi's eyes welled up, and she looked away from him, biting her lips tightly, gritting her teeth. "...I won't believe you're going to save me! You're all liars! There's no such thing as someone being suddenly kind to me for no reason! Even my brother was nice to me because I got beaten up in exchange for it!"

She had always understood that much of Liu Huai's kindness to her came from guilt, and that guilt was the least valuable emotion before betrayal.

Liu Jiayi closed her eyes, tears trailing from the corners: [Tonight I will use poison.]

A twisted black miasma rose from Liu Jiayi's body, and a black lace veil seemed to envelop her. In her hands was a slender glass bottle, filled with bubbling black liquid, from which dark gas erupted.

The thick, smoky gas wrapped around Liu Jiayi like the tentacles of an octopus.

Her grey eyes, veiled by the translucent lace, seemed to weep as forbidden black blood dripped from the corner of her mouth. "You saved me... the worst choice you ever made, Little Bai Six."

"I was never a good boy who knew how to repay you. I was an uncompromising bastard." She hissed. "I will never be grateful to you for saving me!"

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi uses Personal Skill (Witch's Attack Arms).]

"Neither am I." Bai Six looked up at Liu Jiayi, who had seemingly accepted her fate. "You and I have similar skills. I'm a wanderer, and you're a witch. We both look like godforsaken people."

Liu Jiayi bit her lower lip, retorting sternly, "I don't believe in the existence of God!"

"The people at the orphanage always said that children who didn't believe in God would be punished and go to hell. So, Liu Jiayi, after you kill me, I'll see you in hell. But Liu Jiayi," Little Bai Six said softly, "Muke is completely unaware of your situation. You can kill him without hesitation."

Liu Jiayi looked at him for a long time, her fists clenched. Little Bai Six thought she might not let Muke, who had sensed something wrong, go.

Finally, Liu Jiayi spoke in a dry voice, "...Fine. You'll stay for ten minutes. You can escape afterwards. Open the classroom door and leave."

Little Bai Six closed his eyes, inhaling the black mist deeply, then slowly exhaling. His head began to spin. When he opened his eyes, he saw Liu Jiayi walking toward him with the poison in her hand.

"I still don't understand why you... wanted to save me." Liu Jiayi crouched down slowly, resting her head on Little Bai Six's shoulder as he sat on the ground, his body disjointed from the poisonous mist. She asked softly, her voice hushed with hoarseness.

If Liu Jiayi hadn't been holding the bottle of poison, still smoking with black mist, she might have thought she was about to be poisoned.

Black blood slowly slipped from the corner of Little Bai Six's mouth, which he swallowed with great effort.

"Probably—being the bad boy for so long that someone finally wants me to be the good boy," Little Bai Six sighed, rare bitterness in his tone. "There must be some universal truth I can't grasp. When it's clear that you get nothing for being good, and you pay the price yourself."

Liu Jiayi's forehead rested against Little Bai Six's shoulder. Her eyes were slightly red, her teeth clenched, her breath breaking. She tried to hold back her tears. "Obviously, you're a total bad guy. Don't do things like this... to save me to this point. I still won't thank you. I won't. I'm worse than you..."

Little Bai Six leaned back, looking at the ceiling.

His consciousness was fading, but he could still feel the warmth of Liu Jiayi's head resting on his chest.

Little Bai Six, weakly and slowly, asked, "Liu Jiayi, are you tricking me? Didn't you win... didn't you kill me as you wished? Shouldn't you be happy? Why are you crying?"

Liu Jiayi was silent for a long time, then sneered. But the voice that came out was tinged with tears. "Because you made me cry... stupid Bai Six."

When the ten minutes were up, Muke jumped up like a cat who had just been jabbed in the butt with a needle his grandmother had carelessly left lying around. He opened the door, poked his head outside to check if the teacher was coming, then immediately started knocking furiously on the door of the other craft room.

"Bai Six!" Muke's eyes were filled with tears of anxiety. "Bai Six! I've been waiting for ten minutes, just like you said, and now it's ten minutes! Come out! I don't want to run away alone!"

Miao Gaojiang picked up little Muke, who was still pounding on him, from the center. "The teacher will be here soon! We'll go first, and Bai Six will follow! You're still running slower than him!"

"No!" Little Muke cried, his voice rising. "I won't run away without him! We'll run together! He never leaves me alone either!"

Miao Gaojiang was stunned, and little Muke seized the opportunity to slip over his shoulder.

Muke stifled his sobs, wiping his face with his elbows as he watched the corridor for any sign of the teacher, continuing to knock desperately on the door. "Bai Six! Open up! Please, I'm begging you! Please open it!"

The door opened abruptly, revealing Bai Six standing in the doorway, looking mostly intact, though a little pale.

He gave the crying Muke a blank look. "Didn't I tell you to go alone?"

Little Muke sobbed and shook his head, teary-eyed, like an abandoned kitten about to leap at Bai Six. He accused him in a frightened voice, "You scared me to death! Why didn't you open the door?"

"Liu Jiayi is not going," Bai Six dodged the lunging Muke, his face pale. He wavered for a moment but managed to keep his composure, though blood trickled from the corners of his mouth. He looked down at Muke, who was clinging to his hand, crying, with a slightly confused and helpless expression.

He had never encountered such strange, passionate tears before, and he wasn't sure how to handle them, feeling both a little tired and overwhelmed.

Finally, Bai Six patted Muke's shoulder, gently pushed him away, and withdrew his hand. "She wanted to stay here and asked me to draw a picture for her to give to her brother, so I drew it for her. Maybe I was too focused and didn't hear you calling out. But now I'm done, and the teacher is coming. Let's go."

Bai Six suppressed the nauseating feeling in his stomach as he followed Muke, casting a bemused glance back at Liu Jiayi sitting on the windowsill before he left.

Liu Jiayi leaned back, her head bowed, eyes bathed in the rising daylight. Her disheveled, yellowing hair caught the sunlight, appearing like golden threads wrapped around her cheeks and head, almost like a holy halo. She sat serenely against the window, her eyelashes shimmering in the brilliant light.

In the golden, hopeful morning light, Liu Jiayi slowly opened her eyes and looked back at Bai Six.

Liu Jiayi, sitting against the light, had hazy white eyes, her fragile figure as pure as an angel. In her hands was a sketch that Bai Six had just drawn of her—a picture of Liu Jiayi sitting on a hospital bed, in stark contrast to her current open form. She was curled up, holding her head like a scared chick, wearing an oversized hospital gown and clutching a ragdoll with a head twisted at a ninety-degree angle, in Bai Liu's style.

[Why did you save me in the future?]

[I don't know.]

[So why did you save me now?]

[I don't know.]

[So… what do I look like to you?]

[Well… is probably like this, can you see?]

[Well, my visualization props are out of time and now I can't see them.]

[Then wait and see when you can see it again, one day, Liu Jiayi.]

A poisoned man and a poisoned man talk with unparalleled calmness, doing bad things as though they were second nature. They are born with darkness in them, without the awareness to recognize it. They are born in it, suffer from it, numb to it, and accustomed to it.

But because someone is willing to do good for them, unconditionally —someone willing to suffer enough to give them unseen sunlight, warmth, and rain—they, like plants, will eventually grow toward the light.

Bai Six turned to leave, following young Muke. His eyelids grew heavier, and no matter how hard he tried to hold it in, blood began to spill from the corners of his mouth, slowly soaking his shirt. He frowned and covered his mouth, but soon Muke noticed his abnormality. He screamed in panic, "Bai Six! You're spitting blood!"

Bai Six finally covered his mouth, dropping to his knees, his brows furrowed and his teeth clenched as he fought the pain.

"Miao Gaojiang, come carry me. Run to the church in ten minutes, hide under a dead end in the pew to the right. The church can't kill children, but if Liu Jiayi catches up with us, we'll all die." Bai Six calmly, but weakly, gave his orders. "Run!"

Miao Gaojiang, who had been carrying Bai Six on his back, began running toward the church.

Bai Six leaned against Miao Gaojiang's back, eyelids drooping, his limbs feeling like they'd lost all strength. His breathing was shallow, and blood oozed from his mouth, nose, and the corners of his lips, dripping onto his jaw and hands as they brushed against the grass and leaves of the jungle. Only Muke's pushing kept Bai Six in place on Miao Gaojiang's back.

Muke was running after them, his heart aching from both the physical exertion and emotional panic. His eyes were locked on the figure of Bai Six, barely alive on Miao Gaojiang's back. Tears streamed down his face as he whispered, "How could this happen…?"

Miao Gaojiang, drenched in sweat, finally reached the church, where he laid Bai Six down on the ground.

Bai Six shifted weakly, leaning against the wall. His eyes were half-closed, completely devoid of light. His hands rested on the floor, lifeless. With great effort, he managed to speak in a voice barely above a whisper, "Muke…"

Little Muke leaned over, his panic evident as he tried to hear Bai Six's words, but they were too faint.

"I'm in," Muke fought back a sob, taking a deep breath. "I'm in, Bai Six."

"In the church, you're relatively safe. No one will hurt you... next… I have three things to explain to you. I don't think I'll last till 6am to call him." Bai Six's voice cracked, strained from the poison. "First, I brought a transfusion tube out to store my blood. The game isn't over, and you must take my blood to my investors. Make sure you save him, okay?"

Muke nodded frantically, tears streaming down his face. "Yes, I know!"

Now Muke understood why Bai Six had been covering his mouth on the road—to keep the blood from running down his face, to preserve it for his investors.

"The second… hoo..." Bai Six's face grew paler, his chest rising and falling violently, as if wracked with pain, yet his expression remained eerily calm. "There's a coin in my chest. It's very precious. Miao Gaojiang's soul note is also inside it. It must never fall out because of my death. If it does, you'll be in danger, Muke."

"Wait…" Bai Six swallowed a mouthful of blood, the pause in his breathing growing longer. He struggled to speak, his voice weakening. "I'll stuff it in myself. Don't tell anyone but my investors where this coin is, understood?"

Muke knelt in front of him, nodding furiously, his eyes brimming with tears.

Bai Six couldn't help but chuckle softly at Muke's frantic nodding. He choked on his laughter, then coughed painfully. "Ahem, there's one last thing, and that's to tell my investors—"

"He's a liar," little Bai Six said, looking out the window at the rising sun. His smile was gentle, but his eyes seemed full of water. "He said my luck would change when I changed my name. But after I was called Bai Liu, my luck still seems just as bad. Maybe one day, you can tell him… to change again."

Bai Six coughed hard, swallowing the coin with great effort, pushing it down his throat.

His breath faded, and little Bai Six, or rather Bai Liu, slowly closed his eyes. He died with a smile, the first light of morning illuminating his face. He still held the child's mobile phone in his hand, but never had the chance to call and scold the hated investor—the one who manipulated him endlessly, knowing everything.

This absolute liar, this bad guy who had never told him a single truth, this jerk who owed him an uncountable debt. Yet, despite it all, he still chose to do everything for him, without hesitation.

Because this person, this other Bai Liu, was his only friend in his short, virtual life. And though he had lied about everything, Bai Six knew that, whatever the choices were, they were made for their mutual benefit.

So he trusted him unconditionally and chose to do everything that was good for him.

Bai Six's eyes closed completely as his hand slipped to the ground beside him, his strength finally gone.

The Loving Welfare Home

Little Muke clutched Bai Six's head and cried out, but his tears quickly dried as he stood up, his eyes filled with an almost fierce, murderous glare directed at Miao Gaojiang, who was trying to slip away alone. "Where do you think you're going? Bai Six is dead, and I'm still alive. He gave me the prop that can control you, so you'd better behave yourself!"

Miao Gaojiang froze in place, his back tense. He slowly turned to face Little Muke, who was looking at him with tear-streaked cheeks. The sight sent a shiver down his spine.

Little Muke gritted his teeth. "If you disobey me, I'll kill you. I'm not as kind as Bai Six to leave you alive. Now, get your ass over here and pick up Bai Six. Do it, or I'll make you regret it."

Muke looked down at Little Bai Six's pale, lifeless face, lying so still on the ground. His eyes reddened, but he fought to hold back his tears, continuing in a strained voice, "Pick him up. Don't leave him behind, not until I say so. And if you do, I swear I'll kill you."

Taking a deep breath, Little Muke glanced up at the baptismal font beneath the statue of God Xiang—the passage Bai Six had told him about, the one they could escape through.

With tears still in his eyes but his resolve unwavering, Young Muke said, "We drained his blood. We need to take it to save his investors."

"Move faster." Muke's voice trembled with emotion, but he fought to remain calm and firm. "Put Bai Six's body in the baptismal pool. I'll find something to heat the water. Don't let the blood from his body get cold. If it does, it won't pump properly."

---------- --

Wednesday, Ward 501, 6:15 AM

Bai Liu stared at his silent phone for a moment before putting it away, his expression calm. "My child should be dead if he hasn't called me by now."

Muke's face went pale as he glanced at Bai Liu, whose health was hanging by a thread with only 0.5 life left. "What about you?"

"There is a way," Bai Liu said, his voice composed. "I expected this to happen. It's a dire situation, but I have a backup plan. It's just a little more dangerous." He shifted his gaze to Liu Huai, who was sitting on the edge of the hospital bed, still disoriented. "The key to breaking this situation lies with you, Liu Huai."

Liu Huai looked up, his eyes unfocused. "With me?"

Liu Huai's mental state was fragile after a night of turmoil, the dramatic drop in vitality, the after-effects of his life dipping below ten, and the overwhelming amount of information Bai Liu had flooded him with.

The sweet sound of Liu Jiayi's laughter echoed in his ears, and as the world around him blurred, he seemed to see the air turning to mud, fish that couldn't be caught, and a dirty girl hiding in the muck. She stood behind Bai Liu, her hands on his shoulders, looking at him with a wide, unsettling smile.

Liu Huai understood that his low mental state was making it hard for him to grasp Bai Liu's words.

"The key to breaking the game... why is it on me?" Liu Huai mumbled, his eyes drifting down to his blood-soaked body, his hands missing. He gave a bewildered, disoriented expression. "I'm supposed to be dying, right?"

Bai Liu spoke lightly, almost casually, "Yes, you do look like you're about to die. But Liu Jiayi won't let you die that easily. You are, in fact, the key to our escape."

At the mention of Liu Jiayi's name, Liu Huai's expression tightened.

Bai Liu continued, indifferent to Liu Huai's strained face. "From what I can see, the game is just as dangerous for Liu Jiayi. With Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, the two league players, she'll have to drain her own blood to save you."

"Although she can return her own lifespan, her healing skill is weakened by the system. In the gap between draining blood to heal you and her cooldown to heal herself, she remains vulnerable—more so than us. We need to use that window to hold her hostage and force her to return blood to us."

"But she will be no less wary than I am," Bai Liu added slowly, his gaze dropping to Liu Huai's stunned face. "Except when it comes to you, Liu Huai. I need you to control Liu Jiayi while she draws blood to heal you. When she's at her weakest, I won't harm her—we'll take her with us, just... use her a little."

Bai Liu's gaze dropped to the phone in his hand, which had been silent all morning. "After all, she also took advantage of one of the few rare things I've seen—she was supposed to have killed my children."

Liu Huai stayed silent for a long time, his head bowed. Eventually, he let out a deep sigh. "I'll cooperate, as long as you don't hurt her."

Before Bai Liu could respond, Muke's phone rang. He answered in confusion, hearing Little Muke's sobbing, frantic gasps through the receiver. "Is Bai Six's investor around? Can you put him on the phone?!"

Bai Liu and Muke exchanged a look, and Bai Liu quickly took the call.

Little Muke was still crying, gasping for air. "Bai Six... he... Bai Six... he—"

"Dead, right?" Bai Liu interrupted calmly.

Muke's sobs seemed to trigger the floodgates, and he broke down. "Yes! Liu Jiayi killed him somehow!"

Muke, whose heart condition had worsened, cried, unable to breathe as he desperately explained what had happened.

When he mentioned that he had asked Miao Gaojiang to carry Bai Six's body on his back, Bai Liu's voice dropped sharply. "What about you? Muke, as I recall, you have a heart condition, and you can't do strenuous exercise. You let Miao Gaojiang carry Bai Six's corpse, but you'll be in trouble before you can even catch up with him."

Little Muke was now gasping for air as he ran. He had followed Bai Six from the craft room to the church, helped draw Bai Six's blood, and was now running through the hospital corridors.

Little Muke was running through the tunnels beneath the idol's shrine, clutching a small amount of warm blood from Bai Six's body. His face and lips were turning blue and purple, but he gritted his teeth, holding the phone up as he stumbled forward.

"Drop Bai Six's body and let Miao Gaojiang carry you instead," Bai Liu instructed calmly. "Bai Six's body is useless now. Carrying it around will only slow you down. Throw it away."

Little Muke took a sharp breath, his voice trembling with disbelief and anger. His chest heaved as he cried, "Bai Six gave his life to save you! And you want me to leave his body in a tunnel, where it can be devoured by monsters and drained of its blood?!"

"Yes," Bai Liu replied indifferently. "Because he's worthless."

Muke's breath quickened as he tried to hold back his tears, but eventually, he screamed in hysteria, "I'm not leaving him behind!"

The boy cried, his voice shaking with rage as he yelled at Bai Liu. "You're an animal! You used Bai Six from the beginning to the end! You lied to him! You made him think you were a good person! But you're not! He died for you!"

His voice broke, and he sobbed bitterly, "But he died willingly for you, knowing you were using him! Every drop of blood was for you! I drew it with my own hands!"

Little Muke shouted through his sobs, tears and snot running down his face. "You don't deserve him! You can't do this to him, even if he's dead!"

After a long, strained silence, Muke seemed to force himself to calm down, taking deep breaths as his sobs gradually slowed.

There was a long silence on the other end of the line before Bai Liu heard Muke's choked sobs, his voice muffled as he wiped his tears away, crying desperately.

But eventually, Muke started to speak, his voice low and resigned, as if pulling the words from deep within. "Bai Six is worth something, even in death. There's a coin inside his body that controls Miao Gaojiang. It's the coin he was going to give you. He couldn't tell anyone where it's hidden, and I can't leave him behind."

Little Muke seemed to be trying to convince Bai Liu—and perhaps himself.

Bai Liu's voice remained calm, impassive. "You leave him in the tunnel, and I'll go get him. I know where he's hidden. I'm sure his intention was for you to tell me where it is so I can retrieve it. If you keep carrying his body, you're only wasting your energy."

Bai Liu spoke calmly, analyzing the situation logically, without a hint of emotion, which calmed Muke down just a little.

Bai Six had indeed told Muke to leave the body in the tunnel and to tell the investors to retrieve it when they passed by. That was the safest option, after all—the tunnel was known only to Muke and Miao Gaojiang, and since Miao Gaojiang had already gone with him, Bai Six's body wouldn't be easily found.

But—Muke bit his lip. He didn't want to leave Bai Six behind.

"You don't need that coin to control Miao Gaojiang," Bai Liu continued. "He's on the run and is on your side. I know you don't want to leave Bai Six behind, but he's become a liability. I would have died for Bai Six too, but he didn't just die to save me—he died to save you, Muke. He died to save us all."

Bai Liu's voice was steady. "Taking his body with you will only waste everything he did for you. It'll waste the path he sacrificed to pave for you. If you collapse from exhaustion, all of Bai Six's efforts to save us will be for nothing."

"Do you want to waste his heart and soul?" Bai Liu asked gently.

There was only heavy breathing on the other end of the line. After half a minute of silence, Muke spoke again, his voice choked with sobs but determined. "Miao Gaojiang, put Bai Six down... and carry me."

"You don't even deserve to have Bai Six save you," Muke added, gasping through clenched teeth. "You deserve to be sick, you piece of shit! I hate you!"

Bai Liu said nothing, simply waiting quietly for Muke to cry it out, letting him calm down.

After a while, Muke spoke again, his voice filled with frustration and resignation. "You stay in the hospital, junk investor. I'm coming to save you with his blood."

He hung up with a sharp "pop," as if he couldn't bear to speak another word to Bai Liu.

Bai Liu: "..."

The Loving Welfare Home

Bai Liu was lost in thought for a moment after Muke hung up the phone.

It seems like these little kids don't like him very much... He hasn't been very appealing to children since he was a kid himself.

The sound of nurses' heels clicking on the floor outside suddenly interrupted his thoughts. The nurses were heading for the elevators, indicating that something had happened requiring their attention.

Bai Liu's expression darkened slightly. "A patient is awake."

Muke's face stiffened as he turned toward Bai Liu. "It can't be... Miao Feichi and his father, can it?"

7:30 AM, 2nd Floor, Intensive Care Unit.

Miao Gaojiang's body was covered in red and black burns. He choked and coughed as a nurse helped him sit up. He turned to look at the still unconscious Miao Feichi in the bed next to him and gritted his teeth. Even though he had taken most of the attacks to protect Miao Feichi, his son's health had deteriorated far more than his own.

In addition, his loss of life wasn't low.

Miao Gaojiang shifted uncomfortably against his pillow, his eyes narrowing as he checked his life points.

[System Alert: Player Miao Gaojiang has 23 life points.]

Even in league matches, Miao Gaojiang, with his high defense, had rarely suffered such a heavy hit all at once.

He swallowed down a headache from his stamina rejuvenator and mental bleach, his face contorting slightly. His life points were down to 23, and Miao Feichi's were probably even lower.

This realization made Miao Gaojiang's expression turn cold and serious.

Bai Liu, that madman... He's completely desperate to drain every bit of blood from them, isn't he?

It was clear that Bai Liu had given up on the investor pass and was betting everything on the kids.

Once his thoughts cleared, Miao Gaojiang used his remaining credits to buy some protective straps to bind his own wounds, which were still oozing blood. He then moved to wrap Miao Feichi's wounds, gently shaking him awake. Miao Gaojiang grimaced as he helped his son sit up.

Miao Feichi had been given both psycho-bleach and stamina restorer while unconscious, and when he woke, the large intake of fluids made him vomit several times before he wiped his mouth and became fully conscious.

"Feichi, how much life do you have?" Miao Gaojiang asked with a frown as soon as he saw his son had regained full awareness.

Miao Feichi opened his attribute panel and cursed under his breath, his face darkening. "Shit, only eleven points left."

"... That's a bit too low," Miao Gaojiang said, his brows knitting. "I was thinking that if you had enough life to kill Bai Liu, we'd go through the orphanage. But if you drop two life points in a confrontation, you'll be down to ten, and that's already [Death Foretold] territory."

[Death Foretelling] was a term used by spectators in the league, also known as the [Death Threshold]. It referred to a level of life points that dropped below a certain value, causing the system to issue a [Death Threshold] warning. This signified that the player was in imminent danger of being eliminated, as their life could be taken away in a single wave during group battles or sieges.

Miao Feichi's [Death Threshold] was typically 9, and Miao Gaojiang's was usually 1, thanks to his higher defense, which made him less vulnerable to a one-hit elimination.

Miao Feichi touched the bloody wound on his face and winced, angry and in pain. "Forget about this 'Death Foretold' shit. Bai Liu's just a non-league F-rank player. The real 'Death Threshold' is for high-level players in the league—he doesn't deserve to be mentioned in the same breath as me..."

"He hasn't even made it to the league yet, and his panel is F-ranked. Yet, he can push your life down near the threshold in a single attack, and mine by half." Miao Gaojiang interrupted Miao Feichi's rant, his voice calm. "Don't you think that makes him scarier?"

Miao Feichi bared his teeth, his expression cold.

Miao Gaojiang sighed deeply. “We made the wrong choice, trying to sacrifice ourselves to pass the game. Look at your system panel. We need to give up on sacrificing Bai Liu if we want to survive this. Otherwise, we’ll both die.”

Miao Feichi furrowed his brow and clicked on his system panel. A bright red system notification appeared.

[System Reminder: Tomorrow, Thursday, is the day of sickness. Investors who have not yet acquired the blood lingzhi to cure their terminal illness will receive the (sickness) debuff once 00:00 passes. This debuff causes players’ life bars to drop slowly. Please speed up your clearance to avoid this.]

Miao Gaojiang’s expression turned grave. “This [Sickness] debuff is a forced weakening effect that will drain our life points. From what the song says, by Friday, we’ll be severely affected by the sickness, and this debuff will likely consume all our life points. Life is precious to us now, but for Bai Liu and his group, they’ve already given up on the investor pass, so life points don’t matter to them anymore. They can afford to waste them.”

Miao Gaojiang leaned forward, half-crouching to look at Miao Feichi, whose confusion was evident. “They’re not expecting to go through the investor route. Understand, Feichi? All of them, including Liu Huai, have chosen to sacrifice themselves to protect the kids.”

“We, on the other hand, are focused on ourselves. Killing them won’t matter because their hopes and desires lie with their other selves.”

Miao Gaojiang’s eyes darkened. “Killing those kids and draining their blood to survive is the only way for us to clear the level. Do you understand, Feichi? Stop wasting time on Bai Liu and get serious.”

Miao Feichi clenched his teeth, reluctantly nodding.

Miao Gaojiang breathed a sigh of relief. Though Miao Feichi was impulsive and irritable, he would listen when it came to their survival. Perhaps that was why Miao Gaojiang couldn’t help but indulge him sometimes, even in his mistakes—because he was, after all, a good son who listened to his father.

Just not to his mother.

But when it came to his father, he listened.

Miao Gaojiang had seen his son suffer for his sick mother, thinking of ending her life to free his father from the burden. The guilt weighed heavily on him, but Miao Feichi had stepped up, eager to be the hero, even if it meant ending his mother's suffering.

"We have to survive this, okay, Feichi?" Miao Gaojiang whispered, his voice soft as he caressed Miao Feichi's face. His son leaned weakly against him, his spiritual level dropping below 20 before forcefully recovering. The aftermath left Miao Gaojiang in an unnaturally unstable state, his mind wavering.

Miao Gaojiang exhaled deeply, regulating his breathing, though fear and madness lurked beneath his calm façade. "We can defeat even something like your mother. There's nothing we can't defeat."

Miao Feichi, pale and bandaged, looked up at Miao Gaojiang, his weakness making him appear softer than usual.

For a moment, Miao Gaojiang's gaze flickered to the snowy dots on the TV. The image of Miao Feichi, lying in the hospital bed, overlapped with that of a woman—dead, dying, and twisted. Her eyes, wide open, stared at a glass of water on the counter, her jaw hanging unnaturally, revealing her blackened throat. Her tongue had been cut off and eaten by Miao Feichi.

The same son who had listened to his father.

Little Miao Feichi stood by his mother's bedside, subtly gazing at her with longing eyes as her tongue stuck out of the glass, gently stirring the boiling water, creating delicious ripples in the glass. The boy's eyes wavered with the ripples, his throat constricting as he swallowed. His eyes gradually overlapped with the image of Miao Feichi now lying in the hospital bed.

Miao Gaojiang's heart skipped a beat. He suddenly shoved Miao Feichi away from him. Miao Feichi looked at him in confusion and impatience.

"Father, what are you doing?"

Miao Gaojiang forced a smile. "It's nothing. I'm just not in a good state of mind."

Turning away, Miao Gaojiang tilted his head back and drank an entire bottle of mental bleach, feeling the aftereffects surge through him, making his mental state extremely unstable.

He now fully realized that the aftershocks of his mental value dropping below 20 were taking hold, but he didn't want to admit it—or even acknowledge it. Reality and illusion were beginning to blur, and subconscious fear was slowly gnawing at his mind, the precursor to insanity.

Miao Gaojiang gritted his teeth, sweat beading on his forehead. He wiped his face, trying to force himself to calm down.

Turning to the nurse, he asked, "When do we go through the orphanage for adoption today?"

The nurse hesitated. "Because the explosion at the private hospital injured many investors, today's pairing with the orphanage was supposed to be canceled."

Miao Gaojiang's expression darkened. "But we're supposed to be very sick tomorrow. Can we get a separate pairing?"

"…It can be arranged, but if it's just the two of you, the orphanage won't be open due to the risk of children escaping. If you must go, you'll have to use one of the tunnels from this side of the hospital that leads directly to the orphanage's church," the nurse explained, her eyes darting away.

"Previously, children who were baptized in the church were brought directly through this tunnel, but recently, there have been more seriously ill investors before the matching process. Since you've already been paired with your own children, you can use the tunnel to collect them directly."

Miao Gaojiang sighed in relief. "Where is the entrance to this tunnel?"

The nurse was eerily silent for a moment. "The safe passage is directly below."

"Bai Liu, how are you so sure the tunnel exit is directly below the safe passage?" Muke asked, his voice a mix of confusion and fear. He swallowed hard, glancing nervously at the wall clock. "It's after eight in the morning. Those monstrous child creatures in the safe passage don't disappear until after nine. They're probably still around the exit. Should we really go now?"

Muke shifted uncomfortably, his gaze flicking between Liu Huai's broken arms and the bloodstained sleeve of Bai Liu. As much as he hated to admit it, he spoke honestly, "I'm not in any condition to fight, and you're in bad shape too. If we go in like this, we could easily be killed by those kid monsters. And if your guess is wrong about the tunnel exit, we'd be walking straight into danger."

Muke's tone became serious as he leaned forward, hands gripping the edges of his shirt. "Little Bai Six is dead. You can't gamble now, Bai Liu. We can't afford to make risky decisions. If we mess up, you'll be the first to die. You have only 0.5 life left."

"I can't be 100 percent sure," Bai Liu replied, his expression calm. "But I'm about 90 percent certain it's the same place."

He turned to Muke. "I came to this conclusion for a couple of reasons. First, if there are tunnels between private hospitals and orphanages, their main function is probably to transport children. You mentioned that the people using this tunnel are child monsters who have been drained of blood. And the place with the most hospital child monsters is the safe passage."

He raised a second finger. "Second, Muke, do you remember the orphanage we visited in reality?"

Muke nodded, still processing.

Bai Liu continued, "Didn't that teacher mention that the orphanage had downsized a lot? After I got back, I checked the 3D comparison between the original map of the orphanage and the current one. The orphanage used to have a church, but when it downsized, the church was carved out and converted into a… Guess where the security exit on the ground floor of this converted hospital was built?"

Muke held his breath as Bai Liu answered, his calm voice unwavering: "The location of the idol built in the original church of the orphanage is exactly the same as the entrance and exit of this tunnel in the game."

"Couldn't we go after nine?" Muke asked, frowning. "It'll be much safer after nine."

"For me, yes," Bai Liu said as he stood up, picking up his long bone whip and warming it around his wrist. "But not for you. Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi should have woken up by now. They shouldn't be after us, though—[investors] who don't pass the level are only a waste of their time. If I were Miao Gaojiang, I'd head straight to the orphanage to draw the children's blood."

He glanced at Muke, his eyes narrowing. "And little Muke just told us the orphanage gate isn't open, which means Miao Gaojiang and the hospital staff must know about the tunnel. If the nurse told him about it, then he'll likely use it to reach the orphanage."

Bai Liu's eyes dropped to Muke's clenched hand. "That means if we don't move fast, little Muke will be ambushed, and you'll be in just as much danger as I am. You know that, right?"

Muke bit his lip and lowered his head, replying softly, "It's okay. I think it's better to make sure you're alive first. You only have 0.5 life, and I have six."

"Look me in the eye and speak, Muke." Bai Liu's voice was almost inaudible, but there was a coldness to it. "Your hands are shaking. You're scared. If you don't want to speak anymore, then stop talking. Get up. Let's go. We are at a disadvantage now—"

Bai Liu lowered his head and pressed the handle of his whip to Muke's forehead. Muke stared at him, and Bai Liu's expression remained serene, his eyes filled with determination. "But Muke, that doesn't mean we're going to lose. Losing would cost me too much. I will do whatever it takes to win this game."

Before Muke could react, Bai Liu grabbed the back of Muke's collar with one hand, pulling him to his feet. Then, with a swift movement, he slung the fishbone whip over his shoulder and half across Liu Huai, who had lost his arms. Bai Liu exhaled a shallow breath, his gaze quiet, before inhaling again. "Open the door, Muke. The game isn't over yet."

Liu Huai, whose face had turned as white as paper, suddenly interrupted Bai Liu. His wavering gaze lingered on Bai Liu's face for a moment, before he spoke. "Wait. You promise that if you live, you'll save Jiayi?"

Bai Liu nodded, his expression calm. "I promise."

Liu Huai closed his eyes, and a wrist guard appeared before him.

[System Alert: (Cynic Wristguard): After a debauched poor dog is damaged, the damage can be delayed for 14 hours by his optimism. However, if the player hasn't cleared the level within those 14 hours, the damage will stack onto the player.]

"This prop was originally meant for Jiayi, for when she escaped. But now..." Liu Huai let out a bitter laugh. "She won't be able to use it."

A little witch with healing skills doesn't need such lowly props to protect herself from delayed damage.

Liu Huai turned to Bai Liu, a smile spreading across his face that was increasingly bitter and resigned. "I can't use it either, so here, Bai Liu."

Bai Liu didn't speak further; he simply took the wrist guard and glanced at Muke by the door.

Muke looked back at Bai Liu, and after ensuring Bai Liu hadn't wavered, he took a deep breath and pushed the door open with a trembling hand.

It was now 8:40 AM on Wednesday.

On the ground floor, near the security access.

The nurse stood at a distance, cowering in fear. She didn't approach but swallowed hard before extending her hand to point toward the dark entrance. "It's over there. The tunnel entrance is around the corner on the ground floor. From there, you can go straight down to the orphanage church. I won't go any further."

After speaking, the nurse saw Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi leaning over, and unable to stop herself, she called out, "No one is allowed to leave the ward until nine o'clock! I'm just showing you out, you can't —"

Miao Gaojiang turned, his expression blank, and with a few swift steps, was in front of her. The taller Miao Gaojiang grabbed her by the neck and spun her around. The sound of her neck bones locking together was sharp and chilling.

Her eyes widened in shock, pupils dilated. Slowly, she collapsed, helpless.

"Dad!?" Miao Feichi, not only shocked but also horrified, exclaimed, "What are you doing killing NPCs?! This could cause a backlash!"

Miao Gaojiang's chest heaved violently. His eyes reddened, but his face remained unreadable, sweat dripping down his jaw as he casually killed the nurse. His shoulders tensed, his muscles rippling with suppressed aggression. He took a deep breath, his back to Miao Feichi, looking oddly calm for a moment.

But then, Miao Gaojiang steadied himself, cleared his throat, and spoke, his voice sharp. "We can't waste any more time. This nurse NPC wouldn't have let us leave until nine, but those kids are probably plotting their escape already. We need to get to the orphanage fast."

Miao Feichi, reluctantly persuaded by this logic, drew his twin swords and stepped forward, but just as he was about to enter the passage, Miao Gaojiang spoke softly, "Don't you think this nurse looks like your mother?"

Miao Feichi paused, glancing at the nurse's lifeless face—green, pale, nothing like the woman who had given birth to him. He withdrew his gaze, confused and slightly concerned, and looked at his father. "What's wrong, Dad? This NPC doesn't look anything like that dead woman, okay?"

"Is that so?" Miao Gaojiang muttered to himself as he glanced back at the nurse's face. "Maybe I was mistaken."

But in his mind's eye, the nurse's face distorted. Her youthful features were now replaced with an old, sickly, aged smile that reminded Miao Gaojiang of his wife—the woman who had slept beside him on countless nights. The woman whose face he saw first thing in the morning.

In his memory, she had always greeted him with a twisted, grotesque smile, her mouth so wide it almost seemed to stretch beyond human limits. Her jaw made eerie cracking sounds as she smiled, revealing the unsettling absence of a tongue.

Miao Gaojiang shook off the image, wiping the sweat from his temples and refocusing on the exit. “Feichi, you take the lead. I’ll follow behind.”

8:45 AM.

Due to last night’s bombing, the nurses no longer had the energy to patrol each floor and manage the patients. Bai Liu found an opportunity to use the lift and rushed to the ground floor, only to discover that the safe passage had been cleared, leaving behind only a chaotic mess.

This was both good and bad news.

Muke exhaled a sigh of relief. "No more going head to head with these monsters."

Bai Liu’s gaze lingered on the shredded children and syringes scattered everywhere, his eyes twitching as he muttered, "Miao Gaojiang... they’re in the tunnel."

He motioned for Liu Huai, who was slumping from his exhaustion, to climb down from him. Bai Liu quickly moved forward, followed by Muke. Around the corner on the ground floor, there was a yellow bin filled with medical waste, overflowing with blood transfusion bags and syringes. There was also a simple, child-sized bed with fixed bandages, presumably to prevent the children from moving during blood draws.

It looked like this was where the early children were brought to have their blood drawn, only to have their bodies discarded in the medical waste bin along with the used equipment.

The investors, who fed off the children’s blood, didn’t want to witness the brutal process. They had the nurses quickly process the “raw herbs” in a small, filthy corner, all for the benefit of the "compassionate" investors.

The bin had been roughly kicked open, revealing a small, square cellar-like entrance beneath it. Bai Liu estimated the entrance to be about 40 cm by 40 cm, just big enough for a child to fit through. Fortunately for Bai Liu, they were thin and long enough to make it through.

There were some messy footprints near the entrance, likely left by Miao Feichi. Bai Liu asked Muke to hold Liu Huai for a moment, then stepped forward to grab the door handle by its loop, pulling it upwards to open the cellar door.

As the door creaked open, a cloud of dust, earthy debris, the strong scent of blood, and the warm, damp smell of fungal decay and fermentation poured out. The scabs of dried blood from who knows how many victims puffed off the door, revealing the thick, moldy wooden boards beneath.

The dust floated in the air, swirling in the darkness like tiny particles, only visible to those who had nearly drowned in it.

Bai Liu held his breath, his eyes meeting Muke’s nervous gaze, before jumping down without hesitation, not giving Muke a chance to stop him.

"I’ll go down first. You guys can follow when I say it’s safe."

Muke looked back and forth in panic.

It didn’t take long for Bai Liu’s voice to echo from below. "No problem, Muke. You can bring Liu Huai down first and then come down yourself."

Muke carefully moved Liu Huai, who was now armless, down into the tunnel, then braced himself against the edge of the narrow opening before following.

Closing his eyes, Muke took a deep breath and let go, sliding through the wet, sticky passage. When he finally landed, the texture of the ground felt strange—soft and puffy, as though he had stepped on a field of mushrooms. The air was thick with the smell of blood and fungi.

Muke opened his eyes and gasped at the sight before him.

The tunnel's walls were completely covered with a variety of mushrooms—colorful, of different sizes, and glowing faintly, like the mucous membranes of an infected stomach, covered in moist patches that seemed ready to burst, leaking corrosive juice with every touch.

The entire tunnel smelled of fermented matter and secretions, like mushrooms soaked in poor-quality wine with dirt and sand for twenty years—intoxicating and nauseating.

Both Liu Huai and Muke had a slight gag reflex, while only Bai Liu seemed somewhat unaffected.

Muke covered his mouth, stifling a gag. "Why are there so many mushrooms here?"

"The dampness and darkness, combined with the fact that this is where the bodies were dumped, created the perfect environment for mushrooms to grow," Bai Liu replied, his feet sinking deep into the moist mushrooms with every step. "And if I'm not mistaken, these are low-quality blood lingzhi mushrooms that the investors cultivated and discarded."

Muke was stunned. "Blood lingzhi? Isn't that supposed to be rare and valuable?!"

"It's the blood of a 'pure' child that produces the rare blood lingzhi," Bai Liu's eyes scanned the tunnel, landing on a pulsating, heart-sized blood lingzhi on the wall. "We're in a timeline from ten years ago, before these investors perfected their child screening process. Back then, their experiments weren't fully refined, so some of their crops failed, were toxic, or were otherwise useless. And that's why they were discarded here."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to the other end of the tunnel. "If I'm not mistaken, this is where the song about 'being buried in the earth on Sunday' comes from."

The tunnel stretched like a living canal, pulsing with strange life forces as Bai Liu breathed in and out. But upon closer inspection, the walls were lined with slowly pulsing blood primroses, and the bodies of deformed children lay motionless, their eyes wide open, with phones scattered around their hands.

Bai Liu picked up one of the phones and checked it—it was dead, the battery drained, and its owner had long since passed.

Most of the deformed children had been mutilated into incomplete pieces by Miao Feichi's twin knives, their remains scattered among the mushrooms.

Some of the mushrooms had been crushed or trampled. Bai Liu looked down and followed the trampling marks. "Come on, they're heading further in. We need to hurry."

At the far end of the tunnel, young Miao Gaojiang, carrying Muke on his back, panted heavily. Sweat soaked his body, and he struggled against the slippery, soft ground, which made each step harder and more exhausting.

Muke, with Bai Liu's blood bag on his back, anxiously checked the time. Bai Liu had told him they had to be there by nine o'clock, or else the investors would be out by then, and they'd be caught—everything would be over.

What they didn't know was that two investors, Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, had already left before nine o'clock and were now coming down the tunnel.

Muke's anxiety grew as the time ticked away. "Miao Gaojiang, hurry! We won't be able to escape when the investors come out to arrest us after nine!"

"I don't think we'll have to wait that long." Miao Gaojiang wiped the sweat from his brow, his face pale with fear and embarrassment. He glanced at Muke, who was lying against his shoulder. "I hear someone coming closer in the mushrooms. They're moving fast."

Muke's expression darkened after a moment of pause. "How fast? Do you think we can make it back to the church in time?"

The church was a safe zone, and although it wasn't guaranteed how long they'd last there, it was better than being caught. Muke gritted his teeth and clutched the blood bag tightly.

He hoped that the investors wouldn't finish their business too quickly and that their plans wouldn't collapse.

The approaching sound of footsteps grew louder and faster, like snakes slithering through a mushroom thicket.

Miao Gaojiang took a couple of steps back, fear flooding his senses. "I don't think it's going to take until after nine. They're moving too fast. We won't make it to the church in time."

"We can't let them catch us." Muke's voice lowered, his tone steady despite the danger. "Miao Gaojiang, get those extra infusion bags Bai Liu gave us. We'll wear them and pretend to be those monster kids who play flutes. The lighting in this tunnel is bad, and with all the dead kids around, no one will be able to tell the difference between us and the monsters unless they get too close."

Muke quickly darted off Miao Gaojiang's back and began hanging IV bags around their necks.

Miao Gaojiang stared at him in disbelief, his face a mixture of blue and white. "Do you really think this disguise will fool the investors? We look nothing like those deformed children!"

"I'll make it work, even if I have to," Muke said, breathing heavily. His face was grim, but there was determination in his eyes. "I've been thinking about it for a while. If we try to run back to the church now, we'll just be caught. The teachers are up, and if we encounter them near the church, they'll lock us up for the Thursday pairings. If we don't escape today, we'll never get out."

"We have no choice but to gamble," Muke finished.

Miao Gaojiang locked eyes with him for a moment before he nodded in agreement.

The sound of footsteps grew louder, and the squelching noise of mushrooms being crushed underfoot echoed eerily through the tunnel.

The stench of decay and blood intensified as Muke took a deep breath and lowered his voice. "Don't make a sound. Lie down under the mushroom bushes and play dead. Got it?"

Muke quickly found a spot to hide the blood bag, covering it with mushrooms. He took a deep breath and lay face down in the damp ground, trying to remain as still as possible.

When Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang reached this part of the tunnel, Miao Feichi frowned as she wiped the blood from her knife. "What was that noise? Did someone just talk? It didn't sound like the kids we killed earlier—it sounded like two living people."

Miao Feichi's sharp ears caught every sound, but after a quick scan of the surroundings, she saw nothing unusual. She was about to move on when Miao Gaojiang urged her forward. "Stop looking. Let's go. This place is clearly a nest for those monstrous kids."

As they ventured deeper into the passage, Miao Gaojiang's suspicions grew. The narrow, dimly lit tunnel, filled with mushrooms, seemed to stretch endlessly. One entrance led to the church, and the other to a safe passage used to discard dead children and medical waste. The nurse had told them that this passage was abandoned after the investors increased in number and began selecting children based on matching criteria.

However, when Miao Gaojiang entered the abandoned section, he noticed signs of activity, indicating that the monstrous children had been surviving here.

His expression darkened. "The monstrous children are out between nine PM and nine AM, but during the rest of the time, they stay here in this passage. We'll be stuck with them when they return to their nest."

Miao Feichi glanced at his watch, seeing that it was 8:51—almost nine o'clock. They couldn't afford to waste any more time.

There were two reasons why Miao Feichi felt uneasy. First, Miao Gaojiang had been acting anxious since the explosion, which was unusual for him. Miao Feichi could sense something was off.

Second, his gaze fell on the bodies of two children lying beneath the mushrooms, a sight he had grown used to. But this time, the bodies felt different—too fresh, too strange.

Miao Feichi instinctively felt something was wrong. The investors never allowed such "unlucky" things to remain. The incinerator and mortuary would have dealt with the bodies, and the fungus in the passage was the perfect means to decompose them.

Miao Feichi trusted his instincts, but now, with Miao Gaojiang's unusual behavior and the growing sense of danger, he knew time was running out.

As Miao Gaojiang urged him to move, Miao Feichi hesitated for a moment before continuing forward.

A wave of relief washed over Muke when he heard the investors move on. However, before his relief was complete, Miao Feichi suddenly stopped.

He turned his head slightly, his neck creaking as he twisted it to gaze at the "corpses" hidden under the mushrooms. His eyes gleamed with a terrifying excitement.

There was a small water stain on the back of one "corpse," and Miao Feichi leaned in, licking his lips.

Miao Gaojiang saw the look in Miao Feichi's eyes and knew what was coming. He was about to interrupt when Miao Feichi, with a soft voice tinged with surprise, said, "Father, these children… their clothes are wet. They're sweating. I can smell fresh sweat."

"They were alive," Miao Feichi whispered.

Miao Gaojiang froze. His eyes widened as he quickly realized who they were. "It's Bai Liu's group! Those kids are alive!"

Muke's heart sank, and after a moment of hesitation, he grabbed the blood bag and without a word, sprang to his feet, running as fast as he could toward the exit. Miao Gaojiang, his face drained of color, followed closely behind.

Miao Feichi let out a low, mocking laugh as he unsheathed his twin swords. "Damn it, I almost blew up last night. If I don't bleed you kids dry and feast on your flesh today, I'll lose face, even if I get out of here."

He paused for a moment, then whistled, his eyes narrowing. "No problem. This was easy. Today, I've got a fresh delivery of blood. Dad, your kids are in there too."

Miao Gaojiang, ever calm, nodded. "Just make sure to avoid the aorta when you kill them. Don't waste any blood."

"Got it." Miao Feichi casually wiped the blood and mushroom goo from his blade, a wild hunger in his eyes. "Kill you, and the game will be over."

Muke ran with everything he had. His heart felt like it was about to explode. Blood pounded in his chest, a sharp pain shooting through his limbs. His body felt like it was about to give out, but he pushed on, his legs moving mechanically.

He clutched the blood bag desperately, feeling like he might vomit blood into it at any second.

Tears filled his eyes, not from crying, but from the physical strain. He felt like a fragile, defective creature suddenly awakening to survival instinct. His body was weak, his mind foggy from the lack of oxygen, but he didn’t stop.

Don’t stop. Live, Muke. Bai Liu said weakly, lying in his arms, as if praying or begging him. You must save me, you must live.

It's not that he's crying. It'S that he's getting a bit dizzy from the speedy movement.

Muke's nose began to bleed, dripping onto the backs of his hands as he clutched the blood bag to his chest. But he was no longer aware of it. Muke just kept running with blank eyes, completely unaware that Miao Feichi had caught up to him from behind.

Miao Feichi gripped his twin swords and looked at the small Muke, still running wild. "Damn, you're a fast runner. I almost didn't catch you."

He raised his twin glowing knives, their thin, shifting shadows reflecting off the tunnel walls like a scythe of death. With a swift motion, Miao Feichi slashed at the shoulder of the unconscious, yet still running, young Muke.

Little Muke’s vision darkened, and he felt himself being swept up into the arms of a wind, lifting him lightly through another exit.

Someone had saved him, and now he was resting against the spot where his rescuer's heart had been. The other man's heartbeat was nothing like his own—slow and steady, like drops of water falling regularly from a remote cliff, undisturbed by the world around them.

Even if the man now held a scimitar strong enough to kill him, it would not be enough to disrupt the calm rhythm of his breathing or heartbeat.

"Damn, it's you again, Bai Liu!" Miao Feichi snarled, gritting his teeth as he pressed his blade down. "Liu Huai, your hand's gone too? You've come for me? I'll see who else will help you today!"

Miao Feichi shouted, swinging his blades furiously, the silver light flashing across the tunnel. He was trying the same thing again—trying to disarm Bai Liu without knowing how much longer he had to live.

Bai Liu used his high agility to dodge Miao Feichi's powerful slash, then countered with his monkey claws, attacking several times. But Bai Liu was starting to lose his grip.

Little Muke took two steps back, his heart still racing, unsettled. As he ran, he suddenly turned his head to look at the investor who had saved him and was still fighting.

This was an investor who would save children—[he won't kill you because he's a strangely nice guy, and he'll save you.]

Little Muke burst into tears and laughter, stumbling and running on all fours, tears streaming down his tiny face. He saved me. Little Bai Liu, your investor is really strange—he's obviously not a nice guy, but... he did save me.

He got you killed and saved me, and I can't figure out what he was trying to do, just like I can't figure out what you were trying to do.

It was clear that neither you nor he were good people, but in the end, both fought tooth and nail to save me. We met on Sunday, and by Wednesday, it seemed like both you and your investor were ready to die for me.

I don't want that.

Little Muke's running stopped, and he tried to turn around, only to be yanked by someone hiding in the mushroom bushes. He nearly screamed in fear, but his mouth was quickly covered.

The other man lowered his voice and scanned him oddly. "What are you doing, running backwards?! Are you trying to give away our position? Don't make a mess for him!"

Little Muke, his face streaked with sticky tears, clutched the blood bag to his chest, choking on his words as he looked at the man. "But I don't want to see him die for me. I promised Bai Liu I would save him."

Muke took a shallow breath, then spoke softly. "I don't want to see him die either, but he promised me he wouldn't. So let's trust him... and just wait."

Muke and Liu Huai were hiding around a corner in the tunnel, both of them exhausted and lacking combat power. Bai Liu had asked them to stay hidden while he confronted the enemy alone. Muke had vehemently objected at first, arguing that Bai Liu's 0.5 combat ability was no better than his own. This was probably the first time Muke had responded to Bai Liu with sarcasm, but he soon stopped under Bai Liu's steady gaze, blushing without apologizing.

But Bai Liu had soon come up with a plan to briefly contain Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, and this plan barely convinced Muke.

"This tunnel is the daytime habitat of the monstrous child creatures," Bai Liu explained. "They return from the outside as soon as nine o'clock rolls around, and the little monsters would certainly attack if they found us—intruders like us. They locate people using phones, but we—"

Muke's eyes lit up in realization. "We have two phones from the deformed children! As long as our phones stay connected, they won't be able to find us, and they'll attack Miao Feichi and the others instead!"

Bai Liu nodded. "Although the attack might not last long, it will allow us to escape with little Muke. The hospital side is out of the question —after nine o'clock, the investors and nurses there get active. It's not safe. We'll have to go through the church side. It's a safe area for children."

Muke took a deep breath and faced Bai Liu, leaning forward and meeting his gaze with a hint of aggression. "Okay, Bai Liu. Your plan seems solid, but I have a question. We only have two phones from the deformed children, and there are three of us. One person's phone won't work, and that person will be attacked, just like Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang. Who will it be?"

Bai Liu's eyes met Muke's briefly, and he lowered his gaze. "When we have little Muke, we'll have a third phone. I can use my own phone, or we can pick up a phone from one of the dead deformed children, or I can steal one. There's always a way."

"Don't try to fool me," Muke replied sharply, his chest heaving slightly. "Children's phones won't work after nine o'clock. Dead deformed children's phones are useless. And as for stealing—"

Muke's eyes fell on Bai Liu's broken arm, his voice turning urgent. "You only have one arm to use. If you steal, you won't be able to defend yourself, and we have no one left to help you. Liu Huai is delirious, I have no offensive power, and these options won't work. In the end, we only have two working phones."

"That means one of us is bound to have their phone ring." Muke stared at Bai Liu. "Bai Liu, who is that person?"

Bai Liu looked up at Muke quietly, his eyes calm like a clear lake.

"Haven't you already guessed, Muke? It's me."

Muke exhaled a slow, clouded breath, wringing his hands as he tried to keep his voice steady. "I disagree, Bai Liu. You only have 0.5 life left. Liu Huai and I don't have the ability to fight. We simply don't have the means to protect you in the chaos of a ringing phone."

"There's no one to protect you. You'll really die," Muke said firmly, his voice desperate. "Please, Bai Liu... don't do this."

Bai Liu paused for a moment and then let out a soft laugh. "Who says there's no one to protect me?"

Muke was stunned. "Who else can protect you?"

Bai Liu shrugged nonchalantly, a faint smile on his lips. "I can protect myself."

But in the end, Bai Liu convinced Muke with a very, very risky solution.

Muke closed his eyes to shut off the memory, then looked down at his wrist, where a watch he had picked up from the rubble of last night's explosion lay. The second hand ticked slowly, finally aligning with zero.

It's nine o'clock.

Muke's breathing slowed, then quickly became more rapid as he took out his phone and dialed Liu Huai's number, making sure the phone was on hold and wouldn't be traced by a call from a deformed child returning to the nest.

Muke glanced up at Bai Liu, who was still struggling with Miao Feichi.

Clutching his phone in his hand, he hesitated several times before finally pressing his own number. His fingers shook slightly as he leaned against the wall, taking a deep breath.

Muke's phone was picked up before it had a chance to ring. Now that both phones were useless, he leaned against the wall, gritting his teeth and closing his eyes, not daring to look behind him.

--If things don’t go as Bai Liu expects, then Bai Liu is dead for sure.

There was a rustling in the passageway, like rats scurrying across the ground. The sound came from all sides, as if a horde of rats were burrowing out of the ground, sniffing for food. A stronger scent of blood and decay filled Muke's nostrils, growing closer and closer. Yet, strangely, he didn’t see anything approaching, though the scurrying sound crossed over to him and kept moving forward.

The small Muke in his arms tugged at his sleeve and pointed upward with a wry expression.

Muke looked up into the tunnel, and his breath caught at the sight of the strange, misshapen children. Square-headed with tiny, deformed limbs, bulging bones, and abnormally white skin, they had large mouths and eyes in their temples. Crippled and crouching, they were all covered in various infusion bags, waddling along like bats in the night—hanging from the ceiling of the tunnel, their eyes glowing with a dazzling green light, like some variant of a blood-sucking bat.

The tunnel was dimly lit, and with the children buried in mushroom bushes and covered in infusion bags the same color as the mushrooms, Muke didn’t realize at first that the children had "walked" from above.

"Feichi, it’s nine o’clock. I hear voices coming this way. The deformed kids are back!" Miao Gaojiang whispered urgently. "Leave Bai Liu alone! Killing him is useless! Grab the kids! Be careful not to alert the kid monsters—they sound like there are a lot of them and they’ll drain our blood…"

Before Miao Gaojiang could say anything more, Bai Liu pulled a long, fluorescent, snow-white whip from his body without hesitation and lashed it with force directly above him.

His fishbone whip wasn’t strong enough to harm these child monsters, but it was enough to attract their attention and hate. Sure enough, all the deformed children who had been pattering and scurrying forward suddenly stopped. Their green eyes fixed on the group below.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has angered the deformed children in the tunnel. They have decided to punish the bad guy severely!]

"Shit! Bai Liu, are you crazy?! These monstrous children will attack you too!" Miao Feichi looked up, her face going pale as she saw so many child monsters. "How can there be so many? How many children have been killed in this hospital?!"

The children tilted their heads, letting out sharp cries as they crawled down the walls like wriggling, disturbed bats with sharp claws. They descended in a dense mass toward Miao Feichi and Bai Liu.

In such dimly lit tunnels, it was impossible to pinpoint a target by sight alone. Just as bats use ultrasound to locate their prey, these monstrous children, whose eyes had degenerated, relied on sound to track their targets.

At the same moment, Miao Feichi, Miao Gaojiang, and Bai Liu's phones rang simultaneously. The children, like bats detecting something suspicious, raised their syringes in response. With overly innocent expressions, they giggled and attacked with the syringes, which were as large as a human head.

Bai Liu held the phone between his shoulder and chin, pressing the connect button without hesitation. A sharp, thin voice greeted him from the other side: "Mr. Investor, I've found you!"

From the pile of deformed children, one emerged with a grim, innocent, and hideous smile. It lunged at Bai Liu with a huge syringe in hand, but Bai Liu whipped it away. However, the child clung to him, circling around like a child coveting candy, ready to sink the syringe into Bai Liu's neck and draw blood.

At that moment, Bai Liu's phone rang again. He picked it up without changing his expression. A sharp, monstrous child's sardonic laugh sounded from the other end: "Found you! Blood! I want Mr. Blood Investor!"

A child, covered in slime, emerged from the wall, ready to bite Bai Liu's shoulder, but Bai Liu caught it with his monkey paw and shook it off with another whip.

"BLOOD!!!"

"Give me blood!!!"

"Kill you!!!"

The monstrous child grinned hideously, roaring and snarling, tilting its head back and whistling as it moved closer to Bai Liu. His face was white and bloodless, though uninjured. Clearly, he was struggling, and it seemed only a matter of time before the inevitable happened.

Even Miao Feichi was shocked by Bai Liu's self-destructive behavior: "Is Bai Liu crazy? Why does he keep answering the phone when the deformed kids are going to trap him?!"

Miao Gaojiang found it strange that Bai Liu, overwhelmed by the children he had attracted, was still answering his phone.

Although this tactic reduced the efficiency of the swarming, it also had the obvious drawback of being constantly pestered by the children. Miao Gaojiang and his team would never use such a method —multiple playthroughs had taught them that it was a pain to be continually harassed by monsters.

Miao Gaojiang's defense was high enough to withstand it, but Miao Feichi's blood was already being drained by the swarm of attacking kids. He really didn't want to waste time dealing with Bai Liu.

"I've got my children; the one who got away is Muke…" Miao Gaojiang gritted his teeth, grabbing Miao Feichi's hand with a firm grip. "Feichi, let's break out first and leave the kid and Bai Liu alone! Let's go!"

Miao Feichi looked back reluctantly but sneered when he saw Bai Liu's defiant posture. "Never mind. You're going to die in this tunnel anyway. The only difference is whether I get to kill you or not." With that, he lifted his twin swords and hacked at the children surrounding him, following Miao Gaojiang.

Behind them, Bai Liu was overshadowed by the growing influx of children. Just as Miao Feichi thought they were about to walk out of the tunnel, Bai Liu suddenly burst into laughter.

He picked up his phone with an expectant, relieved smile. "Finally, I've been waiting for you to call."

The voice on the other end was a little hoarse, but still calm. "It's me."

From the far end of the church, something began to move at speed, stepping over the bodies of all the deformed children piled up like small mountains, stomping over them as if on flat ground.

Like a gust of wind from the entrance of the church, this thing swept through the pile of children with a steady kick, landing lightly and steadily, the wind whipping up blood-stained clothes before dropping them again.

Someone—or rather, a little monster—had fallen from the sky.

It landed like a falling willow leaf in front of Bai Liu, standing unmoved like an unformed protector.

Bai Liu's phone calls stopped, and the deformed children lost their quarry. They began to retreat, confused and shocked by the sudden appearance of this man.

Little Muke, hiding in the shadows, watched motionlessly, forgetting to breathe or blink, his expression earnest and intense, as if on the verge of tears.

Bai Liu, who seemed to know this man well, casually tossed him his fishbone whip and stood back to back with him, extending his monkey paw.

Bai Liu's hands and feet were covered in bruised pinholes from blood draws. His lips were dry and cracked, and his clothes were stained with black blood. The ends of his hair, damp from the baptismal pool, clung to his thin shoulders.

Little Bai Liu held up the phone. Through the air, the plaintive voice of Little Bai Liu fell, creating a strange, haunting melody.

He said, "Good morning, Mr. Investor. I don't think I'm late."

Little Bai Liu shook the bone whip in his hand, his voice a strange, hoarse whisper. "I'll double my fee, Mr. Investor—two hundred a minute for a job after I'm dead."

Bai Liu smiled lazily. "Fine, add whatever you want. All my money is yours."

Little Bai Six stared down, one of his hands slipping something back into Bai Liu's pocket, while his other hand drew the whip and then swiftly and unceremoniously flung it away.

The wind from the whip sent ripples through the air like waves, pushing through the circle of deformed children like a raging sea.

Amidst the shrill cries and growls of the deformed children, Little Bai Six, standing atop the pile of bodies from which the child's form had emerged, lowered his eyes expressionlessly.

"So noisy."

He flicked his wrist at his side and lashed out again, scattering the children in an instant, their cries growing increasingly desperate.

In the span of a breath, they were already behind Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, who were running for their lives. Little Bai Six leaped onto the wall with his bare feet, spun in midair, and with a flick of his wrist, snapped the whip with a crisp, decisive strike.

In the reflection of Miao Feichi's widened eyes—turned back at the sound—a pale, eerie monster-child stood gripping Bai Liu's whip. The whip, an instrument of pure judgment, slashed through the air toward him.

If it had been Bai Liu wielding it, Miao Feichi wouldn't have been too concerned. He was familiar with Bai Liu's fishbone whip—it judged, but inflicted no direct damage. At worst, it would have left him staggering.

But as Bai Six's whip descended upon him, an instinctual warning exploded in Miao Feichi's mind. Whether it was his Life Value teetering on the edge of [Death Foreknowledge], or the battle-honed sixth sense that had saved him countless times, he knew—

—If he took that hit, he would die.

Miao Feichi ducked at the last second. The fishbone knuckles whirled past, barely grazing his cheek, leaving behind a thin, bloody scratch.

The whip slammed into the ground with terrifying force. Fragments of stone burst outward, scattering along the whip's path. The tunnel trembled for two long seconds. Amidst the rising shrieks of the deformed children, Little Bai Six retracted the fishbone whip, leaving a deep gouge in the floor. His expression remained utterly blank.

Miao Feichi slowly raised a trembling hand to his face, touching the fresh wound. His fingers came away stained with blood—the mark left behind by his brush with death.

In Bai Liu's hands, the fishbone whip had always been a strange, blunt weapon. But in Little Bai Six's grasp, it was something entirely different. It was an executioner's blade in the hands of the one most suited to wield it.

Miao Feichi couldn't help but recall another player—someone who had once given him this exact sense of suffocating oppression with a whip.

Spades. The lizard bone whip.

Miao Feichi's Scavenger Zombies had faced Spades' Killer Sequence team in a team battle once. Their best result? Spades had gone one versus five and ended the match in under a minute. Miao Feichi had stumbled out of the arena in a daze, saved only by his Death-Exemption Medal—and he hadn't even had time to draw his twin swords.

That same look was now reflected in Little Bai Six's eyes. The same look Spades had given him when he pressed his boot to Miao Feichi's head at the end of the match, whip still dripping with blood—

—As if he were nothing more than a statistic. A mere insect, not worth a second glance.

"Father!!!" Miao Feichi screamed as he turned and bolted. "DEFENSE! RUN! Don't look back! Get outside and dodge that whip! It does extra damage!"

Miao Feichi ran at full speed, Miao Gaojiang gritting his teeth as he defended. But Little Bai Six remained unfazed, reeling back before swinging his entire upper arm again.

The whip came down. Miao Feichi was buried under the falling rubble, while Miao Gaojiang barely managed to roll away, escaping direct impact—but the end of the whip lashed across his ankle.

[System Warning: Player Miao Gaojiang's Life Value has dropped by 7. Remaining Life Value: 16. Leave the danger zone immediately!]
[System Warning: Player Miao Feichi's Life Value has dropped by 1. Remaining Life Value: 9. Leave the danger zone immediately!]

The light from the exit cast a sharp glow on Miao Gaojiang's face as he limped forward, his injured ankle slowing him down.

Little Bai Six's intent was clear. His aim with the whip was mediocre, and Miao Feichi was too fast to be easily hit. So, he had focused on Miao Gaojiang instead.

Take down the slower one first. Reduce the burden on Bai Liu and the others.

Miao Feichi coughed as he struggled to his feet, drawing his twin swords. Before he could properly stand, he caught sight of Bai Six preparing to strike Miao Gaojiang again.

[System Alert: Player Miao Feichi uses Long-Range Attack Personal Skill (Locking Slash)]

Bai Six ducked low to dodge the incoming blade, his gaze sharp. The whip in his hand was still poised to lash at Miao Gaojiang—

Miao Feichi shouted, "LOOK BACK! It's the investor behind you I'm going to kill!"

The spinning blade passed Bai Six, hurtling toward Bai Liu.

Without hesitation, Bai Six whipped out a hand, catching one knife midair, while the other continued toward Bai Liu.

Bai Liu reached out calmly, activating [Thief's Monkey Claw], but the skill had only a 50% success rate against attacks. If he failed, he would die.

Bai Six couldn't take that risk.

With gritted teeth, he abandoned his pursuit of Miao Gaojiang and lunged toward Bai Liu instead. The moment the blade was about to pierce Bai Liu's chest, Bai Liu caught the tip—

—and Bai Six, running at full speed, snatched the handle.

His chest rose and fell slightly—an unconscious mimicry of life.

If he had a heartbeat, it would have been racing.

Miao Feichi took the chance to flee, dragging Miao Gaojiang with him. Bai Six let out a sharp, dry "breath," watching as the stolen blade in his hand gradually faded—recalled by Miao Feichi.

Bai Six clicked his tongue in mild irritation.

"Not a single kill." He wiped at his mouth, smearing away the black, viscous fluid dripping from his lips. "And you were offering me 100,000 for Miao Feichi and 200,000 for Miao Gaojiang."

Bai Liu knelt beside him, wiping away the dark sludge with his sleeve.

"You did well," Bai Liu murmured, half sigh, half praise. "I'll still give you the money."

Bai Six, still coughing up black liquid, stared at him.

Little Bai Six's white, porcelain-like fingers dripped with a strange, black, viscous fluid—something that looked like rotting internal organs, interspersed with bits of torn flesh.

Bai Liu knelt down and patted Little Bai Six on the shoulder. "Even if Miao Feichi hadn't tried to sneak up on me in the end, your body—or corpse—wouldn't have lasted much longer."

Using the cuff of his hospital gown, Bai Liu wiped away the thick, tar-like substance that kept flowing from Little Bai Six's mouth. It was like blood, except Little Bai Six had none left to bleed—he had long since been drained.

Bai Liu exhaled, his voice carrying a tone that was both a sigh and a quiet acknowledgment. "A forced outburst at Mental Value 0, complete alienation… it took too much out of your body. The last time you swung the whip, I could already tell—you were slipping fast. Even so, you were brave. You did well. I'll still give you the money."

Little Bai Six looked up at Bai Liu with dark, hollow eyes. His mouth still oozed that black "blood," and his voice came out broken, choked with coughs."…I might be dead, but I want real money, not the false paper money burned as an offering to the dead!"

Bai Liu: "……"

What an odd thing to focus on.

Muke, who had been trailing behind, finally caught up, dragging the unconscious Liu Huai.

The moment Little Muke saw Bai Six pushing Bai Liu away—the irritating investor—he threw himself to his knees in front of him. His tears flowed faster than Bai Six's "blood." He reached out as if to touch Bai Six, but the moment his fingers brushed against the boy's cold skin, he flinched, jerking his hand back as if burned by the chill.

The tears only fell harder. His nose was running now, and he was crying so hard he could barely speak.

"Oooh, Bai Six, how are you?"

"Ahem." Bai Six let out a weak cough, his expression pale. "Thankfully, it wasn't a painful death. Liu Jiayi gave me a worse one."

At the mention of Liu Jiayi's name, the dazed Liu Huai stirred for a moment, his lips moving as he mumbled something unintelligible about her. But his focus quickly drifted again, his head lolling forward as he lost consciousness once more.

Bai Six averted his gaze. "So this is the brother Liu Jiayi was trying to save, huh? And you've already done this to him? With her sense of vengeance, she'll definitely kill you all."

"It's not like we did this to him on purpose," Muke explained, his voice tinged with helplessness. "It's the aftermath of his Life Value dropping too low, combined with the plummeting Mental Value. We've been keeping him stable by feeding him mental bleach, but…" Muke forced a bitter smile. "There's nothing else we can do."

Bai Liu's gaze flickered toward Bai Six. "I don't think we're the only ones responsible for this, though."

Bai Six met his eyes.

"Isn't this what Liu Jiayi wanted?" Bai Liu continued nonchalantly. "Her brother, finally giving her everything she wanted. She'll be more focused on keeping Liu Huai alive than trying to kill us first, don't you think?"

Bai Six stared at him for a long moment, then suddenly let out a soft, amused snort.

"So that's why you gave me the coin in the first place?" His voice was hoarse, but steady. "To make Liu Jiayi believe you were giving up the most important game piece—the game manager—to her. To make her think you had really abandoned the [investor's] side of the pass. And to make her believe she had finally gotten what she wanted—that Liu Huai loved her as much as she had sacrificed for him."

Bai Six's dark eyes sharpened. "So that when she tries to escape, she'll reveal herself?"

Bai Liu reached into his pocket and pulled out the coin—something Bai Six had returned to him just before going after Miao Gaojiang. He turned it over leisurely in his fingers before slipping it back around his neck.

Bai Six's gaze lifted from the coin to Bai Liu's face.

"Since the moment I met you, Bai Liu," he said calmly, "have you ever spoken a single word that didn't have a purpose?"

Bai Liu smiled slightly. "'You're important to me.' That one, maybe."

The Loving Welfare Home

On Tuesday, Baptism Day, during the afternoon of carol singing, in the jungle behind the church, Bai Liu and Bai Six were planning their escape for Wednesday.

Little Bai Six touched the coin Bai Liu had given him. Bai Liu, half-crouched, was teaching him how to use some of its functions when he suddenly spoke.

"Oh, by the way, do you remember that little girl, Liu Jiayi, the one I asked you to protect?"

"Her?" Little Bai Six frowned. "She seems strange to me. She's way too comfortable in this weird orphanage and figuring out its rules way too fast. I don't think she needs my protection at all."

"Is that so?" Bai Liu pondered. "That girl only has 50 life points. I had two guesses about that earlier."

Bai Six looked at him. "What are your guesses?"

"First, that she's poisoned—which is very likely. The information I've gathered so far supports that theory. But there's something strange about it—" Bai Liu paused. "That explanation alone doesn't account for why Liu Huai is bound to her. And it certainly doesn't explain why his lifesteal has been reduced by 50%."

As he spoke, Bai Liu adjusted the coin's interface, showing it to Bai Six. "But this kind of forced nerfing—now that I think about it—it feels familiar. I've encountered it twice before. It usually happens when a player's attributes exceed the game's balance. The system regulates everything to maintain order, nerfing the player in the process."

Little Bai Six quickly caught onto Bai Liu's meaning. "Are you saying Liu Jiayi is so strong in a certain attribute that the system had to weaken her life value?"

"Not only that," Bai Liu replied. "She was also bound to Liu Huai to restrict her from clearing the game." He glanced at Bai Six. "The first time I was nerfed was at the end of a game, because I was using strategies that broke the game's structure. But Liu Jiayi? She was nerfed the moment she entered."

Little Bai Six, despite never having played a single game, was quick to follow Bai Liu's logic. "You mean Liu Jiayi is probably an experienced player?"

Bai Liu rubbed his chin. "That's my guess. And based on the way this game nerfs players—targeting their strongest attributes—I suspect Liu Jiayi has a unique skill related to lifesteal. Something like restoring lifesteal or an advanced version of it."

Little Bai Six frowned. "Didn't you say lifesteal skills are extremely rare?"

"Exactly. Which narrows down the possibilities even further." Bai Liu's eyes darkened thoughtfully. "From what I know, there's a player called 'Little Witch' who fits this description. But she doesn't just have a healing skill—she also has a powerful offensive ability."

Little Bai Six rated it simply: "Sounds like a tough opponent."

"But I want her soul." Bai Liu looked down at Bai Six, his voice firm. "I need a player like her."

"The problem is—" his gaze sharpened—"she already knows I can manipulate people by controlling their souls."

Bai Liu rubbed his knuckles in thought. "We can start with Liu Huai. Test her. Figure out what she really wants."

"By analyzing all the information and maximizing our advantages, I came up with a plan." Bai Liu tapped the coin resting over Bai Six's heart. "You take Muke and Liu Jiayi and escape. But she probably won't let you succeed so easily. A lot could happen in the middle of your escape."

"But that's fine—I've accounted for that. I'll stage an ambush at the private hospital to delay your capture, which means you'll have one more chance to run."

"Then the plan splits into two possible outcomes." Bai Liu met Bai Six's gaze. "The first: I die in tomorrow's raid."

"If that happens, you leave the next day without Liu Jiayi. Just take Muke and focus on escaping the hospital. Forget acquiring Liu Jiayi's soul. Steal a car, use the [Passenger's Blessing] item, and take Muke out. That'll help you bypass most of the monsters."

Bai Six didn't blink. "What if investor players are waiting at the hospital to catch me?"

"I'll have my body thrown into the monster patient wards. Those creatures will attack me with poisonous mist until my mental value drops to zero and my body mutates into one of them. But—" Bai Liu's voice was calm, matter-of-fact, "—as a monster, I'll be stronger. And while you're running, I'll try to stay conscious long enough to fight off the players hunting you, buying you time."

Little Bai Six was silent for two seconds before he spoke, his voice laced with confusion. "You'd turn yourself into a monster just to protect me? You'd be stuck that way forever in this… game you call a copy?" His expression twisted. "Why would you go that far for me?"

"Because," Bai Liu said softly, leaning in so their eyes met, "that's what I want you to do for me, little Bai Six." His voice was almost a whisper. "If I survive tomorrow, I'll want you to die a monster for me."

"And that would be a different kind of plan."

Bai Liu continued, his tone light but firm. "I'll take full control of Liu Huai. Then, I need you to lower Liu Jiayi's guard. Make her believe you and your investors—that is, me—genuinely want to save her. That way, I can gain her trust." He smiled slightly. "And once I have her trust, I'll have her soul."

His voice softened, almost teasing. "Do you know how to do that?"

Little Bai Six met Bai Liu's gaze steadily.

Bai Liu answered for him. "Let her kill you herself. Then have Muke dump your body somewhere it can mutate into a monster and serve me."

Little Bai Six's breath hitched for a moment. Then, with an expressionless face, he scoffed, "My dear Mr. Investor, you may be overestimating yourself. Not everyone is as self-sacrificing as you. I wouldn't do something that stupid for you."

Bai Liu smiled as he reached out to touch Bai Six's face, though Bai Six avoided him indifferently. Bai Liu didn't seem to mind. "I know you, Bai Six. Maybe even better than you know yourself."

"You wouldn't do something so stupid for someone else," Bai Liu murmured.

His gaze dropped to the coin resting on Bai Six's chest. He placed his hands on Bai Six's thin shoulders, leaning in until his forehead touched the coin. Bai Liu closed his eyes against the warmth of Bai Six's heart. His voice was reverent, almost a whisper.

"But you would do it for yourself."

"Just as I was willing to die for you… so too must you be willing to die for me, now that you know—" Bai Liu's voice dropped to a whisper. "—that I am you."

"The coin is important. You should take the time to explore it properly." Bai Liu curled his lips into a smirk. "Pay attention to the player's name when the system prompts, and to the small details. You might find a surprise—like the answer to the question you've been wondering about: who I really am."

Little Bai Six, holding the coin, furrowed his brows slightly.

Little Bai Six, blood trickling from the corner of his mouth, looked at Bai Liu with a pale expression. "Now that everything has gone exactly as you planned... Liu Jiayi, despite thinking you're a scheming and despicable man, probably believes that you genuinely wanted to save her." His tone was flat. "The way you sacrificed yourself to protect Muke and me—even Miao Feichi and the others—made her think you have some kind of special compassion for children as a group.

"But unfortunately, that's not the case, is it?"

"You're a complete and utter liar." Bai Six stated emotionlessly. "Her first impression of you was absolutely right."

Bai Liu simply shrugged, utterly unbothered by the assessment. "So? Are you okay? Can you still move later?"

Little Bai Six coughed, wiping the blood from the corner of his mouth. His head was bowed, brows furrowing slightly. "……We can't leave the tunnel during the day. Even at night, our movement will be limited."

"This tunnel only opens after the monstrous child-creatures return to their nests. That won't happen until after nine o'clock tonight. You should get out of here quickly—and I wouldn't recommend taking me with you."

Slowly, Little Bai Six lifted his head. His pupils, already beginning to dull with death, held an eerily calm expression. "That was the best I could do. My insides are starting to liquefy in this body-consuming state of alienation. By the end of the night, I might turn into a real corpse, or rot into the puddle of slime that was once used to cultivate these mushrooms."

As he spoke, visible corpse spots began appearing on his face and hands—spreading at an unnatural speed, decaying before their eyes.

Little Muke choked back a sob when he heard this. His eyes were red as he turned away, unwilling to look at the ruined state of Bai Six.

Bai Liu, however, was unaffected—his reaction eerily in sync with the fourteen-year-old corpse of himself. A calm, detached stillness.

After a moment of thought, Bai Liu simply nodded and said, "Well then, if you're that useless, there's no point in taking you. You can stay here and rot."

Muke, tears streaming down his face, turned to Bai Liu in disbelief. His voice trembled with anger. "You're just leaving him here? Are you a beast?!"

At that, Bai Six let out a faint, gurgling laugh, a fishy liquid dripping from the corner of his lips. He struggled to lift his heavy eyelids, his gaze dim but amused. His lips curled into a weak smile.

"Mr. Investor," he rasped, "personally, I like you best when you act like a brute. That's the kind of person I expect to become, so please—keep it up."

"I'm just an animal in this game," Bai Liu replied with a lazy smirk, mirroring Bai Six's. "When I'm not playing, I'm just an ordinary, law-abiding laid-off worker."

Little Bai Six gave him a look of pure disdain. "Disgusting disguise."

Suddenly, Bai Liu leaned forward and embraced him. His jaw rested lightly against Bai Six's forehead, his lips pressing against the boy's bloodstained, dirt-matted hair. His voice dropped into a whisper, meant only for the two of them.

"Your body will rot here."

"But even if you turn into a corpse, into a monster, into a puddle of mud, you will never be trapped by this disgusting orphanage, by this disgusting game."

Little Bai Six tilted his head back, meeting Bai Liu's gaze. That ever-present, faint, unreadable smile lingered on Bai Liu's lips. His dark eyes reflected Bai Six's fading form—empty, rippleless.

Then, Bai Liu lowered his gaze and pressed a light kiss to Bai Six's forehead, almost like a prayer.

"—For I will take your soul, little friend."

Little Bai Six closed his eyes, dazed.

Little Muke glanced back at Little Bai Six as they exited the tunnel, his eyes red from crying, his voice thick with sobs. "Do we really have to leave him there?"

Bai Liu responded casually as he dragged Liu Huai out. "He can't leave, and the tunnel is closing."

Once Bai Liu had gotten everyone out, he turned to see Little Muke staring at him with a hostile glare, like a cat about to scratch. "You could have saved him."

"But he agreed to die for me." Bai Liu shrugged, faking a smile as he flicked his tongue against his teeth. "Are you going to attack the investor he fought so hard to keep?"

Little Muke's heart clenched at Bai Liu's words. He glared at him twice as hard before finally lowering his head with a choked sob.

Now standing beneath the idol, Bai Liu looked down at Liu Huai, who was barely holding on to life, then at the new soul note in his soul wallet—Liu Huai's.

This had happened just after Bai Liu obtained the coin, it's when Liu Huai made his trade in the tunnel.

Even in his delirium, Liu Huai remembered their agreement. The deal for his soul went through without a hitch.

Bai Liu could sense Liu Huai's willingness to hand over his soul. It wasn't just because of their deal—it was because, after learning the truth about Liu Jiayi, the college student who once had such a strong will to live now harbored a death wish.

Bai Liu stared down into Liu Huai's dead, lusterless eyes. The man had barely spoken on the way here.

Liu Huai had always feared dying in the game because it meant his soul would be recycled. The uncertainty of what the game would do with it—never being able to escape, even in death—was more terrifying than dying itself.

So he had chosen to sell his soul to Bai Liu—a last act of control, a kind of twisted reassurance. At least this way, he could die with some peace of mind.

But if Liu Huai truly wanted to die, now was not the time.

Bai Liu turned to Little Muke. "Do you know where Liu Jiayi is?"

Little Muke nodded. "She's in the second-to-last craft classroom on the ground floor of the back building."

Bai Liu adjusted Liu Huai's weight, steadying him.

Liu Huai's head lolled against Bai Liu's shoulder, his breath ragged. He stirred at the movement, his voice faint. "Are we… at the orphanage?"

Bai Liu regarded him indifferently. "We're here. Wake up, Liu Huai. Go see your sister—you'll feel better."

"Feel better?" Liu Huai let out a weak, bitter laugh and shook his head. "No. Seeing her will only make me feel worse. I've lost everything—the ability to protect her, the right to protect her. I'm not a good brother."

"Players who lose their will don't survive in this game."

Little Muke anxiously watched Liu Huai slipping away. He had seen Liu Huai's strong desire to live, and even if he could gain a skill from Liu Huai's death, he couldn't help but try to encourage him. "Don't give up yet! We'll do everything we can to keep you alive! And isn't your sister a healer? She can save you!"

Liu Huai lowered his gaze, looking at the dagger on his belt. It was turning translucent as his will faded. He let out a sudden, broken laugh. Tears slipped down his face as he whispered,

"I… have fought so hard to survive. The things that are simple for you—eating fried chicken, going to a good university, having a future—Jiayi and I had to struggle for every single one. The only bright thing in our future was each other."

"But even that… even that has lost its meaning. Living has become… exhausting."

Liu Huai clenched his teeth, tears trailing down the bridge of his nose. He looked at Bai Liu, crying in ugly, silent sobs.

"Bai Liu, if only you were Jiayi's brother, you would understand her thoughts. You would know how to protect her. You could balance her resentment and her suspicions. But I can't. I'm too weak. I'll never be able to protect her from anything…"

His voice dropped to a whisper. "You promised me, Bai Liu. If I die, you'll give her a bright future. You won't let her soul be swallowed by darkness. You won't let the game take her—not even in death."

Bai Liu met Liu Huai's tear-streaked gaze. "Yeah."

He adjusted Liu Huai's weight against his shoulder, shifting him into a steadier position. His voice was calm, almost peaceful. "But that's after you die. Right now, Liu Huai, you've sold your soul to me. At least do something to make it worth the price I paid before you go to hell."

"I spent a lot of points on you," Bai Liu added, indifferent.

Liu Huai let out a tired chuckle, his head drooping.

His gaze, once empty, flickered back to life. The dagger at his waist gradually solidified as he exhaled. "Yeah… I'll make sure you get your money's worth, buyer."

Back building of the orphanage. Ground floor. Penultimate craft classroom.

Little Miao Gaojiang stood stiffly at the front, shivering.

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang followed behind, both looking worse for wear. Miao Gaojiang's ankle was still bleeding, slowing his steps and leaving a trail of blood behind. But stopping wasn't an option—the monster child's attacks were too strong.

Miao Feichi panted heavily. He couldn't believe they had barely escaped, almost wiped out by a newcomer who had only been through two games.

A duel with Bai Liu—no, a one-sided hunt—had nearly ended them.

He remembered what Miao Gaojiang had said earlier.

"Don't you think he's scarier than those League players?"

At the time, Miao Feichi thought he was exaggerating. But now, when he recalled Bai Liu's bloodstained face smiling in the darkness of the tunnels, a cold shiver ran down his spine.

The monster child chasing them had clearly been Bai Liu's. Somehow, he had manipulated himself into becoming one of them.

It was impossible to say what skill Bai Liu had used, but given that his child had already died, there was only one path left for him—the [Investor] path.

With just a sliver of health left, missing a hand, and on the brink of death, Bai Liu had still chased them down alone—had come within a hair's breadth of wiping out a two-man team renowned in the League.

If Miao Feichi got out of this game alive, he swore he would never cross paths with this lunatic again.

He glanced impatiently at Little Miao Gaojiang, who was leading them. "Where the hell is Miao Feichi—the little brat? He's in the same craft classroom as that blind kid, right?"

Little Miao Gaojiang had his head bowed, nodding hesitantly. His grip tightened, sweat slipping down his temple.

He knew something was off about Liu Jiayi. That clever, blind girl should have been able to kill Bai Liu and Miao Feichi. Her abilities were dangerous enough to even make the [Investors] wary.

But he hadn't warned them.

Because this was his chance—his only chance—to escape.

If Liu Jiayi went up against the two Investors, he could find a way out in the chaos.

He didn't want to die at their hands.

Little Miao Gaojiang warily stopped in front of a craft classroom door, across from the bathrooms. "Last night… Miao Feichi and Liu Jiayi slept here."

Miao Feichi kicked open the door. The room was empty except for the lingering scent of dust and blood. Two rag dolls lay inside—one torn apart, its limbs and head ripped off, resembling one of Bai Liu's dolls; the other covered in needles, its stitched face twisted in a grimace of fear, streaked with painted tears—an eerie replica of little Miao Feichi's doll.

A strange, chilling sensation crawled up Miao Feichi's spine as he hesitantly brushed aside the soft, tattered plush fabric. Beneath it, a horrifying sight emerged—little Miao Feichi's face, studded with needles, frozen in terror.

He had been dead for who knew how long. His skin had begun to bloat, mushroom-like corpse spots blooming across his face. His body had been twisted into an unnatural angle, stuffed inside this cloth box like a discarded rag doll—his mouth crammed full of fabric.

Miao Feichi stood frozen before the gruesome sight. Miao Gaojiang approached, took one look, and fell just as silent.

For a long moment, neither spoke. Then, exchanging grim expressions, Miao Feichi gritted his teeth and broke the silence.

"Who drained this little brat's blood?!"

Irritated, he waved a hand. "Father, go ahead and draw your children's blood. Get back to the hospital and grow your blood lingzhi first. Just focus on getting one through."

They had come prepared with blood-drawing equipment, anticipating the possibility that the hospital might stop supplying them after they attacked the nurse NPCs. Before heading into the tunnel, Miao Feichi had made a stop at the ICU, swiping syringes and tubes—just in case.

Now, faced with the needle poised against his skin, little Miao Gaojiang finally panicked. He stumbled backward, desperate to escape. But the classroom door was unlocked. As Miao Feichi closed in with the syringe, little Miao Gaojiang took another step back. Then, the moment his back hit the wall, he broke down, screaming—

"I know who took Miao Feichi's blood! It was Liu Jiayi!"

Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi exchanged sharp glances.

"Liu Jiayi?" Miao Gaojiang frowned. "Why would she take the blood of other children?"

Little Miao Gaojiang pressed himself against the wall, swallowing hard.

"She… she said she was trying to save her brother. She was waiting for him to come and give her his blood, but in case there wasn't enough, she seemed to have drained Miao Feichi too. Bai Six was also killed by her."

Freed from the hallucinations of the hospital, which had left him mentally vulnerable, Miao Gaojiang was finally thinking more clearly. He narrowed his eyes.

"Taking extra blood as a precaution…? How would Liu Jiayi, a child, even know there wouldn't be enough from one person? That sounds like something only an experienced player—someone familiar with the secondary game's rules—would do."

"But didn't Liu Huai say this was Liu Jiayi's first game?" Miao Feichi muttered, rubbing his temples. He wasn't good at thinking through these twists and turns, and it was giving him a headache. "Even if Liu Huai and Bai Liu are working together now, Liu Huai didn't seem like he was lying back then."

"That's true," Miao Gaojiang admitted, his gaze shifting to the grotesque rag doll. "And if Liu Jiayi were one of them, she wouldn't have killed Bai Six's children… This method of killing—it feels familiar. But I can't quite place where I've seen it before…"

In the league, Miao Gaojiang had meticulously studied his opponents' mini-TV videos. The unusual way this victim had been killed, the doll-like attack—it should have been unforgettable.

But he had never bothered to remember the insignificant ones. And he had certainly never noticed a blind… player.

He was sure he had seen this doll before. It hadn't been a crucial item, but something about it stuck with him. Yet, his mind—hazy from exhaustion—refused to recall it.

Miao Gaojiang frowned, lost in thought, but Miao Feichi cut him off impatiently.

"An old player is an old player—doesn't matter. I don't remember any doll-playing little girl, so she's probably not that tough. What matters now is—where the hell did that little blind brat run off with my blood?"

"We need to find her," he said, his expression dark. "We need that blood back. And we need to drain her too—so we can clear the level with certainty."

His gaze snapped back to little Miao Gaojiang. A wicked grin spread across his face as he stepped forward, twin knives glinting as he pressed them against the child's neck.

"Speak. Where is Liu Jiayi hiding in this orphanage?"

"I—I don't know!" Little Miao Gaojiang wailed, voice cracking with terror. "Even though she can't see, she memorized our escape routes and the teachers' patrols. She knows this orphanage way better than we do! And she has the teacher's key we stole when we escaped before—she can get into any room! If she wants to hide, she could be anywhere!"

"The only way you'll find her is by contacting the teachers and searching every room."

"Fuck!" Miao Feichi exploded. "That'll take forever!"

Miao Gaojiang's expression darkened. "We don't have a choice. Your blood is with that blind brat. Muke is in their hands. They have the monster child—we can't just steal it from them. We don't have enough blood. We have to go one by one. Let's go to the teachers, tell them we're investors—they should help us find that little blind girl."

Neither father nor son realized that after 9 AM, the passage linking the orphanage to the hospital would be sealed.

Neither realized how Bai Six's brutal struggle had made Miao Gaojiang—who had taken a whipping—more cautious than ever.

Miao Gaojiang had exhausted his S-Explosion defense skill in last night's blast, draining his stamina. He wouldn't be able to regain his 10,000 defense points until his stamina recovered at 9 PM. Until then, he would be wary of enemies with high attack power.

Even if they suspected the passage might close, who knew if the monsters inside could come out during the day?

The church was obviously a shelter for children. Did it have the same protective effect on those deformed child-monsters? Miao Gaojiang wasn't willing to test that theory. And Miao Feichi was too shaken by Bai Six's fate to risk turning back.

That left only one option—finding Liu Jiayi and reclaiming Miao Feichi's blood.

It was the safest move in every way.

So why… did it feel wrong?

Miao Gaojiang couldn't shake the sense that he was missing something. Something vital.

Like standing before a fogged-up window, knowing that just one small scratch could reveal the truth.

But the needle that could pierce the veil was trapped—clutched tightly by his fear.

Bai Liu followed after Miao Gaojiang into the craft room, which had already been opened. Like Miao Feichi before him, he sniffed the air and quickly dug through the fabric box, uncovering the stiffened body of little Miao Feichi.

Crouching down thoughtfully, Bai Liu examined the child's face, needles embedded under his pale skin. After a moment, he looked up at Liu Huai, who was leaning on Muke for support. "From the way she killed, Liu Huai, your sister holds a deep grudge. She's quite vindictive, isn't she?"

Liu Huai shook his head with a bitter smile.

If little Miao Feichi wanted to devour her flesh, then Liu Jiayi had drained him of his blood.

Had Miao Feichi not intervened, Liu Jiayi's original target would have been little Bai Six—but in the end, the little witch let him go. It would have been far more practical to drain little Bai Six's blood, ensuring Bai Liu's death.

But she didn't do it.

Liu Jiayi let little Bai Six leave the craft room with his blood still in his veins, granting Bai Liu one last chance to survive. Of course, it was also possible that little Muke knocking outside had disrupted her. If she had drawn too much attention and risked attracting a teacher, she might not have had time to finish the blood draw and leave the classroom. That, too, was a possibility.

Bai Liu never underestimated a child's ability to play the game. He couldn't be entirely certain of Liu Jiayi's motivations at every turn, but one thing was clear: Liu Huai was important to her.

Bai Liu stood up and scanned the room. "Liu Jiayi isn't here. Muke, do you know where she might be hiding?"

Little Muke shook his head slowly, deep in thought. "There are too many places she could hide. It won't be easy to find her."

If they ran into her on the road and found that they had lost little Bai Six, it would be uncertain who would live and who would die.

After piecing everything together, Bai Liu no longer thought searching the orphanage for Liu Jiayi was the best choice. His gaze landed on the frail Liu Huai.

—There was no need to go looking for Liu Jiayi. As long as Liu Huai was with them, she would come to them on her own.

"Let's go back to the church. It's a safe zone for children, and Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi won't want to return to that idol passage exit. That's where the monster children emerge—it's relatively safe for us." Bai Liu's voice was calm as he made his decision. "We'll wait for Liu Jiayi to come to us."

Twilight fell, and the night crept into the orphanage like an ominous black mist, swallowing the edges of the horizon.

It was already 8:30 PM—ten hours since Miao Feichi and his father had left the entrance, with only Miao Gaojiang taking an hour and a half break at noon to recover his strength.

And yet, despite all their efforts, they still hadn't found the little brat.

As if by magic, she had vanished entirely within the orphanage, leaving no trace behind.

They searched every classroom, every bedroom, every floor, every toilet cubicle—everywhere—almost to the point of digging.

Miao Feichi leaned against the wall to catch his breath. He raised his hand to wipe the sweat from his forehead and cursed, "Where the hell is this little blind girl hiding? I've used up all my reconnaissance tools and there's no trace of her. If I didn't know she couldn't possibly get out of this orphanage, I'd swear she made it out somehow!"

If Liu Jiayi had run out of the orphanage to clear the level, the system would send out a clearance alert. But Miao Feichi and the others hadn't received any alerts, which meant Liu Jiayi was still inside the orphanage.

"There's only the church left to search," Miao Gaojiang gasped, clearly exhausted, his face showing fatigue. "But we've been hanging around the road to the church. There's no way we could have missed her if she'd passed by."

"Bai Liu is guarding the church, and Liu Jiayi killed Bai Liu's child," Miao Feichi said. "She would be crazy to go over to Bai Liu's side and give him her head."

But Liu Jiayi had to go to the church. Because after midnight on Thursday, Liu Huai would fall into a state of [Sickness], and his life expectancy would start to drop. He only had two points of life left, so if Liu Jiayi didn't treat him in time, he would die tonight.

After all, Liu Huai's hands had been chopped off by Miao Feichi, so there was no reason for Bai Liu to bring him along. He was a burden.

Before midnight, it would be Bai Liu—who had 0.5 life—who would die first.

So Miao Gaojiang waited, spending his time anticipating the moment when Bai Liu's life would be claimed.

"I told you not to rush. Don't worry about Bai Liu," Miao Gaojiang said, looking at Miao Feichi with weary eyes. "Once Thursday arrives, we'll have more life and resistance. We can wear down Bai Liu and his team."

Miao Gaojiang was about to say something more, but when he met

Miao Feichi's gaze, his pupils flinched. The hand he had been about to place on Miao Feichi's shoulder froze in mid-air.

Miao Feichi turned his head, and his handsome face was gone, replaced by the face of a senile, sickly woman who smiled eerily. Her mouth opened to speak, and boiling water dripped from the corner of her lips, still bubbling and steaming.

[System Alert: Player Miao Gaojiang's spirit value is unstable and has dropped significantly! Please restore your spirit value quickly!]

Miao Gaojiang's breath caught as he shook his hand and quickly drank some mental bleach, telling himself it was all just a hallucination from the drop in his mental values.

Miao Feichi, standing next to him, gave him a strange look. "Father, what's wrong with you? You've been acting strange since the beginning. What are you doing all of a sudden?"

Miao Gaojiang barely calmed down enough to squeeze out a smile at Miao Feichi. "…What did you just ask me?"

"Oh, it's nothing," Miao Feichi waved his hand dismissively. "I just don't get why Liu Huai and Liu Jiayi would die for each other. It's so stupid. I'm wondering if they're up to something else."

"Aren't they siblings? No matter how bad things get, there's still blood between them," Miao Gaojiang murmured.

"Blood kinship? I couldn't do something that stupid," Miao Feichi scoffed. "If I were Liu Jiayi, I'd have escaped on my own, regardless of Liu Huai's death."

Miao Gaojiang's breath caught again, and his eyes reddened. He looked down and took another swig of mental bleach. "…Let's keep looking for Liu Jiayi."

Church, 8:47 PM

Liu Huai, resting against the wall, glanced at the time, his eyes betraying some concern. "…You don't think they'll find Jiayi, do you?"

"I don't think so," Little Muke shook his head. "Liu Jiayi knows this orphanage better than the teachers. She won't be so easy to find if she doesn't want to be. She can kill Bai Liu and Miao Feichi without a sound. Don't underestimate her. She can be ruthless. If she runs into someone, it’s unclear who will die."

Liu Huai’s anxious expression faded like a retreating tide. "…Right."

The famous Little Witch, brought back by the King's Guild at great cost, wasn’t without her own means and tricks to save her life.

Bai Liu agreed with Little Muke. "Wait. This orphanage is like an amusement park for Liu Jiayi. It’s a map she knows. She has healing skills. Miao Gaojiang’s condition is clearly deteriorating, and she was actually whipped by little Bai Liu, a novice, in the tunnel. I think Liu Jiayi should have been more cautious. She wouldn’t have been found so easily."

Muke glanced desperately at Bai Liu. "So we just sit here and do nothing? Liu Jiayi doesn’t even know we’re in the church, and by the time zero hour comes, you’ll be in a terrible state! Your life expectancy will be wiped out instantly!"

Liu Jiayi would definitely treat Liu Huai, Muke, and Little Muke as life preservers.

Everyone else had a chance to survive, but Bai Liu, with only 0.5 life left, had no way out.

If Liu Jiayi didn’t treat Bai Liu by midnight on Wednesday, this orphanage would be his last game.

Bai Liu’s gaze fell lazily on the statue in the church. "Isn’t 0.5 enough?"

Muke was stunned.

Bai Liu looked back at Muke, who seemed speechless, and smiled nonchalantly. "Is 0.5 too little? It’s the difference between life and death. 0.5 keeps me alive. The game’s not over. What’s the rush?"

He shook his wrist. "I still have a prop to resist damage and survive until at least midnight tonight. But I think Liu Jiayi will make a move at nine o'clock."

"But even so, Liu Jiayi won’t treat you voluntarily, will she?" Muke frowned. He pushed Little Muke, who was confused, toward Bai Liu, locking eyes with him. "At nine o'clock, the underground will open again. You have little Bai Liu’s blood. You can take his blood and mine to the hospital, and use their blood to heal your injuries. Your life value is too dangerous!"

Liu Huai sat up slightly, nodding in agreement. "That would indeed be a safer way for you to go."

"And then leave you unprotected here?" Bai Liu's gaze swept over Muke's face and Liu Huai's broken arms. "Miao Feichi could wipe both of you out with a single shot."

Muke tried to speak, but Bai Liu calmly interrupted him. "And you want Little Muke to come with me? My previous statement about needing 1.6 children's blood was just a theoretical calculation based on the minimum mortality rate for an investor. It was an investor's blood Lingzhi that needed at least 1.6 children's blood, not that 1.6 children's blood would necessarily save me."

"What if the game has a 75 percent mortality rate? Does that mean Little Muke has to bleed me out to save me? Would you let him do that?"

Muke pursed his lips and looked down without answering—clearly, he had considered the situation but was hoping for a gamble where both Little Muke and Bai Liu survived.

When Bai Liu saw Muke like this, he sighed inwardly, realizing that Muke had learned nothing from him except how to gamble first.

The young Muke's face was already pale, his hands trembling as he pushed forward, sneaking glances at Bai Liu.

"Liu Jiayi is the key to this game," Bai Liu continued calmly. "That's why the system is trying to limit her. Her healing skill allows the kids to hang on to their life points while they bleed out. As long as she's on our side, we can all make it through the game alive."

Third floor, orphanage director's office, by the window.

Liu Jiayi, dressed in a black veil, expressionlessly "watched" Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang search below. The door to the office behind her pulsed with a strange, barrier-like energy, flickering as if it might vanish at any moment.

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi uses a special level prop (Magic Space)]

The two men came to the dean's office once but couldn't find her because they were blocked by Liu Jiayi's props.

Liu Jiayi had learned from Bai Liu that the director, an NPC, had died last night. This made the director's office a place that no one would set foot in for a long time. It was the perfect spot to hide, as there was no better place in the entire orphanage.

She had stayed here specifically to deceive the father and son.

"The props Hearts gave me really work well," Liu Jiayi murmured to herself, her face blank. "Not bad for a top-tier item from the warehouse of a big guild like the King's Guild. Why did you have to follow Mu Sicheng instead of joining this guild? Why didn't you come in when I asked Hearts to recruit you... you'd rather follow someone dangerous like Mu Sicheng."

"You'll only end up as an assassin, helping deflect swords and harm. You're going to get yourself killed."

Jiayi, I have a friend!

He knows I'm not great at growing up, and I've told him everything... But he doesn't mind where I come from! He's really nice. He has a few pet peeves, but I can accept those! We get along pretty well, haha. We play games together, it's fun!

"Silly brother, how can there be good people in this world? We've never met a good man." Liu Jiayi lowered her lashes, her voice soft and indistinct. "Mu Sicheng isn't worth this much importance... has he ever given anything for you? Why do you suffer so much for betraying him?"

You've betrayed me a million times, haven't you?

Have you ever felt any pain for betraying me, brother?

Liu Huai's tears welled up as he hugged Liu Jiayi, wailing until he was emotionally spent, his tears falling involuntarily.

"I have no more friends, Jiayi. I did the wrong thing... I did it to protect you."

Liu Jiayi clenched her fists slowly, collecting herself. She touched the quartz watch on her wrist, the case removed, and her fingers gently rested on her folded hands. "It's nine o'clock."

Liu Jiayi pulled out her mobile phone. Her voice, once cold, now had a subtle sweetness to it. Absently, she wrapped her index finger around the lasso on the phone, ready to end the call. "Brother, are you there? We couldn’t run out today either. Can you pick me up tomorrow?"

The Loving Welfare Home

Liu Huai's voice came over the phone, strained with emotion: "... Jiayi, can I come and get you now? I want to see you."

Liu Jiayi's expression, which had been indifferent, softened noticeably, and her tone shifted, suddenly filled with warmth: "But the orphanage won't be open until tomorrow. Can you wait until then? We'll see each other tomorrow!"

"... Someone told me about a tunnel that leads to the orphanage. I followed it here," Liu Huai said, his voice faltering, as if struggling to speak. "... I only have one life left. I might not make it until tomorrow, Jiayi. I want to see you before I die."

Liu Jiayi's breath caught in her throat, and her expression instantly froze, her face turning cold as ice.

She gripped the phone tightly, not even noticing Liu Huai's subtle reference to his "one life" in his words. Instead, she quickly asked, "How did it drop so low? Where are you now?!"

Shouldn't Liu Huai be in the hospital? Even if he had given up hunting her blood and struck a deal with Bai Liu to protect the child, Liu Huai's personal skills shouldn't have dropped to this point—not even when dealing with monsters or Miao Feichi! He still should have been able to use his skills to run and hide.

With Liu Huai's character, he despised being controlled, and with her hints, he would understand that Bai Liu controlled people with items, requiring their consent. With the multiple limitations of Bai Liu's skills, Liu Huai shouldn't and couldn't be so easily controlled to the point of having only a little life left!

What happened last night? How did Liu Huai's life drop to 1?

A Liu Huai with only 1 life... It almost felt like an opponent who knew her well was deliberately saving him as bait.

The thought flashed through Liu Jiayi's mind, but it was quickly interrupted by Liu Huai's faint voice.

"I'm in the church."

If she didn't restore Liu Huai's life tonight, he would surely die. Liu

Jiayi realized this in an instant.

“Okay, brother, you stay in the church and don’t move,” Liu Jiayi said, taking a deep breath. She paced anxiously from side to side, forcing herself to calm down, though her hand shook violently as she gripped the phone. “Will you wait for Jiayi to come over? Jiayi will be there soon!”

Liu Huai’s voice grew quieter, almost a whisper. “Can I really wait for you, Jiayi?”

Liu Jiayi’s eyes reddened, and she gritted her teeth. “You can wait, brother. Trust Jiayi. I won’t let anything happen to you. I’ll be right there!!!”

There was a long silence from Liu Huai before he spoke again, his voice so soft it was barely audible.

“I believe in you, Jiayi.”

Liu Jiayi exhaled in relief.

As she hung up, Muke approached Liu Huai anxiously and asked, “Does Liu Jiayi suspect you? Is she coming?”

Liu Huai slowly shook his head, his movements stiff. “... She didn’t suspect me.” He paused, then added, “She seemed... flustered.”

“Panic means she cares about you,” Bai Liu observed, rubbing his chin thoughtfully. “She’ll likely come, but she won’t be unprepared. The church is a safe place for her; she might be less wary since it’s here.” Bai Liu continued, “But I think Liu Jiayi’s vigilance, even if she panics, might shift when it comes to the location.”

Liu Jiayi rushed through the orphanage in the dead of night, her expression grim.

Gone were the black witch’s robes—symbols of status and poison—and in their place were the hand-me-down clothes of the orphanage children.

Liu Jiayi tapped her system panel, which was projected directly into her consciousness, easily visible to her. After clearing one section of her system storage and personal panel, her delicate eyebrows furrowed tighter and tighter.

[System Warehouse: Player Liu Jiayi, your visualization category props are about to be emptied. Your demand for this prop is high, and it belongs to the daily necessities category. Please replenish it in time.]

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi, because your personal skills are unique within “Love Welfare Home,” after entering the game, the following restrictions have been applied for game balance:]

[... The cooldown time for your personal skill, Antidote, has been extended from 1 hour to 6 hours ...]

[... You have the universal blood ...]

This long list of restrictions wasn’t new to Liu Jiayi. She had encountered these limits often in the game, given her unique personal skills. The system had a tendency to restrict her in various ways.

The system needed to manage mortality rates to adjust difficulty. If the game contained someone like Liu Jiayi, with healing skills, mortality rates became hard to manage. So, the system found ways to limit her as a witch.

The King’s Guild had put a great deal of effort into making the most of Liu Jiayi’s skills, pairing her with various control players to mitigate the limitations by sharing the mortality rate.

But it wasn’t always effective, as evidenced by Zhang Gui's death after just a few trials.

Normally, Liu Jiayi would swipe past these restrictions with a blank expression, used to being stuck in games this way.

But today, she couldn’t stay calm. Her gaze lingered on the first and third articles, and she couldn’t help but curse, “The system, fuck you!”

[System Alert: Underage players are prohibited from using profanity. The word “fuck” has been replaced with *System I Your Dad.]

Liu Jiayi took a deep breath, trying to stop herself from looking at the system panel that irritated her. She had used the antidote—her healing skill—on herself earlier at 5:30 pm, due to that poisonous mushroom buff. Normally, the skill's cooldown would be an hour.

But in this game, since life was a core stat, the system extended the cooldown for her antidote to six hours.

That meant her next use would be after 11:30 pm, dangerously close to the early hours of Thursday.

Distracted and worried, Liu Jiayi quickened her pace.

After nine o'clock, the orphanage's wandering deformed children—corpses and cold things—would be roaming. Liu Jiayi didn't have many visualization props left, so she decided to go without them for now. But even without being able to see, she had excellent hearing, and she knew the orphanage layout well.

The sounds of the deformed children moving around were unmistakable, and Liu Jiayi was able to position herself based on these sounds, dodging them calmly by turning her head sideways—unlike the time before when she had been swept away by them.

When she was just a hundred meters from the church, Liu Jiayi ducked into a corner to avoid a deformed child behind her.

Gasping, she leaned against the wall, closing her eyes to steady her breathing. Her mind raced, thinking again about the information she'd received from Liu Huai during this brief rest before she reached her destination.

— Was Liu Huai really down to one life? How had he found this tunnel in the orphanage that even she hadn't known about?

Liu Jiayi's sharp instincts told her she was being lured into a trap, the same way Hearts had lured her into using props to enter the guild.

She knew something wasn't right, but it was her brother she was putting in danger.

The architect of this trap knew her well enough to realize that even if it was a trap, she would fall for it.

But what Liu Jiayi feared the most was that Liu Huai wasn't just the bait in this trap—he might also be a participant, even a leader in it, not just a victim.

She didn't want to doubt Liu Huai, but she couldn't help it. This suspicion, deeply ingrained from a harsh upbringing, had saved Liu Jiayi's life countless times in critical situations. She was naturally suited to this game of mistrust, where nobody could be relied upon fully.

Liu Jiayi was undoubtedly the person who wanted Liu Huai to live the most. For his sake, she would risk her life, even trade her own death for his survival. But Liu Huai could never come forward to hurt her.

In the cold night air, Liu Jiayi took two deep breaths, her brow furrowing, her serious expression a stark contrast to her youthful face. She hesitated for a long time before finally digging her slender fingers deep into her dress pocket and pulling out a teardrop-shaped glass bottle containing a clear, flowing liquid. The label read [Psyche].

[System prompt: Does player Liu Jiayi wish to use the prop "Tears of Psyche"? Using it will guide your indecisive choices and lead you to the ending that God Xiang Ming has prepared for you.]

[Prop Rating: Transcendental Prop, possessing the power of fate comparable to that of the gods.]

[The system has detected that player Liu Jiayi has already used this item. Further use will enhance its effect. Do you wish to continue?]

Liu Jiayi's grip tightened around the bottle. She looked down at the tear-like liquid spilling from it, her breath heavy. Her mind replayed the tear-streaked face of Mu Sicheng, wounded by Liu Huai after being controlled by Zhang Gui. She recalled what Hearts, the woman who had given her the prop, had said:

Hearts had leaned back on the couch, her limbs stretched lazily as she looked at Liu Jiayi: "Ah, you said this prop guided you to do something that hurt Liu Huai. Do you doubt that it can achieve your goal? Little witch, this is an extraordinary item given by the system. The effect can't be wrong. Have you ever heard the story of Psyche?"

Hearts smiled, wiping her cheeks. "Psyche, a woman full of doubts, was so beautiful that she made Venus, the goddess of beauty and love, jealous. To torment Psyche, Venus sent her son, Cupid, to make Psyche fall in love with the ugliest beast in the world. Terrible parents, right? To make their own child do such a thing."

With a playful smirk, Hearts continued, "With parents like that, one has to wonder if Cupid was a bad guy too. Seems like he often turns a blind eye to Venus's evil deeds and even helps her out."

"But then Cupid changed. He no longer wanted to hurt Psyche. He saved her, hid her, and treated her very well, but he made her blindfold herself, never seeing his true form."

Hearts leaned in closer, her voice softening. "Psyche wondered: was the man who loved her a god come to save her, or was he the ugly beast? She was tormented by this doubt, not wanting to remove the cloth and risk hurting the one who saved her, yet always questioning: what if he was just pretending to be human to trick me?"

Hearts stepped down from her seat, a light, elegant smile on her face. She reached out and touched Liu Jiayi's cloudy eyes. "Eventually, doubt won, and Psyche removed the cloth. She saw Cupid for who he truly was. But it was too late. Cupid, hurt by her doubts, flew back to heaven. Psyche was tormented by guilt, weeping for days."

"But do you know how it ends?" Hearts whispered, her voice full of a strange, compelled laughter. She placed the glass bottle of teardrops in Liu Jiayi's hands. "Psyche brought Cupid back from heaven through her trials, and they lived happily ever after."

Hearts lowered her gaze, wrapped her white arms around Liu Jiayi's neck, and whispered in her ear, "Sweetheart, doubt isn't a great sin. Psyche and Cupid lived together because of it. Doubt reveals the true nature of each person, making it possible for you to live without fear. Don't worry—when your doubts falter, just drink your tears. Psyche, who achieved happiness through doubt, will guide you."

Liu Jiayi had accepted the "Tears of Psyche" with caution, as it had hurt Liu Huai in the past. Every time this hurt seemed to bring her and Liu Huai closer together, much like Hearts had said.

But Liu Jiayi didn't want to see Liu Huai in pain. She had seen his heart shattered once before, when he was forced to strike Mu Sicheng.

The emptiness in his eyes, when he logged out of the game that nearly killed Mu Sicheng, had shaken Liu Jiayi to her core. It was as though something crucial had been stripped away from him—something that could never be restored.

Since then, she had been careful with her suspicions and the use of the prop. She hoped one day she'd never need it again.

But tonight, her lips pressed into a tight line, her face a mask of struggle. She was torn by doubt and fear, like Psyche with her blindfold, unsure whether Liu Huai, waiting for her in the church, was the god who had saved her or a beast in human skin bent on destroying her.

Hearts' laughter echoed in her ears: "Doubt is your antidote, Jiayi.

Drink it."

Her hands trembled as she gripped the glass bottle, the tears chilling against her palm, sending a shiver down her spine.

Liu Jiayi didn't have much time to hesitate. She took a deep breath, wrapped her hands tightly around the teardrop-shaped bottle, and lowered her head, whispering, "I'm going to use the prop."

Her thin back arched as she placed her lips to her thumbs, her posture reverent like a girl praying for divine favor.

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi confirms use of prop (Psyche's Tears). Prop is loading…]

The liquid in the bottle began to disappear, and Liu Jiayi involuntarily closed her eyes as a tear slipped from the corner of her eye—the Tear of Psyche.

When she opened her eyes again, a strange sense of foreboding washed over her. She quickly accessed her system repository and used a visualization prop she had been saving for her final escape: [Swimming Snake Night Vision Pupil], driven by a powerful instinct.

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi uses prop (Night Vision Pupil), which grants the ability to see creatures around her through thermal imaging. Duration: 12 hours, single-use.]

Liu Jiayi's eyes were covered by a special contact lens, the kind used by snakes when they peer through the darkness.

With this prop activated, she turned toward the church looming ahead in the night. As she moved closer, her eyes shot upward, as though a needle had pricked them.

Psyche removed the blindfold to see the handsome Cupid.

Liu Jiayi put on her glasses and saw Liu Huai—the one who had deceived her.

She could clearly see the thermal images of four people inside the church, a few dozen meters away. This meant that Liu Huai wasn't alone—there were at least three others with him. However, their actions showed no signs of coercion; instead, they seemed to be working together in a cooperative manner.

Several players were guarding a spot, waiting for her, and her brother had not said anything about the situation.

The cold night breeze brushed against Liu Jiayi's face, numbing both her breath and her expression. The feverish state of her mind was cooled by the breeze, and she noticed many discrepancies she hadn't before.

Liu Jiayi slowly took out her phone, blinking her hollow, dark gray eyes as she held back the tears threatening to spill. With no emotion on her face, she dialed Liu Huai's number. Her tone was calm, completely different from the fearful, trembling expression she had earlier. "Hello, brother, I'm about to approach the church, but it's too dark for me to see. Can you come out and pick me up alone?"

There was a long pause, and Liu Jiayi saw a man stand up crookedly—someone without arms, supported by another person. Her nails dug into her hands.

Liu Huai... had no more hands.

Liu Jiayi's gaze locked on the figure holding Liu Huai. It was Bai Liu, without a doubt.

"Brother, can you come out?" Liu Jiayi's mind spun as she stood still in front of the church, her voice barely above a whisper.

The breathing from the other side became a little faster, then slower. "I can, Jiayi. Where are you? I'm coming to meet you outside."

Liu Jiayi gave her location, adding that a child was crying and asking Liu Huai to hurry. Then she hung up. Bai Liu had been the one holding the phone for Liu Huai. After he placed it down, Liu Huai turned to Bai Liu, who gazed at him thoughtfully. "Liu Jiayi suspected something was wrong in the church. After calming down, she still has doubts about you, Liu Huai."

"I know," Liu Huai replied, lowering his head to look at the stumps of his arms, moving them slightly. He smiled bitterly. "I wonder if she'll trust me when she sees what I've become because of her."

Bai Liu didn't answer, as he found that unlikely.

"I'll go out alone," Liu Huai said, just as Bai Liu pulled him back.

"We'll follow you out," Bai Liu said, his tone nonchalant.

Liu Huai was startled and about to object when Bai Liu explained, "It's nine o'clock now. Soon, monsters resembling children playing flutes will emerge from the exit under the idol. These monsters won't harm children, but they will take them."

Bai Liu's gaze shifted to little Muke, who was peeking out from behind the seat. "The church is no longer safe for little Muke. Before, other investors would attract these children's attention, but now that our phones can be occupied, and there's no phone ringing to distract them, little Muke is at risk of becoming their target."

Little Muke bit his lower lip and protested, "But Bai Liu is just like those deformed children now, right? Kids crawl out of tunnels, which means Bai Liu will come out of them! I can stay with him!"

"But he's already a little monster." Bai Liu lowered his eyes and stared at little Muke, who stubbornly gazed up at him. "If you stay with him for too long, you'll risk being alienated as a human. I don't know how long Liu Huai's fourteen-year-old self will last before turning into a mindless monster, so it's safer for you to stay with us."

Reluctantly, little Muke was dragged out of the church by Big Muke, who wanted to stay but was forced to leave when Bai Liu wouldn't allow him to. Bai Liu didn't hesitate to use force when necessary.

Bai Liu and Muke slipped out through the back of the church, while Liu Huai exited through the front alone. Bai Liu and his group hid behind the side door, watching Liu Huai walk into the night.

The loss of his arms made Liu Huai's balance difficult to maintain. He staggered out slowly, the eerie sounds of children's laughter and shuffling footsteps closing in on him.

Muke covered little Muke's hand and whispered fearfully into Bai Liu's ear, "Bai Liu, I remember there were monsters like the wandering deformed children at the orphanage at night. Liu Huai... he won't be killed by them, will he, before he can reach Liu Jiayi?"

"No," Bai Liu replied softly but with certainty. "Liu Jiayi won't let Liu Huai die."

As Liu Huai walked in a trance, seemingly oblivious to the dangers around him, Muke was tempted to call out. But someone else beat him to it.

A faint, tearful voice called out, "Brother? Is that you?"

"Jiayi! It's me!" Even though he knew Liu Jiayi had lied, Liu Huai instinctively turned at the sound of her voice, calling out urgently, "I'm here, Jiayi! I'm here!"

Liu Jiayi, pressed against the wall, cautiously lifted her head to look at Liu Huai. As soon as Liu Huai turned his head to respond, a deformed child lunged toward him from behind!

Muke couldn't resist the urge to shout a warning, but Bai Liu calmly stopped him. "Watch."

As the deformed child pounced on Liu Huai, Liu Jiayi cried out and stumbled toward him. The moment she jumped onto his back, holding him tightly, her fragile, panicked expression vanished.

Her chin pressed against Liu Huai's shoulder, as if clinging to him. In a soft, obedient tone, she called to her brother, her face expressionless. At some point, a black conical potion bottle appeared in her hand.

Liu Jiayi tilted her wrist and poured the potion over the monstrous child that was about to attack Liu Huai.

The creature, its mouth wide open, melted into a puddle of black liquid, vanishing silently into the earth before it could even scream.

Muke, hiding in the back, was stunned. "This kid is an A-rank monster! Liu Jiayi killed it so easily! Is she an S-rank?"

"No," Bai Liu responded faintly, smiling. "I heard from Mu Sicheng that her attribute panel is only A, not even A+. She's a rising star, with huge potential. No wonder the major guilds were after her."

Liu Jiayi's eyes twitched after killing the child, and Bai Liu noticed her gaze shift toward him.

She tilted her head and wrapped her arms around Liu Huai's neck, shaking the bottle of poison in her hand as she stared at Bai Liu without emotion.

It was a threatening gaze—clear in its message: This is what will happen to you.

"Can she see us?!" Muke was amazed. "Didn't Liu Huai say Liu Jiayi was blind? That's usually a problem when moving around."

"It's probably a visualization prop," Bai Liu explained calmly. "But to see us hiding so clearly in the dark, it shouldn't be a regular sight-restoring prop." He paused, then added, "Now it's clear why she called Liu Huai out. She must have seen more than one person in the church."

Muke quickly caught on, looking at Bai Liu with anxiety. "What now? She knows Liu Huai is lying to her. How do we get her to come and help you?"

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed. "I'm afraid that's difficult."

He smirked faintly. "This little witch would probably prefer to kill me with poison than save me with an antidote."

Liu Jiayi held Liu Huai close, her grip possessive and controlling, as if he were a doll. Her gaze swept over the red patch in the distance, marking the living, before finally landing on Liu Huai's empty shoulders. Her hands brushed against his severed arms, and Liu Huai hissed in pain at the touch.

The sound of his pain caused Liu Jiayi's expression to twist slightly, a flicker of emotion passing through her.

She buried her head in Liu Huai's shoulder, taking a deep breath, doing her best to suppress the emotions threatening to spill out in her voice. "Brother… how did your arm become like this?"

"Brother is trying to save you," Liu Huai whispered, his voice as warm as ever, trying to comfort her.

Neither could see the other's face—the vacant expression on Liu Huai's face, nor the struggling one on Liu Jiayi's. They were so close, their heartbeats quickening in the proximity, but then, they turned away at the same time, speaking words that pierced through the veil of pretense.

"Brother, you tried to ambush me in the church, didn't you? Did you want to draw my blood?" Liu Jiayi asked, her voice shaky.

"Jiayi, are you a little witch?" Liu Huai asked, his tone cold and accusing.

Liu Jiayi's pupils tightened. For a moment, Liu Huai fell into an eerie silence, and Liu Jiayi's breath caught, her chest tightening as if she couldn't breathe. She backed away, her steps frantic, her eyes filled with disbelief as she looked at Liu Huai.

Liu Huai, half-kneeling, gazed at her with a silent, sad look, as if he had accepted everything.

"Jiayi," he whispered, his voice low, "since when did you stop being my sister and become a witch?"

"I underestimated you, Jiayi," he added, his words like a knife to her heart.

Liu Jiayi shook her head frantically, tears slipping from her eyes as she staggered backward, panic consuming her. Liu Huai's disappointed, disheveled tone made her feel like she might lose her mind.

At that moment, Liu Huai seemed like a beast—despite her having just nestled in his arms for warmth.

"I'm not, brother," Liu Jiayi retorted, her voice trembling. "I don't know anything about witches! Who told you that?"

"Don’t call me brother anymore, Jiayi. I don’t deserve to be your brother," Liu Huai said, rising unsteadily to his feet. He shook his head lightly, a smile on his lips that seemed almost detached. "You've been smarter than me since we were kids. Everyone said you were born to be a student, you'd have been great if you weren't blind. I've always thought that."

"You’re brilliant, Jiayi," he continued, his voice bitter. "You played me like a fool, and I didn’t even notice." He looked at her, his gaze distant, almost as if looking through her. "If only you weren't my sister."

"If only you were someone else's sister."

Liu Jiayi froze, the words echoing in her mind. Her ears rang, and the pain in her chest almost knocked her off balance.

The cold night wind brushed against Liu Huai's face, his expression growing colder, his eyes and posture sinking into despair. But in Liu Jiayi's dazed state, his image began to glow red.

The red hue soon faded to blue in her vision as Liu Huai’s body temperature dropped, a sign that he was dying.

Liu Jiayi forced a smile as she reached out for Liu Huai’s coat, but halfway there, she turned sharply and called out, "Who's there? Come out!"

Two looming red shadows walked toward them, dragging the red shadow of a child. One of the figures seemed to be dragging something, a sound of metal scraping against concrete.

Bai Liu's eyes followed the direction Liu Jiayi was looking, his gaze sharpening. "It's Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang."

"How did they get here?" Muke asked, his voice tinged with panic. "We haven't tricked Liu Jiayi into joining us! We can't defend ourselves against them—our lives are down to single digits!"

"I figured that with Bai Liu's deterrent, they wouldn't dare come near the church," Bai Liu said, watching Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang approach. "They avoided this place during the day because of it, but I don't know why they've changed their minds."

Bai Liu's eyes narrowed as he observed Miao Gaojiang's approaching form. Something was wrong. "Miao Gaojiang isn't in the right state. He's too far from Miao Feichi."

As they got closer, it became more apparent that Miao Gaojiang was in distress. It had been past nine o'clock yesterday, and his stamina had restored, but now, he walked with his highest level of defense activated, eyes glazed over. He trembled slightly, as if still afraid of Miao Feichi, his son, with whom he had been working as a team.

Bai Liu recognized the signs. He had seen this before when Liu Huai had gone through a similar breakdown.

"The aftermath of a mental collapse can leave a person trapped in subconscious fear," Bai Liu said flatly. "Liu Huai was controlled by that fear, and when it happens, the person either kills themselves or others."

Liu Huai was clearly the first. But Miao Gaojiang... Bai Liu's eyes flicked to the man's clenched fist. It seemed Miao Gaojiang was on the verge of the second outcome.

Bai Liu remembered something Zhang Gui had told him before his death: Players who hurt others due to abnormal mental values are known as Junction Monsters, far more dangerous and powerful than typical monsters due to their emotional instability.

Miao Gaojiang's eyes were vacant, tinged with red, his focus unsteady.

Miao Feichi had noticed that something was off with his father, but Miao Gaojiang didn't share what was wrong. Miao Feichi had been knocked unconscious in the explosion of Miao Gaojiang's mental collapse the previous night and hadn't known that his father had become a Junction Monster.

Miao Feichi clenched his teeth, trying to reason with his father. "Father, didn't you say we should wait until after midnight to deal with Bai Liu and then come back here?"

"Why are we at the church now? What if Bai Liu's still here?"

Miao Gaojiang glared at Miao Feichi, his eyes burning with desperation. "We'll fight him if we have to! Feichi, I can't wait any longer!"

He couldn't hold back anymore. The aftermath of his mental collapse was getting worse. His mind was slipping, and his mental values were teetering dangerously.

They had searched everywhere else in the orphanage but couldn't find Liu Jiayi. She was likely in the church, the children's safe zone. Miao Gaojiang needed to find the blood Liu Jiayi was carrying and escape with Miao Feichi, then head to the Guild's warehouse for supplies.

Miao Feichi hesitated, but Miao Gaojiang's terrifying gaze left him no choice.

Miao Feichi fell silent, a sharp, tingling sensation coursing through his head.

Miao Gaojiang was usually very submissive, but when it came to doing something, even if Miao Feichi thought it unreasonable, he had no choice but to obey.

Watching Miao Gaojiang move mechanically closer, increasing his pace with every step, Bai Liu quickly gave an order to Muke: "Take little Muke back to the church and look for little Bai Six in the tunnel. If he's still in good condition, bring him out. If he's not, head straight back to the church and hide."

But Bai Liu had yet to hear from little Bai Six. The boy was usually punctual, yet it was already past nine, and the channel had been open for quite a while. Little Bai Six hadn't called him, which could only mean something was wrong with the boy...

Bai Liu's eyes darkened, but there was little he could do at the moment.

He needed a core team to break through a fully-defended Miao Gaojiang—someone they could hardly handle, not even with Liu Jiayi. With Miao Feichi's top-tier attacking power, they would have been wiped out entirely.

Grimly, Muke took little Muke's hand and started toward the church, leaning in to whisper near Bai Liu's shoulder, "Don't go up there rashly. Wait until we find little Bai Six before you try to convince Liu Jiayi to help you."

Bai Liu nodded, noncommittally.

Muke had just rounded the side door and was heading toward the main entrance when Miao Gaojiang, who had been following Miao Feichi, suddenly panicked. Breaking free from Miao Feichi's grip, he ran toward the church in a frantic sprint.

Miao Gaojiang's burst of speed left no time for anyone to react. He slammed the door shut behind him, locking it from the inside, just as Muke was about to peek in.

His hands trembled as he fell to his knees after securing the lock. The situation had become nightmarish.

When Miao Gaojiang saw the safety of the church just within reach, he couldn't help but run inside, driven by an instinct to survive. He locked the door behind him, unsure how long he would last.

Muke stared at the locked church door, his eyes wide with disbelief. The passage was locked in the church by Miao Gaojiang!

Miao Feichi, chasing after the panicked Miao Gaojiang, cursed when he saw the door slam shut. He pulled out his twin knives, ready to break it down, but found Liu Huai, Muke, and Liu Jiayi standing in front of the church door.

Warily, Miao Feichi raised his swords, scanning the area. He furrowed his brows, then whispered incredulously to Miao Gaojiang, "Father, that little monster isn't there!"

Muke, standing protectively in front of little Muke, kept his eyes on Miao Feichi and the others. His heart raced, his breath shallow. He couldn't afford to let his attention stray to where Bai Liu was hiding.

Bai Liu should never come out without a core team for support! A single mistake could cost him everything.

Miao Gaojiang's eyes narrowed as he took in the sight of the group before him. He looked at the shuttered church with a twisted expression and muttered, "We've been deceived. That little monster may not have made it out of the church at all. But it looks like we came at just the right time. Everyone's here—just in time for us to take it all."

Miao Gaojiang's gaze swept aggressively over little Muke, who was hiding behind him, and Liu Jiayi, who stood in front of Liu Huai, her expression stone-cold. He smiled, his face a chilling mask of normalcy, like a friendly middle-aged man—only it was a smile that made one's skin crawl.

"Everyone's here," he said, his voice smooth.

"Feichi, open the S-Grade." Miao Gaojiang ordered flatly. "Make it quick. Catch the kid."

The Loving Welfare Home

Liu Jiayi heard the voices of Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi. She wasn't a main attacker and was stuck with a healing skill. Against league players like Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, who had activated the S-grade, she was at a severe disadvantage.

Normally, Liu Jiayi would have already fled with her items by now.

But now... she glanced behind her at Liu Huai, who had lost both arms.

It was too much. She didn't know who had told Liu Huai that she was a little witch, but the look he gave her made it impossible to leave. She had no choice but to stand her ground.

Cursing her father under her breath, Liu Jiayi took a deep breath and stepped in front of Liu Huai.

"Stay behind me and don't move!" Liu Jiayi ordered, her voice firm as she raised her arm in front of Liu Huai.

With a quick shake of her hand, a black potion appeared, releasing a pungent mist. A pure black gauze robe wrapped around her slender, snow-white ankles, transforming her from the soft, gentle Liu Jiayi into the little witch who had once been the subject of a 370,000-point bid for a small TV charge, highly sought after by all the major guilds.

Upon seeing Liu Jiayi's new appearance, Miao Feichi was taken aback for a moment. She hesitated in her attack, her twin swords slashing down slightly sluggishly. "A little witch?"

Miao Gaojiang narrowed his eyes as well. He remembered the Scavenging Guild's brief involvement in a small TV bid for this number one Nova player. The bid had been swiftly outbid by other guilds who were willing to go to extreme lengths.

As Miao Gaojiang recalled the familiarity of the ragdoll hanging from Liu Jiayi's black veil, he realized what was happening. It was an item the little witch always carried into any game.

Liu Huai stood there quietly, taking it all in.

Realizing she had no way out, Liu Jiayi's back stiffened, but she quickly regained her composure and turned to Liu Huai.

"When the fight starts, find a chance to run," she instructed. She was about to add, "Brother, you run, don't worry about me," but the words caught in her throat. Instead, she turned and attacked Miao Feichi without hesitation.

Her face was calm beneath the veil. Her fingers gripped the poison bottle so tightly that they turned white, and as the mist from the potion began to rise, it twisted like a boa constrictor, swallowing Liu Jiayi from top to bottom. It spread into a sticky black cloud on the ground, effectively hiding her from sight.

[OK]

Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang both instinctively covered their mouths and noses as the poisonous fumes began to spread, sending chills down their spines and forcing them to retreat.

“Little witch, we’re giving you face and not touching you,” Miao Feichi growled through clenched teeth. “But Liu Huai’s actions are unforgivable, and we can't let his side go unpunished. So be considerate.”

“To move him is to move me,” Liu Jiayi's voice came coldly, her words encircling them from all directions. “Child-eating bastard, stop pushing and take your father on if you can.”

“I hate it when people bring their fathers into a fight. Let’s see if your father dies first or if you touch a hair on my brother’s head,” Liu Jiayi sneered.

Liu Huai, standing outside the smoke, stared in awe at the boiling, choking mass of mist. He heard a soft voice from Liu Jiayi, who, with no emotion, pushed something into his arms.

“Take the props and blood I gave you and head for the hospital! Don’t look back!”

Inside Liu Huai’s heart were two warm blood bags and a spinning magic cube labeled [Transcendental Class Prop: Magic Space]. To ensure Liu Huai understood, Liu Jiayi had written her name on the blood bags, one marked for Miao Feichi and the other for herself.

Inside the black fog, Liu Jiayi's right arm, covered in needle marks and wounds, trembled as she looked around, pale and weak but coldly determined.

Earlier that afternoon, Liu Jiayi had been poisoned by mushrooms and had forcibly drawn blood to save Liu Huai after hearing he only had one life left. Though she had used a healing skill to stabilize herself, the combination of the poison and her exertion had left her on the brink of collapse. Despite this, she had no choice but to face off against Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang.

Liu Jiayi had long been accustomed to Liu Huai's cowardice, his betrayal, and his stupidity. Yet, in the face of danger, her instinct had always been to protect him, even when it seemed like she was the one who needed protection.

She had grown up protecting him, forced to mature prematurely, and now, in her weakness, she stood between him and danger once more.

Liu Jiayi's chest heaved as she took a step toward the center of the black mist, pushing it further inwards with each step.

Miao Gaojiang, standing in the middle of the fog, was visibly affected by the fumes, his face flushed from the poisoning. He clenched his fist and shouted, "Little witch, I didn't expect you to come to your death so recklessly. Feichi, go!"

Miao Feichi made a sweeping circle around the mist, his twin swords searching for Liu Jiayi's figure. As he found her, he smiled and raised his blades high. "I found you, little witch."

Liu Jiayi's face was pale as she lifted the glass bottle of poison to defend against Miao Feichi's strike. She gritted her teeth and splashed poison in his direction, sensing Miao Gaojiang preparing to break through the mist. She aimed to stop him with the poison.

"Stay here, all of you!" Liu Jiayi shouted, her voice harsh. "Don't step foot outside this place to go after him!"

The poison seeped out of the bottle, forming a hideous black snake on the ground. Liu Jiayi's chest heaved with each breath, blood faintly trickling from the corners of her mouth, soaking into her veil.

Muke rushed to Liu Huai, who seemed dazed, and shouted, "What are you waiting for? Liu Jiayi is holding them off! Open the church door and get to the tunnel!"

Bai Liu joined him to help, but the little Miao Gaojiang inside had locked the door and barricaded it with furniture. The church was completely blocked.

"I can't move it!" Muke exclaimed in despair. "The side door's blocked too."

Several times, Miao Feichi or Miao Gaojiang had stepped out of the fog, only to be forced back by Liu Jiayi's poison.

But it was clear that Liu Jiayi was struggling, and she wouldn't last much longer. The door needed to be opened quickly.

"What about Bai Liu?" Muke's voice tightened.

"Liu Jiayi gave you this, didn't she?" Bai Liu said, his gaze on the spinning Rubik's Cube on Liu Huai's chest and the blood bags. "With her protective nature toward you, she must have arranged an escape route. Try this and see if it opens the door."

Liu Huai nodded silently, his gaze vacant.

Bai Liu took the Rubik's Cube and approached the door, just as a swinging machete flew out of the mist, aiming for his neck.

The black mist cleared, revealing Liu Jiayi, covered in blood, with Miao Feichi's foot on her head. The empty poison bottle slipped from her grasp as her breathing became shallow.

Miao Feichi's grin twisted in triumph as he raised his blade. "I haven't killed anyone yet in this copy. Let's see if any of you get away with it!"

Without hesitation, Bai Liu used the Rubik's Cube to open the door. The church door creaked open slowly.

The two men took a step forward, ready to pursue Bai Liu, but as they did, Liu Jiayi, her lifeless eyes dull and grey, bit down on Miao Feichi's trouser leg with all her remaining strength. Her hand reached out for the poison bottle, and once more, the black mist poured into the bottle, enveloping Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi.

“Damn!” Miao Feichi shouted in anger, swinging his blade down viciously as Liu Jiayi’s grip on his pants leg faltered.

“I’ll kill you now, you little bitch!” Miao Feichi roared.

Liu Jiayi blinked slowly, a bead of blood dripping from her lashes onto her dirty face. She had always been the one left behind in the mud, from birth to now, facing death in the same undignified way.

But as she watched Liu Huai, who had run into the church—her brother, gone once again—she felt an unexpected sense of stability.

He had escaped, leaving her once more, but this time, she felt no sadness. She had already accepted him for who he was. All she feared was that she had lost him too soon, that she had done too many things wrong.

A tear slipped down Liu Jiayi’s cheek.

I want so much to continue to be your sister, brother.

The Loving Welfare Home

The moment Liu Huai walked into the church, he suddenly stopped.

Muke pushed him urgently. "Get into the tunnel!"

Liu Huai turned to look at Liu Jiayi, who was pinned to the ground. He took a deep breath, turned sideways, and discarded the dagger strapped to his waist. In an instant, he lowered his body to bite down on a dagger that had fallen in the air, while letting the other one sink into his body.

Muke was shocked. "What are you doing, Liu Huai?"

[System Alert: Player Liu Huai was attacked by the Shadow Dagger. Mental Value drop in progress... Due to violent shock to Player Liu Huai's Mental Value, the calculation is in progress... Mental Value dropped to 9, Berserk Mode activated, stamina depleting violently...]

Like a swallow skimming the ground, Liu Huai moved so quickly that only streaks of movement could be seen as he darted past Miao Feichi.

Just as Miao Feichi’s knives were about to strike, Liu Huai, like an assassin emerging from the shadows, spun around with his foot planted on the ground. Using the daggers in his mouth, he faced Miao Feichi's blades coming down on Liu Jiayi.

Miao Feichi stared in amazement at Liu Huai, who was holding the daggers in his mouth, resisting his twin blades. This was the first time he had seen an assassin who could withstand such an attack even after being disarmed and having his hands cut off.

Liu Huai's eyes held a desperate intensity. One eye was half-closed in pain, the corner of his mouth cracked from the force of Miao Feichi’s double slashes. Blood dripped from the wounds, his face as pale as a ghost, drool dripping from the corners of his mouth.

Liu Huai stood before Liu Jiayi, not stepping back, his chest heaving violently.

"Fuck," Miao Feichi muttered in disbelief. He could feel Liu Huai's determination—a madman desperate to resist. But Miao Feichi gritted his teeth, drawing his knife again, slashing viciously. "Bai Liu’s men are all fucking insane! Father! Liu Jiayi’s all yours!"

[System Warning: Player Liu Huai's life expectancy has dropped to 1! Please flee to safety!]

Liu Huai dropped to his knees but staggered back to his feet, still biting his dagger and glaring at Miao Feichi—his eyes clearly saying, I will fight you again, and I won't go down easily.

Sweat dripped down Miao Feichi's jaw as he wiped it off and snarled through clenched teeth, "What the hell did Bai Liu put in your head? Is it really worth it to give him this?!"

Liu Huai glanced in disbelief at Liu Jiayi, wrapped in black mist and thrown by Miao Feichi into a fight with Miao Gaojiang.

If Liu Huai hadn't had the dagger in his mouth, he might have told Miao Feichi that Bai Liu hadn't given him anything. They had simply made a deal.

[Bai Liu, are you really sure Liu Jiayi can leave this game safely? I don't mean just this game—can you really take her out of it?]

[I'm not sure, but I promise I'll do my best to take Liu Jiayi, as long as I live.]

[...I believe in your word of trade. Sometimes I think it would have been better if Jiayi weren't my sister. She's too smart, I... I've never been able to keep up with her. I'm not worthy of someone so smart. Bai Liu, if only you were her brother, she wouldn't have to work so hard to protect me.]

[If only Jiayi wasn't my sister. She's good, she's smart, she knows what she's doing. She deserves a better birth, a better brother.]

Miao Feichi's twin swords came down once more without mercy. Muke ran frantically, his heart racing, while Liu Jiayi, holding a magic potion bottle, ran toward him. The black mist around her began to fade little by little, but Miao Gaojiang knocked her down, and she looked at Liu Huai with hysterical eyes, screaming in a broken voice, "Brother! No!!"

Liu Huai took a deep breath, closed his eyes, and clenched the dagger in his mouth. He whispered Bai Liu's name as if praying to an unknown god.

Bai Liu, please.

I'm using my last life to pave the way for you. Please, do what you promised.

[Bai Liu, there's one more thing I regret. Can you help me... apologize to the Fourth Brother?]

[You can speak to him yourself.]

[How can I tell him if I die?]

[Wait for Mu Sicheng to die, and you can talk to him face-to-face.]

[...Does Fourth Brother know you curse him like that behind his back?]

[I've said it to his face too.]

Liu Huai finally smiled with relief, tears slipping from his eyes.

Living had been hard for him, but he had now found a strange peace for his soul.

Though there was a cost, it was a reassuring place to return to.

Before Miao Feichi could strike again, Bai Liu leapt out from the side and calmly swung his whip to intercept Miao Feichi's twin blades. He placed himself in front of Liu Huai, facing the successive slashes of an enraged Miao Feichi.

Bai Liu blocked the strikes with his whip and turned back to Liu Huai. "Liu Huai, watch out for Miao Gaojiang. He's about to turn into a junction monster and could kill Liu Jiayi."

At these words, both Miao Feichi and Liu Huai turned to look at Miao Gaojiang, who was controlling Liu Jiayi.

Miao Gaojiang had become a grotesque zombie, his skin a greenish-black, with bulging eyes covered in black blood. His fangs nearly touched his chin, and his skin looked like crumpled, moldy leather. He held Liu Jiayi by the neck, tightening his grip.

Liu Jiayi's magic potion bottle fell to the ground, empty. The poison she had poured on Miao Gaojiang had no effect at all.

Miao Feichi stared in stunned silence as he lowered his swords, looking at the zombie, his mouth agape. "Dad...?"

The zombie, its fanged mouth exhaling the stench of rotting flesh, stared fiercely at Miao Feichi.

Miao Feichi took two stumbling steps back, his heart pounding. This monster was a creation of his own father, and its defenses were beyond anything they could handle. Even at full strength, Miao Feichi's twin swords had barely left a mark on Miao Gaojiang's arm.

There was no way they could beat this thing.

Liu Jiayi and Liu Huai exchanged teary glances.

Liu Jiayi seemed to realize what Liu Huai was about to do. Her fingers dug into the sand, trying desperately to stop him. Her voice, strained and hoarse, came out as she struggled to speak through Miao Gaojiang's suppression.

"Brother... don't come any closer!"

The fading image of Liu Huai leaped in Liu Jiayi's tear-filled eyes, like a flame about to extinguish.

The fire she had once doubted, the one that had carried her and warmed her, now burned brightly in her eyes—a flashback in the darkness, nearly blinding her with its warmth.

The fire descended on the witch held down in the dirt, weeping and cold.

Liu Huai.

Liu Huai didn't dodge. He wrapped his legs around Miao Gaojiang's neck, throwing his body around with all his strength. With a fierce face, he bit down on the dagger, roaring like a wounded beast protecting its young. He sank the blade into Miao Gaojiang's neck.

"Fuck your father! Fuck your grandfather, Quan family's father!" Liu Jiayi blurted out, her face flushing with blood, the calmness she had been holding back shattered by Liu Huai's weakening breaths.

Liu Jiayi shook her hand and touched Liu Huai's mouth and nose, gasping for breath, trying to calm her emotions. Her mouth trembled as she held back her sobs and said softly, "Brother, just hold on a little longer. My healing skill is almost ready! I'll be able to save you!"

"… Jiayi, I can't hold on any longer." Liu Huai choked, coughing up a large mouthful of blood. He managed a weak smile, his eyebrows arched. "Why are you still cursing…"

"I won't curse anymore, I'll listen to you, I won't curse anymore." The warmth that once radiated from Liu Huai's body began to fade as Liu Jiayi held him. His warmth turned cold, and she could feel him slipping away. She finally couldn't hold back, hugging his head like a little girl would, sobbing uncontrollably. Tears poured out in torrents. "Brother, I beg you! It's all my fault! It's my fault! Please hold on! Don't leave me alone!"

"Don't... don't want me!" Liu Huai's voice was weak, barely audible.

"… Jiayi, it's not your fault." Liu Huai's eyes grew dull, matching the sadness in Liu Jiayi's. "It's brother's fault…"

He spoke slowly, with great effort, each word coming out with difficulty. "I don't deserve a sister as good as you, Jiayi…"

Liu Jiayi was crying so hard that she couldn't breathe. She shook her head desperately, not knowing what to say, just bowing her head and crying, tears streaming down her face.

"You know, Jiayi, before you were born, I thought I would be stuck like this for the rest of my life—living in this mud pit, forever." Liu Huai's voice weakened, but he smiled faintly. "But after you were born, when I looked into your unseeing eyes, and you reached out to me for a hug, I knew I couldn't go on like this. I was determined to take you out of this."

"Because I'm a brother now."

Liu Jiayi tried to cover Liu Huai's bleeding mouth, her voice choking. "Please, don't say anything, don't say anything!"

"You're the one who gave me a future." Liu Huai managed a hazy, heartfelt smile. "You're the best sister in the world, Jiayi."

His eyelids fluttered as exhaustion overtook him. "But... I'm not the best brother in the world. It's because I'm too stupid... I've entrusted you to Bai Liu. He's smart, too, he'll understand you. You won't have to... You won't have to protect anyone anymore..."

"It's been hard for you to protect me, Jiayi."

You will be so painfully happy that you will cherish happiness.]

A soft, compelling voice suddenly rang in Liu Jiayi's ears, shaking her from her trance: "Cupid has flown away, back to heaven only."

Liu Jiayi clutched Liu Huai's head tightly, lowering her head completely against his cold chest. Then, she cried out, heartbroken and in pain. Big tears slipped from Liu Jiayi's exhausted eyes and onto Liu Huai's lifeless face.

She couldn't speak, only crying hoarsely with her mouth wide open. "Ah-!!!"

[Psyche finally tasted the bitter fruit of doubt. She wept night and day but could never get back Cupid who had flown away.]

[System Warning: Player Liu Jiayi's Spirituality is in shock and dropping dramatically...]

The Loving Welfare Home

Liu Huai is dead, but he managed to hold Miao Gaojiang, the rampaging monster, in check—if only for a minute.

Bai Liu glanced at Liu Huai's body, briefly dazed, but quickly composed himself. He moved to grab the motionless Liu Jiayi and dragged her into the church.

Miao Feichi wanted to flee as well, but to add insult to injury, his child's blood was still on Liu Jiayi's body. Liu Jiayi lay next to the zombie monster that Miao Gaojiang had become. He moved toward the child, Miao Gaojiang, who was still alive.

That child was his, too. The blood would work. But he was one child short of blood. Miao Feichi glanced behind the baptismal font at the size of Muke and his murderous, scarlet eyes shifted slightly.

Bai Liu dragged Liu Jiayi without any resistance. The little girl just clutched Liu Huai's lifeless body in her arms and knelt, unmoving. The zombie next to her stared at Liu Jiayi with bulging eyes, its movements starting to shift. Liu Jiayi, lost in her trance, held Liu Huai's head, muttering to herself, "Yes, I can resurrect my brother. I can... with enough points, I can..."

"You can't resurrect Liu Huai," Bai Liu interrupted softly, "His soul is with me."

Liu Jiayi paused, then sprang to her feet, snapping Bai Liu's neck with a speed almost too fast to see. She wrapped her arms and legs around his neck, flipping him to the ground with raw strength.

The number one Nova player revealed her true danger. Tear-streaked and wild-eyed, Liu Jiayi wrapped her thin limbs tightly around Bai Liu's neck and screamed at him, "Give me Liu Huai's soul! Or I will kill you!!!"

Bai Liu coughed as he was strangled, yet remained calm. His voice was hoarse as he slowly rose to his feet, "Even if you resurrect him now, would he really want to live? He wanted to die for you. Keeping him alive was part of my plan."

Liu Jiayi's breath hitched as she remembered Liu Huai's exhausted words before he died. She reluctantly loosened her grip on Bai Liu, who seized the opportunity to take her wrist and drag her toward the church without looking back.

Liu Jiayi was stunned as Bai Liu pulled her along. She was completely drained from using her abilities and had no strength left to resist.

Bai Liu coughed as he continued running, casting a sideways glance at Liu Jiayi. She was slowly processing his words, and he said faintly, "Liu Huai asked me to save you from this game, no matter what."

"It's not just this orphanage. It's the whole game. So maybe when the time comes, he'll be willing to be resurrected by you."

Liu Jiayi's eyes burned with exhaustion, but she quickly refuted Bai Liu's words, "There's no way I can survive. Miao Gaojiang's mutated monster is a level 3 S-class with over 10,000 defenses. When I tried to handle it with healing support in the King's Guild, it took a dozen A+ players with high coordination to defeat it while I controlled the bloodline. How can I fight it?"

Bai Liu's tone remained calm. "I have a solution."

With Bai Liu's words, the zombie that had been frozen for a minute by Liu Huai's suicidal attack finally began to move again.

The zombie opened its black lips, revealing long fangs, and leaped toward Liu Jiayi.

It didn't move quickly, but its range was incredible. In just a few jumps, it reached the church door. Instead of attacking Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi, it jumped right over their heads and made for the side door.

Miao Feichi, who was at the side door preparing to sneak around and attack Muke and the others, swore loudly when he saw the zombie coming toward him. He swung his sword to avoid it.

The zombie, which had been Miao Gaojiang, seemed to know Miao Feichi's combat style and escape habits all too well. Miao Feichi failed to avoid it several times, and soon found himself trapped by the zombie at the front of the church.

Sweat beaded on Miao Feichi's forehead as he swung his twin swords frantically. Forced into using his [Double Slash of Discontent], a burst skill he could only maintain for a minute due to his stamina, the spirits of his swords filled the air.

Blood sprayed across the church as Miao Feichi's swords sliced through the space, their snowy-white light cutting through the night. Miao Feichi's face grew paler as Miao Gaojiang's zombie form managed to land some hits on him.

[System Alert: Carrion Zombie has bitten player Miao Feichi on the shoulder, player Miao Feichi -2 life.]

[System Alert: Player Miao Feichi uses his personal skill (Grudge Double Blade) to strike, dealing 3 life points of damage to the carrion zombie.]

[System Alert: ...]

Miao Feichi gritted his teeth and tried to break free. Soon, his burst skill was running out, but he managed one last attack. However, just as he raised his sword, a monstrous child suddenly jumped onto his back.

The little creature appeared from nowhere and clung to Miao Feichi's neck, babbling as it did.

He recognized the face—this was the child he had kidnapped before entering the game, the same child whose fingers he had cut off and eaten. If Muke had been there, he would have recognized this as the deformed child who had warned him at the elevator not to go up.

The little monster giggled and clapped its hands around Miao Feichi's neck. "Fingers! Fingers! Uncle likes to eat my fingers!"

It had no fingers on its hands.

The word "Fingers" caused Miao Gaojiang's zombie form to freeze for a moment. It was a codeword Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang had used in their game to identify each other, and the zombie's cloudy eyes focused on Miao Feichi. Its voice was hoarse as it rasped, "… Feichi loves to eat… fingers."

For a moment, Miao Feichi thought Miao Gaojiang had regained some semblance of sanity. Just as he sighed in relief, the zombie wrapped its hand around his neck, eyes locked on him as it hoarsely whispered, "… One day, you will eat my fingers too."

Miao Feichi was strangled, his body hanging in mid-air, his legs twitching like a toad. He desperately tried to slash at Miao Gaojiang with the twin swords in his hands, but Miao Gaojiang remained unphased. The pressure from his thumbs around Miao Feichi's throat increased. His eyes soon turned red as he gasped for breath. Miao Feichi looked at Miao Gaojiang and finally understood why Miao Gaojiang had been the first to attack him, and what his father's subconscious fear had been:

— Miao Gaojiang feared that he would consume him, rendering his skilled identity nothing more than the rotting flesh of a zombie.

Miao Gaojiang's grip tightened, and Miao Feichi's body jolted. His twin swords slowly fell to the ground, dissolving into specks of light. His pupils dilated as his mouth slackened, leaning into Miao Gaojiang's grip like a child clinging to a father.

[System Alert (for all players): Player Miao Feichi's life has reached zero. Confirmed dead. Exiting the game.]

"Shit!" Muke cursed as he watched Miao Feichi, who had been recklessly slashing in the dungeon, killed within moments by Miao Gaojiang. Sweating, Muke, who was still struggling with the tunnel entrance, couldn't contain his frustration. "Why won't the tunnel open?!"

Bai Liu glanced at the doorway. "It's being blocked from the inside."

Little Miao Gaojiang was sweating heavily, desperately pushing against the tunnels. He used wooden blocks from the church to barricade the tunnel's entrance, doing everything he could to prevent anyone from entering. His breath hitched as he realized—the investor had truly turned into a monster.

Previously, he had used the baptismal font and some chairs to block the exit of the passage beneath the idol, but Muke had just pushed the baptismal font aside. He hadn't expected another layer of resistance inside.

Having killed Miao Feichi, Miao Gaojiang turned his head and fixed his gaze on Muke and Bai Liu. Muke stepped in front of Bai Liu, a nervous Liu Jiayi and little Muke flanking them. Glancing at his system panel, Muke took a deep breath as he faced the S-rank monster —the Carrion Zombie.

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Muke for gaining the skill status (Brave Assassin of Light). You have acquired a skill-derived weapon (Dagger of Light and Darkness).]

[System Alert: Does player Muke wish to equip the skill-derived

Muke exhaled. [Yes.]

Liu Jiayi, tears streaking down her face, looked coldly at Bai Liu, still struggling: “Give up. There’s no way out. We’re all going to die…”

Before she could finish, Muke suddenly stepped forward, blocking her. He flung his hands down, revealing a pair of daggers.

The gesture was all too familiar to Liu Jiayi. Her breath caught, and her words died in her throat.

“Liu Huai didn’t give away his skills to protect you. He didn’t ask you to die, Liu Jiayi,” Bai Liu said, still struggling with the door, his voice out of breath. “Is this how you repay your brother’s feelings?”

[System Alert: Does Muke have the Blitz skill (Flash Attack) enabled? Note: Using this skill will severely drain your stamina, and you will be unable to escape after use.]

Muke glanced back at Bai Liu, at the bewildered Liu Jiayi and little Muke. Gripping the daggers tightly, an unfamiliar emotion surged in his chest, making his heart race and his eyes fill with tears. Clenching his teeth in fear, a stronger feeling pushed him forward.

[Use.]

Muke leaped forward with the speed of a lightning strike, the daggers in his hands glowing with blinding light. He knelt before Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu, his body covered in cuts from his own clumsy dagger attacks. His eyes, clouded by his first mental drop, remained determined.

He gripped the daggers tightly, using his body as a shield to block the zombie's claws.

He was like an immovable umbrella, shaking but unyielding. The young master who had once trembled at the thought of S-rank players now stood firm before an S-rank monster.

Muke’s heart pounded wildly, the pain in his chest almost unbearable, but he refused to collapse. His legs trembled, and his hands shook, but he held his ground, driven by an overwhelming urge to protect.

Glancing back at Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu, something unprecedented squeezed the tears from his eyes. His knees nearly gave out from the strain, but he refused to fall.

The young master, once golden and fearful of pain, now stood in a frenzy, tears streaming down his face as his heart nearly burst from the agony.

“Get out of here!!! You’re not allowed to touch them!!!!”

The glittering dagger was driven viciously into the zombie’s tough hide by the grim-faced Muke.

The zombie threw back its head and let out a furious whine, pressing its claws harder and harder against Muke’s body.

[System Alert: Player Muke uses (Flash Strike), causing a one-minute stiffness in the carrion zombie and reducing its life to 5!]

Muke was slammed to the ground by the zombie’s heavy claw. He collapsed to his knees, his face pale. The ground beneath him shattered and cracked from the force of the zombie’s blow.

The downward pressure from the zombie finally stopped. Muke blinked slowly, letting out a soft giggle once he confirmed the zombie had stopped moving. He murmured a quiet success.

Then, blood began to seep from Muke’s mouth, eyes, and nose.

He released the dagger, his body slowly going limp as he collapsed to the ground, vomiting blood. His vacant eyes lingered on Liu Jiayi and Bai Liu—those he had protected. It was a look Bai Liu was familiar with.

It resembled the proud gaze of a child receiving praise from their family, but Muke’s expression was weak, fading, as if his energy was slowly dissipating. His eyelids drooped, but there was still a flicker of happiness in his eyes.

Like Liu Huai and Mu Sicheng before him, he had completed the task Bai Liu had set for him to perfection.

“...You did well, Muke,” Bai Liu said softly.

Muke’s bloodied mouth curved into a faint, genuine smile at Bai Liu’s praise. His lips pulled into a small, proud grin, but his eyelids drooped lower, barely able to hold his gaze.

With great effort, he spoke, his voice weak and uncertain, “...I think I'm failing... I... I really tried my best this time. I did everything I could... Ahem, I didn't... disrupt your plans, right... Bai Liu?"

"I know, Muke." Bai Liu's gaze lifted. "You did well. And now, I'm giving you permission to die."

Muke exhaled slowly, coughing up blood and foam. He slowly released the dagger that had been clutched so tightly in his hand, the pattern on the dagger having shifted from [blood] to [heart] from his excessive grip. The letters engraved on his palm showed the strain of his strength.

The glow on the dagger dimmed and faded to the ground, transforming into a data point.

[System Alert: Player Muke's main identity line has zero life, confirmed dead.]

In the split second that Muke's death was confirmed, Bai Liu didn't hesitate. He immediately scooped Liu Jiayi up and sprinted toward the tunnel entrance, carrying her on his shoulders. Liu Jiayi's expression was one of confusion and incomprehension.

She stared ahead, lost in thought, looking at the flame that had flung itself before her and died on the ground. It was Muke, the new player who had inherited Liu Huai's skills.

He was like a cloud of weapons and fire, just like her brother, falling to the ground once more for her sake.

Liu Jiayi's thin fingers tightened around Bai Liu's shoulders as tears slowly filled her eyes. "Why...?"

She had been nothing but a forgotten child, unwanted by anyone. It seemed as if God had allowed her to be born only to repeatedly remind her of her insignificance, stuck in a long, dreary existence.

Her life seemed meaningless—just a small fish struggling to survive in the mud. She had fought to survive, but she was destined to drown in the same weir that had claimed her mother and sister. The only place she could breathe was in the palm of Liu Huai's hand.

Liu Jiayi didn't deserve saving. No one would save her.

Muke, who had protected Liu Jiayi, lay silently on the ground. His eyes were barely closed as Bai Liu carried her away. Her eyes fluttered open briefly, holding onto Bai Liu's shoulder, feeling as though she might fly.

Time felt distorted as she gazed up at the monstrous zombie that had leapt toward them, its stiff body now in mid-air. As the hideous creature's face morphed into that of a real person in slow motion, Liu Jiayi could see through her thermographic vision.

The zombie's face twisted into the angry, drunken visage of the man who had fathered her. He screamed at Liu Jiayi, "Little bastard! Who let you be born?"

But then Liu Huai's face appeared, tear-streaked and sorrowful. He broke down, crying, "I'm sorry, Jiayi. I didn't mean it. For brother's sake, just one last time, okay?"

Bai Liu pressed Liu Jiayi's face into his chest, and the twisted faces vanished.

Liu Jiayi, small and fragile, curled up against Bai Liu like an immature kitten, gripping the corners of his collar. Bai Liu, breathing heavily, spoke in a calm, steady voice.

"If you're asking why I saved you..."

"Because I made a deal with a man who sold me his soul. He promised that as long as I lived, he would take you out of here."

"I'm still alive," Bai Liu said, "so I save you."

Liu Jiayi's eyes were open but unseeing, tears flowing in a steady stream, soaking into Bai Liu's collar.

Two children, who had never believed in God, stumbled toward what they now saw as the safety of divine shelter.

A monstrous attack came from behind with a wide-open mouth. Bai Liu tore the hinges off the tunnel's entrance and threw little Miao Gaojiang toward the oncoming zombie. Bai Liu coughed and choked, then dropped Liu Jiayi from his shoulders.

[System Warning: Player Bai Liu's protective item (Cynic Wristguard) will expire in 15 minutes! Damage taken during this time will stack on top of player Bai Liu's body! Player Bai Liu's main status line life is about to hit zero!]

Liu Jiayi, panicked, watched the fire before her flicker and fade. Tears poured from her eyes. “Bai Liu! Bai Liu! Bai Liu!”

Bai Liu slowly collapsed to the ground.

He loosened his grip on the whip, and more blood poured from his mouth, as though all his previous injuries had caught up with him. Struggling to turn his head, he spoke to Liu Jiayi, his words labored and slow. “Run... channel...”

“Don’t die!” Liu Jiayi cried out, touching Bai Liu’s face with frantic desperation. She pressed her face against his head, feeling his weakening breaths. “Please don’t die! Didn’t you want to save me? Didn’t you promise to take me out of this game? Don’t just die like this!”

“Don’t lie to me,” she sobbed. “Don’t leave me alone, will you...?”

Her dull, grey eyes glistened with anguish as she cried out, kneeling before a statue of a pure god. “Don’t leave me alone to hide anymore!”

She had been forever hiding in the dark, like a deep-sea fish that couldn’t see the light. A strange, cursed existence, growing in betrayal and doubt, living through games she couldn’t share with anyone.

Who would stay with her, the little fish whispered? “I can save you... and poison you... but if you come near me with love, I’ll give you my warmest belly.”

“Just stay with me forever, and don’t fish me up only to fear my monster-like appearance and cowardly leave me in a muddy pond.”

Little Miao Gaojiang screamed in terror as the monster grabbed him. In the moment before the zombie bit down on his neck, the eyelids of the god on the cross twitched.

[System Warning: Monster attack on children in the safe zone detected!]

[System Warning: The gods have sent down punishment!]

Dense thorns spread out from the feet of the idol, wrapping tightly around the carrion zombie that had stepped into the church. The zombie, trapped by the black thorns, attacked frantically in every direction, but the barbed spikes easily sank into its thick, leathery, greenish-purple skin. The thorns coiled around its neck in a tight circle, and the zombie let out a roar of fury as it struggled to break free from its thorny prison.

More and more thorns twisted around, wrapping in layers, until the zombie was completely encased in a cocoon made of sharp, black thorns.

As the thorns burrowed deeper, the zombie's growls grew louder before gradually fading, its voice becoming weaker with each passing moment as the thorns tightened, as if slowly swallowing the monster whole.

Little Miao Gaojiang, watching in fear, stepped back, realizing that the entire church floor was now covered in thick strands of thorns, which continued to spread, weaving toward the central cocoon.

The thorns slowly settled, and the air grew heavy with the foul stench of decay. Black, blood-tinged liquid dripped from the spikes, adding to the grim scene.

[System warning: God-level NPC attacking carrion zombie (player alienation) — carrion zombie life value confirmed as zero.]

[System Alert: Player Miao Gaojiang's main identity line life value is zero, confirmed dead.]

Liu Jiayi smelled the stench of death and heard the soft hiss of thorns retracting from the ground, followed by the dull sound of falling debris. Her breathing quickened, but none of these noises were as significant to her as the fading colors on Bai Liu's body.

She barely registered the death of Miao Gaojiang, whose system panel now flashed in front of her.

[System Alert: Regret to inform you that your personal skill (Antidote) has one and a half hours remaining on its cooldown and cannot be used at this time.]

Liu Jiayi closed her eyes and exhaled slowly. Calm down, she thought. There must be something she could do to save Bai Liu.

Her healing skills were unavailable, but there was one other thing she could use — her blood. Her blood could nurture the Blood Lingzhi, capable of saving anyone, even Bai Liu, the investor. However, she needed a bed of straw to cultivate the Blood Lingzhi.

Bai Liu couldn't wait for her to find a bed of straw, especially with other investors' monsters closing in. Even if she had the strength to fight, Bai Liu didn't have the time.

Liu Jiayi's gaze moved toward the idol, where thorns were still coiling. The god's cold eyes stared at her, a dead mass that emitted a chilling aura.

Before Tawil could react, he saw the blind girl stumbling toward the idol, pulling the thorns from its body with a determination that was almost violent.

Tawil, newly awakened and confused, watched in silence.

"I didn't expect her to be so calm," he mused. But when he saw Liu Jiayi's face, it all made sense. She was blind.

As soon as Liu Jiayi touched Tawil, she was overcome by an inexplicable compulsion to pull the thorns from his body, almost as if they were wool.

Tawil, still silent, watched her work.

After a moment, he glanced at Bai Liu, who lay motionless on the ground, and then gently wrapped his thorns around him, carefully placing him in the baptismal pool without causing any damage to his fragile body.

Liu Jiayi, stunned by the sound, was about to snatch someone from the thorn bundle when Tawil silently placed his own thorns in her hand.

Liu Jiayi froze.

"Are you planning to use my thorns to create a place for the Blood Lingzhi?" Tawil asked calmly. "I'll pile them up for you."

The thorns obediently weaved together at the bottom of the baptismal pool, forming a sturdy black cane bed. Bai Liu, pale and bloodless, lay on it, his eyes tightly closed.

Liu Jiayi stood in front of the baptismal font, gazing down at Bai Liu, the player who had been saving her since the beginning of the game — a player she had once hated.

"How did you know you could raise the Blood Lingzhi with my thorns?" Tawil asked, looking down at her. "Or is the Blood Lingzhi a product of my thorns?"

Liu Jiayi bowed her head, her eyes fixed on Bai Liu. Without hesitation, she slashed her wrist with a knife, blood spilling from her arm and dripping into the baptismal pool. The blood mixed with the water, swirling in patterns like a flower, haloed in a forbidden, foul light.

The submerged thorns began to stretch and grow, glowing red like fireflies rising from their tips.

Liu Jiayi's pale wrists dripped brightly colored blood, and she spoke without emotion in her voice. "All monsters in this copy suck blood, and you're a monster too. So, why wouldn't you?"

She looked up at Tawil, her grey eyes cold. "From the way this safe zone is set up, you seem to be a god who protects children. But if you were truly so benevolent, why would the investors worship you so fervently, obsessed with baptizing us in your presence? Every copy has its core evil, formed by the disgusting desires of humans. The core evil in this copy is the Blood Lingzhi, and it all begins with the Blood Lingzhi's appearance."

"You are the most important figure in this copy's monster book. Your presence must be tied to the core evil."

Liu Jiayi's gaze hardened as blood dripped from her hands. "You're not a good god. You're an evil god. The investors worship you because the secret recipe and creation of the Blood Lingzhi started with you. It was you who gave them these things, which is why they worship you."

Tawil blinked slowly, his eyes focused on Liu Jiayi as she spoke. "You're not entirely wrong. The Blood Lingzhi did start with me," he admitted.

"But I am no longer a god," Tawil continued, the thorns crawling rapidly over his body as he spoke softly. "I am just a fallen, undead evil creature — no longer considered a god. I am merely the first sustenance for the Blood Lingzhi."

"I was the first child discovered by the investors. They learned that blood could feed the Blood Lingzhi. After realizing that I wouldn't die, they bound me to this cross with thorns, hoping that every child they baptized would be like me, feeding the Blood Lingzhi. If that makes me a god, then I suppose I am indeed an evil god."

Liu Jiayi's breath caught, her eyes narrowing as she looked at Tawil. The once-still thorns in her vision turned red and hot, twisting around the idol's form like veins, burrowing into Tawil's veins and greedily draining the blood and nutrients from his body. The thorns twisted inside the statue's heart, feeding and secreting spores at the intersections of the vines.

These blood-red canes were blood-sucking mycelium, with spores still waiting to grow at their tips.

Tawil lowered his eyelashes. "I am the eternal sustenance of the blood primordial mother, and every sub-colony in the straw beds of the investor's hospital grows from the thorns that suck my blood and thrive on me."

"I am a symbiont of the blood primordial."

After driving the vines that strangled the monster, the vines—mycelium—swelled and sucked blood from Tawil's body, wrapping tighter and tighter. The thorny ropes scurried and pulled through Tawil's veins and heart, and Tawil's face grew visibly tired. This was the reason he became sleepy every time he used the vines to save Bai Liu.

It drove its mycelium to save Bai Liu, but in doing so, intensified its efforts to extract blood and nutrients from Tawil's body.

Tawil slowly dropped his eyelids, focusing intently on Bai Liu, still unconscious, lying in the baptismal pool before him.

The first time Tawil met Bai Liu, it was as a rotting mermaid fished from the water by humans, placed in a window as an exhibit to attract tourists to its slaughter, eventually transforming an entire town into ghostly fish-man monsters.

The second time Tawil saw Bai Liu, it was in the form of a ghostly mirror, stolen from a collector's house by thieves. The mirror hid a fear that all humans dared not face. The thieves, fearing it would break or be stolen, placed a bomb inside it, ultimately burying an entire carriage of passengers in flames.

It lowered three times to meet Bai Liu—Tawil lowered his eyes.

Bai Liu was a child fit for the blood lucifer mother's supply. He would not die or stop blood production, only sleep. His special blood drove all the terminally ill investors mad, eventually turning hospitals and orphanages—places meant for good—into hellish farms.

And so, Tawil was banished and exiled by the gods.

[Tawil, you were born evil. You can only sleep at the bottom of the sea, in the heart of the earth, in the shattered lenses of untouchable fear, in the darkness of the universe, 13.7 billion light years away.]

"You are a god. You enjoy the faith of mankind, and you must take responsibility for the human tragedies born of your evil."

Thus spoke the gods from on high: Tawil, no human being can remain sane after seeing your true face. You are so wicked, so full of compulsion to the abyss and extreme evil, that you can corrupt the purest and most innocent child in all of time and space.

If a human can keep their senses upon seeing you, they will become——the next demon.

The next demon, sleeping on the snow-white baptismal pool tainted by the blood of a forbidden witch, was awakened by the gods from a dream filled with bloody fireflies. Bai Liu's eyes slowly opened.

Bai Liu was pale, his neck and head tilted, the smallest parts of his arms and legs twisted and pulled tight by crimson vines, moving upwards inch by inch as the plant branches that redeemed the terminally ill man shook and stretched across his body, presenting a fragile, sacrificial pose.

The face of the sacrificial victim, the demon, the sick and dying patient concealed beneath the vines, hidden under the flower of evil watered by human desire, looked calmly at the fallen evil god bound by the same derivatives of human desire, while the awakened evil god silently looked back at him.

"Will you go mad seeing me?" Its voice buzzed and echoed in all directions in the vine-engulfed church, as if a thousand voices were judging the self-sacrificing congregation at once.

"Never," the devilishly religious answered with a smile.

The spikes on all the vines spreading from the statue burst open. Blood-red spores floated through the church like shattered pieces of glowing planets. The red candlelight hovered in the air, dancing wildly. The spikes burst from the top like a four-petaled, exploding flower of red clematis, wrapping tightly around Tawil's cheeks, revealing only a pair of sculptural eyes devoid of emotion.

Liu Jiayi collapsed in a daze on the edge of the baptismal pool as the spores bloomed. She fell unconscious from a drop in mental energy and blood loss.

Her wrist rested upwards on the edge of the pool, snaking toward it, bleeding steadily from several new cuts and an old one that had clotted a little.

"Her blood won't be enough to raise a blood primrose." Tawil, whose face was hidden under thorns, whispered. "The blood lucifer mother needs more blood."

That's why the investors don't use the mother to raise the blood lingzhi directly. The mother requires more and more blood to raise a mature blood lingzhi, and Tawil's blood regenerates at a rate sufficient only to maintain the supply of daughter strains. So they harvest the daughter strains from Tawil and cultivate them more efficiently on their own.

"How much more do you need?" A thin voice came from the doorway of the church. Little Muke propped one hand against the door, clutching the hand that fell at his side as he glared at the idol. "With the blood of little Bai Liu and me, and the blood packets of Miao Feichi and Liu Jiayi that I just pulled from Liu Huai, will it be enough to raise a blood lingzhi to save him?"

"Maybe still not enough." Tawil calmly looked at little Miao Gaojiang, unconscious on the floor. "But with this child and all the blood I have left, it will be enough."

Kneeling at the edge of the pool, Little Muke rolled up his sleeve and used the knife Liu Jiayi had dropped to make several vicious cuts on his thin arm. Then, he took out Little Bai Liu's blood bag—already somewhat clotted, layered, and thoroughly cold, which made Little Muke's eyes redden—and tore open three blood bags. He soaked them in the baptismal pool beneath Bai Liu, who was too weak to move, and then cut his other arm, soaking both hands in the water.

Little Miao Gaojiang was dragged over by Tawil's cane and was cut and bled dry by Little Muke, gnashing his teeth—if it weren't for this bastard, they wouldn't have lost so many people!

"Ahem," Bai Liu coughed twice, glancing sideways at Muke, who had his hands in the water. Bai suddenly smiled, not really caring about his life-threatening situation, and casually teased Little Muke. "Don't you hate me? Why are you saving me?"

Little Muke bowed his head, his voice low. "…Little Bai Liu wanted to save you, and you saved me, so I want to save you too."

Liu Jiayi dipped one hand through a gap in the vines into the cold water of the baptismal pool, her drowsy face resting against the edge, while her other hand gently tugged at the corner of Bai Liu's coat.

Her fragile upper body was covered in tear marks, and on her thin arms, there was a shocking slash—she had cut herself with a deadly hand, seemingly knowing she wouldn't last long in terms of her mental stability. Afraid she might pass out, she cut deep to prevent her blood from clotting.

Bai Liu turned his head back and looked at the ceiling of the church, as though replying to Little Muke's question, though his tone was light: "What childish logic."

The logic of a child is simple, easy, and deceptive: You saved me, so I will save you. You paid for me, so I will pay you back.

Liu Jiayi is like this. Muke is like this.

So is little Bai Liu, though he doesn't like to admit it. Bai Liu must concede that he hasn't grown much since he was a child, still holding onto that same logic—a logic that is purely transactional.

"And what did you save me for, Tawil?" Bai Liu asked softly. "I don't remember making a deal with you that would have made you pay for me with all your blood."

Tawil's face was completely engulfed in thorns, but his voice remained calm: "Your very existence is worth everything I have to give."

"Bai Liu." Tawil's voice was cold and solemn, as if he were proclaiming some sacred vow in a church. "You are my only believer."

[Tawil, if such a human being exists, then you have believers once again.]

[A devilish, evil god's devotee.]

"The gods are meant to fulfill all the requests of the faithful unconditionally," Tawil said.

Little Muke, who had lost a lot of blood, looked at the face of the statue and fainted, overwhelmed by an unspeakable fear and dizziness.

The vines on the statue flew up and wriggled, weaving through its body at a speed that made one's flesh ache just to watch. They quickly crawled all over the church, like some kind of blood that had been stained away in a pool.

The holy church was instantly transformed into a habitat of dark red, leaping vines, with little red spores, resembling flower pistils, thumping regularly as if they had a heartbeat. They grew rapidly, as if devouring extraordinary sustenance, instantly blossoming into heart-like mushrooms.

Tawil's heart also thumped, the same heartbeat as theirs.

Thump. Thump. Thump. Thump. Tawil's heartbeat seemed amplified a hundredfold through these vines, echoing throughout the church.

Bai Liu gazed at the sky of vines and the leaping "hearts," finally letting his eyes fall on the idol that was so entangled it could no longer be seen, the dark red vines circling it in a ring.

"If I am indeed your only believer," Bai Liu said in a scattered tone, joking, "Then save me, Tawil, my god."

The millions of beating "hearts" stopped for a moment.

Then they began to throb more intensely, frantically.

The vines began to wither, and rose-like, red, heart-sized blood lingzhi started growing from each vine's tip. Millions of shimmering, leaping red blood lingzhi blossomed from the withered black vines like fields of roses in full bloom during their flowering season, decadent and unrestrained before wilting.

The vines on the statue withered and blackened, slipping away, and Tawil descended from the statue. He propped himself up on either side of the baptismal font, the ever-cold god lowering his eyes. His lips, now nearly the temperature of blood, kissed Bai Liu's forehead as he whispered.

"Divine baptism for your new birth, my only believer."

The Loving Welfare Home

The god who had shed the last drop of blood for his followers closed his eyes wearily, and he slept peacefully beside the rejuvenated and healed believer.

The withered vines turned into a black sleeping quilt over it, and the young god, who had gained his first followers, had a very faint and imperceptible smile on his lips, like a child dreaming after having acquired his favourite toy.

It all seemed like fairy godmother magic, because the clock had just struck midnight.

Liu Jiayi woke up choking and coughing from the smell of psycho-bleach. Her face was almost transparent from the blood loss, and though she had just woken up, the little girl immediately regained her guard. She drew out her poison and aimed it at the direction of the sound she had heard.

Liu Jiayi couldn't see anything now because the visualization effect had expired.

"It's me, Bai Liu." Bai Liu remained calm, even as Liu Jiayi threatened him with the poison. He spread his arms to show he was unarmed. "Your blood is still flowing, so I wanted to take care of you."

Liu Jiayi lowered her weapon in a daze, still processing the fact that Bai Liu had survived.

In that moment, she had already prepared to sacrifice herself—just to put up a fight—but she hadn't actually believed she could save him. Now, however, she could feel the bandaged wound on her arm and tightened her grip slightly, her cuts still stinging.

"You're probably low on life. Don't you want to give yourself a little boost?" Bai Liu asked.

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips, silent. Her healing skill had already run out, and Bai Liu was right—she had bled to save him, leaving her life very low, only 5 points. Sitting on the ground, an unbearable chill crept through her, making her want to shiver.

She didn't answer him, so Bai Liu turned his attention to treating the wound of the still-sleeping Muke. Liu Jiayi's eyes were closed, her eyelashes trembling with water, her face covered in blood. Suddenly, a holy white glow emanated from her body, spreading like water to Bai Liu and Muke.

The glow was warm, pure white, making it impossible not to relax, as the little girl at the center of it all held a shimmering bottle of mercury-like liquid. The bottle was long and thin, about the length of Bai Liu's hand.

Liu Jiayi placed the bottle of liquid into Bai Liu's hand, her voice hoarse. "Antidote. You and Muke drink it. Don't save it for me. Top up your blood."

As Bai Liu was about to ask why she was giving it to them, Liu Jiayi seemed to feel the cold and curled up, hugging her knees, burying her head in them.

Her voice was muffled. "Neither you nor Muke have a higher panel than I do. The healing skill works better when the personal panel level is lower. You're better off drinking it than I am. You two are about to run out of life. I still have some, and I have skills. I'm more durable than you in this game."

"Why give it to us?" Bai Liu asked anyway.

"Give it back to you." Liu Jiayi's head was still buried in her lap, and she spoke without looking up, without thinking.

Bai Liu understood.

Little Bai Liu saved her, Muke saved her, and he saved her. She remembered them all—probably in disbelief, maybe in doubt, maybe in denial.

But she remembered them all.

"I thought you'd hate me. You guessed I was using Liu Huai to catch you when you were outside the church, didn't you?" Bai Liu asked thoughtfully.

Liu Jiayi still didn't look up, but she made a nasal sound, acknowledging his words.

Bai Liu looked down at the swirls in Liu Jiayi's yellow hair. "Then why did you bleed to save me when you knew I lied to you and was using you?"

Liu Jiayi asked him in return, "What about you? Why did you risk your life to save me?"

Bai Liu simply said, "The deal."

Liu Jiayi finally lifted her head, her eyes red. "Because you just saved me."

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi exchanged a long, silent gaze, whispering and sobbing.

The little girl's gray eyes, blind to the world, held a stubbornness, loneliness, and vulnerability. It was like a fish watching birds on the shore from the muddy water, unnoticed by anyone. But when you truly looked at the fish through the mud, you would see that her eyes could speak. [Whoever saved me, I'll return it all to you. I don't owe anyone anything.]

I'll settle the score with the world, with everyone in it, and figure out where I went wrong.

Let's see how long I can survive as a little cunt.

Bai Liu handed the antidote bottle back, his expression and tone calm. "I've got the Blood Lingzhi. I've cleared the level. I don't need to restore any life points. You don't need to return anything to me just because someone else did it for you. Just leave some of the antidote for Muke."

"The rest, I think you need more." Bai Liu extended the antidote bottle to Liu Jiayi. "You're also low on life. Drink it, and rest easy. I promised Liu Huai I'd take care of you."

Liu Jiayi's dry, cracked lips parted slightly. Her chin rested on her knees as she curled into a tiny ball. She raised her head with wary, suspicious unease, blinking to contain her emotions. She pursed her lips and reached for the bottle, but her hands trembled, almost dropping it.

"You have a wound on your hand." Bai Liu caught the falling bottle and held it to Liu Jiayi's mouth. "I'll feed it to you like this."

Liu Jiayi inhaled softly, then opened her mouth. Before she could drink, a drop of liquid dripped from the bottle.

One drop, two drops, her tears falling into the antidote. Liu Jiayi wondered if tears—emotions venting through the poison of human sorrow—would render the antidote ineffective.

She held the bottle in her mouth, her tears flowing freely as she choked on the antidote that healed her, whimpering. “It’s so humiliating to drink like this... like a...”

“Stray dog, right?” Bai Liu smiled slightly. “Your mantra is the same as your brother’s—stray dogs are nice. Why do you all hate stray dogs so much?”

Thinking of Liu Huai, Liu Jiayi cried harder, tears and snot streaming together. Her body shuddered with sobs. “What’s so great about stray dogs? They’re dirty, disliked by everyone! Everyone shouts at them! Everyone hates stray dogs!”

Bai Liu gently stroked Liu Jiayi’s head, finding it somewhat amusing that she was crying so hard.

He said, “A homeless person wouldn’t hate stray dogs.”

Liu Jiayi lifted her tear-streaked face.

“When the game is over, take your brother away from me, a vagrant.” Bai Liu lowered his eyes, his voice soft. “When the game ends for good, neither you nor he will have to wander anymore.”

Liu Jiayi didn't drink much, but the little girl had a stubborn streak and had to leave it to Bai Liu, who wasn't too safe with only three life points. So, he went along with Liu Jiayi and drank it. Liu Jiayi didn't know how much blood she had left, but she wouldn't tell Bai Liu, saying that she wasn't dying easily at this level, so he shouldn't worry about her.

Taking advantage of the night, Bai Liu moved the baptismal font to reveal the tunnel below. He clapped his hands and exhaled. "At this point, the deformed children can't exit through this tunnel. They'll have to go out through the hospital exit. The number of deformed children in the tunnel should be low now..."

"It doesn't matter if there are more," Liu Jiayi said, standing in front of Bai Liu while holding the bottle of poison. Her voice was still hoarse. "I'll clear the way."

Bai Liu raised an eyebrow slightly. "Okay, I'll take Little Miao Gaojiang with me."

After Big Miao Gaojiang's death, Bai Liu only had to fulfill this agreement to get Little Miao Gaojiang's soul note. To do that, Bai Liu saved Little Miao Gaojiang's life and fed him some antidote to keep his blood flow steady.

Liu Jiayi could have guessed this as she watched Bai Liu carry Miao Gaojiang without any reaction.

Muke wasn't as calm as Liu Jiayi. Her eyes were red with anger, and she pointed at Bai Liu with shaking hands. "How could you save him? You're an idiot! He's the one who closed the church door and let everyone else die!"

"He'd die even if he didn't," Bai Liu said, glancing faintly at Little Muke. "The church has no shelter for us adults. We'd be killed too if we stayed."

Little Muke was still fuming, but Liu Jiayi had already jumped through the opening of the passage. Little Muke was startled when Bai Liu said, "Follow her in."

The passage was still dark, stuffy, and damp. Occasionally, something would rustle and crawl, but before it could get close to Bai Liu and the others, it was eliminated by Liu Jiayi, who was one step ahead of them. Jiayi's natural blindness gave her an advantage in the dark, making her faster than the monsters in finding her target by sound.

When they reached a spot, as if hearing the sound of fingers snapping in the dirt, Liu Jiayi prepared to attack again, but Little Muke suddenly screamed, "Wait!"

Bai Liu and Liu Jiayi both looked over.

Little Muke stared at Bai Liu's face, breathing quickly. "Little Bai Liu... Little Bai Liu was here before sending us up. You promised to take him out."

They had pulled the limp Little Bai Liu from beneath the mushroom bushes. The morning's battle had been so exhausting that the child had lost all ability to move. He was decaying quickly, with Bai Liu pressing down on him, his body sinking into the mud-like texture.

The fourteen-year-old Bai Liu, like any other deformed child turned monster, was decaying rapidly, turning into a puddle of mud in the hidden tunnels beneath the orphanage.

Little Muke looked nervously at Bai Liu, who was carrying Miao Gaojiang on his back. Taking Little Bai Liu's body with him would be a burden, and keeping with the man's philosophy that "useless things" should be abandoned, Little Muke was apprehensive that Bai Liu would leave Little Bai Liu there again, as he had done in the morning. He asked warily, "You promised to take him out, you can't leave him here."

Bai Liu tilted his head slightly, his face expressionless as he stared down at Muke.

Muke's back was tense. "I know he's just a corpse, but still, you can't leave him here. You promised him!"

Bai Liu suddenly smiled softly, wrapped Miao Gaojiang's limbs around himself with bandages, and then knelt down to look at Little Bai Liu.

Little Bai Liu's face was already covered with corpse spots. He looked like a child who had slept restlessly, still wrinkling his brow the moment before he died, but with a little smile at the corner of his mouth, a somewhat peculiar expression.

"You see, you have a friend too, Little Bai Liu," Bai Liu's tone was light, almost to himself. "Not a liar like me, but a real friend."

"Your luck will change."

Little Bai Liu didn't open his eyes. His chest was calm and unruffled, but corpse spots grew from the place where his heart had once been.

Little Muke looked at Bai Liu strangely and muttered to himself. Then, Bai Liu bent down, picked up Little Bai Liu's body, and, with two children in front and behind him, he shakily stood up, but did so. Little Bai Liu rolled unconsciously in his arms. His head rolled out from Bai Liu's shoulder, and was wrapped in one arm, held back, sleeping like a baby.

Bai Liu walked out of the orphanage with his fourteen-year-old body in his arms, one step at a time.

The Loving Welfare Home

After exiting the hospital, Bai Liu, relying on Liu Jiayi to deal with the monsters, reached the car parked outside. He opened the "Passenger's Blessing" and took the three children with him.

Bai Liu drove through the night, surrounded by twisted, eerie ghostly faces swaying towards him, reactivated by the [Passenger's Blessing] prop. He kept driving in one direction until the first light of dawn broke the sky, and the number of investor monsters roaming around began to dwindle. At that point, Liu Jiayi spoke up, "We've finished escaping the orphanage."

Little Muke was still confused, holding the game manager to his chest. "This thing just told me I completed a mission... what mission?"

Little Miao Gaojiang cowered in the back seat, unconscious, still not waking up, but Bai Liu was reminded of the completion of his soul deal with Miao Gaojiang.

Bai Liu leaned back lazily in the driver's seat. "Tap out. We'll talk outside. I have a little business to take care of."

"What's the point of quitting...?" Little Muke mumbled, looking confused. Before he could finish his sentence, Bai Liu disappeared.

Liu Jiayi glanced at Little Miao Gaojiang in the back seat and realized Bai Liu wanted to speak to Miao Gaojiang alone. She pursed her lips and nodded, getting out of the car too.

Now, the only ones left in the car were Little Miao Gaojiang, lying unconscious in the back seat, and Little Bai Liu, casually holding the steering wheel in the passenger seat. A lanyard hung from his wrist, with the game manager he had taken from Miao Gaojiang's corpse dangling from it.

"Wake up, Miao Gaojiang. Are you still pretending to be asleep?" Bai Liu spoke slowly. "Are you wondering why they can all disappear and quit the game, but you can't? It's because I have your game manager."

"Your soul is also with me."

Little Miao Gaojiang's trembling eyes finally opened. He stared at Bai Liu, sitting idly in the driver's seat, covered in blood, looking like a demon. His shoulders shuddered uncontrollably. "What are you going to do to me?!"

It was hard to reconcile this terrified child, who was scared by just Bai Liu pretending to sleep, with the Miao Gaojiang who had waged a battle of wits with Bai Liu and killed everyone, including his own son.

It's remarkable how people grow up. It’s difficult to imagine that Bai Liu, ten years ago, would have turned into the law-abiding man he is now.

Now, Miao Gaojiang, already tearful before Bai Liu even spoke, would probably find it hard to believe that he had once been a villain in this horror game, someone who could easily sacrifice Bai Liu's life for his own gain.

"I don’t want to do anything to you. I can get you out of this place," Bai Liu said. "But I want one thing from you."

Little Miao Gaojiang cried out in fear, "What, what is it? My blood?!"

Bai Liu smirked. "No, your guild."

Before entering the game, Bai Liu had asked Mu Sicheng what he needed to do to take Miao Gaojiang's guild. Although Mu Sicheng had thought Bai Liu was joking, he had told Bai Liu exactly what to do.

First, Bai Liu had to kill Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, the two most powerful members of the guild, who had risen to power through sheer violence and strength.

Second, Bai Liu needed the assignment agreement signed by both Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang.

But both of these tasks were extremely difficult. The guild was as important to Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi as their own lives.

According to Mu Sicheng, even if Bai Liu had manipulated Miao Gaojiang and Miao Feichi’s souls, the two would never have allowed Bai Liu to seize the guild’s power, as it would directly affect their resources and their lives.

Even if Miao Gaojiang died, other, larger guilds would probably take over the Scavengers Guild.

Bai Liu had planned to sign the agreement by manipulating Miao Gaojiang’s soul and using his panel, but when he tried to do so directly, a warning popped up from the system:

[System warning: Guild management transfer authority belongs to senior authority. Player Bai Liu's authority exceeds the level. Player Bai Liu only enjoys part of the soul debt authority of player Miao Gaojiang and has no right to call higher authority. This authority belongs to the system. Please exit quickly!]

Miao Gaojiang, who knew how important the guild was, would not easily sign the agreement, but a Miao Gaojiang who didn't understand the full importance of it might.

At Bai Liu's direction, the terrified Miao Gaojiang pulled out the transfer agreement from the panel. After signing it in a shaky manner, he glanced nervously at Bai Liu, who smiled with increasing satisfaction. "That's it, right?"

Bai Liu casually signed the agreement as well. "That's fine. You're out of the game."

[System Alert: Player Miao Gaojiang and Player Bai Liu have signed the "Thirty-five Explanatory Regulations on the Transfer of the Scavengers Guild."]

[There is no third-party witness. The only guarantee of utility is the game system. Effective immediately upon signing.]

[System Alert: Congratulations to player Bai Liu, who has become the new president of the Scavengers Guild. All members of the Scavengers Guild have been notified of the change of their guild president.]

Miao Gaojiang felt as though he had lost something very important, but at the moment, he only felt relief from Bai Liu's presence.

Now, Bai Liu was alone in the car. For some reason, he hadn't quit the game yet. He continued driving in one direction, watching the landscape shift from barren to lush as the sky brightened.

Bai Liu took Little Bai Six out of the car, bought a shovel and a tombstone from the system, and dug a hole in the area. He placed Little Bai Six inside, then casually put the tombstone on the hole and wrote [Bai Liu's Grave] on it with a marker, which he had taken from the hospital.

Then, he wrote the epitaph: [The future buries you, but your future is not buried. Be happy, little friend. You'll get lucky.]

With the same marker, Bai Liu drew a sketch of Little Bai Six on the tombstone—a slim boy with bright eyes and a hollowed-out coin around his neck. On top of his head, Bai Liu drew a cartoon mushroom.

It was an unconventional and humble grave.

But Bai Liu didn't think Little Bai Six would mind. After all, they didn't like wasting money on useless things.

"I brought you out of the place you hated most and buried you in a place I don't even know what it is," Bai Liu stood before the tombstone as daylight slowly crept up his legs, lighting his cheeks. He smiled. "But I kind of like this place, and I think you will too."

"Goodbye, Little Bai Liu, aged 14."

Buried with Little Bai Six was a quarter of a million dollars, which Bai Liu had redeemed with points owed to the boy. He spread it evenly around Little Bai Six's grave, thinking that Little Bai Six wouldn't hate this.

He always kept his promises, even to the dead.

Bai Liu turned away, the sunrise at his back, waving his hand, unsure of what he was saying goodbye to, with only the tombstone left behind.

The breeze carried faint children's songs, resonating in Bai Liu's departing back.

"Born on Monday
Baptism on Tuesday
Marriage on Wednesday
Get sick on Thursday
Aggravated on Friday
Dead on Saturday
Buried in the earth on Sunday
This is the life of Bai Liu."

The daylight illuminated the tombstone so brightly that Bai Liu's back was a halo of light in the diamond-like daylight, which soon dissipated.

[System Alert: Player Bai Liu has quit the game.]

Chapter Notes

Bai Liu walked out of the game's boarding exit.

Muke, who had been waiting through customs, breathed a sigh of relief upon seeing Bai Liu: "You're finally out."

Bai Liu nodded before asking, "Mu Sicheng, did he make it through?"

Muke replied, "I just checked, and his little TV is settling in. He should be coming out of the boarding gate soon."

It wasn't long before Mu Sicheng was helped out, supported by Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua, who looked so drained it seemed like he had a hangover.

In contrast, Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua, the two newcomers, appeared fine.

As soon as Mu Sicheng saw Bai Liu waiting at the door, he couldn't help but push himself up, cursing at Bai Liu: "I'm really impressed, Bai Liu. You know I can't use my skills if you use them, right? I was about to make a big move, and you use it on me—now I'm empty! Why don't you use someone else's skill? You can't be a good guy if you're always catching me like this!"

Despite his rude words, Mu Sicheng didn't seem particularly angry. Instead, he added in a low, slightly bitter tone, "...If it wasn't for Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua coming to my rescue, you would've killed me sooner or later. Even if you want to train me, you don't have to be so aggressive, right?"

Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua, a little tired but also excited to have made it through, smiled and waved. "It's okay, it's okay. It was hard for Little Mu to take us."

Mu Sicheng now had a clearer understanding of Bai Liu's style.

Bai Liu was a highly efficient and cost-effective player who liked to get things done quickly and decisively. The shadow of cooperation left by Liu Huai had become a problem for Mu Sicheng, who, like Liu Huai, was a quick attacker. Moments of hesitation in a team battle could be fatal for both his teammates and himself.

Bai Liu had been using his skills to force Mu Sicheng to adapt quickly to his new teammates, training him relentlessly without fear since Mu Sicheng wouldn't die easily in the first level of the game.

Another reason for this was that Mu Sicheng's skills were exceptionally good.

"Even if I have a little shadow of cooperation because of... you, Bai Liu, you hit too hard..." Mu Sicheng, who was leaning against the boarding exit to catch his breath, stretched his back, his neck and shoulders aching. His eyes lazily swept over a pair of daggers in Muke's hands.

His words and his gaze froze instantly.

It was a pair of daggers—familiar to Mu Sicheng, so familiar that he recognized them immediately upon seeing them.

These daggers had saved him countless times, deflecting numerous demon attacks, and they had nearly killed him twice.

Muke, in his hurry to leave, hadn't remembered that he had been logged out for so long and still had those daggers clutched in his hands.

But with Mu Sicheng's gaze fixed on him, Muke looked down at the daggers.

The daggers disappeared from Muke's hand, but Mu Sicheng didn't move, still staring at the empty space where they had been, his voice low and measured as he asked, "Where did this dagger come from?"

"Liu Huai's," Bai Liu replied.

A strange smile appeared on Mu Sicheng's face. His eyes remained fixed on Muke's hand, but the corners of his mouth curled up in an unsettling way, as if he had heard something funny and completely unbelievable. "How can it be Liu Huai's? The skill requires a voluntary agreement to be signed before the person dies in order to pass it on. You don't have to be such an ass to me. You said it was Liu Huai's dagger, which means he had..."

At this point, Mu Sicheng stopped. Muke looked at Bai Liu with a bewildered expression.

Bai Liu lifted his eyes nonchalantly. “He’s dead, Mu Sicheng.”

Mu Sicheng dashed down the campus path, running as fast as he could, Bai Liu’s words echoing in his ears just before he logged out of the game.

“Liu Huai wanted me to apologize to you, but I think it would’ve been better if he said it to you in person.”

[If you run fast enough, you might still be able to see Liu Huai before he dies. You do know where he is, don’t you?]

Mu Sicheng heard himself huffing and puffing, his lungs burning with each breath. He could indeed guess where Liu Huai was. If Liu Huai was going to die, he would’ve chosen to log out at the same place he first logged into the game—at a bus stop near the school.

Liu Huai had said goodbye to his sister at that bus stop, asking others to help send her home as she cried, clinging to him.

It was also there that Mu Sicheng had first met Liu Huai.

Liu Huai had no suitcase—just a large, sewn cloth bag and a bucket—and he seemed out of place, at odds with everything around him.

Mu Sicheng hadn’t expected to see this man in the same dormitory as himself, nor had he expected to find Liu Huai, hugging a bucket and crying, as soon as he entered the dorm. His father had just left, cursing Liu Huai away with foul language.

There was an unseen pressure that weighed down on Liu Huai, who had just started university, but Mu Sicheng didn’t feel it at the time—he only felt embarrassed.

To avoid the awkwardness, Mu Sicheng kindly treated the sobbing Liu Huai to a KFC meal. Liu Huai, with wet eyes, thanked him, calling him “Fourth Brother,” saying it was the first time he’d ever had such a thing, and then began to help Mu Sicheng with everything he could: signing in, cleaning, and even attempting to wash Mu Sicheng’s socks and sheets. Mu Sicheng had refused, speechless and helpless.

After being turned down, Liu Huai stood there with his head down, looking like a child who had done something wrong.

Liu Huai was a very introverted and shy person, and if not for what happened later, Mu Sicheng might never have gotten that close to him in his life.

Liu Huai wasn't the kind of friend who fit Mu Sicheng's usual criteria —not because of his family background, but because Liu Huai had so many things he didn't want to say. He was like a fish, wanting to speak but keeping it all inside. When you asked him what was wrong, he would only smile helplessly and say, "It's nothing."

"It's my own thing."

Mu Sicheng always wanted to tell Liu Huai that between friends, sometimes your problems are my problems too.

"If you don't talk about it, it will still affect me. Because human relationships don't just keep things to themselves—whether good or bad, they transmit things to one another. Not talking about it doesn't stop it, Liu Huai."

Mu Sicheng finally reached the bus stop, propping himself up on his knees, gasping for breath as he looked across the road at Liu Huai, sitting at the platform.

Liu Huai looked down at something he was holding in his arms—a yellow bag, which seemed to contain something to eat.

Mu Sicheng couldn't help but call out, "Liu Huai!"

Liu Huai looked up sharply. The moment he saw Mu Sicheng, his eyes lit up, and he smiled with tears in his eyes. He no longer seemed uncomfortable or withdrawn. It was just a peaceful smile, as if he had dropped everything. He took a step forward and waved at Mu Sicheng, who was still running. His voice rang out from a distance, still tinged with happiness.

"I didn't think I'd see you, Fourth Brother."

"I'm sorry!" Liu Huai shouted loudly from across the street, his voice cracking. "I'm really sorry, Fourth Brother! It's my fault!"

Mu Sicheng's pupils contracted as the piercing siren of the bus rang out long and loud, and the out-of-control bus suddenly crashed into the platform.

The fried chicken fell to the ground as Liu Huai collapsed, blood spreading across the pavement, still clutching the KFC bag.

Game Hall, Nightmare Nova Room.

Bai Liu's mini-TV was settling, and the newcomer who had made it to the Core on his first try and unbelievably finished second to Nightmare Rising Star on his second attempt, had, through a series of unfortunate coincidences—being chased by the Scavengers' Guild, meeting a vest-approved little witch, and other dramatic factors—managed to reach No. 1 in the Rising Stars before his third mini-TV had even fully settled. The new star had already claimed the top spot.

This was already an impressive achievement.

However, the crowd, who now waited with bated breath in front of Bai Liu's mini-TV, clearly had even greater expectations of the result.

In front of Bai Liu's mini-TV stood all the senior guild executives except for the Killer Sequence, all eagerly waiting for Bai Liu's score to settle.

Bai Liu's mini-TV was flickering with static snowflakes—an image that typically appeared during the settlement process when the data was too large to process quickly. Wang Shun couldn't help but swallow nervously at the sight of the static.

The mini-TV had already been calculating for over a minute, indicating that the amount of data being processed was significant.

The snowflakes slowly faded, and the mini-TV began to display the settlement results.

Wang Shun held his breath, and the senior guild members in front of the mini-TV remained silent.

The spectators watched in awe as Bai Liu's achievement unfolded on the screen, seeing the golden, crowned logo appear on the mini-TV, accompanied by 3D fireworks that continued to bloom around it.

"Aren’t the people from the Scavengers' Guild after him?!"

"Look at the forums, they’ve blown up! Miao Feichi is dead, Miao Gaojiang is mentally unstable, and everyone in the Scavenger Guild has been notified that the president has changed..."

"Dark horse... This guy is too fierce. If we play league next year, there’s going to be something to see..."

Chapter End Notes

> SPOILERS .....
> I can't get over how heartbreaking it is that both of Mu Sicheng's friends, Liu Huai and Yuan Qingqing, died right in front of him—by reckless bus driving, no less. It’s devastating to think that every person he’s ever loved has been taken from him in the same tragic way, all while he was helplessly watching. It’s like he's trapped in an endless cycle of loss and trauma, forced to witness the people closest to him being ripped away, and he can't stop it. My heart is completely shattered for him.

Reality

Many guilds are seeking information about Bai Liu, a phenomenal newcomer, and many have even made offers in their posts, saying they want Bai Liu to join them and that they'll train him under any terms they choose!

At this point, the players of the Scavengers Guild, who hadn't yet figured out their direction, jumped on the bandwagon and boycotted the high-level guilds trying to recruit Bai Liu. They accused them of poaching and called them out! Look closely! That's our new president! He won't just follow you!

Although the players of the Scavengers Guild were rattled by the loss of Miao Gaojiang as their leader, it was clear that Bai Liu was also a promising prospect. Before the players of the Scavengers Guild had time to lament the leadership change, they eagerly rushed to secure Bai Liu, fearing he might be snatched away by other guilds.

A guild needs senior players who can compete in the league, but with Miao Feichi dead and Miao Gaojiang completely unhinged, the guild had no choice but to hand it over to Bai Liu.

The Scavengers Guild is a relatively low-level guild; aside from Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, most members are ordinary players. If they were any better, they wouldn't have gone so many years without winning a match in the tournament. Once word got out that Miao Gaojiang and his son were in trouble, all the capable players fled the Scavengers Guild.

Although there's a substantial fine for resigning, to these capable players, leaving the guild is better than staying in one with no future. The Scavengers Guild has no prospects!

A new guild leader with only three games under his belt? That's laughable in the eyes of veteran players!

Without the resources to network with other guilds, without league-level players to lead the way, and without senior players to help build up the guild's assets, the guild is doomed. The annual league is vital to all guilds, and for a medium-sized guild like the Scavengers, if the Miao family can't even get league players for a year, the guild will collapse into smaller groups, and many will scatter.

Those still in the guild are mostly average players, stuck on the first level of the game.

They can't afford the fines, and other guilds won't take them seriously, so they have no choice but to hold on to Bai Liu as their lifeline.

The players of the Scavengers Guild comfort themselves, thinking, even if they don't make it to the league this year, Bai Liu has high potential, and there's always next year!

But no matter how much they try to reassure themselves, they're still in a state of panic, each one scrambling for their new president like a chick separated from its mother.

What's peculiar is that the new president, who just inherited the guild, isn't rushing to show himself. In other guilds, when a new president takes over, they immediately make a speech or offer promises to the players to calm them down and prevent mass departures. It's a standard move: the new leader paints a rosy picture for everyone.

But not Bai Liu.

He's lazily leaning against the edge of the central hall. The small TV in the center of the room shows the King's Leaderboard, constantly repeating clips of Bai Liu's games. Bai Liu can see some people looking for him in a hurry, but he remains relaxed in his corner, not approaching.

"Are you going to say something to them?" Muke asked, turning to Bai Liu.

"No, let them be for a while," Bai Liu said, lowering his gaze. "When they've finished with the ones they want to leave and panicked enough, I'll make a deal with them. I'm not going to be president for free. It's essentially a job, no different from going to work."

Muke kept quiet, chuckling to himself.

Other new leaders make promises to the players, but Bai Liu? He'll probably make the guild promise him certain conditions and pay him a certain amount before agreeing to stay on as their president.

Muke felt a pang of sympathy for the guild members when he remembered how arrogant they had been towards Bai Liu at the start.

...How did it get to this point? And now we have to pay him to lead us?

Isn’t it usually the leader who pays those of us who work here? Why is it the other way around for Bai Liu?

What exactly is going on?

Bai Liu ignored Muke’s mixed expression and opened his system panel to check the points and items he had acquired.

In addition to the two items from the Monster Book, Bai Liu received items and points from Miao Feichi and Miao Gaojiang, which amounted to quite a sum.

[System Alert: You have obtained a completed (Murphy's Theorem Ghost Mirror).]

The only thing they knew about the prop was that staring into the mirror for a long time would cause something terrifying to appear in the reflection. The less you wanted to see something, the more likely you were to see it.

Bai Liu examined the prop description and then glanced at his points for a while. Satisfied, he closed the system panel and turned to Muke.

“Let’s quit the game for now.”

“You don’t need to follow me. I have some things to handle,” Bai Liu said, waving his hand. “You’ve worked hard. Go home and rest.”

“Oh, and Muke, remember to compile the information on those investors and send it to me.”

Muke was stunned but quickly responded, “You’re looking into your friend’s case, right? I’ll get a professional to send it anonymously and directly to the relevant authorities so it won’t be traced.”

Bai Liu turned back and smiled at him. “Thank you for helping my friend, Muke.”

Before Muke could respond, Bai Liu disappeared in a flash of data chains.

Bai Liu opened his eyes in his rented room. He got up, felt under his pillow for his phone. It was an old, cracked phone, but it still worked. He checked the time—almost 10 am. He’d entered the game nearly yesterday morning, and it seemed that the flow of time in the game matches that of the real world, about a day each time.

However, in the game lobby, each small TV has its own time and spatial latitude.

The flow of time inside each viewing area is synchronized with the game world's time for that area, and viewers can't spill over into other spaces.

This, combined with the magical inability to attack others in the game lobby, made Bai Liu realize something—he had attacked Mu Sicheng with his Siren fishbone whip, which could cut through time and space.

Bai Liu deduced that the game lobby was a distorted area where multiple temporal and spatial latitudes overlapped.

It's unreasonable for people to exist in this area in their normal forms, but somehow, they do. The fact that so many players can exist at the same time in such an overlapping space—one that is surprisingly vast—indicates an energy beyond human comprehension.

With that in mind, Bai Liu glanced down at the cross hanging around his neck.

As expected, the godly NPC's Monster Book prop always follows him out, and it claimed to be a god.

It would make sense if it were the elusive power of gods, which humans can never truly understand, only deceive or exploit.

[You are my only believer]—that's what the creature whispered to him.

The unemployed devotee fiddled with the reverse cross on his pendant, feeling the chipped fish scales, now gray and white, that had been damaged by Miao Feichi's twin swords, hanging absently from his neck.

"I don't know if I can fix this fish scale..." Bai Liu muttered as he touched the surface of it.

He dressed and headed straight out the door to the hospital where the children were being treated.

On the television in the hospital corridor, the morning news played.

This morning, a horrific stabbing incident occurred in a civic building in our city. The perpetrator, Miao, aged 49, used a kitchen knife to sever the ten fingers of his 28-year-old son, Little Miao, forcing him to eat...

“When the police arrived, Little Miao had unfortunately died from blood loss, and Miao also committed suicide after a confrontation with the police, slitting his throat while shouting a male name. The male had no known connection to Miao, and considering Miao’s mental state, it’s believed that the name was randomly shouted…”

“...The police have confirmed that this was a tragedy caused by Miao’s deteriorating mental condition. In recent years, the number of suicides and crimes committed by mentally ill individuals has risen. Not long ago, a girl from a high school was murdered by a mentally ill inmate in prison…”

“Has the increasing number of crimes related to mental disorders become a major social problem? Are the free community counseling services effective in addressing these issues, and should stronger measures be taken to control individuals with criminal tendencies due to mental illness?”

Reality

Bai Liu watched the TV for a while, and Lu Yizhan followed him. When he saw that the program was talking about community psychologists, he casually asked, "I recommended you see that community psychologist before. Have you been going regularly?"

Lu Yizhan was probably the most concerned person about Bai Liu's mental health, fearing that Bai Liu might have a sudden lapse of judgment and make a rash decision to chase after fortune.

"After two visits, I think I've almost driven that shrink crazy, so I'm doing a good deed and not going anymore," Bai Liu replied, withdrawing his gaze from the TV to look at Lu Yizhan. Lu Yizhan raised an eyebrow. "I think you should see a psychiatrist too, with the way you look right now."

Lu Yizhan, with his hair pulled back, frowned. His eyes were bruised and bloodshot, his body reeked of cigarettes, his clothes were crumpled and covered in soot. He hadn't been home all night and was here, his eyes red and agitated, clearly overwhelmed.

Lu Yizhan let out a bitter laugh at Bai Liu's jibe. "What are you doing here?"

Bai Liu wasn't the type to get involved in others' business, and his visit to the hospital was only because Lu Yizhan had a habit of being so short-spoken.

But it was far from Bai Liu's usual style to visit someone so proactively.

"I came to see when you're ready to smoke yourself to death," Bai Liu remarked, glancing at the mountain of cigarette butts in the top lid of the trash can Lu Yizhan was holding. "What, you're not saving up to marry your sister anymore, spending all that money on cigarettes?"

Lu Yizhan raised the cigarette butt and shook it before exhaling slowly. "Cheap smokes. Don't tell Sister Dian. I'm really on edge. Some kids had another accident last night."

Bai Liu casually asked, "Oh, what happened?"

Lu Yizhan fell silent for a moment and took a sharp drag from his cigarette. "The five kids who had managed to survive in the orphanage started fainting one by one last night for some reason and had to be rushed to the hospital."

"They checked all their indicators, and it's severe anemia. They had just been checked two days ago, and their anemia wasn't serious at all. But early this morning, these kids started going into a sort of coma, with shock and even spasms. The doctors think it might be due to excessive blood loss, but the kids are stable in the hospital now, and the doctors can't figure out where the blood loss is coming from."

"What about Liu Jiayi?" Bai Liu asked casually, his tone indifferent.

Lu Yizhan's frown deepened. "This child is strange too. She suddenly slipped out yesterday morning after her brother, and we only found her this morning. We had the doctor give her some blood and are sending her for tests now."

"She looks even paler than yesterday, much like the kids who had the accident last night. She probably has very severe anemia too."

"Some police officers wanted to question her because the timing of her escape was suspicious, but she's in really bad shape, so it's better to have a doctor look at her first."

Once Lu Yizhan started talking, he couldn't stop, as if he had been holding everything in all night but didn't have anyone to talk to. With Bai Liu there, he vented his frustrations.

He sighed deeply. "It's not just that. This whole orphanage situation doesn't feel right. I still think there's a connection with those investors."

Lu Yizhan rubbed his forehead in frustration, as though he could poke a hole in his own head to solve the case. "I asked around, and the colleagues investigating the case seem to think the same. They've sent the whole department to investigate, but it's still too hard to find any clues. The missing children from the orphanage all ran off on their own, and no one knows where they went. Plus, the investors have a special status, so it's unlikely we'll be able to investigate without solid evidence."

Bai Liu nodded, signaling he had heard, but then asked, "Can I see these children?"

Lu Yizhan paused, thinking for a moment, then nodded. "Yes, I can vouch for you. A lot of good-hearted people interested in adopting have been coming to see the children, so you should be able to look at them."

"The other kids are fine, but Liu Jiayi's situation is more complicated. After we held her down and forced the doctor to draw blood, she kept hiding under the bed and wouldn't come out. She started screaming and overreacting when we went in."

Lu Yizhan led Bai Liu to see the children.

These pale, blood-deprived children lay weakly in their beds. Their body temperatures were low, their hearts beat slowly, and it seemed like the line between life and death blurred in their fragile bodies.

The blood-hungry desires of the adults greedily sucked the fresh blood from these children, who were at the peak of their blood production but still couldn't keep up with the adults' ravenous consumption.

"They still haven't figured out what's wrong with them," Lu Yizhan said, unable to bear looking at the children. His eyes welled up as he glanced at them. "They've suffered so much... they're so young."

Bai Liu gently traced his fingers over the dry skin of one child's mouth, his voice soft and distant. "Don't be sad. It'll get better."

[System prompt: Does player Bai Liu want to use the prop (Blood Lingzhi) to heal the subject in the hospital bed?]

[Warm tip: There is only one Blood Lingzhi plant. Adults can use it three times, children six times. This prop has specific doses and usage limits. Player Bai Liu, are you sure you want to use this prop?]

Bai Liu: [OK]

[System warning: This prop is not a core desire prop for player Bai Liu and cannot be used directly in reality... zzz... zzz... Abnormal data intrusion...]

Bai Liu felt a burning sensation in his chest, and his coin seemed to overheat.

[...Unable to clear abnormal data... Prop (Blood Lingzhi) activated...]

The child's throat rumbled oddly, as if something had been swallowed subconsciously, his face flushed and he slowly regained consciousness, opening his eyes with difficulty.

Bai Liu's emotionless face appeared before him.

The boy's breathing was weak, his chest rising and falling gently as he stared at Bai Liu, his vision blurred. A warm, inexplicable feeling rose in his stomach as he licked his lips, tasting a rich, mushroom-like flavor, one that was both sweet and evil, not at all like human blood.

It was the smell of salvation.

"Let's go, next," Bai Liu said as he pulled Lu Yizhan, who had yet to notice the child's strange awakening, out of the room, shutting the door behind him.

The child, now alone, felt a strange sense of regret and sadness as he reached out his thin fingers toward the departing figure.

Just as Bai Liu was about to leave, his head poked back through the door. "O little one, I remember your name. And remember, it was Uncle who saved you."

"Uncle Bai Liu. Remember to pay me back for your medical bills when you grow up. For now, you're too young to pay, but I've got a note on your bedside."

The boy stared in awe as Bai Liu closed the door. Then, unexpectedly, he felt a light urge to laugh.

So he laughed—weakly, but happily.

Lu Yizhan's voice came from outside, questioning, "What did you just poke your head back in to see?"

"...Nothing. I thought I'd forgotten my phone..." Bai Liu replied nonchalantly.

After visiting five wards, Bai Liu finally reached Liu Jiayi's room.

Lu Yizhan, looking confused, asked, "Why are you suddenly so kind today, visiting sick children?"

"Looking for clues. Didn't you ask me to investigate for you?" Bai Liu responded casually, not missing a beat.

Lu Yizhan was deeply puzzled. He'd seen these children many times before—was there a clue he had missed?

Before Lu Yizhan could contemplate further, Bai Liu had already opened the door to Liu Jiayi's room.

The girl's shrill screams were so loud they could have toppled the roof, and the police officer guarding the room grimaced, covering his ears and gesturing for Bai Liu to close the door quickly.

But Bai Liu was unfazed. "Liu Jiayi, I'm Bai Liu. Let's talk."

The girl's screams stopped abruptly.

Both the officer and Lu Yizhan looked at Bai Liu in disbelief.

Bai Liu had managed to enter Liu Jiayi's room, thanks to the suspicious gaze of the guards and Lu Yizhan's vigorous vouching, along with the condition that surveillance was on and Bai Liu had a tape recorder with him.

In less than a minute after Bai Liu entered, a police officer came over holding a phone, his expression grim. "Liu Jiayi's brother, Liu Huai, is dead. We were just informed by the traffic department that there was an accident this morning. It seems like it was an accident. What should we do now?"

Lu Yizhan, with a complicated expression, turned on the loudspeaker connected to the recorder, and Bai Liu's voice came through clearly: "Liu Jiayi, can we talk?"

After a long pause, a hoarse, dry voice came from the speaker, "What do you want to talk about?"

The policeman holding the phone looked at the recorder in confusion. "Who's that? Why is Liu Jiayi suddenly willing to talk?"

"My one... no, he should be considered one of Liu Huai's... webmasters," Lu Yizhan said, his expression growing even more complicated.

Though he had no idea how Bai Liu had become acquainted with Liu Huai, he was clearly involved in this situation.

Inside the ward, Liu Jiayi crawled out from under the bed and curled up in a corner. Her head was still buried in her knees, a defensive posture indicating insecurity. Her bare skin and fingers were disturbingly pale, with no visible signs of bruising or veins.

It was clear Liu Jiayi had also suffered blood loss, something Bai Liu had already guessed. The antidote [Blood Lingzhi] could only be obtained by collecting the page "Love Welfare Institution - Plant Patients," but Liu Jiayi had spent most of her time at the welfare institution, so she never had the chance to collect this page.

"What do you want to talk to me about?" Liu Jiayi asked hoarsely, her head still lowered.

Bai Liu, always direct, replied, "You know Liu Huai is dead, right?"

Liu Jiayi's whole body trembled as she shrank into herself, almost disappearing into a small, unnoticed shape on the quilt. Her breath hitched in her throat.

She had run out this morning to find Liu Huai, but she hadn't been able to prevent his death in time.

"I have his soul," Bai Liu continued calmly, "or rather, part of it is with me, and part of it is with the system. If you want to resurrect him, you need his soul. But I won't give it to you for free. You'll need to exchange something for it."

Liu Jiayi was silent for a moment before asking, "What do you want?"

Bai Liu eyed her carefully. "You should know what I want. I want your soul. I need you to accompany me to the league this year. If you win, you can use the points, your brother's, to make a wish and get out of the game. I also promised Liu Huai I would take you out of the game. This is how I will do it."

Liu Jiayi slowly lifted her head. Her gray eyes, swollen and red from crying, locked onto Bai Liu.

"You're ambitious," she said, her voice filled with bitterness. "If I want to win the league, why not just join the King's Guild? They have a much better chance of winning. Even if you take my brother's soul, as long as I win, I can use my wish to take his soul from you, and the system will do whatever I ask."

"Does that include being siblings with Liu Huai forever, without any hard feelings?" Bai Liu asked in a calm tone. "I thought you'd had enough of the system—a thing full of lies."

Liu Jiayi clenched her fists, remembering Hearts' flirtatious smile and the [Psyche's Tears] prop from the system.

The god-level prop was the highest in the game, yet it hadn't granted her wish.

"You can make a deal with me," Bai Liu said, meeting her gaze. "I can tell you everything about my abilities. I can't break a deal, and my soul would be imprisoned if I did. At least you can trust me to keep my word."

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips and asked softly, "If I agree to trade my soul, what will happen to me? Will I have to stay in the orphanage? Will I need to disappear one day a week to enter the game? Or maybe you'll send me back to the countryside—that might be easier."

"I don't think this orphanage will last much longer," Bai Liu said, though he didn't mention that Muke was already gathering evidence to report it anonymously. "I can't let you return to your real father's village either, but I do have a friend who wants to adopt you."

Liu Jiayi, as though she had already expected this, asked, "Was it the policeman who's been guarding me?"

Bai Liu nodded. "Yes."

Liu Jiayi hugged her knees again, turning her head to look out the window. It faced the street, where the sounds of vendors filled the air, the warm morning breeze blowing in. The sight of the vendors hawking their goods made her seem so out of place.

"Red bean cakes, sweet and savory, three for ten dollars!"

"Bean curd brains, five dollars a bowl!"

"Beef noodles..."

"This morning, that policeman bought me red bean cakes," Liu Jiayi said abruptly. "Because I had my blood drawn, and he saw from the CCTV that I kept looking out the window. I guess he thought I wanted something sweet, so he went out and bought them for me."

Bai Liu noticed a paper bag of red bean cakes on the bedside table, cold but unopened.

"He's the first nice person I've met," Liu Jiayi said slowly, her tone oddly calm. "So, a person like me—don't go ruining him."

"I'm a gamer," she continued softly, "and being around me could pull him into the game. So forget it, Bai Liu."

She looked away from the window again.

The sweet scent of red bean cakes and the warm breeze brushed Liu Jiayi's cold forehead. The sunlight bathed her pale face in a dull yellow outline as she closed her eyes, lost in thought.

She didn't deserve kindness, let alone something as pure as Lu Yizhan's.

There were so few people in this world willing to spend ten dollars just to be nice to her. Even if she was cheap, there was no reason to ruin the one good thing left.

"It's a possibility," Bai Liu said objectively, "but considering my friend's particular nature, it's unlikely that your influence has pulled him into the game."

"After all, even I can't do that. For him, adopting a child is a subjective choice. He likes you so much that he was already preparing for your arrival before you even asked. I think he was prepared for whatever would come after."

"Are you sure you want to say no to him, Liu Jiayi?"

"Lu Yizhan will be the best dad in the world," Bai Liu said confidently. "If you want, he'll run five kilometers every day just to buy you red bean cakes, send you to the best school for the disabled, stay up late making rag dolls—he'll do anything for you."

Liu Jiayi opened her mouth, about to scoff at the idea that someone could be so foolish, but the words caught in her throat. She choked out, "No more."

"Bai Liu!" Lu Yizhan burst into the room, his face flushed with anger. "What are you saying to that little girl?!"

He stormed in, his voice rising with frustration as he interrupted Bai Liu, whose statement about Lu Yizhan being the best father had clearly shaken him.

Lu Yizhan scratched his cheek in embarrassment and moved toward Bai Liu, trying to drag him out. "What's wrong with you? Talking about her brother, then trying to lobby for me? Are you human? Look at what you've done—you've made her cry! I came here to check something, and now you're causing this mess! I'll send you away if you don't stop!"

Lu Yizhan glared at Bai Liu in exasperation.

But Liu Jiayi spoke softly, "Bai Liu? Are you leaving?"

Lu Yizhan's scalp tingled at the question. Liu Jiayi's hands reached out, grasping the air in a fragile gesture, her face showing no tears.

Bai Liu turned his head and shrugged at Lu Yizhan, mouthing, Seems like I can't leave yet.

Under Lu Yizhan's tense gaze, Bai Liu walked back and sat beside Liu Jiayi's bedside. She gently pulled at the corner of his coat, as though she was attached to him.

"Lu Yizhan, can you buy me three red bean cakes and bring them up?" Bai Liu said naturally. "I haven't had breakfast either."

Lu Yizhan, defeated, just sighed. "..."

Lu Yizhan held his breath and raised his hand to wave at Bai Liu twice, verbally scolding him for being so shameless. "You'll see, Bai Liu!"

"Bai Liu never liked children when he was younger, so why is this little girl giving him such a good look...?" Lu Yizhan muttered as he closed the door and walked downstairs, seemingly ready to go buy red bean cakes for Bai Liu. "...The old man still eats red bean cakes."

When Lu Yizhan closed the door, Bai Liu looked at Liu Jiayi. "Are you sure you don't want to be adopted by Lu Yizhan?"

Liu Jiayi pursed her lips and gently shook her head. "No, I can follow you in the game, but there's no need to be adopted in reality. I can just pretend to go back to my real father's village as a cover. No one there will notice if I'm dead or alive. Then I can stay in the game. I can afford to pay the points for staying in the game indefinitely."

"That's a waste of points. Are you sure you want to stay in the game with me?" Bai Liu asked again. "Lu Yizhan is a rare good guy among seven billion people. You won't meet someone like him again if you miss out. I'm genuinely trying to sell you on my friend because he really likes you. Otherwise, I wouldn't have saved you in the game."

Liu Jiayi was silent for a moment, then slowly shook her head with a soft, self-deprecating smile. "I'll just thank him for the three red bean cakes. I won't harm him anymore."

Bai Liu leaned forward as he sat on the stool next to Liu Jiayi's bed. "Lu Yizhan and I are completely different types. He's the kind of person who gives you something without expecting anything in return, but I'll remember even if I buy you a red bean cake until you give it back to me."

"If you agree to trade your soul with me, I will drain you of your value to the last moment. Of course, I'll pay you accordingly. Do you want to, Liu Jiayi?"

Liu Jiayi met Bai Liu's gaze for a moment before suddenly pointing to the door. "Now go downstairs and buy me red bean cakes."

Lu Yizhan came back upstairs with three red bean cakes, but he had been delayed by a phone call from his sister downstairs, so the cakes were already a bit cold by the time he arrived.

He subconsciously swept his gaze over the red bean cake he had bought earlier, still sitting unopened on the bedside table.

"Jiayi, who bought this for you?" Lu Yizhan asked, stepping forward. "Other police officers?"

Liu Jiayi took a small bite from the edge of the red bean cake, the sweet, sticky bite sliding down her throat and warming her whole body.

There was a small piece of mushroom in the red bean cake with a hint of blood—it was a blood reishi.

It was a shame. She didn't like the taste of mushrooms in her red bean cake.

"Bai Liu bought them for me," Liu Jiayi mumbled, bowing her head and clutching the red bean cake.

Lu Yizhan was shocked. "And he would spend money on other people?!"

Liu Jiayi shook her head. "It's not free."

Lu Yizhan's expression faltered. "I knew it! Did he ask you for money, Jiayi? No, you don't even have any money..." Lu Yizhan was puzzled when he spotted a piece of paper on the bedside table. He picked it up, and his face instantly split in disbelief.

[IOU: Today, Liu Jiayi asked Bai Liu to buy one red bean cake for ten yuan, and three pieces in total. The goods should be three pieces for three yuan.]

[Liu Jiayi instructed Bai Liu to pay for the errand: 5 yuan. Liu Jiayi chose to use the rest of the red bean cake to cover the debt, so Liu Jiayi actually owes Bai Liu 5 yuan.]

"This bastard!!!" Lu Yizhan was really convinced. "A cake costs three yuan, and he charged you five yuan for the errand. He's good at business! What did you use to cover your debt with the red bean cake? Don't trust him! He's a jerk. He probably took more than three yuan from you! Tell the police uncle—he'll help you recover it later!"

Liu Jiayi finished the last bite of her red bean cake, clapped her hands, and, as if remembering something, turned her head to look out the window. She squinted her eyes and smiled innocently, like a little girl. "I paid off my debt with something worth one red bean cake. He didn't overcharge me."

Lu Yizhan became even more confused. "What was it?"

Liu Jiayi replied, not particularly concerned. "It's not very important, and it doesn't hold much value."

"No matter how worthless it is, don't trade with Bai Liu..." Lu Yizhan said, exasperated. "He's so treacherous. He'll trade everything with people; he's so calculating."

"Is that so bad?" Liu Jiayi looked up at Lu Yizhan, her tone naive and almost ethereal. "Is it bad that I can get everything I want through trade, that he will never betray me, and that he'll never give me anything, good or bad, for no reason?"

She couldn't trust anyone else, so she simply didn't trust.

Bai Liu was the best choice for her because Bai Liu understood her, her lowliness, her evil, everything about her that wasn't like a child and wasn't like a normal human being.

She would never have to worry about hurting Bai Liu, nor would she have to worry about Bai Liu hurting her. Their relationship was like a bank transaction, always calculated so clearly and reasonably that there would be no betrayal or suspicion.

Lu Yizhan looked at Liu Jiayi in stunned silence, but it wasn't long before someone came to call him.

"Yizhan, the other five children are awake!"

Lu Yizhan's eyes lit up, and he put down the red bean cakes he had bought for Bai Liu before rushing to see them.

Bai Liu took a bite of his red bean cake as he looked at an extra Liu Jiayi soul note in his old wallet. He took a big bite with his left hand, then frowned. "It's too sweet, and this goes for three yuan? I should have just bought one."

Bai Liu wrapped the red bean cakes, clipped his phone from his pocket, and scanned the screen—it was from Lu Yizhan.

"Where are you? I've bought you some food, so come eat it!" Lu Yizhan sounded excited. "I'm telling you, those five kids are awake! The doctor says they're doing better! If you need anything, you can ask now!"

"No, I've sorted it out," Bai Liu said slowly. "You should be able to sort it out right away too."

Lu Yizhan was shocked. "When did you sort it out? What do you mean, we sort this out right away?!"

Bai Liu looked back at the hospital with his phone in the air and, instead of answering Lu Yizhan's question directly, he lamented absentmindedly, "Lu Yizhan, I find that at fourteen years old, I really ate your shit up."

"Luckily, I'm more than fourteen now. I don't eat your shit anymore." Bai Liu took another bite of his red bean cake, wrinkled his nose, and swallowed. "Remember to buy me another meal when things are sorted out, or I'll be a bit short—I'm running out of phone bills. Hang up."

"?!?!!?" Lu Yizhan was confused. "I thought we were talking about a case. Why are we talking about... Hey!!! You're really dead! Bai Liu! Bai Liu!!!"

Lu Yizhan cursed and charged Bai Liu's mobile number, which was said to be in arrears. As soon as he did, he turned to see the police officer guarding Liu Jiayi with him, looking up in a trance.

"Yizhan, someone has posted our case on the internet..."

"?!?" Lu Yizhan opened his phone in disbelief. "There's no card over at Cyber Security? I thought the status of this case said they weren't allowed to post it?"

The police officer shook his head, slightly delirious. "It's not about the case circumstances, it's about the clues to the case. Someone compiled what happened to these kids back then, along with the medical records of those investors. It's now trending..."

Lu Yizhan: "?!?"

Reality

"I had my dad hire someone to handle it— a professional, with an overseas address. It shouldn't be that easy to trace, and my dad mentioned there are ways to track it down," Muke told Bai Liu on the phone, coughing awkwardly. "There's a business rivalry between my dad and someone here, so he left out some of the less credible details, like the blood ganoderma part, and vaguely hinted at the fact that these investors were experimenting on children to cure them. You don't mind if it gets bigger, do you?"

Bai Liu used the computer to search for the following trending topics.

"I don't mind," Bai Liu replied, leaning back in his sofa chair. "I'm the type who doesn't care much about the process, as long as it gets results. But they're probably spending a lot of money trying to hype it up now, aren't they?"

"Yeah, but it's not going to be easy to get them to pull back. We're also pouring money into the hot seat, so it shouldn't be easy for them to back down until the police get involved," Muke said.

"Please, Muke," Bai Liu said. "Rest up and get back in shape. Get into the game at midnight; I've got some business to take care of this afternoon."

Muke snorted. "Okay, Bai Liu."

At 3 pm, Bai Liu brought a couple back to the hospital.

Across from Liu Jiayi sat a couple, nervously rubbing their knees, looking expectantly and incredulously at the little girl sitting on the bed. Soon, their eyes moistened with disbelief as they looked at Bai Liu standing by and asked in a trembling voice, "Bai Liu, can we really adopt her?"

"... Are we eligible to adopt her?"

Bai Liu leaned against the door and gave Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua a breezy glance. "You are eligible for adoption."

The couple's tragic loss of their only daughter, their solid reputation, and their love for children, combined with their age and the fact that they didn't want any more children, made them ideal candidates for adoption. In fact, Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua were among the best types of adoptive families—far superior to someone like Lu Yizhan, a small-town policeman with limited means.

For the children in the orphanage, Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua were a dream adoptive family—this was their best chance.

Liu Jiayi was also aware of this. She propped herself up on the railing of her hospital bed and spoke in a guarded tone. "Bai Liu, I said I can stay alone. It's completely unnecessary for you to find me an adoptive family like this. I won't be grateful to you, and I don't want to keep acting or pretending in front of them. You have to understand, I'm a gamer. They might stay with me and say..."

"They're gamers too." Bai Liu interrupted Liu Jiayi with a nonchalant remark.

Liu Jiayi went quiet, a look of surprise crossing her face.

Bai Liu drew a bench and sat down, cutting off whatever Liu Jiayi was about to say. "They know you're a little witch. I made them buy and watch all your game videos, so they know what kind of kid you are. You don't have to pretend in front of them. Just go into the game and do what you need to do."

"I sold you on Lu Yizhan before, partly because he liked you so much, and partly because your brother really wanted Lu Yizhan to adopt you. He thought Lu Yizhan was a good man who could give you a perfect family." Bai Liu raised his eyes to Liu Jiayi. "But if you don't want that, I'll arrange something else so you can move around more freely without worrying about the aftermath."

Both Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu were still a little nervous.

Xiang Chunhua, rubbing her thighs, looked at the blind little girl. "My family had a child before, but... something happened to me and Mr. Liu. It's true we're not very well-off, not in the game, not outside the game. Otherwise, we wouldn't have let Guoguo..."

She paused and lowered her head to wipe her eyes with her palms. "Jiayi, I know you're a great little girl, and we can't do much for you.

But Bai Liu said you need a place to stay outside the game that's legal and sensible. You're a kid, and there's no good place for Fang Ke to go."

"We can still help with that." Liu Fu took over from Xiang Chunhua, leaning forward nervously, his words hesitant. "This adoption is just a stopgap measure. If you don't like us or don't want us as your nominal parents, you can dissolve the relationship when the game is over."

"If you need anything, you can always talk to us. We'll do our best to help. Do you think that's okay?"

Xiang Chunhua added, "Look how skinny you are. Stay with us, and at least you can have a hot meal when you come out of the game."

"I make great soup too," Liu Fu said, embarrassed.

It was clear that these two middle-aged people, almost a hundred years old combined, were speaking to an eight-year-old girl in a careful, consultative tone, afraid of scaring her away. They felt as though they had nothing to offer and couldn't keep her.

Liu Jiayi sat on the edge of the bed, her head bowed. She sat motionless, her thin fingers slowly gripping the covers, her toes curled in the air.

"Games, shelter, help with cover, a safe place to rest and rejuvenate—all of that is here. They're my people. I promise not to harm you and will help look after you. After all, you're underage, and there are many things that will be easier with two adults to guide you. Do you have any other questions?" Bai Liu asked. "Just ask, and I can figure everything out for you."

All the problems Bai Liu spoke about had always been ones Liu Jiayi solved on her own. She had gotten used to hiding, solving everything herself, with no one ever offering to help her.

Finally, Liu Jiayi looked up, her eyes red, but her tone cold. "Yes. How am I going to repay you for all this?"

Xiang Chunhua was confused. "Repay? What for?"

"For shelter, hot meals, the soup you made, all that." Liu Jiayi thought it was only right to repay what was owed. "How do you want me to repay you? Money? Points?"

Xiang Chunhua's eyes reddened, and she was about to protest when Bai Liu spoke up. "I'll have them list the money they spend on you each day in a bill and settle it when you get out of the game. Any other questions?"

Liu Jiayi slowly shook her head, still feeling like she owed something.

But for a moment, she didn't know what to repay or how.

Xiang Chunhua gazed at Liu Jiayi with affection, wanting to embrace her. After hesitating for a long time, the middle-aged woman, her face full of weariness, gently touched Liu Jiayi's face. Her tone choked with sobs. "How can you be so young? When Guoguo was eight, she would have been twice as big as you..."

Liu Fu's eyes were red, his voice hoarse. "Take care of her well, feed her lots of roast meat and bone broth, and she'll grow up fast."

"Eat as much as Guoguo did, and she'll grow into a big girl before you know it."

Liu Jiayi seemed unsure of what to say and remained silent.

Bai Liu looked at her. "I'll find you the best place to live. Don't think so much. Do what you need to do. I'll be in the game tonight. You can follow me if you want. It's okay if you don't want to. After Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua adopt you, it'll be easier for you. You won't have to keep hiding from everything like you did before."

There was a long silence before Liu Jiayi whispered, "Hmm," indicating that she understood.

---------- --

When Bai Liu walked out of the hospital, Liu Fu shook his arm, unsure of what to say. When Bai Liu looked over, he saw Xiang Chunhua and Liu Fu both looking at him with tears in their eyes.

"Thanks, Bai Liu. Really, thanks," Liu Fu said, blowing his nose. He didn't know how to express his gratitude, so he got straight to the point. "We're going into the game tonight, right? We're going in too, right?"

They were prepared to die and had never expected to have a little girl as their daughter before their death. It wasn't that they hadn't thought about suicide in their darkest moments, but once they entered the game, they became cautious, careful not to influence others.

"Yeah, you're going in too. I'll have Mu Sicheng continue to take care of you, probably for the second-level game. Is that okay with you?" Bai Liu asked.

Liu Fu and Xiang Chunhua nodded decisively. "No problem."

.....

After taking care of Liu Jiayi's affairs, Bai Liu returned to his small rented house.

Seeing that it was still early, Bai Liu, mentally exhausted and ready to rest before moving on to the next game, set his alarm, put on his pajamas, and lay down on his bed, closing his eyes.

Bai Liu was always a good sleeper and rarely dreamed.

But this time, perhaps due to being too drained or too tired, Bai Liu had a strange dream. He felt his body covered in white frost starting from his fingertips, freezing him irresistibly. A cold body appeared on him, pressing down on his heart.

It was this ghost, quite good-looking.

Tawil propped himself up beside him and looked down at Bai Liu, his pale pupils devoid of human emotion. "Your doom is coming."

Bai Liu could feel Tawil's small arm propped up against his ear, a cool sensation.

Half asleep, Bai Liu looked up at Tawil, tempted to say that he never seemed to have any luck, but was used to bad luck.

However, his voice felt stuck, as though it were glued to something, and he couldn't speak clearly. Instead, all that came out were strange, sticky short sounds that went with the position. Bai Liu stopped trying to speak gracefully and merely gestured with his eyes for Tawil to continue.

Tawil leaned over Bai Liu's neck, picked up the cross hanging from his chest with his fingers, kissed it with his head, and then placed it on Bai Liu's forehead, gently tapping it with his index finger.

"At a quarter to nine on the wall clock, the avenger from a timeline other than this one will come upon you with a death destined for you, so that God will manifest Himself and reveal Himself to you here, to bless you and shelter you."

Tawil looked down at Bai Liu, who was frowning and struggling in his nightmare, his tone carrying a sense of indifference and solemnity, as if he were a god.

He continued, "Remember, my evil devotee, to dodge the bullet of the hunter's suicide, and don't feast your eyes on desire with your right side—the only and irreversible time in you, until real death comes."

Tawil placed his hand over Bai Liu's eyes as he bowed his head and kissed the reverse cross on Bai Liu's forehead, then said in a voice as cold and holy as the cross, "The key to everything lies in the hand of the witch. The poison or the antidote is the key to your choice."

"The gods live forever; the soul lives on."

Tawil placed the cross back in Bai Liu's shirt and gazed at him, his pupils reflecting a pale pink rose whose branches were gradually spreading and blooming. "Beware of the rose."

As soon as the words left his mouth, Tawil turned into a pile of luscious rose petals, scattering them over Bai Liu's body. A pungent rose fragrance filled the air, making Bai Liu uncomfortable. The petals quickly turned into light pink smoke that hovered obsessively over Bai Liu's blanket, before falling under the bed like burning ashes, swept away by the wind until they vanished.

Bai Liu's eyes snapped open.

What roses? What petals? What Tawil? He was lying on an old bed, with springs poking out at the foot of the bed in his low-rent house, less than three meters high. Sitting up, Bai Liu pulled the cross from his neck.

The crucifix he kept close was strangely cold to the touch. Bai Liu held it to his nose and sniffed it.

A rose scent, one that made him uncomfortable, lingered on the crucifix.

"Doom and death are about to befall me..." Bai Liu rubbed the cross and narrowed his eyes. "...Be careful of the hunter and the rose."

Tawil is a god, and the status he had acquired through the cross had marked him as [a believer in Tawil]. The suggestive messages Tawil had just given him were, in colloquial terms, [oracles].

The [oracles] from ancient times to the present seem plausible but imprecise, including the one Tawil had just delivered. Many things were ambiguous.

If Bai Liu were to use his previous worldview to interpret these ambiguous [oracles], he would say that because God doesn't exist, these [oracles] are fabricated by the believing deities themselves, and must be vague in order to offer greater tolerance for foreseeing what is happening.

But this time, Tawil's [oracle] gave him a very familiar feeling.

"It's kind of like what I say after I've been shielded, because there are things I can't say outright that will be blocked, and I have to beat around the bush to convey the same message in other words..." Bai Liu pondered. "So it's quite possible that Tawil is also being blocked by a higher being and can't directly tell me what to avoid, but has to imply it in such a subtle way that I should be careful and alert."

The witch is a good guess, referring to Liu Jiayi.

But what do the rose and the hunter imply?

Bai Liu squinted as he held the rose-scented cross and glanced at the time on the battered wall clock.

It was exactly a quarter past nine.

Bai Liu heard footsteps coming one after another from the walkway in front of his house. The soundproofing in this rented house was poor, so Bai Liu could clearly hear the footsteps from outside—normal but regular, all going straight through the door and up the stairs, like regular residents of the building.

But when the fourth set of footsteps reappeared with great regularity, Bai Liu relaxed his breathing, got out of bed, put on his clothes and shoes, and opened the window to look outside. He quickly assessed his chances of surviving a jump from the fifth floor, then decided against it.

The building he lived in was a low-rent building from top to bottom. Bai Liu lived on the fifth floor, and there were only four other tenants on his floor. This meant these weren't normal tenants, and the trained footsteps were familiar to Bai Liu. He had only heard them from one person before—

—Lu Yizhan.

The footsteps finally stopped in front of Bai Liu's door, which was violently kicked open. A group of men shouted at him, guns flat in their hands. "Police! Don't move! Put your hands up!"

Bai Liu quickly looked down, removed the coin from his neck, put it in his mouth, and pressed it under his tongue.

The night breeze came through the window as Bai Liu slowly turned and raised his hands unsteadily.

The wind whipped his hair across his forehead, and although Bai Liu did nothing, there was a sense of calmness, as if he anticipated his arrest. He obediently allowed the officers to twist his arms behind his back and tie him up without asking questions or showing fear.

Although Bai Liu hadn't yet figured out why he had been arrested, the officers were clearly terrified of him. The officers who had broken into his room at a quarter to nine were heavily armed, wearing leather gloves and protective clothing. Bai Liu visually estimated that they carried shields, maybe 2 to 3 cm thick, made from some strong metal.

Their gear made the officers look like bomb disposal experts preparing to defuse an explosive device.

And Bai Liu, who had no idea when he had become as dangerous as a bomb, dozed off in the car on the way to the station.

The car Bai Liu was in was special, with a thick metal plate separating the front from the back. Only a small 15 cm by 15 cm window allowed Bai Liu to see a small policeman nervously gulping, pointing his gun at him as though afraid that the young man, bound and restrained, might suddenly break free.

The light from the streetlamp shone through the small window in front, casting a glow over the back of Bai Liu's car. On the wall, a red triangular symbol depicted an octopus writhing hideously, with its tentacles. Next to it was a sketch of a small man with limbs scattered and bleeding, and a large red cross above the octopus.

Under the logo, the words read:

[This is an unknown supernaturally dangerous object that has a tendency to harm people! Please stay alert and keep your distance!]

A strip of light flashed across Bai Liu's emotionless face, scaring the policeman watching him from the small window. The policeman driving was startled by the movement. "What's wrong?! Has it mutated?"

The small policeman sobbed, "It! It's breathing!"

"Calm down!" The officer driving took two deep breaths. "It's the first humanoid heretic monster our precinct has captured. It's normal for it to breathe. Don't be alarmed."

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

Bai Liu's tongue moved in his mouth, the cold coin moving slowly under the thin mucous membrane at the base of his tongue, and with an inexplicable emotion in his eyes, he looked calmly out of the small window at the policeman who was guarding him with fearful eyes.

The lorry with its heavy metal tailgate sped across the deserted road at night, followed by several other cars, towards a huge, domed, stadium-sized white building in the middle of the moor.

The interior of the domed building is smooth and silvery white, a shiny metal that reflects light, cast in tightly knitted patterns, each side resembling a mirror. A huge lamp hangs in the center like the sun, its cold white light blindingly reflecting off the walls and coming from all directions. Everyone who enters wears dark goggles to shield their eyes.

The men who had arrested Bai Liu in the name of the police had expertly put on their goggles before entering the building, but Bai Liu, shackled with metal chains, had no goggles to wear.

It only takes a second or two for the eye to lose its normal function in such high light levels without goggles, and only a few spots of light are visible.

Bai Liu had hoped to take a quick look at the interior of this peculiar building to help plan his escape later, but the intense light and the building's design were clearly meant to prevent anyone from memorizing the layout.

In this light, the human eye cannot see anything at all, let alone remember the route.

Bai Liu quickly gave up on the idea, closing his eyes with a resigned smile as he was pulled along by the others.

The men eventually placed Bai Liu in a small, gray metal room, roughly square in shape, not very high. There was a table, two benches, a bright lamp on the table, and a small window in the wall, the same size as the one Bai Liu had seen in the car. He could hear voices from outside.

"Reporting to the 3rd Detachment Lieutenant! The squad has successfully captured the high-risk humanoid heretic with proposed code 006!"

"No one has gone mad on this mission! No one committed suicide under the heretic's influence! No one was physically maimed by the heretic's attacks! Because Captain Tang has classified this heretic as a red high-risk heretic monster, capturing him required 5 modified armored vehicles, 17-barrel guns, a straight gun barrel, 33 members of Team 3, and no personnel or weapons were expended. The mission was successfully completed!"

A gentle male voice replied, "Thank you, team. I will interrogate this captured humanoid heretic myself."

The voice of the reporter sounded anxious, "Captain Su, what's the rush? You should go with Captain Tang! He's more resistant, and it was his idea to capture this heretic by force tonight. It's too dangerous for you to face this unknown heretic alone."

"Where is Captain Tang?"

The gentle voice grew slightly colder, and the man addressed as Captain Su sighed with a touch of disappointment, "After pushing us to capture the heretic tonight, he went back to drinking and is now drunk somewhere. His phone isn't working, and people are looking for him."

"Captain Tang went and drank again?!" The team member's voice was full of disbelief. "How can he do that?! He used his captain's authority to force us to arrest this heretic without fully investigating the situation tonight! Didn't Captain Tang say he was going to handle it himself? Why is he getting drunk again?!"

"This isn’t the first time he’s gone overboard, sending a detachment to catch a monster in some strange place," Captain Su laughed bitterly. "He sees anyone as a monster when he's drunk, but this time he gave very specific and exact information about this humanoid heretic called Bai Liu. I thought he had genuinely investigated, but now... maybe the person is just an ordinary citizen."

"Let me go in first and see what's going on."

With that, the metal door to Bai Liu's small room was pushed open.

The visitor was a man in his thirties, wearing a police uniform, a protective mask, and brown leather gloves. He had a gentle, modest face, stood over 5'8", and had soft amber-colored eyes. His hair had been unkempt for a while, hanging halfway down the sides of his face, and his eyes had a slight green-black tint from staying up too late. Despite this, he appeared clean and tidy, someone who managed to keep his life in order despite a demanding job. At first glance, he seemed affable—the kind of person people could easily let their guard down around.

Bai Liu's eyes fell on the identity tag clipped to his right breast pocket: [Su Yang, Deputy Head of the Third Detachment of the Dangerous Heresy Unit].

Su Yang gestured for Bai Liu to sit down. After Bai Liu complied, Su Yang noticed his gaze on the ID tag. He nodded at it and explained with a helpless smile, "You may not believe this, but we are indeed regular state department personnel."

Bai Liu raised his eyes, disinterested, and said nothing.

Su Yang’s expression grew more helpless. "As strange as it sounds, at a time when many ordinary people aren't aware of it, there have been many existences in this world that defy human scientific understanding—monsters, if you will. We call them heretics."

"Some heretics drive people to madness, others drain their blood, and to deal with these dangerous heretics, we created the Department of Heresy Disposal. The men who arrested you tonight are members of this department."

Bai Liu lifted his eyes. "What does that have to do with me? Do I look like a heretic?"

Su Yang didn’t answer directly. Instead, he pulled out a remote control from the table in front of Bai Liu, flicked it toward the wall, and a white screen slowly descended. A projector on the opposite side started displaying a PowerPoint.

[Dangerous Heresy Department Section]

Su Yang looked at Bai Liu. "Let me explain what I just said, and then I'll talk specifically about your situation. Our department has been around for a long time, but we still don't know where these heretics come from. They just appear, in all sorts of strange and terrifying forms—people, animals, objects."

Su Yang pressed the remote, and the slides switched.

He continued, "These heretics have the power to destroy us. Do you remember the Mirror City bombing?"

The PowerPoint displayed a photo of the antique mirror Bai Liu had seen in the 'Last Train to Burst.' Several people in uniforms, similar to Su Yang's, were examining the mirror with serious expressions.

Su Yang said, "This is the mirror from the Mirror City bombing. After the bombing, many people questioned how someone could bring a bomb onto the subway undetected. They said the mirror was too thick to hide a bomb, but our announcement was that the thieves had hidden the bomb inside the mirror. We were ridiculed for a month for suggesting such an absurd theory."

He pressed the remote again, and the image changed to show the same group of uniformed men pulling an immense black bomb from the mirror, their faces full of shock.

"But that's exactly what happened," Su Yang said. "The mirror shattered in the explosion, and we had to recover it from the underground station. After extensive testing, we discovered that the mirror was a fold in space, capable of storing objects much larger than itself. And what was stored inside was undetectable by any known rays or devices."

"Through further testing, we learned that the mirror not only stored objects but also had a mental materialization function. If someone stared at it for long enough, the mirror would change what it contained based on their deepest fears."

He continued, "The thieves had been staring at the mirror day and night, fearing it would break. Their collective fear materialized into the bomb, which eventually exploded on the train."

The screen switched again to a set of instructions:

[Heresy Name]: Murphy's Mirror of Theorem
[No.]: CEDT-0714
[Report]: Found in a mega-explosion. During recovery, it was discovered that the train had been trapped in a looping underground line an hour before it exploded. The loop was later confirmed to be the fear of the passengers, who couldn't leave the train as it was about to explode, their terror reflecting in the mirror fragments.
[Danger Class]: Light Grade Red

Su Yang chuckled. "After our experiments, the mirror no longer contained bombs. We had one experimenter, who really hated spicy food, stare at the mirror after eating a particularly fiery hot pot. After an hour, the mirror stored all the contents of his spicy hot pot."

Su Yang continued, "You saw the mushroom poisoning case in the orphanage on TV, right?"

Bai Liu glanced at the wall—on the screen was a hand-painted picture of the blood primrose.

Su Yang smiled faintly. "We took over that case, and our investigation revealed that the investors were likely connected to... substances that were supposed to cure all diseases. Unfortunately, we couldn’t find solid evidence. But coincidentally, this morning, someone revealed a clue to us. The second team is already on their way to arrest someone."

The PowerPoint switched to a small video clip from a hospital surveillance camera.

In the video, Bai Liu was visiting a young child in a hospital bed. After Bai Liu left, the child quickly recovered and whispered, "Thank you," looking at the door Bai Liu had just passed through.

Bai Liu mentally sighed.

"After you left, we did a test on the child's throat," Su Yang said. "And we found peculiar mycelium residue." He pulled out a small glass jar containing a blood-red mycelium and looked at Bai Liu. "Comrade Bai Liu, there was no one else visiting the children that day. They got better after you left. Can you explain where this mycelium came from?"

"That's why you cops brought me, a good, law-abiding citizen, here in these shackles at nine o'clock at night?" Bai Liu held up the heavy silver shackle in his hand and lightly digressed, "This surveillance video isn't conclusive evidence at all."

"Sir, isn't it a bit too arbitrary to arrest people like this?" Su Yang coughed awkwardly.

It was true—the video was only meant to intimidate Bai Liu and was not solid enough to be used as evidence for his arrest.

"I'm just a laid-off worker living in a cheap rental," Bai Liu said lightly. "If I could get my hands on that cure-all you're talking about, what wouldn't I do to feed it to these kids for free? You've done your research on me, and you know I'm short on money, right?"

It was true that Bai Liu's financial situation wasn't great, and if he'd really gotten his hands on the blood ganoderma, it wouldn't make sense for him to just give it away to a child without leaving his name on it. After all, if you thought about it, you'd realize how much money could be made from it, and few people could resist the temptation. Not to mention, Bai Liu had been laid off for almost a month now.

"An ordinary laid-off worker? Why would Miao, who killed his son and committed suicide not long ago, shout your name in terror before slitting his throat?" Su Yang quickly regained his composure and pressed the remote control.

A new video appeared on the screen.

On the screen was Miao Gaojiang's tired, manic, insane face. His eyes were sunken, his cheekbones high, and a knife pressed against his throat, a mess of blood at his feet, with the dead body of Miao Feichi lying unconscious nearby.

Someone in the video said, "Miao Gaojiang! Calm down! Put the knife down!"

"Suicide won't solve anything! Get a grip on yourself, and if you have a problem you can't solve, talk to us police!"

Miao Gaojiang shook his head in horror, his arms and legs spasming with mental instability. He growled hoarsely and sharply, "I'm dead!

I've been killed by Bai Liu!"

"This is not a suicide, this is a murder!" Miao Gaojiang seemed to resist the knife in his hand, his forehead tight as though he was trying to move away from the blade, but his hand, as if acting on its own, dug hard into the large vein in his neck. He broke down, screaming, "This is a homicide!"

"Bai Liu! Bai Liu! Bai Liu and the statue are my murderers!"

Blood sprayed from his arteries, hitting the ceiling as Miao Gaojiang collapsed in a pool of blood with his eyes wide open, still clutching the knife stuck in his neck.

The video froze on the image of Miao Gaojiang on the ground. Su Yang turned to Bai Liu: "Do you have anything to say?"

"There's nothing I want to say." Bai Liu's face remained unchanged, with a hint of forced confusion in his eyes. "Comrade police, I don't know this man at all. Is this the one who was on the news? Isn't he the one who committed suicide? You filmed the whole process of his suicide, so what does that have to do with me?"

"He shouted your name before he died," Su Yang said, staring intently at Bai Liu. "He said it was a homicide and that you killed him, which is most likely the death message Miao left for us."

"So, Comrade Miao's death has turned into a homicide?" Bai Liu smiled slightly as he looked at Su Yang. "Captain Su, you're pushing me like this. I'm mentally weak. If I can't bear the pressure you're putting on me and I kill myself, I can scream your name when I do it. By the same logic, Captain Su, you would also be the murderer who killed me, right?"

Su Yang exhaled slowly, not answering Bai Liu's words. If he had, he would have only been playing into the man's rhythm.

Bai Liu, a man more slippery and comfortable with such platitudes than he appeared, truly seemed like an ordinary person based on his CV.

"I certainly didn't mean that. It's just that you do look suspicious, Comrade Bai Liu," Su Yang tried to redirect the conversation.

"You cops are all about evidence, right?" Bai Liu gave Su Yang a casual glance. "Besides the fact that I look suspicious, is there any evidence that I was ordered to kill Miao?"

Bai Liu emphasized the word look.

Su Yang fell silent again.

The fact that Bai Liu and Miao Gaojiang had never met or interacted made the fact that Miao Gaojiang had gone insane and shouted Bai Liu's name before his death even more bizarre, which was why the case had been moved to the Dangerous Heresy Bureau.

But apart from Miao Gaojiang's incoherent words, there was indeed no concrete evidence in this case.

Bai Liu calmly asked, "So, there is indeed no evidence, Captain Su? Then I don't quite understand how you can use such strong-arm tactics to bring me in for questioning when there is absolutely no evidence. It doesn't fit my common sense of legal science."

Su Yang locked eyes with Bai Liu's tired, seemingly sleepless gaze for a moment before sighing helplessly. As if struck by a sudden conscience, Su Yang took a new vial from his breast pocket and placed it on the table in front of Bai Liu.

The small bottle rolled and emitted a pink gas, swirling like a universe of broken and fallen stars. It looked pretty, glimmering around the little bottle.

Bai Liu's eyes twitched slightly—it was similar to the pink smoke he had seen Tawil shatter into in his dream.

"It's a gas perfume that's been selling like hotcakes on the internet lately, called Dry Leaf Rose Gas," Su Yang said, gazing at the small pink bottle with a sober expression. "It contains an invigorating substance that keeps you functioning at a high level all day if you spray it on. Many companies use this perfume as an air freshener, and it's been nicknamed 'Gas Coffee' and 'Love Work.'"

"But recently, we found that companies using this perfume on a large scale experienced employees going crazy after discontinuing or replacing it." Su Yang paused before adding, "But strangely enough, we couldn't detect any harmful ingredients with any of the standard instruments used to test it. The perfume met all the standards for manufacture and distribution. We investigated further, transferring affected employees for treatment and research."

"Under repeated testing, these employees exhibited withdrawal-like symptoms."

Bai Liu's gaze fell on the small bottle, and he understood what Su Yang was implying.

"We defined this perfume as a new type of gas opium and were planning to give these employees forced withdrawal." Su Yang took a deep breath. "But something happened during the withdrawal process."

Su Yang clicked the remote, bringing up a new video.

The video showed a middle-aged man with bulging eyes howling in a crazed attack. His face was flushed pink, like the gas in the vial. His forehead was bruised from pounding himself against the wall. Someone entered and tied him to a chair, but he tore himself free.

Soon, amid the man's agonized screams, a strange change occurred. A wilted rose appeared clearly in his pupils, and the flesh on his body began to dry and blacken, peeling away like wilted rose petals. Eventually, all that remained was a clean pile of white bones sitting on the chair before they fell apart.

A cacophonous background noise filled the video.

"…CEDT-0756 Contaminated subject attempted withdrawal 6 days 17 hours 56 minutes, failed…"

End of video.

Su Yang didn't look at the screen, and his voice was a little dry when he spoke again. "We tried everything, but we found no way to keep these employees alive other than keeping them on this perfume called Rose Dry Leaf Gas..."

"No, they will wither," Bai Liu interrupted.

Su Yang fell silent for a moment before continuing. "But the production and distribution chain for this stuff cannot exist. By the time we realized it, it was too late..." Su Yang let out a bitter laugh, picking up the rose-colored bottle. "Do you know how much this sells for every month on the internet? Over a hundred thousand, and the number doubles each month. So many people are using this stuff. If it's suspended..."

"So what?" Bai Liu asked, unmoved. "Captain Su, this problem you're talking about has nothing to do with me, right? I can't solve it even if you arrest me."

Su Yang looked straight at Bai Liu. "No, you have a solution."

He leaned forward, propping himself up on the table, and met Bai Liu's gaze. "Our captain says you're a monster who can fix all the evil in this world. He believes that by capturing you, these crazed events will stop flooding into our world."

At these words, Bai Liu raised an eyebrow in slight surprise.

A tall, drunken man in uniform was helped into the small room where Bai Liu was being held. Some of the team members glanced at the collapsed, drunken man and fanned his nose. "How much has Captain Tang had to drink?"

"I don't know. He'd been down in front of the base for who knows how long before being found by a patrol member," one of the team members said, laughing bitterly. "Where's Captain Su? Still working on that newly captured humanoid heretic? Eh, now that I see Captain Tang like this, I don't even know if he's directing us to capture a normal person or a real heretic..."

"Still believe Captain Tang? After all, he has the special ability to see the future. That's why he has such high emergency authority. He's been right about mobilizing us to capture things before. This time should be... too, right?"

A few team members glanced at Captain Tang, who was covered in unkempt hair, and saw him lying motionless on the floor, snoring slightly.

The tone of the team member hesitated, "While it’s true that... Captain Tang has been drinking a bit uncharacteristically lately, didn't Captain Tang say that the more he drank and lost his mind, the more heresies he could see coming in the future?"

"And you believe that?" Su Yang pushed the door open and stepped in, casually answering. "Tang Erda could foresee when and where the evil things would appear even when he didn't drink a drop of alcohol. But now that he's drunk, his ability's been deteriorating. He’s failed several operations lately—probably because the alcohol's gone to his head."

The veins on Su Yang's forehead twitched as he looked at Tang Erda, who lay on the floor snoring. "Go to CEDT-0076, the Room of Eternal Ice, and get some ice water to wake him up."

The man's hair was messy, curly, and hung over his ears, his chin covered with stubble. He wiped off the icy water from his jaw with his thumb as he staggered to his feet, dragging one leg.

The uniform was crooked, with some buttons misaligned. The badge on his right breast was scrunched up near his jaw: [Captain of the Third Detachment of the Department of Dangerous Heresy Handling - Tang Erda].

"Whew—hiccup!" The man burped loudly, smelling strongly of alcohol. He pushed the hair that had covered his eyes back and revealed a pair of sharp, narrow, wolf-like dark blue eyes.

Tang Erda's eyes weren't hazy from alcohol—only for a moment. Soon, he propped himself against the wall, dazed, shaking his head. "Why do these bar walls look so much like the base walls..."

Su Yang slowly held his forehead in frustration. "In three minutes, wake him up, and then get him into the small room to deal with the humanoid heretic he must've captured—Bai Liu."

Three minutes later, Bai Liu raised an eyebrow at the drenched man sitting outside his door. His gaze shifted down to the badge on the man's chest. "Are you the Captain Tang who Su Yang said must have arrested me?"

"I don't know why you think capturing me will solve all these... quirky problems you guys are facing," Bai Liu said, his eyes flicking over the small rose-colored bottle on the table before returning to Tang Erda. "I'm just an ordinary citizen who's been laid off."

"Tsk, ordinary citizen? Heh." Tang Erda pulled out a packet of cigarettes from his pocket, lit one slowly, took a deep drag, and exhaled slowly. The red glow on his finger reflected in his wolf-like eyes.

His gaze didn't move as he stared at Bai Liu for a moment, then his mouth curled into a hostile smile. "Bai Liu, what are you pretending with me?"

"Do you know how many times I've put you in this place?" Tang Erda braced himself and stood up, pressing his cigarette into Bai Liu's handcuffs, releasing a mocking puff of smoke into Bai Liu's face. He reached out to touch Bai Liu's face. "Dozens of times... It's been a thousand years since the fox. What are you playing at now?"

Bai Liu leaned back slightly to avoid Tang Erda's touch. "But this is the first time we've met, isn't it, Captain Tang? Are you mistaken?"

Tang Erda slumped back into his chair, narrowing his eyes as he surveyed Bai Liu. He suddenly snorted in disdain. "First time meeting? This isn't your first time with me. I've met you many times."

"Devotee of the legendary evil gods, faithful lackey of Tawil, most hated and wanted of all the Dangerous Heresy Handling Bureau around the world, interface of evil things, gambler who uses evil things to swallow gold... Let me think of another title for you... the reigning villain—"

"Oh yes." Tang Erda rolled his neck stiffly, finally locking his gaze on Bai Liu's face. "The captain of the famous game warriors, the Wandering Circus, Bai Liu—the White King."

"I don't remember meeting you, Captain Tang, and I don't understand what you're talking about," Bai Liu lied without blinking.

Tang Erda stood up and gripped Bai Liu's shoulders, and like a wolf attacking, he nuzzled Bai Liu's neck with his open mouth, slowly hooking a chain from Bai Liu's collarbone with his index finger. It held a reverse cross and a piece of greyish-white fish scale.

Bai Liu didn't pull away. It would've been strange to speak with so many objects in his mouth. Apart from the coins, all these things were ordinary pendants and props—losing them wouldn't stop him from entering the game.

But not the coins. Without them, you couldn't enter the game.

Tang Erda lifted the reverse cross with a smirk, staring at Bai Liu. "You're wearing the reverse cross of the evil god around your neck. What do you mean, you don't know the only follower of the evil god?" He tugged on the cross and lifted Bai Liu's head. "You're not afraid of angering the evil god, Bai Liu? I'm warning you again—better hide your tail before you talk to me. Let me guess... Where have you hidden your game manager?"

Tang Erda jerked his hand, dislodging Bai Liu's jaw, and Bai Liu squinted from the pain. Tang Erda used the plastic bag he'd used for his cigarettes to wipe his hand with disdain.

"No?" Tang Erda frowned, surprised by Bai Liu's reaction. "The rest of your timeline was hidden under your tongue after I caught it... Where is it?" He pulled his hand out of Bai Liu's mouth and shook it off with a look of disgust. "You didn't swallow it, did you? You don't usually do things like that in other timelines, it doesn't fit your villainous aesthetic."

Tang Erda tossed the plastic bag aside and slammed Bai Liu's jaw back, the crunch loud and painful.

But Bai Liu didn't look weak. Instead, he moved his jaw to adapt before calmly asking Tang Erda, "Other timelines? Your personal skill is time travel? You've captured me in other timelines many times?"

"My skill isn't time travel. Time travel is a high-danger ability, or rather, a godly prop ability in the game." Tang Erda slouched back in his chair, arms and legs spread out. He rested his head on the back of the chair, tilting it sideways without looking at Bai Liu. "I once won a league in one of the timelines and got a wish. The game rewarded me with this prop based on that wish."

Tang Erda chewed on his unlit cigarette, looking slightly drunk. "This prop allows me to jump through different parallel timelines at any time. Whenever I feel dissatisfied or regretful about something, I reverse time to change it."

"I thought I was reversing time, but I soon realized I wasn't. I was just in a different parallel timeline," Tang Erda muttered, dropping his eyelids as he chewed on the cigarette.

After a moment of silence, Tang Erda returned to his cynical expression and turned his head back to Bai Liu. "And it's funny, Bai Liu, you're destined to be the greatest enemy of our Heresy Handling Bureau in all the timelines I've been through."

"In all timelines of eternal continuity, you are destined to become the sole devotee of the evil god Tawil." Tang Erda pulled a gun from his waist and leveled it at Bai Liu's right eye. "And then you, a demon who will do anything for money, used your belief in an evil god to turn the world into a hell full of evil things in almost every timeline I've seen."

"You use your status as a follower of an evil god to create all kinds of evil things to enrich yourself. You auction off mirrors that reflect the fears of the human heart at exorbitant prices, letting shameless people steal them and circulate them at high prices. You display Siren's fish bones in the most exclusive museums, letting viewers go mad over the decaying mermaids. You sell the most expensive life-saving remedy, the Blood Reishi, to the rich, smiling as you collect payment from these parasites who've survived by sucking the blood of children."

"And this dried rose leaf gas, which makes everyone fade in a frenzy." Tang Erda glanced at the small bottle of perfume on the table. "After you let it flood, you kept raising its price, leaving the poor who couldn't afford it to wither while the rich who could afford it saw it bloom in joy in their gilded halls."

Tang Erda's thumb rested on the safety, and his finger hovered over the trigger. His eyes locked on Bai Liu's with a piercing sharpness. "You're just like the game—a madman who buys human souls and pours evil into the world for his own gain."

"And it is my destiny to kill you."

Bang!

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

The bullet grazed past Bai Liu's eye, hitting the wall behind him with such a strong thud that people outside started banging on the door, asking what was wrong. Su Yang even opened the small window to warn Tang Erda seriously.

“Tang Erda, firing a gun in such a confined room is a death wish. The shrapnel could be shot through your head. You’d better not play this game of suicide in front of me, again and again, by accidentally killing yourself. You’re holding a gun, not a toy,” Su Yang said coldly. “I won’t collect your body if you kill yourself.”

Tang Erda carelessly put the gun down on the table and turned to Su Yang with a fake smile, raising his hands to show he wasn’t playing with it.

As if jokingly, he casually glanced at Bai Liu, who remained unmoved, and tsked. “I just wanted to scare him, but I didn’t expect you to be scared, Captain Su.”

“After all, I don’t think he and I care much about things like dying,” Tang Erda smiled, moving closer to Bai Liu. He raised an eyebrow and lowered his voice slightly. “It’s not like we’ve never died before, don’t you think, Bai Liu?”

Su Yang didn’t hear the rest of Tang Erda’s sentence. He gave him a warning glare, lowered the small window, and said nothing to the team outside.

“You do have to die, but not now, and not in the Bureau of Heresy. You’d be in a lot of trouble here.” Tang Erda lifted his wrinkled eyelids. “It wouldn’t be the first time I’ve killed you, Bai Liu, so if you don’t want to die so early without earning your keep, you’d better be honest about what the solution to the dried rose leaf gas on the table is.”

Tang Erda’s disgusted gaze fixed on the glass bottle as he spoke. “It was so popular all over the world soon after it appeared, that everyone had roses growing out of their eyes.”

“People who couldn’t afford it withered by the side of the street, the slums and low-rent housing were full of wilted petals, blood and flesh, while the roses in the eyes of the rich flourished. In the end, everyone started making and selling this stuff, and we can’t even find out where it comes from. And this time, it's just inexplicable."

"I'm sick of this stuff, but you like it, don't you, Bai Liu?" Tang Erda's eyes were fixed on him.

"What makes you think I have anything to do with this rose gas?" Bai Liu asked rhetorically, not skipping a beat. "And is there even a solution to this thing?"

"Because somewhere in the timeline where I caught you, you helped us at the Bureau of Heresy Processing with this," Tang Erda said.

Bai Liu quickly caught the meaning of Tang Erda's words. "I'm not going to work for you for free just because you caught me and tried to kill me. Did you pay me?"

Tang Erda gave a look as if he'd swallowed a thousand flies before he finally waved his hand and admitted, somewhat sullenly, "Tsk, yes, quite a lot was given, and you were eventually acquitted in that timeline for your outstanding contribution to solving this dried rose leaf gas."

He looked down at Bai Liu with no emotion in his gaze. "Even though all of us knew that you must be connected to this thing, we let you go because there was no direct evidence that you took it for profit."

"All we could get was circumstantial evidence of your connection to the dried rose leaf gas. We knew full well that the source of this was you, and you did not deny it. But because there was no direct evidence that you profited from it, at Su Yang's insistence, we found you not guilty in this matter. So, you couldn't be arrested, and you were let go."

"A year later, the vendor of this stuff opened a retail shop outside the Heretic Authority, and the world is dying because of it." Tang Erda paused for a moment. "In that timeline, Su Yang's parents died at home because they couldn't buy dried rose leaf gas, and Su Yang entered the game to revive them."

Bai Liu's gaze fell on the rose-colored perfume. "It really doesn't fit my idea of profit-making."

Tang Erda's eyes swept over him with a sharp sneer. "You still have a profit motive? Don't you want all the money you can get? Because you were acquitted, this thing is somehow made grey and legal."

“Those manufacturers claim that this perfume is just like cigarettes and that it won’t be lethal except to a small number of allergic people, because your exoneration made it easier for them to market and promote the perfume. They handed you a large sum of money for that, and I didn’t see you refuse it.”

“Yes, I shouldn’t have turned down the money that was handed to me, but I wouldn’t have introduced this addictive perfume if I had the status and resources you mentioned in that timeline.” Bai Liu reached for the small rose-colored glass bottle and peered at it over his focused fingertips. “Because this perfume is under addictive exploitation, and resources like people are non-renewable and disposable, like a rose that can only bloom once before it withers.”

“It’s the lowest form of capital exploitation. It’s stupid.” Bai Liu looked up blandly at Tang Erda. “I prefer leeks to roses because they are renewable.”

“If I were a being who could permanently exploit the lower classes, then I wouldn’t easily harvest them completely. I’d nurture them, give them the space and resources to grow so they could always regenerate. Turning them into roses is too extravagant; it’s not my preferred way of enriching myself.”

Tang Erda: “…”

No matter how many times he saw this, Bai Liu’s nonsense and brainwashing skills remained intact.

“I don’t care if you like roses or leeks. You’d better give me an honest account of your solution to this rose gas or whatever it is.” Tang Erda gave a very false, polite laugh. “Also, the room we have here has been specially made by me with props to isolate all evil things, including that coin. Even if you swallowed the coin, you wouldn’t get into the game.”

He tapped Bai Liu’s face slowly with his gun, and his smile grew kinder. “I have plenty of time and ways to take my time with you, old friend.”

“Captain Tang, am I a prisoner of this timeline in a position to ask you one last question?” Bai Liu raised his eyes to look directly into Tang Erda’s. “If you managed to kill me in the other timeline, then in this timeline, I’m just an ordinary person. Why didn’t you kill me as soon as you came to this timeline, but waited until this gas appeared before coming to me?”

“Because I thought you were dead,” Tang Erda stared deeply at Bai Liu. “I wanted to kill you before you grew up, so I followed the clues I got from the other timelines to find the private orphanage where you were supposed to be, the place where you hadn’t grown up to stay.”

“In every timeline I’ve experienced and checked, you’ve grown up in that private orphanage that abuses children, and I’ve found traces of your existence there almost every time. But this time, the director there told me that Bai Liu died at the age of fourteen from swallowing a coin. Did you actually die?”

Tang Erda paused for a couple of seconds.

“You dragged out and dragged into the game almost all the investors and directors of that orphanage that led to your childhood tragedy after you grew up. All these people died horribly. You didn’t kill them yourself. You just lured them into the game by all means and let them die in the monster’s bite. Bai Liu, you’ve always been so clever at doing bad things. It’s hard for us to catch anything or trace it. It’s quite difficult to prove you.”

Tang Erda’s expression became slightly unfocused as he spoke, his fingertips tapping twice unconsciously on the table. “You couldn’t have died that easily. I don’t believe for a second that you did. If you entered the game, it would have been the others who suffered. That you would actually kill yourself by being tortured by these investors—that’s not something you would have done at all.”

“But every trace I’ve found proves that this child who committed suicide is definitely you.”

Tang Erda lit another cigarette, not looking at Bai Liu. His eyes fell lazily at some point in the room. “I didn’t even think there would be another you in this timeline.”

Slowly, he moved his eyes to Bai Liu’s face.

Tang Erda and Bai Liu looked straight at each other through the smoke.

“There’s actually a version of Bai Liu in this timeline who grew up in a public orphanage, changed his name, didn’t touch anything evil at all, and seems to have survived to the present day without doing anything bad for twenty-five years.”

“That’s something that couldn’t happen to an asshole like you. You wouldn't have tolerated yourself in such a low-cost money-making position for so long." Tang Erda took a deep breath of his cigarette and exhaled in a daze, shaking the ash from his fingertips. "Working for someone else as a social animal for low wages? I'd wake up laughing in my sleep if I ever dreamed that you, bastard, would have that day."

"This is tailor-made torture for you. It's worse than killing you. I don't even know how you put up with it."

Tang Erda continued, "Given the slightest chance, you would become a money-grabbing machine without any conscience. You'd domesticate and possess the most fearsome and loyal criminal gangs in the world and turn them into a trained, gold-devouring syndicate. The world's wealth would fall like an old wallet with a leaky mouth into the long-open hands of your vagabond self."

Tang Erda sat at the table, his gaze deep as he took a puff of smoke and exhaled again through his nose.

Bai Liu's face tilted slightly sideways as his breathing slowed a little.

Tang Erda smiled suddenly and oddly, delightfully. "Yes, you hate the smell of smoke, and to see you forced to stay in an environment you don't like for so long is—"

"—worse than killing you with your own hands."

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

Tang Erda gazed at Bai Liu through a haze of nicotine smoke.

"But it's amazing," he said, "that you actually just did an honest job as a game worker for years at a normal company, and got laid off because of your boss's prejudice."

He couldn't help but laugh as he continued, "When I first looked into this, I wondered if I was mistaken—whether there really was an ordinary person named Bai Liu in this timeline, and the real Bai Liu had somehow swallowed his own game coins and died."

"Maybe it’s the bad luck of this timeline," he mused, "that Bai died in the game before he could become a scary trader, so the game let him die like that in the so-called real world. Who knows?"

Tang Erda shook the ashes from his cigarette. "But soon, I knew I was wrong."

"Because I'm in the game, right?" Bai Liu looked at him. "You relied on my skills to figure out my identity?"

"Yes." Tang Erda took a drag from his cigarette. "That personal skill of yours in acquiring souls—I wouldn’t mistake it even if I turned to dust. It’s how you gathered a bunch of psychos like you and nearly wiped out our base a few times."

"A bunch of psychos like me?" Bai Liu asked, amused.

Tang Erda scowled at him. "I’ve wondered in every timeline how you manage to find so many people who are as gifted and mentally unbalanced as you, to form your so-called wandering circus."

"And only in this timeline," he continued, tapping his finger on the table. "This is the first time I’ve seen your wandering circus take shape."

"In other timelines, when I met you, you were already powerful. Your origins were only unearthed after I risked my life digging through dozens of timelines. All I could find was that you lived in that private orphanage. I knew absolutely nothing about the mad dogs around you."

Tang Erda’s eyes narrowed. "One reason is that these mad dogs of yours are both rampant and discreet—it's hard to trace their true identities. The other is that you protected them so well that, before this timeline, the base only knew their titles and habits. The rest was untraceable. Once traced, it would've been trouble for our people."

He leaned back on the sofa and lazily ticked them off on his fingers. "You should have met them: the monkey thieves who help you steal secrets, the little killer witches who like to poison men."

"The only person we can identify who's involved with you is Muke—the inland investor who inherited his father's business and helped you spread your evil. But Muke is a slippery man, hiding in a sanatorium most of the year, claiming he's suffering from a heart attack."

"But now," Tang Erda said, his voice lowering, "I know all about who they are." He clenched his cigarette in his hand, the ash drifting to the floor as he leaned in close to Bai Liu. "And then I realized—they weren't born mad dogs. They just had some mental gaps."

"You were born crazy, Bai Liu. You found their gaps and tamed them into mad dogs, so they would bite anyone they saw, except you."

"Is that so?" Bai Liu stared at him unflinchingly. "And do you think I've tamed them now? Do you think they'll bite you to death for capturing me, Captain Tang?"

Tang Erda's ghostly blue eyes narrowed. Then, he pressed the still-burning cigarette against Bai Liu's pale neck, the smoke hissing as it made contact, leaving a burn above his collarbone. Bai Liu's breath caught, but he managed to see, in him casually open bodice, a hideous scar—scratches from some fierce beast, with traces of corrosion.

It looked like the scars left by a combination of Mu Sicheng's monkey claws and Liu Jiayi's poison. These scars, brought out of the game, also required a low spirit value and a weakened will to leave such marks.

— Muke, the dagger that lowers the spirit value.

"How do you know I haven't been bitten to death?" Tang Erda buttoned his lapel to hide the wound, then whispered in Bai Liu's ear with a chilling smile. "I killed you, and you killed me, Bai Liu."

"But sadly," he continued, "we both didn't make it to death." He exhaled a puff of smoke into his ear and laughed softly at his choking cough. "We've both been brought back to life."

Tang Erda emerged from the room, where Su Yang was waiting for him. "How was it? Did he say what to do about the rose gas?"

"Not yet. He won't talk so easily." Tang Erda dangled the butt of his cigarette. "It'll take a while to grind it out and keep him in line."

"Grind for a while? How long is this 'while'?" Su Yang frowned. "Captain Tang, are you sure he can fix this?"

Tang Erda flicked the cigarette butt into the bin with perfect precision and glanced at Su Yang.

None of them knew what his powers were, or why he could predict where many of the heretics appeared—including the conversation he just had with Bai Liu inside the house. They probably wouldn't understand, even if they were in front of the surveillance.

That's because conversations like these, and abilities that would reveal the existence of the system and the game, were blocked out when spoken by players like Tang Erda.

It was a limitation of the game for the players. Tang Erda could only communicate about these matters with players like Bai Liu. As a timeline traveler, he also knew that, with each new timeline, personalities, family dynamics, and emotions changed slightly.

Only Bai Liu remained unchanged—ever wicked, ever greedy, like an anchor that didn't disorient Tang Erda, a sailor adrift in the flood of time. He was never shaken by his time-traveling dilemmas, only calmly watching him, amused, as though to say, "So the rest of me is so interesting."

To him, the world was just a game.

Tang Erda was the only player in this game who kept reading through the files, unwilling to let go, trying to beat the perfect ending.

It was ironic that Bai Liu, this strange anchor point, was the only person Tang Erda could talk to about anything.

Others—Tang Erda's colleagues, friends, and Su Yang—had all been lost an unknown number of times. The reunions were so painful that he couldn't even approach them.

As a player, Tang Erda knew he couldn't touch anyone, for doing so would bring them into the game—a truth he had learned after countless turns.

This particular department of the Dangerous Heresy Bureau, which fought evil, had always been a breeding ground for players. Tang Erda was not the only one on the base.

But these "player-players," who knew the ways of the evil, couldn't tell the non-players about the game, because of its limitations. They couldn't reveal that what they were fighting was not some external evil, but a product of a game that had no end. All they could do was run.

When a player died in the game, the non-players would watch in horror as those players logged out, dying in bizarre, miserable ways in reality. The desperation and scorn of the evil creatures grew deeper, and the normal players, influenced by the gamers, would develop a violent desire to survive and eventually fall into the game themselves.

Elsewhere in Tang Erda's timeline, most of the players in the Heretic Processing Bureau had become gamers and then died one by one in the game—including Su Yang, in front of him.

Tang Erda's gaze was long and distant, passing through countless deaths and untold time, before falling slowly on Su Yang's frowning face.

Su Yang had died trying to save him, in the semi-finals of the tournament.

The team members of the Heretics Directorate who entered the game tried desperately to stop others from entering, trying to do their duty in the game—to protect the fragile, unknowingly real world and their loved ones in reality.

But it seemed as though an invisible hand was driving all of this, unbeknownst to them. They had already become like rats in a sewer, afraid to see their loved ones, afraid to speak to their friends, afraid to kiss their lovers. They could only stand far away, in the shadows, watching from a distance, guarding what they held dear. They were terrified that being a player would drag their loved ones into this game, one that had no end.

When Tang Erda first entered the game, he didn't even dare go out to buy food or cigarettes. He ordered takeout and let it sit outside his door for an hour before going to pick it up.

But sometimes, no matter how careful you are, the person you cherish will inevitably move on to a future you don't want to see, because of you.

Su Yang came looking for Tang Erda, who had been hiding at home, out of touch with everyone.

Tang Erda ran around, hiding from Su Yang, changing hotels and logging out coordinates. But Su Yang kept chasing him, going from place to place. When he realized that all those tricks could be avoided by Tang Erda, he started looking for him the foolish way—the dead way.

Finally, Vice-Captain Su was holding up Tang Erda's picture on the street, asking, "Have you seen my captain?"

Tang Erda was standing in an alley not far away, lighting a cigarette. He waited until Su Yang had gone past and it had burned his hand before he stepped out.

But in the end, Tang Erda met Su Yang in the game.

The moment they met, the much younger vice-captain smiled, arched his brow, and said, "Captain, I've finally found you."

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

Su Yang started a guild and a team in the game. His eyes gleamed as he shook Tang Erda's hand and told him that if he won the game, he would be granted a wish.

"Then, Captain, we can wish for everyone to be taken out of the game. We in the Dangerous Heretics Bureau can form a team and enter the tournament. We're fighting these evil things outside the game, so it wouldn't make sense for us to lose inside the game with the support of skills and props."

"Don't give up on the world so easily, don't be so pessimistic, Captain!" Su Yang said with a smile.

His teammates laughed and shouted, "Yes, Captain, don't be a coward when you enter the game! We're all on the third team. Don't back down, we won't admit defeat easily!"

They were born to die, unbreakable, never conceding defeat—and in the end, they won.

The men died victorious, content with their unfinished wishes entrusted to their trusted captain.

Su Yang stood resolutely in front of him, looking at Tang Erda for a moment. With a relieved smile on his face, as though he knew what was going to happen, he whispered to Tang Erda, "Captain, go on."

What followed seemed to play out in slow motion. In Tang Erda's open eyes, a pure white bone whip strangled Su Yang's slender neck, pulling him through as though he were carrying a rabbit. A silver bullet passed through Su Yang's skull, blood splattering across Tang Erda's face as his pupils dilated.

Tang Erda was the only one left alive.

At first, Tang Erda asked, "Why do you want me to live?"

Later, he asked, "Why did you let me live?"

At the end of the day, Tang Erda, who had won it all, knelt on the podium amidst a huge cheer, a victor who had won everything.

The champion, bruised and dying, bowed his head, his eyes lazily tilting. In a dazzling white light, so intense he could barely see, his voice hoarse and dry, he wished for a god whose existence he couldn't be sure of, saying:

"I hope everyone, especially Su Yang, gets out of this game alive."

Then the merciful gods favored him and granted his wish.

The gods told Tang Erda that for his wish to come true, it could only be stopped before it even started. To this end, the game granted Tang Erda a god-level prop that allowed him to reverse time and change events.

But this was all a lie to deceive him. Even after reversing time countless times, he never succeeded in preventing everyone from entering the game. Instead, he found himself constantly reversing time, delaying others' entry, and consuming himself in the process.

And even if he did manage to stop it, he could never truly keep everyone out of the game. Since [Tang Erda] possessed the prop, he had to be in the game to use it. But with the prop, he couldn't escape, even if he managed to get everyone else out.

So Tang Erda asked the gods, "Didn't I wish for everyone to leave the game? Why am I not included in this?"

The gods, still compassionate, replied, "The moment you made your wish, you ceased to be human. You are a heretic, a monster, and so you are trapped in the game forever. That is the price you must pay for achieving a wish beyond your abilities."

And so, Tang Erda, now a heretic and a monster, broke down and went mad, silently accepting his fate and the cost of his wish. He continued his relentless pursuit of the end where everyone but him could leave the game.

This was the longest delay Tang Erda had ever experienced. It was already that time, Bai Liu—the bastard—was twenty-four, and no one in the whole department had ever entered the game except him.

And his co-captain, Su Yang, had finally survived past thirty-three—the age he should have died in the game.

"Captain Tang, Captain Tang! Captain Su is talking to you!" one of the team members shouted.

Tang Erda snapped back to attention and looked to Su Yang. "Oh, I'm sure he can handle it. You don't need to worry about that. Just leave it all to me. You just need to protect yourself…"

"Captain Tang, Captain Su is not asking you this..." another team member replied, somewhat helpless and amused. "Are you drunk? Captain Su's baby is having a full moon, and they're inviting you to the celebration. Are you going?"

Tang Erda's face turned pale.

"Yes, Captain Su! We're the fastest of us! We got married last year and have a baby this year!"

"Captain Su, the baby's just a month old now. Can it look like you or your sister-in-law? Eh, but you're both good-looking, so it doesn't matter. I just hope the baby's mother is pretty..."

"Wake up, you've been single for twenty-seven years."

Su Yang's normally gentle and elegant face flushed red, his eyes bright with the goofiness of a first-time father. "I can't tell who it looks like yet… but I think it looks good. Captain Tang, are you coming to my house for the full moon celebration? Little Ann cooked it herself."

Someone joked, "We always said Captain Su was Captain Tang's wife, but I didn't realize she was faster than Captain Tang, the head of the family."

"Jealous?" Tang Erda said lazily. "I was so jealous when I saw him get married, I didn't even dare go to the wedding. I told him not to tie the knot by stealing the groom away from me."

The others laughed, and Tang Erda added nonchalantly, "…I didn't expect it to happen so soon, before I even did, to get married and have kids."

Su Yang gave Tang Erda an expectant look. He smiled, "I've bought your favorite wine, we'll have a drink then."

"I've been your vice-captain for so long, Captain Tang, so I have to give you face, right?"

Tang Erda silently stared at Su Yang's joyful face. Then, he suddenly smiled, waved, and turned to leave.

"I really don't give Captain Su the benefit of the doubt. I prefer to drink alone. Congratulations on your new baby, Captain Su. I'll give you a big red packet sometime. I'll leave the man alone."

Everyone's laughter stopped awkwardly.

"...Captain Tang, are you sure you don't want to go?"

"No, Captain Tang, what's wrong with you lately? Why don't you even engage with us?"

"...Captain Su. After you got married, Captain Tang, you were always drunk alone, but you don't have to be so jealous, Mr. Tang! You're well-endowed; you can find anyone you want!"

Without turning around, Tang Erda just lazily waved his hand without answering and headed for the door.

"Tang Erda!" Su Yang reached out to grab Tang Erda's hand, looking somewhat angry. "What's wrong with you lately? You're always alone, avoiding me and the rest of the team? Do you have a problem with us?"

Tang Erda subconsciously pushed Su Yang's hand away, and then, seeing Su Yang's somewhat dazed look, Tang Erda stared back at him, his own expression full of confusion.

[Captain, why are you avoiding me?]

[Is there any point in hiding from me alone?]

[Tang Erda, we've been friends for so many years, captain and vice-captain. Do you really think I can't see that you're hiding from me?]

Su Yang from different timelines seemed to overlap in that moment.

Tang Erda opened his mouth, as if to laugh, but there was a weariness and hollowness that seemed to consume everything as he gazed at Su Yang's face—untouched by torture and death—and his own gaze began to fade.

Eventually, Tang Erda took a deep breath and smiled, as if forcing himself to let go. "Captain Su, you're a family man now."

Su Yang, confused, looked at Tang Erda. "What's wrong with me having a family? Does it mean I can't have a normal relationship with you just because I'm a family man? That doesn't make sense. We've been friends for years."

Tang Erda had seen such a look before, such a gaze, a million times. But not once had he been silenced like this, for no reason.

"I have no problem with you," Tang Erda said quietly, pausing. Then, to ease the awkwardness, he smiled indifferently. "I think you're fine the way you are. Exceptionally fine, very fine. I have no complaints at all, and I sincerely bless you."

Su Yang's face relaxed slightly, as if sighing in relief.

But Tang Erda's next words came quickly: "Of course, it would be better to stay away from me, stop chasing me around, and learn to look after your family, Captain Su."

"Don't be so silly as to chase me into games anymore, Su Yang."

The subtle smile on Su Yang's face faded, and the light in his eyes dimmed as if he was saddened. He stared at Tang Erda, reluctant.

"I don't understand, Captain. Why are you saying and doing this? Did I do something wrong?"

"You didn't do anything wrong." Tang Erda paused. "It was my mistake. I got sidetracked... it was... me who didn't figure it out."

With those words, Tang Erda shook off Su Yang's hand and, without hesitation, put on his coat and turned to leave.

"In the future, no member of the team is allowed to come to me for personal matters unless it's for official business."

CEDT - In room 006.

Bai Liu slept on a mattress in the corner. Only faint light filtered through the small window, and the sound of regular, measured footsteps echoed at the door.

Following the steady pattern of footsteps that passed his window every fifteen minutes—like a prison—Bai Liu waited until the patrol passed before quickly removing a hollow coin—the game manager—from the edge of his handcuffs.

Bai Liu hid the coin under his tongue, inside the handcuffs, in the interval between Su Yang's departure and Tang Erda's entry. He kept his head down to avoid surveillance. It was highly unlikely he could hide something in his mouth without being caught during continuous questioning, and according to Su Yang, the incoming Captain Tang might know something about him.

But Tang Erda didn't bother to search Bai Liu's body for the game manager either. His claim was: "[This room has been spiked by me with props, you can't get into the game.]"

Bai Liu's cross and fish scales had been taken by Tang Erda, and the only thing left on his body was the coin—one Tang Erda was too disgusted to search, so he had to try it.

[Go to game.]

[System Alert: Zizi... signal is isolated, touching the transcendent-level prop (magic space), the space owner can control the people in and out of the space. The game signal is isolated, player Bai Liu cannot log into the game!]

"[Magic Space]?" Bai Liu pondered. "Isn't this the prop Liu Jiayi gave Liu Huai?"

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

Bai Liu also notices something else strange—he is not allowed to use props in the real world, as the system places restrictions on him.

Except for certain items related to desire fulfillment, which can be used in reality without restriction, most props are restricted by the system, much like how Bai Liu was once prohibited from using his skills in the real world.

Typically, the higher the level of the item or skill, the greater the restrictions on its use in reality.

The prop Bai Liu used in reality was the Blood Lingzhi from before.

The system warned him, but after the warning, Bai Liu clearly felt the coin attached to the cross vibrate twice, and then he was able to use it.

However, even under the protection of the evil gods, many of Bai Liu's props cannot be used directly.

But Tang Erda, from the sound of his voice, seems to be able to use props in reality beyond the system's limitations.

Bai Liu considers two possibilities for this situation.

The first is that Tang Erda's special status as a time traveler allows him to escape the system's scrutiny and restrictions.

However, Bai Liu thinks this is unlikely because, if this were true, Tang Erda would not still be a player, and he had obviously seen Bai Liu's "little TV," proving that Tang Erda was still in the game.

The second possibility is that Tang Erda did not acquire his abilities from the system at all.

It's likely that Tang Erda has a deep understanding of the game, its props, the evil, and reality.

Tang Erda may have used his position as the leader of the third detachment of the Department of Heretical Hazards to acquire and use evil objects that had entered real-world replicas, collected by this department, and then used them as his own props.

Bai Liu had previously discovered that after clearing a game copy, the monsters generally reward players with props associated with the monsters, and sometimes even the monsters themselves.

For example, in the earlier copy of Siren Town, the rewards included fish scales, amulets, and fish bones. The last train to the explosion rewarded a shard of the mirror that caused the explosion, and Bai Liu's recent copy, Love Orphanage, rewarded Blood Lingzhi.

It's as if the game deliberately gives out these evil items, which cause all sorts of calamities, as rewards for completing quests, allowing the player to take them back to reality and use them.

The mirror that suddenly appeared, the recipe for the Blood Lingzhi that investors in the orphanage had just discovered—these items seem to be transported into reality, rousing the most evil, insane desires of the human heart. It seems some entity is deliberately sending these things to reality with the help of players, turning them into hubs overwhelmed by their own desires. This could be how the game loads its copies into the real world.

The "interface of something evil"—that's the term Tang Erda used to describe Bai Liu.

It's an apt description of players who constantly move between the game and reality, using evil objects to fulfill their desires in the real world, acting as mediums for the game to load core evil objects into reality, much like an interface.

And if Tang Erda was a devotee of the evil gods, he must have been a particularly efficient interface—his frequency and speed of loading evil items into reality must have been higher than ever.

Thanks to the blessing of the evil gods, Bai Liu is less restricted in reality than other players, and he has certainly felt this.

"If it can be used for profit…" Bai Liu's eyes darkened for a moment.

"It's quite an enticing future." He rubbed his chin in thought. "Is this considered smuggling illegal controlled substances? Is it illegal?"

After a moment of considering the nature of the trade, Bai Liu had to admit with some regret—it should be illegal, and if Lu Yizhan found out, Bai Liu would probably be read to death. So, forget it.

But if his other timeline self didn't have Lu Yizhan—someone who could tear people apart—Bai Liu feels he would have likely chosen to be a smuggler. He wouldn't have chosen to profit directly from these evil objects; that would be too inefficient.

It would have been quicker to smuggle these evil items into the real world, then sell them to the relevant industries for patent and smuggling fees. He could control the entire channel for the profits earned from the evil goods. Just thinking about it makes Bai Liu feel regretful—what a great opportunity for wealth.

Unfortunately, it's not legal—as evidenced by Tang Erda's attitude. By late in the game, they've touched the interface with him, and as an evil entity, he will meet a gruesome end.

Bai Liu looked through his system panel again and found that without the protection of the fish scales and the cross, he was indeed unable to use any special items. He also couldn't use his personal skills—using skills to trade with people was now out of the question.

Sitting in the small, dark room, unsure of the time, Bai Liu sighed mentally. Tang Erda was a worthy opponent who had faced him many times and eliminated all risks almost as soon as they met.

He could tell he had suffered many times at his hands and truly hated him for it.

It’s not that Bai Liu didn’t want to ask for help, but people like Tang Erda wouldn’t leave him any openings to exploit.

If he's right, Tang Erda will soon have someone else to keep him company—he doesn’t sound too happy when he talks about [the Wandering Circus].

Hopefully, these people will understand what he meant when he sent them his last text message before he was caught and had his phone confiscated. Bai Liu doesn't want to see his property get caught up in this mess.

Bai Liu leaned against the wall and slowly closed his eyes.

U of C, 3rd floor of the 2nd dormitory.

Mu Sicheng stared blankly across the room at the bed wrapped in white cloth—the bed of Liu Huai, who had just returned from an incident. Mu Sicheng had been logged out and taken to the police for questioning.

Even Bai Liu, with his pickpocket nature, probably considering the mental shock Mu Sicheng had endured, let him off the hook today and didn't immediately pull him into the game. Bai Liu simply sent Mu Sicheng a text message, saying he would be in the game tonight and advising him to get some rest first, without specifying when he would be let in.

When Mu Sicheng closed his eyes, all he could see was Liu Huai being hit by a bus, blood spreading across the floor.

He stared at the message Bai Liu had sent him at 9:16 PM. He could read the words, but they seemed jumbled, as if his mind couldn’t process them properly—almost like he had dyslexia.

"[Beware of the rose and the hunter, I may die by the hunter’s hand. Don’t wait for me. Get out of here.]"

... What does this mean?

The emotional drain and confusion persisted until a knock sounded at Mu Sicheng's dormitory door.

Mu Sicheng, still in a daze, stood up and opened the door. "Lao San, don’t you have your dormitory keys with you…?"

He stopped mid-sentence when his gaze met the cold eyes of a policeman in a dark grey uniform.

The policeman put one hand behind his waist, gripping something, and eyed Mu Sicheng warily. "Mu Sicheng, we need to ask you something. Please come with us."

Mu Sicheng hesitated, then responded, "I’ve just returned from giving my statement. Haven’t you finished asking me everything you wanted to know? If you have more questions, you can ask tomorrow. I’m really tired and need some rest."

He was referring to the Liu Huai incident.

"We're not from the traffic department," the policeman said, showing his credentials. "You’re connected to another very serious social incident. Please cooperate with our investigation."

Mu Sicheng's eyes casually scanned the back of the policeman's waist before resting on the papers the officer had shown him. He muttered to himself, "Dangerous Heresy Exclusion Field Unit 3… Coded…"

Mu Sicheng remained quiet for a long moment after reading.

"Although I don't fully understand what department you're from or why I'm suddenly involved in a serious social incident, I'll cooperate with your investigation." Mu Sicheng took a deep breath and rubbed his face tiredly. "But can I take a bathroom break first? I've been at the police station all day giving statements and haven't been allowed to go to the bathroom. They've been feeding me water, and I've only just returned."

The policeman looked at Mu Sicheng with hesitation.

Mu Sicheng's face displayed an outward weariness, as if he could fall asleep at any moment while holding the door. It seemed clear that the traumatic death of his roommate earlier that morning had affected him deeply.

Mu Sicheng didn't look like a heretic at all. He appeared more like an ordinary man who had been caught up in something that drove him to madness.

The policeman hesitated, glancing at his captain, who was known to be unreliable when it came to catching heretics and had been drinking heavily that night.

"Fine," the officer said after a few seconds, "You have one minute, and you can't close the bathroom door."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow, slightly speechless. "I'm a citizen, and I can't even go to the bathroom without being watched? Can you at least give me some privacy?"

But seeing the serious expression on the policeman's face, Mu Sicheng shrugged. "Fine. If you don't feel embarrassed after watching."

As Mu Sicheng zipped down his jeans, the policeman outside the door glanced away awkwardly at the remark. In that moment, Mu Sicheng's tired, loose eyes sharpened instantly. He kicked the bathroom door shut, locking the unresponsive officer outside.

As the police officer shouted for the door to be opened, Mu Sicheng's body swayed slightly, and with one swift motion, he kicked open the air vent and crawled through it.

When the officer outside kicked open the bathroom door, he stared at the open vent in confusion. He immediately spoke into the intercom, "Report, the proposed humanoid heretic number 004 has escaped through the bathroom vent on the 6th floor and vanished. Have you seen heretic number 004 anywhere?"

"No!" The voice from the intercom replied, "We have squads in all four directions of the dormitory building. The vent on the 6th floor was opened about a minute and seventeen seconds ago, but we didn't observe anyone escaping through it."

All they had seen was the vent open, but no one emerged from it, which meant Mu Sicheng had seemingly vanished into thin air inside the bathroom.

It really is a heresy!

The officer took a deep breath. "Report, the heretic, identified as number 004, who is said to be very skilled at stealing, has escaped due to my negligence. I will be punished when I return. Inform the other squads to be cautious and catch any heretics named by Captain Tang tonight!"

"They're all very cunning!"

In the hospital corridor.

The police officer guarding Liu Jiayi outside her ward is communicating with the team from the special unit that has arrived unexpectedly.

"Are you...?" The policeman guarding Liu Jiayi stared in disbelief at the heavily armed and well-trained visitors.

The team member in the dark grey uniform showed his ID. "We are from the Dangerous Heresy Unit. We've taken over the Blood Lingzhi case, which has had a significant social impact. Liu Jiayi is a key witness in the Blood Lingzhi case. We're not at liberty to disclose too much information, but you can confirm our identity directly with your superiors."

The two policemen guarding Liu Jiayi glanced suspiciously at the weapons carried by the visiting group.

Handcuffs and wristcuffs, fully armed, possibly with anesthetic needles and steel bar cages, and two or three armored vehicles covered in green ponchos parked outside the hospital.

This didn’t seem like a team sent to escort an important witness. It felt more like a team prepared to apprehend a dangerous suspect.

Only after the two policemen called and confirmed with their superiors that the visitors were indeed from the regular department did they reluctantly allow them inside.

The group quickly and efficiently donned their gas masks, which startled the two officers once again.

The team didn’t just bring their own masks; they handed two masks to the confused policemen and advised, "Comrades, when we go in later, if a black mist fills the ward, you must get as far away as possible. Don’t inhale or touch it, and try to stay in areas with higher wind convection. It’s poisonous."

"Is there a toxic gas leak somewhere in the hospital?" the two bewildered police officers asked.

"No, it’s something much worse than that." The third team member, leaning against the door, took a deep breath and gestured to the rest of the team. "One, two, three!"

The door to the ward slammed open, and the team scattered quickly across the room in a fan formation, pistols raised, surrounding the small bulging mass on the bed.

The leader of the group was about to fire but soon sensed something was wrong. He raised his hand in a signal to pause. "Wait."

He stepped forward, gun raised, and pulled back the covers, revealing an ugly doll made of pillows about the size of Liu Jiayi. The doll was sticking out its tongue and grinning nastily, as though mocking the group who had worked all night and found nothing.

"Liu Jiayi, where is she?!" the leader of the team demanded, glaring at the two policemen outside the ward.

The two policemen were equally confused. "Look at the surveillance—she was asleep in the bed! The door and window were closed. Where could she have gone?"

Liu Jiayi had disappeared from the sealed ward.

The team leader exhaled in frustration and reported into the intercom, "Report, failed arrest of proposed heretic number 601 with poison gas hazard."

Mu family villa area.

The third team member sat on the couch, watching Muke, who was clutching his chest, clearly in distress.

Muke frowned, biting his lower lip. His face was as pale as a sheet, and his hands gripped his chest tightly. His parents hovered around him, both visibly worried.

Papa Mu, for the third time that night, picked up his teacup, his voice as cold as a threat: "I don't know what kind of dispute my son has gotten involved in, but what kind of major social incident could he possibly be mixed up in? He's a preconditioned patient who doesn't even leave the house and won't even take a few steps without scaring us."

"To take him on a trip? Not to mention whether you even have the qualifications—if anything happens to my son, can you afford the consequences?!"

Papa Mu slammed his teacup onto the coffee table, puffing out his chest and glaring. "Don't think that I, Mu Jingwu, can just be pushed around by anyone, or that you can take my son away just because someone barges into my house and says a few words. I'm not an uneducated fool!"

Muke, lying on the sofa with his eyes closed, pretended to be suffering from heart pain. He peeked through a slit in one eye, catching sight of the awkward, embarrassed expressions of the team members sitting across from him. The corner of his mouth twitched slightly.

However, he soon silenced himself, frowning again as he lay back on the sofa, his face so pale it was almost transparent, as fragile as if the team could kill him with just a touch.

The team members were also struggling, but there wasn't much they could do about Muke.

Captain Tang, the unreliable leader, had said that Muke wasn't strictly a heretic, but he had to be brought in.

Muke had no combat skills, and in any other timeline, he was more of an external spokesman for Bai Liu, relying on his excellent memory to handle and sell the various heresies born of Bai Liu's hands.

Though Muke had no abilities, he played an important role as an intermediary in Bai Liu's evil object-based gold-devouring network, acting as a manager for Bai Liu's underground criminal team.

For years, Bai Liu had relied on Muke to make contact with others under his command and pass on information. Bai Liu had hidden himself so well that the Dangerous Heretics Bureau had long thought of Muke as nothing more than a madman collecting money from evil objects. But eventually, they realized that Muke was just one of Bai Liu's cards on the table—the true king of ghosts was hidden even deeper.

Muke had relied on his illness for years to muddy the waters, pretending to be dumb with the Heresy Bureau. When things went wrong, he would collapse, eyes closed, playing his game. That's why they had to send Muke to the hospital for treatment, something that made Su Yang's hair stand on end every time.

It was the same this time.

Muke was not like the others—he had a powerful father and a natural protective layer provided by his condition.

Tang Erda's forced capture of Muke didn't meet the requirements for a heretic who must have had a harmful effect on humanity. The department couldn't afford to force Muke's capture. After all, Muke's heart condition was real, and his identity was not simple. It would be a difficult situation if he died in the Bureau of Heresy.

The heart patient, fragile as a crystal cat, seemed harmless. But in the eyes of the third team in this timeline, Muke was evil, sinful, and cunning.

However, this wasn't entirely true, because as Tang Erda had said, Bai Liu protected those around him—people like Muke—very well.

Muke, both in and out of the game, had never killed or directly harmed anyone. His hands were not stained with blood. He only negotiated, did business, and ran the guild. Out of some sense of empathy, he had even saved a number of desperate, unskilled players in the game.

This was why it had been difficult for the Heresy Bureau to deal with Muke in other timelines—because, in a narrow sense, Muke hadn't had a harmful effect on humans. He was, in a way, just a normal human being.

Muke only invested in projects he thought were worthwhile, and he could easily claim ignorance about the consequences. After all, Muke had invested in numerous projects, many of which he hadn't even thoroughly examined, so he could genuinely say he didn't know they were evil.

Because, at first glance, they didn't appear to be.

These were, after all, just ordinary mushrooms, unremarkable antique mirrors, and beautifully crafted sculptures of mermaids.

Muke thought they were good projects and promoted them. He wasn't even directly involved in their processes. So unless Muke admitted it, he couldn't be judged a heretic.

Just like now.

For Liu Jiayi, Mu Sicheng, and Bai Liu—three heretics for whom Tang Erda could positively hold evidence of crimes that had caused harmful effects on humanity—it was possible to arrest them by force.

But not for Muke.

Tang Erda couldn't tell if Muke was being deceived or if he was actively working with Bai Liu.

In every timeline, there was no direct evidence that Muke willingly aided Bai Liu, nor that he was simply a poor man coerced into being an accomplice. The line between good and evil was strangely blurred in Muke's case.

Muke's father refused to comply, even threatening to call the police, claiming he would use his special connections to make sure the third team members left his home.

Muke, who had been lying on the sofa pretending to be ill, sat up suddenly, breathing heavily. He grabbed his phone and opened a message sent to him by Bai Liu at 9:16.

[Beware of roses and hunters. I may die at the hands of a hunter. Don't wait for me. Get out of here.]

Muke's face hardened as he gripped his phone.

Dead at the hands of hunters? Was the group that came for them tonight [the hunters]? Had Bai Liu already been captured?

In-game:

Liu Jiayi meets up with Mu Sicheng at the entrance to the game, both having just experienced the death of Liu Huai, a person who meant something to them. The atmosphere between them feels stagnant and stiff, their faces numb. However, the silence doesn't last long.

Finally, Mu Sicheng speaks up, a little stiffly, "I got Bai Liu's text. Did you get it too?"

Liu Jiayi, who is blind, resists the urge to roll her eyes and simply points to her own eyes in silence.

Mu Sicheng coughs awkwardly, "I forgot you can't see. You don't act like a blind person at all in the game. How did Bai Liu inform you that something was going to happen to him and let you into the game?"

"He didn't tell me anything was going to happen to him," Liu Jiayi replies in a calm tone, "He just told me to enter the game at night. But that night, a group of people suddenly came to arrest me. The noise they made was so loud. I have good hearing, so I noticed something was wrong and retreated into the game immediately. Sure enough, the group who came to arrest me was related to Bai Liu. What happened to him?"

Mu Sicheng reads the message Bai Liu sent him aloud to Liu Jiayi.

Liu Jiayi listens carefully, then frowns in thought, "Hunter and Rose... If that's what it's called, I might have a clue... I might know who this person is."

"What's the clue?" Mu Sicheng reacts, unable to follow Liu Jiayi's reasoning. How could she deduce who arrested Bai Liu after hearing a text message?

He frowns at her, "You know this [Hunter] who took Bai Liu?"

"I'm not sure it's the same person," Liu Jiayi begins, "But when I was training with the King's League team, Hearts gave me an extraordinary-level item called [Magic Space]." Liu Jiayi looks up at Mu Sicheng, her eyes misty, "Extraordinary-level props are usually only produced in Level 3 games, by collecting all the monster books, and are very difficult to obtain."

"This means this [Magic Space] came from a Level 3 game that's probably unexplored... But of course, there's another possibility." Liu Jiayi pauses, "A very rare, difficult possibility."

Mu Sicheng's face goes stony as he picks up on her words. "Another possibility is that someone cleared a Level 3 game with a monster book on their own and with the mini-TV turned off. We wouldn't be able to find any information about this Level 3 game because there's no clearance video in the library. If the mini-TV had been on, the video would definitely be in the VIP library."

"But if that's the case..." Mu Sicheng can't help but shiver, pulling at his hair in frustration. "Damn it. Whether it's a single-player Level 3 game or a multiplayer game, the abilities of this person are terrifying. One person passing a Level 3 game with a set of monster books... Could this be the person who took Bai Liu? How do you know?"

"I can't be sure it's the same person who took Bai Liu," Liu Jiayi admits, "But I think there's a strong possibility they're connected. Hearts said the prop came from an old player with a strange skill identity." Liu Jiayi looks toward Mu Sicheng, her voice low, "That player's skill identity is called [Withered Rose Hunter]."

"Tsk." Mu Sicheng tightens his brows as if he could kill a fly with them, "It matches the message Bai Liu sent me."

"But even if this hunter player is powerful, Bai Liu just needs to find a way to evade his surveillance to enter the game. At least in the central hall, this hunter has no way of hurting him. And why does Bai Liu always seem to attract such a great enemy?" Mu Sicheng mutters.

"Unlucky, I guess. Bai Liu's zero luck value truly lives up to its name." Liu Jiayi comments indifferently. "I thought he was unlucky enough to meet me in his third game, but I didn't expect him to be even unluckier."

Liu Jiayi adds calmly, "And, unfortunately for you, I don't think Bai Liu will be able to get into the game."

Mu Sicheng raises an eyebrow, "What do you mean, he can't get into the game? As long as there are no [onlookers], we players can enter the game anytime. I don't think a hunter of some sort can trap Bai Liu in reality."

A system panel appears in front of Liu Jiayi, which she shows to Mu Sicheng.

[Prop Name: Magic Space]
[Prop Description: You can control a space you specify, allowing those you want to enter to enter and those you want to exit to exit. Sorry, this prop has been dropped and picked up by player Bai Liu. You cannot use this prop at this time.]

"Generally speaking, we players can enter the game at any time if there are no [onlookers]—ordinary people who haven't entered the game. But there is another way in which players can be prevented from entering the game," Liu Jiayi explains.

She looks at Mu Sicheng. "That's by using props in reality. If Hearts got [Magic Space], an extraordinary-level prop, from this [Fading Rose Hunter], it means this Level 3 game was cleared by this hunter. And—"

Liu Jiayi speaks calmly: "As long as this Level 3 game refreshes once and this hunter clears it once, they will have a [Magic Space]. They could even pass the [Magic Space] to the King's Guild. This suggests the veteran player has more high-level props, and Bai Liu is most likely being trapped by him with them."

Mu Sicheng's face darkens as he thinks about it. "But aren't props generally not allowed to be used casually in reality, except for those core props that fulfill desires?"

Liu Jiayi puts the panel away and shrugs nonchalantly. "What if this person's core desire is related to Bai Liu?"

"It can't be that much of a coincidence..." Mu Sicheng's voice weakens as he looks at Liu Jiayi's expressionless face. He grits his teeth, muttering, "Bai Liu, you unlucky bastard."

"You and I both know what Bai Liu's luck value is. So when thinking about things related to him, it's best to prepare for the worst," Liu Jiayi comments as she rummages through the prop store. "We've been in the game for so long, and Bai Liu hasn't come to meet us. He said he'd be in the game at night, and he rarely goes back on his word. So it seems the worst-case scenario I've been talking about has already happened."

"Let’s go." Liu Jiayi finds a dark goggle that’s slightly too big for her, putting it on. Half of her face is covered by the oversized goggles. She turns to Mu Sicheng. "Go save that unlucky bastard who keeps getting into trouble."

[System Alert: Player Liu Jiayi wears a prop (Blizzard Goggles) that keeps her vision clear in extreme weather conditions, such as blizzards. The prop expires when damaged.]

"But we don’t know the true identity of this hunter, we don’t know where he is, and we don’t know how to find him or Bai Liu, who was captured by him." Mu Sicheng asks, furrowing his brow.

"I don’t know." Liu Jiayi pushes the oversized goggles on her face, "But having dealt with players from the King's Guild, I know of one person who will definitely be looking into his reality information."

Mu Sicheng and Liu Jiayi exchange a look, realizing at the same time, "Wang Shun!"

"I’m a senior player in the King’s Guild now, so I can get him out. The problem isn’t getting Wang Shun out," Liu Jiayi takes a deep breath. "But if Hearts finds out I got Wang Shun out to set up a conversation for Bai Liu, that would be a problem. Bai Liu is now a member of another guild, and I would be betraying the guild. She won’t make it easy for me..."

Mu Sicheng sneers and asks, "Does she make you feel better?"

Liu Jiayi falls silent for a moment before exhaling. "Better than that. She used me, but her use has at least kept me safe until now."

"There’s nothing wrong with being used," Mu Sicheng remarks with a sarcastic smile. "Oh, you think it’s a good time, so you use Liu like this too..."

Liu Jiayi turns her head and looks at him, making Mu Sicheng stop mid-sentence.

Liu Jiayi's expression is one of shocking indifference, as if despair has drained all life and desire from her.

Mu Sicheng clenches his teeth, resisting the urge to continue pricking at Liu Jiayi with his words. Instead, he asks, "So if you still feel good about being used, why did you betray Hearts to save Bai Liu, the young witch seeded by the King's Guild?"

At the end of his sentence, Mu Sicheng's tone is mocking.

"Because I no longer have a reason to be used." Liu Jiayi lowers her head. "I was used as an excuse to die, and his soul chose Bai Liu. I rarely agree with my brother's choices because he is really stupid. He makes cowardly decisions, like being friends with dangerous people like you, going against the King's Guild, and trying to protect someone like me."

"I never agreed with his choice because it was clearly self-destructive. But this time, I wanted to try... my brother's choice."

Mu Sicheng falls silent for a moment. He looks away awkwardly and hands Liu Jiayi a tissue. "No."

Liu Jiayi pushes Mu Sicheng's hand away with an expressionless look. "I'm not crying. Save it for yourself, useless thief."

"Who are you calling useless?!" Mu Sicheng growls in frustration.

"If you were useful, I wouldn't have had to pull out the visualization props I stored with someone else." Liu Jiayi mutters, her voice dripping with annoyance, "I was going to use it in the league, but you're a fool with only 74 intelligence points, so it wouldn't have come in handy. Guess I'll do it myself..."

"What's wrong with having 74 intelligence points?!" Mu Sicheng growls. "Do you have an IQ point... that high?!"

Liu Jiayi shoots him a disdainful glance. "Heh, don't forget what I'm combining with Zhang Gui for."

[The highest intelligence duo ever - Little Witch and Puppeteer]
[A great combination of 91 and 93]
[The newcomer with the highest intelligence value has emerged! Will they be the next generation of league warriors?]

...

Mu Sicheng finally remembers — Liu Jiayi was famous for her intellect before her skills were fully revealed.

"What are you freezing for?" Liu Jiayi turns to Mu Sicheng calmly. "Come on. I'll find a way to get Bai Liu out. You don't have to be too scared."

"Who’s scared?! Don’t just slander me because you’re young..."

Mu Family Villa

Muke took a deep breath and looked at his father, who had just hung up the phone. "Dad, did the professional hacker you hired manage to find the address of these people? Who the hell are they?"

"No," Father Wood replied, furrowing his brow in thought. "The other side is very protective. There's no way to pinpoint their exact address."

Muke's eyes darted from side to side as his mind raced. After a moment, he looked up again. "What if it's not the address of another base, but rather specific personal information that we can track down?"

Father Wood asked a few questions in English on the phone, then turned to Muke. "Yes, but we need specific details like phone numbers, names, or photos. Unfortunately, we don't have any of that. They were using shields when we arrived, so we couldn't capture any photos, the surveillance was disabled, and they were wearing tight masks..."

"I can draw them out." Muke interrupted, his eyes suddenly sharp with determination. "A 3D scan of their facial bone structure should be enough to identify them. I can restore it."

Father Wood fell silent. "Wait, just a few minutes ago, did you note down the skeletal structure of everyone's face?"

"Yes, Dad," Muke replied calmly.

Father Wood spoke quietly into the phone, then turned to Muke. "Alright. Is there any particular information you need to focus on?"

"Anyone who might be under financial strain, or has bad habits—like drinking or gambling—or someone getting married, or with a newborn, or elderly family members in poor health," Muke said quickly. "Anyone likely to face a big expense soon. I need someone who could be swayed by money or material gain and would be willing to share information."

Father Wood gave Muke an understanding look before ending the call with a brief explanation.

He then turned to Muke, who was breathing heavily, his chest rising and falling, and regarded him with a complex expression. "This Bai Liu... he's done a lot more for you than just save you, hasn't he, Ke? Do you really have to be involved with him?"

"It's not that I have to be involved with him." Muke slowly lifted his eyelids, his voice strained with breathlessness, making him seem fragile. "Dad, he makes me feel alive. If he dies, my soul dies with him. He's... very, very important to me."

Father Wood was silent for a moment, then placed a hand on Muke's shoulder. "I'll help you. You need cash, right? I'll make sure you get it. How much do you need?"

"It depends on how much these people planning to come after me are willing to be impressed by," Muke replied coolly.

Inside the King's Guild

Wang Shun looked confused as his system flashed a red notice.

[System Alert: An anonymous invitation has been sent to you by a King's Guild Premium player, inviting you to meet at the game portal.]

[Meeting Code: Long time no see, old friend.]

An invitation from a premium access player was something a mid-level guild like Wang Shun's could hardly refuse.

Suspicious, Wang Shun made his way to the game's entrance. But when he arrived, he saw no senior guild members he recognized—except for Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng saw him too and waved with a fake smile, greeting him with, "Long time no see, old friend."

Wang Shun subconsciously raised his hand to return the greeting, but then froze, a jolt of realization hitting him.

He felt something press against his rear end and instinctively threw his hands up—before his brain reminded him that this was a game lobby, where players couldn't harm each other.

A sweet, laughing voice came from behind him, "Don't worry, I can't hurt you here, but this is the game login. I can force you into the game, and once you're in, I can do whatever I want to you, Wang Shun."

Cold sweat instantly dampened Wang Shun's back. He recognized the voice and quickly bowed his head, his posture submissive. "Little witch, Queen Hearts is looking for you. We can discuss anything you want, I'll serve you unconditionally. You're an important player in our team, but... would you like to talk to Queen Hearts first?"

"The Queen doesn't seem to be in a very good mood because of your actions."

Wang Shun's words were clearly a veiled threat aimed at Liu Jiayi with Queen Hearts, but Liu Jiayi merely snickered and pushed him further against Mu Sicheng.

Mu Sicheng wrapped his arms around Wang Shun's neck, seemingly friendly, but in reality, he was secretly pulling him toward a corner.

Once they reached the corner, Mu Sicheng pinned Wang Shun against the wall. His hand pressed into Wang Shun's throat, slowly tightening, his tone cold. "We need to ask you something. Specific information about [The Withered Rose Hunter]. What's his name? Where does he live? What's his core desire to enter the game? You should be able to find all that with your skills, right?"

Wang Shun's throat constricted, even though he knew he wouldn't die. The feeling was unbearable. The pressure from Mu Sicheng was so intense that it felt like suffocating, but he couldn't break free, no matter how hard he tried to pull Mu Sicheng's hand away.

Gasping and coughing, his voice hoarse, Wang Shun croaked, "I can't tell you that—it's an act of rebellion!"

"Rebel meeting, or go into the game now, and I'll kill you. Your choice." Mu Sicheng lifted Wang Shun by the throat, his eyes cold and merciless. "I don't want to waste too much time on you. Will you talk?"

Liu Jiayi tilted her head, her hands behind her back, her voice sweet but sinister. "I haven't taken you to level 2 yet, Wang Shun. Do you want me to take you this time?"

Take him where? To hell?

Wang Shun looked into Mu Sicheng's eyes. The emotions swirling in them formed a black vortex that seemed to pull him in. Even though he felt dizzy, he realized that Mu Sicheng would really find a way to kill him in the game.

"Ahem! You guys put me down first! Put me down so I can talk!" Wang Shun choked out, pulling desperately.

Mu Sicheng finally loosened his grip, pulling his hands into his tracksuit pockets. He gave Wang Shun a disdainful look as he crouched on the floor, coughing weakly. "I can't even touch you."

But in truth, Wang Shun knew the real answer—he was intimidated by Mu Sicheng, something embarrassing he could never admit.

Thanks to his "Know-it-all" skill, Wang Shun was more attuned to emotions than most people. The malice from both Liu Jiayi and Mu Sicheng had made him shudder, pushing him to confess.

"I don't know all the specifics of the person whose skill identity is [Withered Rose Hunter]." Wang Shun finally calmed himself and spoke.

Mu Sicheng shot him a vicious look, but before his hand could move, Wang Shun quickly stepped back, continuing, "But I know some information that might be useful."

Mu Sicheng raised an eyebrow. "What news?"

Wang Shun warily held his hands out in front of his chest, preventing Mu Sicheng from grabbing him. "My personal skill is called [Know-it-all]. It can detect basic information about an opponent, but it's not universal. I can't always find out everything, it requires certain conditions."

Mu Sicheng's patience was thinning. "What are the conditions? Get to the point!"

Wang Shun's eyes darted around as he spoke, "To me, everyone is like a computer, and I'm like a hacker who needs to bypass the [firewall] inside the computer to steal information."

"The strength of each person's [firewall] varies. For example, take God Mu—you, before, I couldn't easily access your information because your emotions and attention were focused and stable. Your [firewall] was solid, and it was very hard for me to steal information from you."

At this point, Liu Jiayi, who had been listening intently, whipped her head toward Mu Sicheng and shouted, "Stupid! Calm down your emotions! He's about to steal the information in your head!"

Before Mu Sicheng could react, Wang Shun quickly continued, "But now there's a crack in your attention—"

Wang Shun's eyes changed as he quickly pulled up a notepad from his system panel. "Sorry, God Mu."

The notepad displayed like a terminal code, and suddenly a series of characters filled the screen.

Wang Shun skimmed through it quickly, spotting the message before Mu Sicheng lifted him again. Gritting his teeth, Mu Sicheng slammed Wang Shun against the wall. "Fuck..."

Wang Shun exhaled deeply, raising his hands in surrender. He looked steadily at Mu Sicheng. "You're going to save Bai Liu, aren't you? He's been captured. If you're planning to do that, maybe we can talk terms."

"Put him down," Liu Jiayi ordered coldly. "We've lost the initiative."

Mu Sicheng ground his teeth but eventually let go.

Wang Shun dropped to the ground and stood up, brushing off his clothes as if nothing had happened. "I can tell you what I know, but I need a guarantee when you save Bai Liu."

Liu Jiayi frowned. "What guarantee?"

"If I'm judged as a rebel by the King's Guild for leaking information to you, and they find out I know too much, the Queen will come after me." Wang Shun smiled bitterly. "At that point, it would be nice if Bai Liu could protect me."

"... That's all the guarantee you need?" Liu Jiayi frowned. "And you're willing to risk defecting to help us save Bai Liu? Do you know what rebellion means?"

"No one knows better than I do."

Wang Shun took a deep breath. "I helped the King's Guild recruit many promising newbies, using my skills to learn their inner desires and then coaxing them into joining. I've seen too many newbies rebel after realizing they've been deceived."

"Most of the players from the Rebel Society have disappeared from the game." Wang Shun fell silent.

Liu Jiayi looked up at Wang Shun. "So, why are you helping us?"

Wang Shun smiled. "Because Bai Liu is my favorite player out of all the ones I've screened. So far, I've never been able to break his [firewall]."

He spoke in a sincere tone, "I'm looking forward to the day when he becomes a god."

"... So you're a fan of Bai Liu?" Mu Sicheng looked at Wang Shun with a strange expression.

Wang Shun shrugged indifferently and smiled slightly. "You could say that. I was his first loyal viewer, and I want to see his 'show' go all the way to the end—even surpassing the King's Guild."

"For that, you need to bring him out of the [Rose Hunters'] hands."

Liu Jiayi followed up, "What exactly is the identity of this [Rose Hunter]? I haven't seen him in the league player profiles, but if he can turn off the little TV, then he's at least a top 100 player. I've never heard of such a strange player among the current top 100."

"Because he wasn't a consistent player in the top 100 and has now fallen down the rankings, [Rose Hunter] might be someone you newbies don't know. But a few years ago, he was a top 3 player," Wang Shun explained.

He took out his notepad, flipped through the pages, and then showed the information to Mu Sicheng and Liu Jiayi. "See? He's a [Gunner] league player."

"[Gunners League players]?" Mu Sicheng looked confused. "What does that mean?"

Wang Shun explained, "It means [Rose Hunter] doesn't have a guild of his own, and he doesn't team up with anyone. He seems to reject group actions, so no player knows when he entered the game, but he participates in the league every year."

"We all know it takes five people to sign up for the league. One person can't participate, so [Rose Hunter] would join a guild's team during the league period and then break away from that guild when the league ends. He's an itinerant league player, also known as a hired [Gunner's Aid]. Guilds that want a strong single combatant will pay a high price to hire a [Rose Hunter] for their team."

Mu Sicheng asked, "So what guild is he in now?"

Wang Shun shook his head. "He's not in any guild right now. [Rose Hunter] hasn't played in a league in two years. No matter how much guilds want him, he hasn't shown up."

"[Rose Hunter] is a God Xiang who haunts the game and forbids people from following his little TV. He changes his appearance to disguise himself, so no guild can find him when he doesn't want to be found. It's no surprise you haven't heard of him."

"Do you have any precise information about him?" Liu Jiayi asked, looking directly at Wang Shun. "He's most likely the one who took Bai Liu."

Wang Shun sighed and shook his head. "He has a thick firewall, and the few times I've tried to steal his information have failed."

Liu Jiayi bit her lower lip.

But Wang Shun paused, then continued, "However, the one time I tried to steal a bit of his data was at a league match two years ago. [Rose Hunter] came in late, looked out of form, and rightfully lost that game to the other side. I thought I might have an opportunity then, so I waited for him to log out at the exit of the Den."

Mu Sicheng's face changed when he heard this. He suddenly realized something. "Holy shit, Wang Shun, when you went to the exit to find Bai Liu, who had low mental value, were you also trying to take advantage of the opportunity to steal information from his brain?!"

Wang Shun pretended not to hear Mu Sicheng's accusation and continued, frowning as if recalling the events.

"I remember the day [Rose Hunter] smelled heavily of alcohol and stumbled out of the boarding gate. The system panel wasn't even closed, just wide open with a system prompt on it. I pretended not to brush up against him and used my skill—"

Wang Shun took a deep breath. "I've never seen such strange brain data. Human brains usually focus on personal things like appearance, career, desires, and so on. But not [Rose Hunter's]. He only had one name in his head. A dense one."

Wang Shun flipped to the relevant page in his notebook.

The page looked like a name was scribbled carelessly, almost madly, with a pen, filling an entire page.

[Su Yang].

Su Yang, Su Yang, Su Yang—!!!

It was like the name of someone you hiss, miss, and desperately grasp for when drowning and trying to catch the last straw.

Wang Shun silently flipped through another logbook, which read:

"[You've finally gotten the happiness you wanted. It's great that you're engaged.]"

"[Shouldn't my timeline, at this happiest moment in all your time and space, end here? After all, this is the wish I wanted, and it's finally been granted.]"

"[When I have destroyed the source of all the hidden dangers, I, the heretic, will leave you with all the elements that will endanger your happiness.]"

Wang Shun looked up at Liu Jiayi and Mu Sicheng. "I also saw a prompt on his system panel the other day."

"The system prompt said, 'Congratulations to the player for the change in the core of desire and the shift in skill identity from [Rose Hunter] to [Withered Rose Hunter].'"

Liu Jiayi and Mu Sicheng exchanged looks. "Do you know anything else about this Su Yang?"

Wang Shun nodded. "Rose Hunter's mind is filled with information about this Su Yang. When he thinks about him, his emotional and attentional [firewall] is full of holes. I'll give you all the information about Su Yang later..."

Mu Family.

It didn't take long for Woody's father's phone to ring again, an internet call. It was obvious that the hacker had come looking for him.

Muke's father gestured for Muke, who stood up with dead eyes, to calm down.

After exchanging a few words on the phone, he covered the receiver and turned to Muke. "I've got information on these people, but they're not showing any obvious distress about income or expenditure, and they seem loyal to the organization. It's probably going to be difficult to impress them with money."

Muke's face turned pale as he listened to his father continue, "These people are not in the portrait you sent over. However, we found that someone connected to all of them just had a baby in his family. The expenses have suddenly increased after the first month."

Muke asked, "What is this man's name?"

Father Mu looked at Muke. "Su Yang."

10:30 PM, Middle Construction Avenue.

The lights in thousands of homes were out at this time, and only the streetlights flickered. This was an old neighborhood, full of middle-aged and elderly people who lived here regularly, and there were no pedestrian lights at this hour.

However, a light was on in a room around the corner. Through the crack in the curtains lit by the pale light, you could see the mistress of the house, freshly bathed, tenderly looking at the child in the crib, gently rocking it with her hand while humming an unknown nursery rhyme.

She still seemed to have difficulty moving around. Sitting on a cushion, her back bowed for a while before the ache started to kick in. She frowned and leaned back, as if preparing to stand up with some support.

But as soon as she moved, the child in the cot began to make a grunting sound, almost as if about to cry. Its arms and legs flailed in restlessness, trying to grab her fingers.

She sat back down helplessly, lying on the edge of the cot with a sighing, contented smile on her face as she looked at the baby. "What's wrong with you today? You don't want mummy to go at all? Why are you so clingy? You don’t sleep well either?"

She gently pinched the tip of the little baby’s nose with her thumb, and the baby’s eyelids twitched. He sneezed and babbled a few times.

There was a sudden knock. She stood up with joy, turning her head and kissing the baby’s face. "Your daddy's finally home!"

The door opened, and Ji An’s delighted voice faded just as it rushed out. "You're back—"

She looked, somewhat amazed, at the little girl standing outside.

It was a thin little girl with strange, grayish eyes, wearing clothes that seemed too thin for the season. She looked fragile and had a sweet, doll-like face. She looked around the room, confused and timid but politely said, "Excuse me, big sister, I don’t see... I seem to be going the wrong way. This isn’t my home, is it?"

A blind little girl who had lost her way put Ji An's newly raised guard at ease.

She had just given birth and was overly caring for children, so she quickly softened her tone and demeanor. Kneeling down, she spoke to the girl face-to-face. "Where do you live? Do you have your parents' phone number? I'll call them for you to come and get you."

The little girl shook her head, her fingers twisting nervously. Her voice was faint. "I... I don't remember."

Ji An's maternal feelings flooded. "It's okay, what are your parents' names? Tell me, I'll see if I know them. I'll have to tell them how I can let you run around alone so late."

The young girl tilted her head seriously and said, "My parent's name is Su Yang. Can you help me find him?"

Ji An slowly stood up straighter, confused. "This is Su Yang's house. How can your parent be my husband?"

The little girl, or Liu Jiayi, instantly wiped the expression from her face, dropped her wringing hands, and waved them back. "Found it. This is it. Mu Sicheng, do it."

Ji An finally realized something was wrong and took two guarded steps back to close the door. But she couldn't pull it shut. A tall young man stepped out from behind her.

The young man was two heads taller than Ji An, with an exaggerated monkey headset around his neck. All he had to do was lift his elbow, and she couldn't close the door anymore.

Mu Sicheng's cold eyes met Ji An's. "Tell Su Yang to come out."

Ji An subconsciously reached for her phone to call the police, but she ended up emptying it into her shirt pocket.

Breathing heavily, she watched as the young man across from her slowly pulled out a pink-and-white mobile phone from his pocket and raised an eyebrow. "Looking for this, aren't you?"

"When did you steal that!" Ji An was on the verge of breaking down. "Who the hell are you people?!"

The cries of the baby in the nursery behind her rang out shrilly, and Ji An's face paled before quickly becoming desperate and broken.

"There's a child?" Liu Jiayi tilted her head slightly, always very attuned to sounds. She quickly concluded, "In the last room of the house, it must be Su Yang's child."

Ji An's mind went blank. She had no time to think and turned around, stumbling frantically into the nursery.

With trembling hands, she locked the door, turned, and picked up the baby. Breathing heavily, she paced back and forth across the room, tears of fear spilling from her eyes.

She pushed open the window and cried out into the empty street: "Anyone! Help! Somebody! Please!"

No one responded.

She sobbed hysterically, burying her face in the baby's swaddling clothes. Her hands covered the baby's ears as she kissed and soothed the frightened infant: "It's all right, baby. Sleep tight. Mummy's here. Mummy won't let anything happen to you."

The click of a lock being inserted with a key echoed behind her as it slowly turned.

Ji An's breath stopped. She reached into her pajama pocket with a trembling hand. The key to the baby's room was in there too.

Now, it felt as though everything was slipping away, as if those two had taken it all—her key, her baby.

Ji An let out a long sob, her face drenched in tears. She closed her eyes in despair.

The nursery door slowly creaked open.

It was empty, except for the cot bell still jingling.

Mu Sicheng gave a curious giggle, looking around the room and bending down to peek under the bed. “Where is she? I clearly saw her run in here.”

Liu Jiayi raised her hand to stop Mu Sicheng from advancing. “I can still hear her breathing.”

She half-closed her eyes, “She’s outside the window.”

“Outside the window?!” Mu Sicheng exclaimed in shock.

He stepped forward and yanked open the window to look outside, only to see Ji An holding the baby in her arms, perched on the external heater of the air conditioner. The tiny baby dangled helplessly in her embrace.

The night was cold and fierce, the wind blowing Ji An’s white nightgown, making it bulge and tremble. She looked like a dandelion about to be blown away, clinging to its seeds as tears streamed down her face.

Ji An’s eyes were bloodshot as she glared at Mu Sicheng, her teeth gritted. Like a protective mother, she threatened, “Even if I have to jump with the baby in my arms, I won’t let you use us to threaten Su Yang!”

Mu Sicheng’s head felt like it had doubled in size. “Big sister, we don’t have that in mind yet! Of course, there might be such an arrangement later, but right now, we mainly want to find Su—”

Before he could finish, Ji An took two alert steps back, shaking her head. The old air conditioning unit suddenly tilted, its rusted screws screeching as Ji An stepped back, causing her to lose balance and tumble down the stairs in a panic.

But, instinctively, Ji An threw the baby towards Mu Sicheng in a desperate move to save her child.

Her eyes were wide with desperation and pleading as her voice choked on sobs: “Please! Save my baby!”

Mu Sicheng’s pupils fluttered. His reflexes kicked in, and he hooked one foot on the window sill while reaching out with the other to grab hold of the crumbling air conditioning shelf, trying to prevent the baby and Ji An from falling.

The weight on his ankles caused the tendons in his forehead to bulge, and he pressed himself against the outer wall, gripping the window edge with one hand while the other wrapped around Ji An's waist as they descended.

"Shit!" Mu Sicheng's face turned red, his carotid artery pulsing from the strain. "You're heavy, big sister!!!"

The baby, loosened by Mu Sicheng's tugging, slipped from Ji An's arms.

The baby, dazed but somewhat happy, babbled and kicked her little legs, slowly sliding out of the swaddling clothes.

"Fuck!" Mu Sicheng's eyes widened in panic as the baby slid downward. "You hold onto your baby!"

The baby, now free of the swaddle, fell through the air with wide eyes, her arms and legs moving as if trying to reach her mother's fingers. Innocently, she continued to fall.

"The baby!!!" Ji An screamed, reaching desperately for her child. Her face twisted with panic, her tears streaming. "MY BABY!!!!"

Liu Jiayi leaped over Mu Sicheng, propping herself against the window with one hand before diving down without hesitation.

Mu Sicheng yelled, "Liu Jiayi! Hey! You can't see it!"

Liu Jiayi didn't look back, as if guided by a hidden sense, hanging lightly from the air conditioner. She jumped a few times before finally grabbing the foot of the falling child.

The baby hung upside down in mid-air, still confused, swaying on all fours and reaching out to Liu Jiayi for a hug.

With one arm stabilizing the child, Liu Jiayi landed swiftly, her feet touching the ground with a few more jumps. She waved casually at Mu Sicheng and then carried the baby, walking back up the stairs.

Mu Sicheng, visibly relieved, helped Ji An back up.

Ji An gasped in shock, her legs trembling as she stumbled toward the door.

When she opened it, Liu Jiayi was already standing outside, holding the baby's nappy far away from her. The baby, seemingly amused, giggled and reached out to grab Liu Jiayi's face.

Liu Jiayi pushed the baby away with mild disgust and quickly handed Ji An the nappy. "Here, she peed all over me."

Ji An, still holding the baby, sank to the floor, taking deep breaths to calm herself before covering her face and sobbing.

Mu Sicheng came out, rubbing his shoulder, his eyes wide in amazement as he looked at Liu Jiayi. "You're good. How did you jump onto those air conditioners so accurately?"

"Listen to the sound." Liu Jiayi said naturally. "When it's quiet at night, I can tell where obstructions are by the reverberations. The air conditioning unit is box-shaped, so the reverberations are louder and more obvious. Don't you know how to do that?"

At the end, Liu Jiayi's expression took on a hint of contempt.

Mu Sicheng stared at her. "....."

Was this some kind of bat-like skill I'm supposed to know? It's no wonder she can jump six floors with ease. What a monster child!

When Ji An came out after setting up the baby, her pajamas were still marked with rust from the air conditioning rack.

Mu Sicheng and Liu Jiayi were relaxed on the sofa. They likely didn't know the meaning of "sorry," but Ji An, now standing, was visibly nervous.

Especially after seeing the scratches on Mu Sicheng's face from her own hands and the redness and swelling on Liu Jiayi's palm from catching the baby, Ji An gripped her wrist and opened her mouth, but no sharp words came.

After a long silence, she turned into the room and brought out a small medical kit. Kneeling before the coffee table, she placed antiseptic, band-aids, and bandages there.

Looking at the items on the table, Mu Sicheng glanced at Ji An in confusion.

Ji An kept her head down, saying nothing, but she slightly tilted her head, avoiding his gaze.

Her hair was disheveled, and her eyes were swollen from crying.

Eventually, Mu Sicheng picked up the kit and handed it to Liu Jiayi with some disinfectant.

Once Ji An had gathered herself, she took a deep breath, turned to the two unexpected guests, and asked, “What do you want with Su Yang?”

“His colleagues caught us—” Mu Sicheng began, but before he could finish his thought, Liu Jiayi took over, speaking flatly. “His colleagues grabbed my dad without warning.”

Ji An’s face grew surprised. “Your... Dad?”

Liu Jiayi nodded without flinching. “Yes.”

Mu Sicheng covered his mouth and let out a cough. He was about to speak when Liu Jiayi’s hand twisted his waist under the table.

Liu Jiayi blinked, tears welling in her hollow eyes. She bit her lip, sniffled, and said softly, “Big sister, we really don’t want to hurt you. But my dad was taken away. I heard them shouting that one of the people involved in the arrest was called Su Yang—that’s all I know.”

“I’ve been looking for him, searching for so long before I found your place.” Liu Jiayi reached out, pathetically grasping Ji An’s sleeve. “We don’t want to hurt you or your baby. I just want my dad to come home. And you... you’re waiting for your child’s father to return, too, right? You have a child too. You know what it’s like for a child to be forced to lose the only father they can rely on.”

“I know he was doing dangerous work, but I swear everything he did was legal, all to give me a better life. He wouldn’t have done anything bad, even for me,” Liu Jiayi choked out, her tears falling freely. “I just want to understand why he was arrested when he did nothing wrong.”

As a new mother, constantly in fear for Su Yang, Ji An couldn’t help but empathize with Liu Jiayi’s words. Her rejection slowly faded, replaced by hesitation.

As Liu Jiayi cried, covering her face with unbearable sadness, Ji An finally relented. She saw her own child in this vulnerable girl who had just saved her baby’s life.

Ji An reached forward and hugged Liu Jiayi gently, sighing as she stroked her hair.

“... Don’t cry.” Ji An sighed, patting Liu Jiayi’s shoulder in comfort.

“Your dad... should be fine.”

Liu Jiayi looked up from Ji An’s shoulder, her face streaked with tears, and silently mouthed to Mu Sicheng: learn from it.

Mu Sicheng stared, dumbfounded. “.....”

Chapter End Notes

Like Father, like daughter □

The moment Ji An let go of Liu Jiayi, Liu Jiayi's face shifted to one of confusion and helplessness, like a little girl who had lost her father.

She seemed reluctant to let go of Ji An's warm embrace and gently folded her arms around her. But soon, she realized she was doing the wrong thing and let go again, nervously.

Liu Jiayi pulled her hands away and shyly adjusted her shirt, tears still hanging from her trembling eyelashes.

These little gestures made Liu Jiayi seem like a very upset child who had lost a loved one, softening Ji An's expression.

Mu Sicheng, who had been watching all of this, looked more and more perplexed: "..."

He wasn't surprised anymore that Liu Huai was being played by Liu Jiayi.

Liu Jiayi's performance was worthy of an Oscar. The girl could go from emotion to tears in less than a second.

Mu Sicheng wanted to shake Ji An and tell her, "Wake up, big sister, three minutes ago you thought this poor, cute little girl had jumped from the sixth floor without blinking and landed safely."

And this little girl's original plan was to kidnap you, threaten your husband, and force him to reveal Bai Liu's location.

Mu Sicheng's back chilled as he watched Ji An's gentle voice soothe Liu Jiayi. He couldn't help but rub his arms.

Well, that was scary! Who did Bai Liu get on the team?

"I rarely interfere with Su Yang's work. It's very confidential, and I don't know exactly what he's doing," Ji An said, still wary under Liu Jiayi's coaxing. "But I can ask around for you, and if he's willing to talk, I can help pass on your address. You're relatives of the prisoner, so you should be able to visit."

"If it was your father who was arrested, then who is this man who came with you?" Ji An asked suspiciously, eyeing Mu Sicheng.

Before Mu Sicheng could respond, Liu Jiayi quickly replied, "He's my father's friend."

Ji An was about to ask more when another knock came at the door.

Mu Sicheng quickly nudged Liu Jiayi's hand, and before Ji An could react, the two men were in the nursery, dryly closing and locking the door.

Ji An knocked anxiously twice, shaking the handle, but it wouldn't open—the key to the nursery was still in Mu Sicheng's hand!

She couldn't get in from the outside, except for Mu Sicheng, who could open the door from the inside.

Liu Jiayi's soft voice came timidly from inside, "Big sister, just ask my father, Bai Liu, for news. We won't hurt your child, I swear."

The thought that Liu Jiayi had indeed saved her baby, and that Mu Sicheng had saved her too, eased Ji An's panic a little. She hesitated for a moment in front of the nursery door before preparing to open it.

But this time, it wasn't Su Yang at the door either.

Standing outside was a young man dressed in seemingly simple clothing.

Ji An recognized the watch on the young man's wrist, one she'd seen in a TV series, said to cost millions of dollars. The young man had an exquisite appearance, well-kept clothes, and a pair of elegant gold-rimmed glasses perched on his nose.

Ji An felt calmer after the night's events. The man looked about her height and didn't seem very aggressive. Plus, there was an adult male with high combat skills in the nursery—Mu Sicheng—hiding in there.

She settled herself and looked at the man at the door. "May I ask who you are?"

"My name is Muke." Muke bowed politely to Ji An, then straightened up and asked, "Is this Su Yang's house, and are you his lover?"

Muke was wearing black leather gloves and carrying two black suitcases with combination locks.

"I am," Ji An nodded hesitantly, eyeing the suitcase Muke was carrying. "Is there something you want from him?"

Muke opened one of the suitcases, turning the combination lock a few times. He then slid the box open to reveal gold bars inside.

Ji An stared at the box in shock. "What is—?!"

"May I come in and talk to you?" Muke smiled decently, shaking the boxes of gold bars in his hand. "After all, these two boxes of things your husband wants are quite light, and it's not very safe for me to stand outside the door carrying them alone."

Somewhat dazed, Ji An stepped aside to let Muke in. "Please, come in."

The bright golden glow from the box still flashed in her mind, and she was a little dizzy when she sat down—she had never imagined someone would come to her in the middle of the night with two boxes of gold bars!

"May I ask what you mean when you say that these two boxes are what my husband wants?" Ji An asked sharply.

"That's something you should ask your husband," Muke replied, sitting neatly on the sofa. He folded his hands in his lap and looked at Ji An with a wry smile. "Ask him why he let his crew arrest a man who'd committed no crime and then demanded a sky-high bail from me, the man's rich friend?"

"No way," Ji An denied without hesitation. "Su Yang couldn't possibly do such a thing!"

It was true that Su Yang hadn't done such a thing, but that didn't stop Muke from presupposing it and using it to put pressure on Ji An.

"He really didn't do it?" Muke raised his eyes casually, his smile unchanging. "Then why was my friend taken in, and around ten o'clock this evening, Su Yang's team even came to the villa where I was staying and warned me to pay bail quickly or I'd be taken in as an accomplice too?"

Ji An clenched her hands to her chest and bit her lower lip.

Su Yang did call her around ten o'clock, saying the team had to go on a special assignment in the rich district. It was a last-minute arrangement.

Su Yang's tone seemed helpless, even as he explained that his captain had started making arrests before the case had a clear lead.

Why would they start arresting people in a case before it was clear?

And Su Yang had mentioned that the captain wasn't in good shape lately and had been arresting unrelated people...

Her eyes fell on the two boxes of gold bars on the table. Muke followed Ji An's gaze, watching as she opened the box. In that moment, the brilliant gold glow filled her vision.

Ji An quickly withdrew her gaze as though burned. Her fists clenched at her sides as she nervously paced across the room.

"No way!" Ji An's chest heaved as she closed her eyes, blocking out the gold bars and Muke on the sofa. "Su Yang is not that kind of person! Take the gold bars away!"

"You've been in a bad financial situation lately, haven't you?" Muke's voice came clear and steady as he continued. "This second-hand house isn't very safe anymore. You've been planning to get a new one, but the money hasn't been coming in. After all, a new baby costs too much."

Even with her eyes closed, Ji An could hear his voice.

"The birth of a child changes your thinking and values, Madam. You're willing to do things for your child that you weren't before, right?"

Ji An's breathing quickened, her nails digging into her palms.

"How can you be sure that your husband hasn't changed?" Muke's tone dropped lower. "Even if he hasn't, what if his boss has? What if the people around him have? Maybe he didn't do these things willingly, but everyone else did, and he had to go along with it. That happens all the time, doesn't it?"

"But what's done is done, and I won't blame him. He didn't mean to." Muke pushed the boxes of gold bars towards Ji An. "I believe your husband is a decent person. I won't tell anyone. Just take the gold bars and give me some information about where Bai Liu is, and I'll never speak of this again. You'll have done the right thing for Su Yang. You'll have saved an innocent man."

Muke adjusted his gold-rimmed glasses and smiled. "I'd feel it was money well spent, a good deal for me. I'm sure Su Yang feels the same."

Ji An’s breathing was rapid. Her hands hung at her sides, clenched violently. Her closed eyes trembled.

"As long as you get Su Yang to give me Bai Liu’s information," Muke said softly, "I can keep making offers until you’re satisfied. I’ve brought a truckload of gold bars, and we have all night to talk."

Ji An’s eyes snapped open as she stared at Muke. "Who did you just say you were saving?"

Before Muke could repeat the name, Bai Liu, the nursery door opened. Liu Jiayi and Mu Sicheng leaned against the wall, arms crossed. They raised an eyebrow and looked at Muke. "You’re here fast."

At 1 a.m., a tired Su Yang knocked on the door.

The moment he opened it, he collapsed into Ji An's shoulder and rubbed his face against it. "Honey, I'm home."

But this relief lasted less than a second. Su Yang quickly straightened up, holding Ji An's shoulders and scanning the room warily. "Has anyone been in the house today?"

The room wasn’t quite right—something had been moved.

Ji An forced a reluctant smile. "The air conditioning unit outside the baby's room broke and almost fell, so I called someone to fix it."

Su Yang relaxed slightly and kissed the top of Ji An's head, his tone apologetic. "I'm sorry for making you live in a second-hand house like this. We'll have money for a new one once this is all over."

Where would the money for a new house come from?

Ji An wanted to ask, but in the end, she just silently rested her head on Su Yang's shoulder and mumbled softly, "There's nothing to be sorry about."

Su Yang didn’t notice Ji An’s strange behavior as he unzipped his coat and walked straight to the baby’s room. He smiled as he peeked inside and began making silly noises to entertain their little girl.

Ji An couldn't help but cry at the sight of Su Yang looking so carefree after the emotional rollercoaster of the night. She felt like she might break down.

When Su Yang turned and saw Ji An wiping tears from her eyes, he walked over to her, helpless and heartbroken, and pulled her into an embrace, pressing his forehead against hers. "I made you wait so long, with all this worry."

Ji An shook her head, pushing gently on Su Yang's shoulders. She placed her hands on his temples and gave him a relaxing massage. "If I can't make it, can you?"

Su Yang relaxed completely under her hands, slumping in the chair. His eyes closed, and his breathing evened out.

But Ji An knew he was still awake, just in a sleepy state.

She asked softly, trying to sound casual, "You're working late tonight. Who are you arresting? Why so sudden? You told me you were coming home for dinner, but now you're working until 1 a.m."

Su Yang furrowed his brow but didn't open his eyes. "I actually think this person shouldn't have been arrested. It was Captain Tang who pushed for the privileged arrest, but I don't understand why. I didn't find any core evidence of a crime, but it seems like this person might be involved. Still, I don't think it warranted detaining him."

"Lately, Captain Tang's been asking us to arrest people with no core evidence, and we can't even see signs of a future crime," Su Yang continued with a sigh. "He's also in a bad state—drinking a lot and getting drunk. We had a fight tonight, and the team feels like he's acting out of character."

"He wasn't like this before..." Su Yang's head began to nod as he got drowsy, his words becoming less clear. "But still, I believe in Captain Tang. It's for all of our good. If this guy is really what Captain Tang says he is, locking him up will solve everything, and we won't have to work so hard in the future..."

Ji An exhaled slowly, her suspicions confirmed. She lowered her hands, still massaging Su Yang, her gaze focused.

Once Su Yang fell asleep, Ji An carefully slipped out of the bed. She grabbed Su Yang's work card and key from his jacket, which hung on the back of a chair. She opened the window in the baby's room and threw them downstairs.

Then, with a calm expression, Ji An closed the window, kissed the baby in the nursery, and left the room as if nothing had happened.

Two black leather suitcases were hidden along the edge of the crib.

.....

Downstairs, Mu Sicheng observed the dropped work card and keys. He sniffed them in distaste, waving them in front of his nose before smirking. "I don’t know what this is loaded with, but it smells terrible. Let’s go. I remember his scent."

Muke had already dialed a number. He looked at Mu Sicheng and Liu Jiayi, shaking the phone in his hand. "I got in touch with the hacker. He said if we hook up the car recorder on the GPS, we’ll be able to track where he's been."

"Let’s find the car."

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

1:30 a.m., Dangerous Heresy Bureau base.

Despite being caught, Bai Liu slept soundly against the wall, undisturbed. The footsteps of the patrols outside the room were loud but largely unobtrusive to him.

His eyes were closed, and his eyelids didn't flutter, much to the dismay of the patrol members who had been instructed by Tang Erda to check on Bai Liu's condition.

"This man is unbelievably mentally resilient..."

"I'm starting to wonder if he's really a heretic..."

"Hey, do you think he can really solve the problem with that dried rose leaf gas? The Bureau said the situation has gotten so bad that most of us in the Heresy Bureau have been reassigned to deal with it. There aren't many people left at the base, and many team members are starting to crack under the pressure..."

"Tomorrow, the third detachment is supposed to investigate the perfume production factory, right?"

"Yeah, I heard Captain Su is leading the team. A lot of members from the first two detachments started to deteriorate soon after returning. That heresy is awful—it's already at the level of a severe third-degree red heresy..."

Bai Liu, who they thought was sound asleep, opened his eyes silently once they had left. He counted the seconds in his mind—the patrols here make rounds every fifteen minutes, which is roughly nine hundred seconds.

Bai Liu took the Game Manager coin from around his neck and narrowed his eyes.

With the loss of the cross and scales, most of his special items were no longer accessible in the real world.

But there was one thing he could still use—money.

This [Magic Space] controls the entry and exit of people, but not of matter, meaning money can come and go freely in this space.

What if Bai Liu is money?

This kind of extraordinary item, which can trap people in and out of the game, is supposed to work on a soul level. If Bai Liu were to leave this [Magic Space] in the form of a soul note, would it, in a sense, release him? Would the space no longer be able to trap him?

Bai Liu slowly pulled a soul note out of his pocket.

The soul note bore the cold, astringent face of little Bai Liu— a coin generated from his half-soul, imprisoned in his wallet after a trade default in the previous round.

Bai Liu looked down at the soul note in his fingers, his head bowed, lips curled into a smile.

The only problem now was getting the patrolmen to open it for him voluntarily.

As another fifteen minutes passed, the patrolman opened the small window to check on Bai Liu's condition. Instead of seeing Bai Liu's sleeping face on the side of the bed as before, coins began pouring out in a steady stream.

A cascade of coins and dollar bills—some in cents, others in notes of various amounts—rushed through the small window in a frenzy. It was as if the patrolman had opened not a prison room, but the bottom bin of a game machine, overflowing with coins.

The coins and notes mixed together, forming a coin fountain as they spilled through the window.

Among the stream, a coin folded into a triangular shape followed.

This note was no different from the others, save for the subtle fold that disguised it. Its difference was hidden, a detail easily overlooked in the rush.

As this note gushed out, Bai Liu, now lying atop a mountain of coins he'd created, licked his lips in pleasure.

He realized that he was losing control.

But with the patrolmen still present, Bai Liu couldn't dive straight into the game. He needed to escape the prying eyes of the onlookers before he could act.

Outside, the patrolman panicked, shouting into his comms: "Report to the night watchman! Room number 006 is pouring out so many coins that the humanoid heretic inside can't even be seen! It's drowning in coins!"

"What?!" The night watchman's voice crackled with surprise, but he quickly regained his composure. "Open up and find the Humanoid Heretic! Captain Tang is very concerned about this heretic and has requested the use of heretic number [2617] [Magic Space] for this room. This heretic can control the entry and exit of people inside, so don't panic too much. I'll transfer you to Captain Tang now!"

The patrolman nodded. "Yes, I'll continue the search!"

Just then, a transfer signal came through.

Tang Erda's unusually stern scolding rang out from the communicator: "Don't open it!"

Tang Erda gritted her teeth. "Once this man starts spending, he must have found a way to recover it. He's found a way to escape!"

"Eh...?" The patrolman sounded confused. "But I've opened it already. It should be fine. Using 2617—a creature trapped inside could never escape easily—"

Before he could finish, a muffled sound, like something falling, followed by the patrolman's voice disappearing, was all that was heard.

After a burst of static, Tang Erda's voice returned, calm but full of urgency: "What happened? Report in!"

Bai Liu's unhurried laughter filled the line, "Captain Tang, how about we make a deal?"

Tang Erda, pressing the accelerator to the floor as he drove, forced himself to stay calm, trying to stall Bai Liu. "What deal? If you're talking about the money-for-roses deal with the dried leaf gas, we've already settled that—"

He paused, his voice taking on an air of exasperation. "I can offer you the solution to buy the dried leaf rose gas at the original price, but you swear you'll never smuggle it in again! Nor cause any more accidents that would make dried rose leaf gas popular again!"

The rapid footsteps and shouts of alarm soon reached Tang Erda's comms as patrolmen from the base spotted Bai Liu fleeing. "There's a heretic out there!"

Bai Liu, in no hurry, replied with an amused tone, "Oh? Sounds like I've gone back on our deal, huh?"

Tang Erda's frustration boiled over. Yes, this time, he had no intention of dealing with Bai Liu using money. After all, Bai Liu had backtracked on the last deal with them.

Bai Liu had helped the Bureau of Dangerous Heresies with the dried rose leaf gas, but after being paid, he never disclosed the treatment method, claiming the protocol was his exclusive patent. After saving those affected by the gas, and at Su Yang's insistence, Bai Liu was released.

However, a year later, a factory that had previously produced dried rose leaf gas began operating again, and some people fell victim to it. The Bureau had to bring Bai Liu back in, paying him to assist once more.

But Bai Liu didn't play along quietly. When he was driven to the factory, he stood on the rooftop, gazing down and asking the team guarding him, "Do you want to know what the gas smells like when it explodes?"

The confused officers didn't understand what he meant. Bai Liu raised his hand, mimicking an explosion, and smiled. "BOOM! Then, you'll smell it—the scent of burning roses. It's beautiful."

The factory exploded shortly after.

Rose-colored smoke flooded the area, igniting everything in its path. Su Yang's home was nearby, and the explosion killed the entire 3rd detachment.

Tang Erda had led the investigation into the perfume factory, and he would never forget the moment he turned to see Bai Liu standing on the rooftop amidst the chaos. Bai Liu looked at him lazily, one hand in his pocket, a mischievous smile on his lips.

"Does it smell good, Captain Tang?"

The memory of that moment stung Tang Erda as he tried to regain composure.

"I can make a deal with you, as long as you don't back out," he said through clenched teeth. "I'll offer you a considerable sum."

Bai Liu replied smoothly, "I must say, I'm impressed. But what you're really thinking right now is that you'll kill me once you get the solution, right? After all, there's no better way to prevent me from backtracking than that—the dead can't backtrack."

Tang Erda's teeth clenched as he floored the gas, nearly speeding out of control. He could already see the circular building that housed the base. Almost there.

Bai Liu's voice rang out again, lightly teasing. "Captain Tang, you care so much about me. But after you caught me, you left me alone in that room all night. Isn't that a bit strange? Let me guess—you went behind my back to see someone, didn't you?"

Bai Liu's tone was sharp, a mix of ambiguity and coldness. "You found it hard to control me, so you wanted someone who could hold me in check. Someone who could interrogate me... Lu Yizhan."

Lu Yizhan, sitting beside Tang Erda, blinked in confusion. "Huh? Did you call me, sir?"

Tang Erda slammed the steering wheel, a mad grin on his face as he looked ahead. "I've always wondered why you're like this in this timeline. After looking into your past, I realized that the deviation point is this guy sitting beside me—Lu Yizhan."

Lu Yizhan glanced at Tang Erda, perplexed. "Sir? What are you talking about?"

Tang Erda swerved into the parking lot, barely missing a mark as he parked the car with a screech.

After dragging Lu Yizhan out, Tang Erda began dialing his comm again, calling in the escapee. "Report: 3rd Detachment Leader Tang Erda, pursuing escaped heretic 006. Request to close all base entrances. We have him on surveillance—"

But then, he paused. His tone shifted, darkening.

"Heretic number 006's weakness is water. I request to use room 1087

[Devouring Fountain] for his interrogation."

A dark gleam appeared in Tang Erda's eyes. He licked his canines, his voice dropping low. "Heretic 006 hates having his head held under water. That's how I'll interrogate him."

Lu Yizhan's expression faltered, and he grabbed Tang Erda's arm to stop him from moving forward. "You can't do that. Even if he committed a crime, he still has rights."

Tang Erda gave a dry laugh, his eyes darkening. "Oh? You think he still has rights?"

Bai Liu's voice cut in from the comm, smooth and unbothered. "Captain Tang, don't you think he knows who I am?"

He paused, a teasing edge in his tone. "What makes you think he can be my friend for ten years?"

Lu Yizhan stood frozen, realizing the truth. He suddenly understood that Bai Liu might have committed serious crimes. He turned to Tang Erda with a panicked expression.

"Sir, it's not true, right? He's not involved in anything serious? He didn't—" Lu Yizhan trailed off, his face twisted in concern. "He didn't commit murder or something, right?"

Tang Erda remained silent, his demeanor grim.

Lu Yizhan, with his hands to his face, sank into despair. "Has he turned into a serial killer, or some kind of criminal mastermind? God, I've only been away for two days and—"

Bai Liu's voice broke through the tension, carefree as ever. "You see what I mean?"

He dodged a patrolman's reach, speaking to Tang Erda as if they were discussing business. "Why don't you consider making a deal with me?"

Tang Erda's expression was dark and sullen as he dragged Lu Yizhan by the back of his collar toward the lift in the underground car park. Upon reaching the lift doors, he swiped his work pass open without hesitation and pressed the special warning button inside after stepping in.

"I can pay," Tang Erda said, his tone growing increasingly annoyed.

“You name the price, and I’ll get the solution for the rose gas!”

As Tang Erda pressed the alarm button, a piercing siren echoed through Bai Liu's corridor, and the bright white lights shifted to a flashing, dark red alarm.

“Warning! Warning! Heretics are on the loose!”

Bai Liu, unhurried, turned into a side corridor, easily evading those who came after him.

Fifteen minutes of patrol rotations and the long night of waiting had given him enough time to deduce something: there wasn’t much staff at this base, or else it wouldn’t be the same patrolman checking on him each time.

Bai Liu’s escape seemed calm. He wasn’t the one anxious—his pursuers were. His escape proved that, as a heretic, he was difficult to handle, and ordinary patrolmen might not have dared to confront him. Even if they caught him, they wouldn’t have known what to do with him.

But that was before Tang Erda arrived.

Bai Liu listened to the sound of the lift arriving from Tang Erda’s communicator, hearing the beeps as the lift moved between floors. One... two... three.

It could either be three levels down or three levels up from the car park, but Bai Liu’s impression was that the building was not very tall, so it was more likely to be down.

He must be around the fourth basement level, Bai Liu mused to himself.

Casually, he stuffed the soul notes he had taken from the mountain of coins into his pocket, then spoke into his communicator. “I’m not going to negotiate a money deal with you. I can give you the solution for the dried rose leaf gas, but I want something else.”

Tang Erda, hearing Bai Liu refuse the payment, frowned. “What do you want?”

“I want you to sell your soul to me and join my team,” Bai Liu quipped. “I’m playing in the league this year, but my team is still in the process of gelling. They need an experienced coach to guide them through."

"You've won the league, you have a lot of experience, and you should know plenty about the team you're playing against." Bai Liu offered a sincere compliment. "There's no better coach for my team than you, Captain Tang."

"I've left a room full of money for you to use in buying your soul. How about it? Think it over. I haven't been this generous in a long time." His voice was light and flirtatious, with a cocky grin, as if toying with a small pet.

Tang Erda, clearly furious, took a deep breath. "Bai Liu, you better hope I don't catch you."

With a cold look on his face, Tang Erda ended the call, the lift's arrival dinging in the background.

He yanked Lu Yizhan out of the lift, his face still cold, as he resumed dialing his communicator. "Report, 3rd Detachment Leader Tang Erda, in pursuit of escaped heretic 006. Request to close all base entrances and exits. He's visible on surveillance—"

He paused, his deep blue eyes turning almost black with rage. His tone dropped low, yet his face remained unnervingly calm.

"Heretic 006's weakness is water. I request to use room 1087, [Devouring Fountain], for his interrogation after capturing him."

Tang Erda licked his canines, his pupils dilating with excitement, as his breathing slowed in anticipation of the kill. "Need me to report on the interrogation method? Heretic 006 hates having his head held down and repeatedly dipped in water. That's how I'll interrogate him."

Lu Yizhan slowly looked at Tang Erda, noticing the calmness in his expression, and his own face shifted uneasily.

"Sir, you can't do that. Even if he committed a crime, he still has human rights," Lu Yizhan said, grasping Tang Erda's hand to stop him from moving forward.

Tang Erda chuckled nervously, his eyes sparkling unnervingly, but his face remained expressionless. He looked at Lu Yizhan and pulled his wrist away. "You know, I've told Bai Liu the same thing countless times. Even if he didn't do it, I wouldn't be in this situation now."

Tang Erda yanked Lu Yizhan's hand away so forcefully that the veins on the back of his hand stood out, but Lu Yizhan held firm. Then, with a sudden motion, Tang Erda locked eyes with him, and with a swift twist, he bent Lu Yizhan's wrist downward with ease.

Lu Yizhan couldn't help but hiss, his face contorting in pain.

"Human rights?" Tang Erda's deep blue eyes gleamed with a frightening light as he moved closer to Lu Yizhan. He gripped the loosened wrist and snapped it back into place with a sharp crack.

Lu Yizhan's face went pale, and cold sweat trickled down his forehead.

"All the world can live, but the heretics cannot," Tang Erda muttered, his pupils trembling with cold fury. He smirked maniacally. "Because we are not human. We are monsters."

"Monsters don't have human rights."

The Bureau of Heresy and Dangerous Treatment

Meanwhile, in the underground car park.

The door of the car next to Tang Erda's parking space slowly creaked open.

Mu Sicheng, who had been keeping watch, got out of the car and walked quickly to the lift, watching as Tang Erda entered. The lift descended fast and finally stopped at -4.

They exchanged glances as Liu Jiayi swiped Su Yang's work pass to unlock the lift, then pressed the -4 button.

Liu Jiayi's gaze remained fixed on the red alarm flashing inside the lift. Mu Sicheng's expression was so dark it felt like the color had drained from him, and Muke remained silent.

"Tsk." Mu Sicheng let out the breath he'd been holding while listening to Tang Erda and Bai Liu in the car. "Can I beat up this Tang guy later?"

"Did he say anything wrong?" Liu Jiayi asked nonchalantly.

Mu Sicheng faltered—technically, no. That Tang guy hadn't said anything untrue... Bai Liu really was nasty from head to toe, down to every last strand of hair.

But still... it was annoying!

"But so what if he's right? I'm still upset." Liu Jiayi tore her gaze from the siren, her nose wrinkling slightly in rare childish frustration. "I'll do my best to buy you time, so you can beat that frustration out of me too."

Mu Sicheng blinked, then smirked. "OK."

On the fourth basement level, Bai Liu moved quickly through the winding passages.

On either side of the corridor stood oddly shaped, numbered metal rooms, each painted in the same unsettling style. Occasionally, eerie noises echoed from within.

Even more troublesome were the patrols stationed at every corner.

Though few in number, they were positioned so strategically that Bai Liu couldn't enter the game smoothly—every attempt was interrupted by a patrolman suddenly rounding a corner.

It didn’t take long for Bai Liu to realize that this patrol layout had likely been designed by Tang Erda specifically to hinder [players].

With these ordinary guards patrolling the area, slipping into the game undetected was nearly impossible.

First, Tang Erda had used [Magic Space] to create a small cage around Bai Liu. And once Bai Liu escaped that, he found himself inside a larger, shifting cage formed by the patrols.

Pressing himself against the wall, Bai Liu regulated his breathing, preparing for one last attempt.

He pulled out the coin hanging from his lanyard, ready to enter the game. But just as he was about to summon the system, a patrolman appeared at the other end of the passage. Bai Liu had no choice but to put the coin away and turn down another corridor.

Sure enough, these patrols acted as an elaborate interruption mechanism.

Bai Liu sprinted forward, chased by the patrolman behind him, his eyes flicking to the room markers on either side—1097, 1096…

His escape route was supposed to lead to Room 006. But somehow, he was already in the thousands, despite not having passed every number. It felt like he’d been funneled into a shortcut leading straight into one of the rooms.

…This wasn’t an illusion. The patrols were deliberately herding him toward a specific location.

Bai Liu skidded to a stop at another corner. His gaze landed at the end of the corridor—a dead end.

The room waiting for him was numbered [1087].

Watching from the monitors, Tang Erda raised his communicator and gave a ruthless command.

"All patrolmen, put on your breathing masks. I’m activating waterproof mode. Open the door to the heresy containment room [1087], codename [Devouring Fountain]. Underwater mode will commence. All units, prepare—"

"—3, 2—"

The small windows on the metal doors around Bai Liu snapped shut one after another. Each door retracted, blending seamlessly into the corridor's smooth metal walls.

Across from him, the patrolman was securing a transparent breathing mask just as the final countdown echoed through the communicator—

"—1."

Behind Bai Liu, the door to [1087] creaked open.

Crystal-clear water spilled out in a steady stream.

Then, with a violent surge, a torrential flood crashed through the corridor. Bai Liu barely had time to turn before he was swept away.

Lift Room
As soon as they stepped inside, Mu Sicheng smashed the surveillance camera.

He tensed slightly. "There's surveillance all over this base, right? Should we be hiding or something…?"
